This concerto presents itself in classic guise—that is, as a suite, based on the old forms, with contrapuntal procedure. Actually it is a virtuoso piece, not merely of the hands but the brain, and an expression very characteristic of the composer. For Mr. Prokofieff has been blessed or cursed with a brain which travels very fast and with the nervous temperament of this era. If the concerto were remarkable only for its electric current which gives a ping to every note, it would have strong claims to attention. With all its afflatus and devil-may-care facility, it is strongly, surely, audaciously put together. For a composer who has produced so much music, and some of it important, Prokofieff is a young man of 41. But in some of these pages he is a bad and not irresponsible boy. He knows very well what he is doing, and he takes an exhilarating, sometimes insolent, pleasure in doing it.

Youth and temperament and what used to be called "panache" go hand and hand with a style that is swift and concise and stripped to the bone of softening harmonies or ornamentation. Everything fits together like a clock and sometimes it clicks like a typewriter.

The very opening is a flag-signal of what is to come, and from this moment our play boy of contemporaneous music rejoices in his modern apparatus and his skill and technical immunity from disaster. Had the piece been written in the middle '90s it might possibly have been a thunderous work of display, with all sorts of embroidery and firecrackers. And this piece is fireworks, but of a genuinely musical kind. The dissonances explode like rockets and the whole thing sizzles and whirls. And there at the piano sits the boy, playing like a whirlwind, and juggling rhythms, counterpoints, imitations and anything you please as if he could toss three more balls in the air and still ride the orchestra!

The orchestra is severely put to it, rhythmically speaking, and last night, like the soloist, it richly deserved the title of virtuoso.

The purely orchestral works were Bach, Two Preludes arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, the first an arrangement of the prelude to an organ fugue, the second an arrangement, with counterpoint added of the Prelude from the Partita in E major for unaccompanied violin. Bach "arrangements" seem almost to have become a disease. Those heard last night are musicianly and continent in style, though the thought arises that if Bach, in the Prelude of the E major Partita, had wanted counterpoint — even the sparing touches of it which Pick-Magiagalli supplies with taste and care—he would probably have written it. Of course, these pieces did display the magnificent texture and brilliancy of the string choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky concluded his concerto with the Berlioz "Fantastic" Symphony. To this work he gives a peculiarly poetic and imaginative character, and in certain places accomplishes remarkable and original things by the emphasis of understatement. This relieves the music of its occasional bad taste. But a certain kind of bad taste, or let us say, more exactly, immoderation, is a quality of Berlioz's genius. The orchestra played the music with extraordinary subtlety and suggestion. The climax of the last movement was thrown into the higher and more savage relief by what had gone before. There was a nightmarish vagueness, contrasting with sudden violence, in the March to the Scaffold. But one craved more recklessness in the reading, which tended to be too finished and refined for that madman of genius, Hector Berlioz.

The orchestra warmly applauded program and performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

JAN 6 - 1933

Who's News Today

By Lemuel F. Parton

[Special Dispatch to The Evening Sun]

NEW YORK, JAN. 6.

THE more recondite of the musical fraternity sounded their underground tocsin for last night's New York appearance, with the Boston Symphony of Serge Prokofieff, Russian composer and pianist, who keenly interests the modern musical world. He played the solo part in his new Fifth Pianoforte Concerto.

He is acclaimed as a modernist who is, at the same time, intelligible. Young, daring, explosive, he has confounded the musical standpatters by a virtuosity of technique and just enough genuflection to the orthodox to absolve him from the sawmill and trip-hammer classification of the dissonant musical reds. The critics apparently find in him a link between the "revolutionary documents" of Dimitri Shostakovitch, one of which was unscrolled here Tuesday night by Leopold Stokowski, and the psaltery and harp of the classicists.

He blazed out with his own opera at 8 and took first prize as pianist when he was graduated from the Leningrad Conservatory. In 1917, to the obligato of gunfire, he began ten years of wandering around the world, venturing masterfully, in this period, into composition. He first attracted attention in America in 1926 with his series of Boston concerts. In 1927, he visited Russia and was enthusiastically acclaimed. Tunes from his opera, Love for Three Oranges, produced in Chicago, are hummed all over the world. Last November, Furtwangler's rendering of his new G Major Piano Concerto in Berlin was a musical event of world interest. His Scynthia Suite, Visions Fugitives and Le Vilain Petit Canard are other notable compositions.

On his long wanderjahr he acquired a Spanish wife, Senorita Llubera. He is one of the authentic musical geniuses of the age.

THE veterans yet may be pleading, "Woodrum spare that axe." He is Representative Clifton Alexander Woodrum, of Virginia, chairman of the House Veterans' Appropriations Committee, and he proposes to slash $85,000,000 from the said appropriations.

Furthermore, he's Judge Cliff Woodrum, not so long ago a member of Roxy's Gang at the Capitol Theater, working as a regular trouper and singing, Carry Me Back to Old Virginny. This rendition and his famous recitation, Stub Yo' Toe, impelled him inevitably to the professional stage, where he was a great success, as well as on the radio. He is a lawyer of Roanoke, born and reared there, in Congress ten years now. If the Farm Board and its cotton agency were really corporate entities, they would have blisters all over them, raised by Mr. Woodrum.

Rep. C. A. Woodrum

"I think the most pitiable class of citizens in the world are the farmers," he said a few months ago. "And when I say farmers, I mean farmers. I do not mean the white-collared, frock-tailed fellow that comes up here and parks at the Mayflower Hotel and undertakes to tell Congress what it should do to relieve the farmer."

8A

NEW YORK SUN

JAN 6 - 1933

Prokofieff Plays Own Concerto

Composer Is Piano Soloist at Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Lovers of orchestral music have had a febrile week. Tuesday night there was the celebrated Stokowski infuriating the Philadelphia Orchestra to deeds of violence in the performance of a symphonic work designed to show us the blessings of the Soviet Government.

On Wednesday the faithful beheld Bruno Walter sitting before a piano and officiating simultaneously as conductor and soloist in the fine concerto grosso of Ernest Bloch. He also permitted us to feed our souls with the warm odors of Richard Strauss's gingerbread ballet. Last night Carnegie Hall was again the scene of orchestral revelations. This time the urbane and unruffled Serge Koussevitzky stood before the Boston Symphony Orchestra and aided and abetted Serge Prokofieff in the introduction to New York of his third piano concerto, the composer at the piano.

Mr. Prokofieff's concerto was produced at a Berlin Philharmonic concert last October 31. It is in five movements. The first is an allegro con brio, written in a condensed and perhaps rather free sonata form. The second is a strongly accentuated section, resembling a march. The third is a toccata for orchestra and piano and contains perhaps the most difficult music in the entire work. The piano part in particular calls for virtuoso skill of high order.

The fourth movement is intended to be the lyric section of the work and is marked larghetto. But it is far from tender or reflective, except for a few moments at the beginning and again at the close. The rest is insistent, heavily accentuated, and suggestive of Cossacks on the keys. The finale is, of course, vivacious and brilliant. The piano part throughout the composition is prominent, though the orchestra has almost as much to say as the solo instrument.

The work is entirely characteristic of its composer. The soloist is called upon to do most of the things that virtuoso pianists delight in—octave scales, chromatics, glissandi, rapid runs, thundering chord successions and all the rest. Mr. Prokofieff's style revels in staccato effects, and in this concerto there is an impression of brittle enunciation from beginning to end. The singing powers of the piano are not taxed. When Mr. Prokofieff is lyric he is severe and when he is not he is frequently exacerbating.

The Sun's recorder confesses to a carefully hidden enjoyment of the Prokofieff xylophonics, though he knows that they do not permit the piano to show its best qualities. But there is something of virility and defiant independence in the style, which forces upon us a kind of unwilling admiration. It does not create love, nor does it stir any emotion. And one is compelled to admit that it makes slight pretense to what has generally been regarded as the beautiful in piano art. The audience of last evening received the work with equanimity, not to say coolness. There was the customary applause at the end, but it was of the politest kind.

The program began with two preludes of Bach, arranged by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli. The first prelude is that prefacing the D minor organ fugue. The second is the prelude of the third partita for violin unaccompanied. The composer has informed us that under the first violin part of the second prelude he composed other parts in strict counterpoint after the manner of Bach. Inexplicably Bach neglected to do this himself, so perhaps we ought to be grateful to Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli for supplying the omission. Bach is gradually being brought up to date by earnest editors of his works. Possibly they will be able to prove to us that we are all mistaken in believing his music to be immortal and concluding that it needed rejuvenation by these Steinachian operations. But some of us have been harrassed with doubts, and after hearing the arrangements of last evening continue to be so.

The concert came to a truly romantic finish with the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Hector Berlioz, about whom at this time conflicting opinions are renewing their activities. Conductors have always been addicted to Berlioz, but the public remains divided against itself. However, one is safe in saying that the cause of the composer is well supported by Mr. Koussevitzky and the gentlemen from Boston.

N. Y. World-Telegram

JAN 6 - 1933

New Prokofieff Concerto Gets Its Premiere Here

Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall Concert, with the Composer Assuming the Piano Part.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IN spite of some accomplished orchestral execution, the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, was one of the most disappointing the writer has ever listened to.

The fault, however, lay not wholly with the program, which had much to commend it—two preludes of Bach arranged for string orchestra by Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli; the fifth piano concerto, in G major, of Serge Prokofieff, a first time in New York, and Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony. Mr. Prokofieff was the soloist.

The transcriptions from Bach were well enough made—treating of the D minor prelude to the ninth organ fugue and the familiar prelude to the third partita for unaccompanied violin. They were none too well played, however. The first was given in a dull and spineless manner, and the second was taken so fast that the ensemble went awry when the counterpoint entered the picture.

New Concerto Arrives Promptly.

Mr. Prokofieff's new concerto has not been dilatory about reaching us. The first performance took place in Berlin at a Philharmonic concert the last day of last October, when the composer assumed the piano part and Wilhelm Furtwaengler conducted. Paris heard it December 10 in the course of a Prokofieff festival, and it was given in Boston before the Bostonians brought it to New York.

Luckily Mr Prokofieff has done better by the world than in this opus. A single hearing is enough to convince one that the fifth concerto, in common and war-worn parlance, is scarcely more than pretentious piffle. There is a "Moderato" which seemingly tries to emulate the charming march in "The Love for Three Oranges"—a pitiable specimen of unsuccess. There is a "Larghetto" that sounds like ambitious variations on the famous tune the old cow died to. And these are quite the best of the affair. It was brilliantly performed by Mr. Prokofieff and the orchestra.

Movements Soporifically Placid.

I had expected that the Koussevitzky imagination would be fired by the symphony (one recalled what gorgeous things the Russian conductor had done with Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture). How keen, then, the disappointment! For dull, soporific placidity the first three movements of this mad work could hardly have been beaten. The "March to the Scaffold," in its turn, produced some effect. But that section is practically conductor-proof. In the finale ("A Witches' Sabbath") Mr. Koussevitzky's acute dynamic sense stood him in good stead. Yet his reading of the tempestuous music was sane and cautious, saved from utter ineptitude only by the aforesaid dynamic sense and the masterly orchestration of the composer.

A large audience accepted this concert with courteous forbearance, really demonstrative only after the resounding fortissimos of the concluding peroration.

Herald MUSIC Dec 17

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's ninth concert which took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony in A minor No. 4. Converse "Prophecy," tone poem for soprano (Beata Malkin) and orchestra (first performance). Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3 A minor ("Scotch").

In his fourth symphony Sibelius escaped from Tchaikovsky and any other predecessor or contemporary. In this symphony he proclaimed triumphantly his own individuality. In so doing he stepped forward as a great master of symphonic writing. No doubt this particular work is to some, perhaps to many easy-going listeners, a stumbling block. They miss the sensuous strains that are too often lush; they miss measures that are joyfully expected, conclusions that are anticipated. They miss a "story," one that "explains" the music, an episode in a composer's life, a romantic episode that led into a tragic situation. They miss decorative trappings, brilliant rhetoric. Not for them is Walt Whitman's saying: "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments." They welcome the first symphony because they are reminded of Tchaikovsky in his most flambuoyant vein. To them the Fourth is inexplicable because the music comes from the moods, the mental reflections of the composer suggested possibly by northern scenery, more likely by brooding on life and its problems. Only in the last movement do they prick up their ears and assume a pleasant expression welcoming the jingle of the glockenspiel. Here is music that is not to be explained; music that by the economy of means and the simplicity of expression is a source of wonder to the musician who is more than a tradesman; music that to the imaginative listener compels attention, cheers and uplifts his soul. But mood should answer mood; otherwise this Fourth symphony is not for the listener who can only say: "Yes, I am fond of music, but I know what I like" and so dismisses Sibelius when he is at his greatest.

Mr. Converse arranged for his new tone poem lines from the 34th and 35th chapters of Isaiah. He arranged them so they formed a dramatic sequence: The call to the people to heed the indignation of the Lord, who will take vengeance on nations. Their palaces shall be laid waste, but for Israel the desert shall rejoice. The dramatic splendor of Isaiah's prophecy calls for dramatic music and dramatic singer. There is the contrast between the vengeance and the blessing. Mr. Converse has given the necessary expression, especially in the orchestral writing, for here voice part is bound together with the orchestral. The denunciatory pages are forceful but not theatrical; in the measures of blessing, there is no descent to the sentimentalism that is dear to English composers of anthems when they set music to passages from the Prophets and the Psalms, even when these composers have been awarded from Oxford the degree of Mus. Doc. "Prophecy" is a noteworthy addition to Mr. Converse's list of works. Miss Malkin has been blessed by nature with a powerful, dramatic voice, which, however, is of fine quality in the middle register. Like many singers in Germany she is inclined to throw a heavy accent on the first note of every measure regardless of the text and the music. This undue accentuation becomes monotonous. Nor was her attack, especially of the extreme upper notes, always decided and clean. On the whole she made a favorable impression and shared with the composer the hearty applause.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave a pleasing reading of Mendelssohn's symphony which he conducted here for the first time. Mendelssohn himself, as a conductor, took all allegros at a very fast pace. Even in his lifetime his tempi were adversely criticised except by the English to whom everything he did and wrote was admirable. The "Scotch" symphony does not wear so well as the "Italian" but it is much preferable to the "Reformation." Even in the best of the symphonies one cannot help remembering the portrait showing the composer with an ingratiating smile, a huge bulging shirt front with a stickpin prominently displayed; or Aubrey Beardsley's amusing caricature of the blameless prig which was published in the Savoy, a magazine that was too good to live. The performance of the "Scotch" yesterday was grateful to the oldest members of the audience; interesting to others by its contrast with the Fourth of Sibelius.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The concerts of next week will be on Thursday, instead of Saturday evening, and on Friday afternoon. Program: The suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan"; Martinu, string quartet with orchestra; Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony.

IN THE THEATRES TONIGHT

Brooklyn Times Union

JAN 7 - 1933

MUSIC

Prokofieff Concerto Given

Brooklyn had its opportunity to hear Serge Prokofieff's new piano concerto, his fifth, last night when it was presented in the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, with the composer at the ~~piano.~~ The first New York performance of the work was given on the preceding night in Carnegie Hall.

In a newspaper interview with Mr. Prokofieff, printed as part of the program notes, the composer outlined his creative method, explaining that before undertaking a work of major proportions he accumulated "melodies" enough for three or so symphonies or concerti, as the case might be. Upon these melodies, he said, his work was based.

Now, if we accept the dictionary definition of melody as "a succession of agreeable sounds," it is doubtful if there were many in his audience of last night who recognized the operation of Mr. Prokofieff's technique.

The fault, if there be any, does not lie altogether with the composer, of course. But it is a difficult thing for an audience which has through years of listening to the best music built up a "hearers' technique" based on certain notions of what constitute melody and harmony to listen appreciatively to a work in which these notions are frequently disregarded.

Serge Prokofieff is, by his own avowal, if it were needed, an outright modernist, which is to say, an experimenter. Some day, perhaps when a larger part of our programs are made up of music of this type, we will be able to see the melody in this concerto, because we have attained to the composer's idea of the nature of the word.

Suffice it to say, for the present, that the new work is ingeniously contrived of strange melodies, weird harmonies and orchestration that is novel, but, to one ear, somewhat lacking in richness. Mr. Prokofieff, in his capacity of pianist displayed greater power and technical facility than beauty of tone.

Dr. Koussevitzky might have been kinder than to "spot" the concerto following the works of Bach and Brahms. Arrangements of two master composers as Bach and orchestra opened the program. The conductor gave a particularly reverent reading of the first in keeping with its mood. The second in a more spirited vein, was also pleasing.

Brahms' Third Symphony, which was heard next, served further not to prepare the audience for Mr Prokofieff's gropings. Even the somewhat gaudy, but thrilling Spanish Caprice, of Rimsky-Korsakoff, closing the program, gained in importance by virtue of the performance of the concerto. T. M.

Copeland

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 7 - 1933

Spalding Goes On Air Jan. 14

Albert Spalding will be heard as violin soloist Saturday, January 14, during the second of the series of concerts being presented over the National Broadcasting Company networks by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Spalding, a Chicagoan by birth, has attained wide fame in the music centers of Europe as well as in the United States, and was selected as soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra on the first European tour ever made by an American symphony orchestra.

The Boston Symphony programs are being broadcast over NBC stations this Winter in the famous orchestra's first radio series.

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master of the Boston Symphony, will direct the concert.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 7 - 1933

Koussevitzky Superb Appearance Here

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky appeared with his eminent Orchestra Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall in his s his New York series. As usual, his program was cont and finely performed.

The program comprised two preludes by Bach, a orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, piano concerto No. 5 in by Prokofieff, with the composer at the piano, Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony in C major, opus 14 A.

The piano concerto of Prokofieff was given its initial performance in New York. It was given its first performance anywhere only last October in Berlin. It is in five short movements, the whole taking but twenty minutes to perform. In the words of the composer "each movement contains at least four themes or melodies." Each theme, though, is not merely stated, but developed.

Have Separate Themes

And as the composer has pointed out the development is not cyclic in the Caesar Franck manner where several movements are developed from one theme or group of themes. Each of the Prokofieff movements has its own separate themes with some reference to the material of the first movement in the third and some of the material of the third in the finale. Also noteworthy is that the piano score has at all times the leading part, but its themes are closely knitted to the pattern of the orchestra.

In this music there is honesty and in it there is a definite promise of permanency for the ultra-moderns. It is a rare example, but it has the sincerity throughout for which practically all other "modern" disciples strive, to give them the benefit of the doubt, and fall far short of on the whole. Prokofieff's purpose is clearly defined in this concerto. It has a definite clarity and beauty of line despite the dissonances this type of music affects. Prokofieff, himself a virtuoso pianist, masterfully brought out the merits and apparent qualities of his striking work. Each cadence was abrupt, but astonishingly dramatic, each was a climax in itself.

The two preludes of Bach, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, were transcribed in the true Bach fashion, wholly contrapuntal. The first prelude, in D minor, is in a slow, dignified tempo, and very delicately and finely interpreted by the orchestra. The second was much more brilliant in conception and performance.

Ecstacies and Despairs

The second half of the program was taken up with the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony. It is in five movements, and is the first part of a work called "Episode in the Life of An Artist" and deals with Berlioz trying to vent, at the time, an unrequited fever for the person of one Henrietta Smithson, hardly a glamorous appellation, who was toast of the theater of her day and whom three years after he had worked off his frustration musically he married and was sorry for it.

The symphony is a description of a brainstorm through which wanders Henrietta, in allegorical form, hectoring and bedeviling Berlioz, also in allegory, as a love-sick young musician, who gives all for, to his mind, the damnable maiden. Melancholy, murderous anger, joy, all the ecstacies and all the despairs such a mad young man might think up.

But, no matter the theme, the symphony is a masterpiece of conception and construction. The third movement, the scene in the meadows, in adagio f

most haunting pa
It has the illusiv
Corot. The f
"March to the S ing else but hi sharply realistic the axe. The fi
Witches Sabbath, fugue. Its satire is overwhelming

THIS CLI BROOK
E.
JAN
M

Prokofiew
Acad

Serge Prol
Symphony Orc evening and h it might be manners (of v Scythian Suite romanticism c of this concer strikes the lis Prokofiew wit with it sitting books, choosin and desultoril certo of them tinguished m cept the craft together.
Somehow w kofiew than r do. He is so is so obvious amaginative music provid genial mode c distressing to wasting his t thing that a contempora well if not ter how wel mately of so little g of music who do pos
a respons away.
The con
Hall Thurs of Music las Intention a compositions men of the that we hav

distinction of material concerto.

Last evening the composer himself played the piano part in his work. It was a virtuoso's task, for the writing for the solo instrument is difficult and showy, and he acquitted himself of it with all the necessary skill. Mr. Koussewitsky and the orchestra provided a vigorous and clean cut accompaniment.

The orchestral numbers on the program were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of two Bach preludes, already familiar to Mr. Koussewitsky's Brooklyn audience, Brahms' F major symphony, and Rimsky's Spanish Caprice.

FREDERICK NEW

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 6 - 1933

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Mr. Prokofieff Has a Bout With Euterpe: Ringside Notes on a New Concerto

Second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; assisting artist, Serge Prokofieff, composer-pianist. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach—Pick-Mangiagalli,
   Two Preludes, Arranged for Strings
2. Prokofieff,
   Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55
   Mr. Prokofieff
   (First time in New York.)

Intermission

3. Berlioz.........."Fantastic" Symphony

THE thing I have always liked best about Mr. Prokofieff is an answer he gave some years ago to Mr. Olin Downes in the course of an interview. When Mr. Downes asked him who were the most important of living Russian composers, Mr. Prokofieff replied, quite simply: "Stravinsky, Myself, and Miaskovsky." I liked the scrupulous exactness with which Mr. Prokofieff ranked himself—neither, vaingloriously, first; nor, mock-modestly, last. But just about where, I fancy, he belongs.

Observing last night the second most important Russian composer as he appeared upon the stage of Carnegie Hall, lank, blond, unobtrusive, pleasantly awkward; hearing him play his new concerto for piano with his friend and champion Mr. Koussevitzky and the great orchestra from the East, I wondered if the simplicity and naïve candor of the man were not reflected in his music.

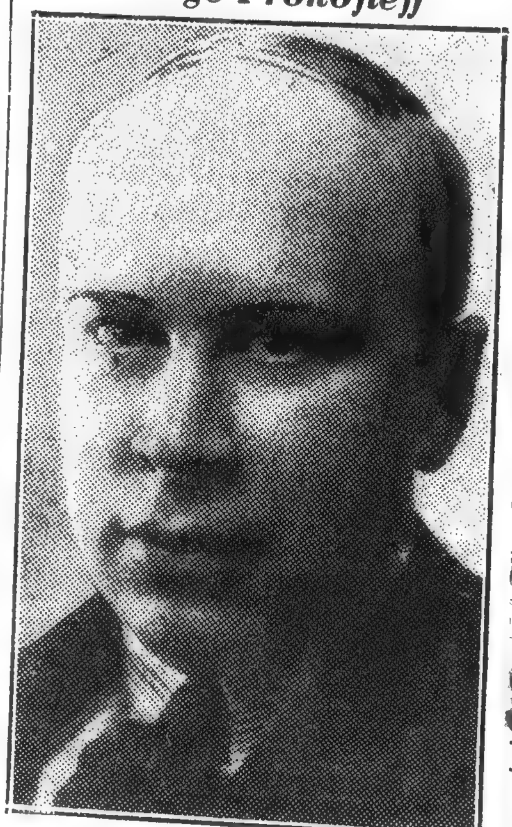
* * *

Mr. Prokofieff has long had here the reputation of being an horrendous modernist. When he played one of his earlier piano concertos in New York a decade ago, the music gave pain in certain quarters because the "object of its harmonic structure seemed to be," it was said, "to avoid every succession of tones in which the ingenuous, unsophisticated musical ear might recognize obvious beauty." I cannot honestly lay claim to the possession of an ingenuous or unsophisticated ear; nor do I think it important that an ear of that sort should be pleased, or that a composer is under any obligation to be obvious. Yet nothing could be more easily accessible than this new music that Mr. Prokofieff displayed to us last night, if we will only take it for what it is, and not for something that it has no desire or ability to be.

* * *

Mr. Prokofieff explained the other day in Boston to "The Transcript's" accomplished Mr. Myers that all his work is "founded on melodies." "When I begin a work of major proportions," he said, "I have usually accumulated enough themes to make half a dozen symphonies." When he began his new score, he tells us, he had "enough melodies to make three concertos." If one may judge from the result, Mr. Prokofieff is hoarding. I was not aware last evening of the presence of more than the normal depression allowance of melodies. But there is no excuse for being unreasonable about these things,

Serge Prokofieff



Boston Symphony Soloist

and I am glad to proclaim the melodiousness of this concerto.

* * *

Of course Mr. Prokofieff's type of melody is highly personal, as it should be. Who would wish him to write melodies like those of Brahms or Tchaikovsky? He has described his own: they are patterned upon "successions of tones which form curves that up to date have not been recognized as melodic." Well, they are hereby recognized as melodic.

Some may find that these cantilenas exhale a rather wintry lyricism. But that is the character of Mr. Prokofieff's Muse. She is a lustily boreal maiden, muscular and downright, and a little strident, simple of heart and mind, as forthright as she is naïve.

* * *

This concerto is likable and amusing, lusty, insouciant, adolescent. Mr. Prokofieff, after the manner of his period, regards the piano as an antagonist rather than as a confidante or a mistress. He has no secrets for Euterpe's ear, and he would consider it disgraceful to make love to her. He treats the keyboard, for the most part, as an instrument of percussion—even his melodic utterances have a belligerent tone; and last night his energetic bouts with the adversary were as exhilarating to those at the ringside as they evidently were to him.

Nothing could have been better sport than watching Mr. Prokofieff's Muse as she sparred with him in this concerto. It was, all of it, good, clean fun, and most of the audience seemed to enjoy the match.

* * *

This, naturally, was the feature of the performance—even though Mr. Koussevitzky followed it with the "Symphonie Fantastique." Mr. Koussevitzky, like most conductors, is fond of the "Fantastique." There are concert-goers who share his evident regard for it. Let us respect their sentiments.

New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1933

Albert Spalding Soloist With Boston Symphony

Violinist Will Play Mozart Concerto Over WJZ

Albert Spalding, violinist, will be heard as soloist next Saturday during the second of the series of concerts being presented over National Broadcasting Company networks by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Spalding's appearance Saturday is said to be his first concert heard on the radio within the last year. The program, which will be carried over mphony Hall in Boston at lows:

ony .....Vaughan Williams
.Lento Moderato; Mod-Presto; Lento.
olin in D major.....Mozart
ite cantabile; Rondo;
ioso.
n and orchestra...Chausson ballet "Petrouchka".
Stravinsky

rgin, assistant conductor aster of the Boston Symlrect the concert.

l Symphony is considered one of Vaughan Williams's greatest achievements. Williams, an Englishman and professor of composition in the Royal College of Music in London, bases his work largely on folk songs and the early music of England.

The Mozart concerto, in which Spalding will be heard as soloist, is one of five which the Austrian composer wrote in 1775, and the second in D major. As is characteristic of Mozart's violin concertos, this starts elaborately in the first movement, the second is simple and tuneful and the third is in the form of a rondo.

The "Poeme" was composed by Ernest Chausson in 1896, three years before his death in an accident, and was given its first performance by Ysaye in Paris in 1897.

The suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" was first played in the United States as a concert number under the Russian composer's own direction in 1924. The ballet tells the story of an old charlatan and three miraculously animated puppets, a dancing girl, a blackmoor and a clown.

CLIPPING FROM
ork Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1933

ld Brooklyn Concert Given y Boston Symphony Orchestra oussevitzky Conducts Another in Season's of Academy of Music Programs; Jane F.

Betrothed; Benefit Card Party Aids Blind auspices of the Brooklyn rts and Sciences the Philciety of Brooklyn and the mittee, the Boston Symstra, conducted by Serge

, gave the second concert on Friday evening at the ademy of Music. Mr.
Sinderen is chairman of Committee.

YORK TIMES

JAN 8 - 1933

zky Wins Plaudits.

ear of grace and of iversaries from Haydn
it was the benediction n's Seventh Symphony
t to a classic close the phony Orchestra's sec-
' the season yesterday
t Carnegie Hall. A ouse applauded Mr. y and the orchestra in t carried reminders of n rhythm was yet an sic a spiritual refreshokofieff, the Russian nd pianist, was again as on the preceding playing his piano con-

, Op. 55. Still with the nacity of his youthful tours, the artist at e retained a sharply viduality and intensity.
r times recalled.
ssevitzky opened the th Vaughan Williams's n a theme of Thomas er of English cathedral ork first heard here ten and made melodious
by the transparent choir on strings. W. B. C.

---

ork Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1933

rmonic and Boston estras Heard Here

rk Musicians Give 4th Concert for Children

Two orchestras played at Carnegie Hall yesterday.

Ernest Schelling conducted the fourth concert in the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's elementary series for children and the younger set, beginning his program with two American numbers, George Chadwick's Jubilee Overture and Howard Brockway's Sylvan Suite. A third American work, Henry Hadley's Chinese Sketches, was offered under its composer's direction. Because Harry Glantz, first trumpet of the orchestra, was indisposed, Sol Klass substituted for him as soloist in Saint-Saens's septuor for trumpet, strings and piano. Marching to the stage down the middle aisle of the auditorium, the choristers of St. Thomas Church sang the carol "We Three Kings of Orient Are."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second New York matinee of the season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who began his program with Vaughan Williams's fantasia for strings on a theme by the sixteenth century Briton, Thomas Tallis. Serge Prokofieff made his third successive appearance here in three days as soloist in his own fifth piano concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky then turned from novel to familiar music with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 8 - 1933

CHILDREN HEAR PHILHARMONIC AND BOY CHOIR

Boston Orchestra's Concert Again Features Prokofieff and His Newest Concerto

BY GRENA BENNETT.

Music lovers of every age were appealed to at the two orchestral concerts held yesterday in Carnegie Hall.

Hundreds of children, most of whom have several years to go before reaching their teens, attended the morning event planned by the Philharmonic and presided over by Ernest Schelling.

A high light in the programme was the singing of "We Three Kings" by the surpliced boy choir of St. Thomas's Church. The silvery voiced lads marched slowly down the center aisle while chanting the lovely hymn, sang two stanzas from the front of the stage, and, still singing, proceeded slowly up the aisle to the rear of the hall. It was a picturesque and imposing interlude in the instrumental program.

The list, featuring the wind choirs, comprised compositions by Liadoff - Glazounow, Chadwick, Brockway, Saint-Saens and Henry Hadley, the last named an interested auditor.

PROKOFIEFF AGAIN.

The afternoon program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again double-starred Prokofieff's newest concerto, with the composer at the piano. The work was locally introduced Thursday night in the same hall and under similar musical conditions.

Conductor Koussevitsky presented, besides that work, Williams' Fantasia inspired by a Tallis theme; and, as a closing number, Beethoven's seventh symphony.

* * *

BARITONE HEARD.

At Town Hall yesterday afternoon Heinrich Schlusaus, baritone, made his New York re-appearance and renewed the favorable impression made in former seasons.

A large audience apparently enjoyed his interpretation of lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Strauss and other romantic

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 7 - 1933

Koussevitzky Superb in Appearance Here

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky appeared with his eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall in his second program of his New York series. As usual, his program was contemplatively chosen and finely performed.

The program comprised two preludes by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, piano concerto No. 5 in G major, opus 55, by Prokofieff, with the composer at the piano, Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony in C major, opus 14 A.

The piano concerto of Prokofieff was given its initial performance in New York. It was given its first performance anywhere only last October in Berlin. It is in five short movements, the whole taking but twenty minutes to perform. In the words of the composer "each movement contains at least four themes or melodies." Each theme, though, is not merely stated, but developed.

Have Separate Themes

And as the composer has pointed out the development is not cyclic in the Caesar Franck manner where several movements are developed from one theme or group of themes. Each of the Prokofieff movements has its own separate themes with some reference to the material of the first movement in the third and some of the material of the third in the finale. Also noteworthy is that the piano score has at all times the leading part, but its themes are closely knitted to the pattern of the orchestra.

In this music there is honesty and in it there is a definite promise of permanency for the ultra-moderns. It is a rare example, but it has the sincerity throughout for which practically all other "modern" disciples strive, to give them the benefit of the doubt, and fall far short of on the whole. Prokofieff's purpose is clearly defined in this concerto. It has a definite clarity and beauty of line despite the dissonances this type of music affects. Prokofieff, himself a virtuoso pianist, masterfully brought out the merits and apparent qualities of his striking work. Each cadence was abrupt, but astonishingly dramatic, each was a climax in itself.

The two preludes of Bach, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, were transcribed in the true Bach fashion, wholly contrapuntal. The first prelude, in D minor, is in a slow, dignified tempo, and very delicately and finely interpreted by the orchestra. The second was much more brilliant in conception and performance.

Ecstacies and Despairs

The second half of the program was taken up with the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony. It is in five movements, and is the first part of a work called "Episode in the Life of An Artist" and deals with Berlioz trying to vent, at the time, an unrequited fever for the person of one Henrietta Smithson, hardly a glamorous appellation, who was toast of the theater of her day and whom three years after he had worked off his frustration musically he married and was sorry for it.

The symphony is a description of a brainstorm through which wanders Henrietta, in allegorical form, hectoring and bedeveling Berlioz, also in allegory, as a love-sick young musician, who gives all for, to his mind, the damnable maiden. Melancholy, murderous anger, joy, all the ecstacies and all the despairs such a mad young man might think up.

But, no matter the theme, the symphony is a masterpiece of conception and construction. The third movement, the scene in the meadows, in adagio form, is one of the most haunting pastorals to be heard. It has the illusive atmosphere of a Corot. The fourth movement, "March to the Scaffold," was nothing else but highly graphic and sharply realistic, even to the blow of the axe. The final movement, "A Witches Sabbath," has a remarkable fugue. Its satire on religious music is overwhelming in its vituperation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 7 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Prokofiew Plays His New Piano Concerto at the Academy of Music—Recitals by a Singer and a Pianist

Serge Prokofiew's new piano concerto, introduced at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Manhattan and Brooklyn Thursday evening and last night, is rather less consequential than I had hoped it might be. Written in the least interesting of the composer's several manners (of which, roughly, there are four: the neo-barbarism of the Scythian Suite, the neo-classicism of the Classical symphony, the neo-romanticism of the "Love of Three Oranges" and the neo-modernism of this concerto, which combines elements from the other three), it strikes the listener as the product of a rainy day. We can imagine Prokofiew with time on his hands and not much idea of what to do with it sitting down with his note books, choosing themese at random and desultorily fashioning this concerto of them. It is casual, undistinguished music in everything except the craft with which it is put together.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, Serge Prokofiew, composer-pianist, soloist. At the Academy of Music last night under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THE PROGRAM

Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli . Two Preludes
Brahms .... Third Symphony
Prokofiew ...... Fifth Piano Concerto
Rimsky-Korsakow ... Spanish Caprice

Somehow we expect more of Prokofiew than merely this. At least I do. He is so obviously talented, he is so obviously a born musician—an amaginative artist, that is, whom music provides with the most congenial mode of expression—that it is distressing to discover he has been wasting his time writing the sort of thing that any number of his lesser contemporaries can write at least as well if not better and that, no matter how well it is written, is ultimately of no importance. There is so little genuine talent in the world of music today that the few men who do possess it have, so to speak, a responsibility not to fritter it away.

The concerto played at Carnegie Hall Thursday and at the Academy of Music last night is so similar in intention and effect to countless compositions by the bright young men of the modern musical world that we have heard in the last ten years, that what was said of any of them might be repeated verbatim of it. It is the product of cleverness, sophistication, a determination not to be serious or to be caught in the act of expressing a sincere emotion, plus great technical adroitness and facility. In its way, it succeeds in being diverting, in passing 20 minutes or so of the listener's time without making him fidget in his seat. But when it is over, it is quickly forgotten, like a chance acquaintance whose conversational irrelevancies have amused us for a time, but whose face and name we cannot recall five minutes after his departure.

Structurally, the concerto is divided into five movements, some of them free in form, others deriving from classical models. The first movement is an allegro, the second a march (despite Prokofiew's depreciation of the term), the third a toccata, the fourth a songful larghetto, the fifth n swift tempo with a coda appended. The writing throughout is polyphonic; the harmonic idiom extremely dissonant, the general effect that of a nervous, ejaculatory style. Prokofiew has written quite a bit in this manner, usually for the theater, but seldom has produced anything with less dictinction of material than this concerto.

Last evening the composer himself played the piano part in his work. It was a virtuoso's task, for the writing for the solo instrument is difficult and showy, and he acquitted himself of it with all the necessary skill. Mr. Koussewitsky and the orchestra provided a vigorous and clean cut accompaniment.

The orchestral numbers on the program were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of two Bach preludes, already familiar to Mr. Koussewitsky's Brooklyn audience, Brahms' F major symphony, and Rimsky's Spanish Caprice.

FREDERICK NEW

Newr
ist.

New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1933

Albert Spalding Soloist With Boston Symphony

Violinist Will Play Mozart Concerto Over WJZ

Albert Spalding, violinist, will be heard as soloist next Saturday during the second of the series of concerts being presented over National Broadcasting Company networks by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Spalding's appearance Saturday is said to be his first concert heard on the radio within the last year. The program, which will be carried over WJZ from Symphony Hall in Boston at 8:15 p. m., follows:

Pastoral Symphony ..... Vaughan Williams
Molto Moderato; Lento Moderato; Moderato pesante; Presto; Lento.
Concerto for Violin in D major ..... Mozart
Allegro; Andante cantabile; Rondo; Andante grazioso.
Poeme for violin and orchestra ... Chausson
Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka". Stravinsky

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master of the Boston Symphony, will direct the concert.

The Pastoral Symphony is considered one of Vaughan Williams's greatest achievements. Williams, an Englishman and professor of composition in the Royal College of Music in London, bases his work largely on folk songs and the early music of England.

The Mozart concerto, in which Spalding will be heard as soloist, is one of five which the Austrian composer wrote in 1775, and the second in D major. As is characteristic of Mozart's violin concertos, this starts elaborately in the first movement, the second is simple and tuneful and the third is in the form of a rondo.

The "Poeme" was composed by Ernest Chausson in 1896, three years before his death in an accident, and was given its first performance by Ysaye in Paris in 1897.

The suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" was first played in the United States as a concert number under the Russian composer's own direction in 1924. The ballet tells the story of an old charlatan and three miraculously animated puppets, a dancing girl, a blackmoor and a clown.

CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1933

Second Brooklyn Concert Given By Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Another in Season's Series of Academy of Music Programs; Jane F. Fyfe Betrothed; Benefit Card Party Aids Blind

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Citizens Cimmittee, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave the second concert of the season on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the Citizens Committee.

NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 8 - 1933

Koussevitzky Wins Plaudits.

In this year of grace and of musical anniversaries from Haydn to Wagner, it was the benediction of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony that brought to a classic close the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second visit of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. A crowded house applauded Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in a work that carried reminders of an age when rhythm was yet an art and music a spiritual refreshment.

Sergei Prokofieff, the Russian composer and pianist, was again the soloist, as on the preceding Thursday, playing his piano concerto No. 5, Op. 55. Still with the panther tenacity of his youthful American tours, the artist at middle age retained a sharply etched individuality and intensity. He was four times recalled.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the matinee with Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis, father of English cathedral music, a work first heard here ten years ago and made melodious once more by the transparent choir of the Boston strings. W. B. C.

New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 8 - 1933

Philharmonic and Boston Orchestras Heard Here

New York Musicians Give 4th Concert for Children

Two orchestras played at Carnegie Hall yesterday.

Ernest Schelling conducted the fourth concert in the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's elementary series for children and the younger set, beginning his program with two American numbers, George Chadwick's Jubilee Overture and Howard Brockway's Sylvan Suite. A third American work, Henry Hadley's Chinese Sketches, was offered under its composer's direction. Because Harry Glantz, first trumpet of the orchestra, was indisposed, Sol Klass substituted for him as soloist in Saint-Saens's septuor for trumpet, strings and piano. Marching to the stage down the middle aisle of the auditorium, the choristers of St. Thomas Church sang the carol "We Three Kings of Orient Are."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second New York matinee of the season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who began his program with Vaughan Williams's fantasia for strings on a theme by the sixteenth century Briton, Thomas Tallis. Serge Prokofieff made his third successive appearance here in three days as soloist in his own fifth piano concerto, and Mr. Koussevitzky then turned from novel to familiar music with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

JAN 8 - 1933

CHILDREN HEAR PHILHARMONIC AND BOY CHOIR

Boston Orchestra's Concert Again Features Prokofieff and His Newest Concerto

BY GRENA BENNETT.

Music lovers of every age were appealed to at the two orchestral concerts held yesterday in Carnegie Hall.

Hundreds of children, most of whom have several years to go before reaching their teens, attended the morning event planned by the Philharmonic and presided over by Ernest Schelling.

A high light in the programme was the singing of "We Three Kings" by the surpliced boy choir of St. Thomas's Church. The silvery voiced lads marched slowly down the center aisle while chanting the lovely hymn, sang two stanzas from the front of the stage, and, still singing, proceeded slowly up the aisle to the rear of the hall. It was a picturesque and imposing interlude in the instrumental program.

The list, featuring the wind choirs, comprised compositions by Liadoff - Glazounow, Chadwick, Brockway, Saint-Saens and Henry Hadley, the last named an interested auditor.

PROKOFIEFF AGAIN.

The afternoon program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra again double-starred Prokofieff's newest concerto, with the composer at the piano. The work was locally introduced Thursday night in the same hall and under similar musical conditions.

Conductor Koussevitsky presented, besides that work, Williams' Fantasia inspired by a Tallis theme; and, as a closing number, Beethoven's seventh symphony.

* * *

BARITONE HEARD.

At Town Hall yesterday afternoon Heinrich Schlusaus, baritone, made his New York re-appearance and renewed the favorable impression made in former seasons.

A large audience apparently enjoyed his interpretation of lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Strauss and other romantic

Symphony on the Radio a Success—to an Extent

Adv. Jan 8

By Moses Smith

Music Editor

THE PROGRAM of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on Saturday evening, New Year's Eve, was broadcast over a nation-wide hook-up, the first of a series of 12 such broadcasts. Since I had heard the same program in actual performance in the concert hall on the preceding afternoon, there was offered an opportunity, too good to miss, to compare what the listener hears from his radio set and what he would hear sitting before the orchestra itself.

The program consisted of two Bach preludes, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli; the third symphony of Brahms; the new fifth piano concerto of Prokofieff, with the composer as soloist, and the brilliant Spanish Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Let us clear the ground further by pointing out that the actual performance of the orchestra on Friday afternoon was, in turn, poetic and incisive, dramatic and lyric, virtuosic and witty, brilliant and sonorous — in short, an illuminating recreation of what the respective composers wanted to sound out of the instruments.

* * *

THE SAME brilliant performance was heard in Symphony Hall on Saturday night. At that time I was high up in a loft of Symphony Hall, where a technician sat before an instrument called the controls, while in back of him was a huge receiving set. The job of this man is complicated.

So far as I can understand it and describe it in a sentence, it is to regulate the quantity of tone being broadcast so that the sensitive pick-up apparatus does not transmit any unpleasant blasts of tone or noise.

For this apparatus has definite limits of dynamics (which means quantity of sound), and is especially sensitive to certain sounds of great volume, like the beat of a bass drum, which the naked ear in the concert hall can accommodate quite readily.

The man at the radio controls must listen carefully for even a hint that such a blast is coming and take the necessary remedial precautions. It goes without saying that a competent technician at the controls, who happens also to be a musician, familiar with the music being played, will be the best man for the job.

* * *

THE BROADCAST on this occasion was on the whole a huge success, in my opinion. What I heard coming from the receiving set was, as compared with other radio programs, excellent in quality of tone and clarity of detail.

Partly this was due to the fact that I was hearing the reproduction from the finest set in my experience; partly also to the fact that this set was not picking up music from the air, as broadcast by WBZ, but directly from the line which was feeding the hook-up. But both these details were not of vital importance, I was assured by the radio officials; the reception on the average set in the home would compare favorably with what I was hearing. And outside reports, after the broadcast, seemed to verify this contention.

Compare now the concert as broadcast with the performance in the hall. Both Bach preludes were very clear—clearer perhaps than in the concert hall in respect to the development of the various parts. The lower strings (double-basses, particularly) were resonant and well defined. But their intonation, so accurate in the concert hall, was not sufficiently definite coming from the receiver.

The Brahms symphony came out surprisingly well in all essentials and in most details. One important exception I noticed was in the fourth movement at a point where the first French horn has a rising phrase accompanied by a typically Brahmsian swell in tone. At the top point of the crescendo there was an unpleasant blast. The reason I assume, was that the man at the controls had not expected quite so sudden an increase in tone.

Continued in Column 7

THE SYMPHONY VIA RADIO

Continued from Column 2

The Prokofieff concerto, ultramodern music, dissonant in character and, in all likelihood, unpleasant to most radio listeners, was broadcast with surprising faithfulness. The piano part of this work was even more audible above the welter of orchestral sound than it had been in the concert hall. Perhaps the composer might have objected that it was too clear; that he had in mind a somewhat different balance between the piano and orchestra, as we actually heard it in the concert hall. The quality of piano tone was another matter. It is no secret that the problem of reproducing the tone of the piano on the radio has not yet been solved.

Concluded on Page 8, Column 4

THE SYMPHONY VIA RADIO

Continued from Page 6

The final number was the Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice, an extraordinary experiment in orchestral virtuosity. In a conversation I had with Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, some time before the broadcast, he had expressed greatest anxiety over the reproduction of this work, primarily because it is scored so heavily and brilliantly for various percussion instruments.

As matters turned out, either the fear was groundless or the brilliant conductor anticipated the difficulty by toning down his percussion. I suspect the latter was the case; and if it was, we are faced with the conclusion that radio IS changing performances originally intended for listeners in the concert hall.

In substance, the broadcast was a good imitation of the actual performance. If I were asked to choose between sitting at home and listening to the radio performance of the program, with all the attendant physical comforts, and, on the other hand, hearing the performance at Symphony Hall, I should not hesitate to choose the latter, regarding sound alone as the criterion and leaving entirely out of account the unexplainable thrill of being present at actual music-making. But I can understand that others might not be so fastidious, especially—and here is the cat come out of the bag—if they have never heard the real thing.

Globe Jan 8

Williams' "Pastoral" Symphony

Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral" Symphony is a score which some qualified observers have pronounced as a notable achievement by one of the most notable of contemporary composers. It is likewise a score which the majority of Boston concert-goers have hitherto not been permitted to hear in their own city. Now Richard Burgin has elected to play it at the Boston Symphony concerts this week, which he will conduct in the absence of Dr Koussevitzky.

This "Pastoral" Symphony was composed about 11 years ago. It was performed in this country twice from manuscript. When it was published in 1924, Lawrence Gilman made a detailed examination of the score and set down at length in the New York Herald Tribune what he found therein. The symphony has presumably had few performances in this country since then; it was played a while ago here by the student orchestra at the New England Conservatory, but it is undoubtedly not familiar to the rank and file of local music lovers.

Dr Williams has been quoted as saying that there is no authorized "program" for this symphony. Lawrence Gilman, remarking upon this, continues that "Unlike Beethoven's 'Pastoral Symphony' it has no storm music, no imitations of bird songs, none of the obviousness of appeal which has made the meditative beauty of the best parts of Beethoven's 'Pastoral' tolerable to the groundlings—it is all mood, all meditation, all interior loveliness and brooding. It is the English countryside reflected in the heart and spirit of a poet—."

The composer is said not to have used any English folksong for material but that his style in this work was influenced by that sort of music. That may well be, for Dr Williams' labors in collecting English folksong constitute an important part of his services to the musical art. This "Pastoral" Symphony has, naturally, modal turns of melody and harmony, and the composer has made use of the modern device of writing in more than one key simultaneously. There are four movements.

Burgin Conducts Symphony

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the regular Friday and Saturday concerts this week in the absence of Dr Koussevitzky, who is taking his customary mid-season holiday. Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral" Symphony will be introduced to these concerts.

Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, will play the solo parts in Mozart's D major violin concerto (K 218), and Chausson's "Poeme" for violin and orchestra. The closing number will be the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka."

Plan Beethoven's ~~[cut]~~

The above line cut at the clipping edge:

Plan Beethoven's College Choirs---L

Post Jan 8

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There is a plan to perform Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and portions of the first act of "Parsifal" with the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting at the pair of Symphony Concerts next month designed to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, who passed away at Venice on Feb. 13, 1883. Some will feel that Wagner's memory would best be honored by Wagner's music, and by his alone.

NEW YORK SUN

JAN 9 - 1933

Boston Symphony Again Features Prokofieff

The program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at the season's second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday again featured Sergei Prokofieff, playing his piano concerto No. 5, opus 55. A large audience, as on the preceding Thursday, heard the concerto set forth with electrifying virtuosity by both composer and orchestra, and at the end recalled Mr. Prokofieff four times.

The concert opened with Vaughan Williams's orchestral fantasy on a theme of Thomas Tallis, an excellent work of ecclesiastic character which employs old harmonies in modern instrumentation and was introduced to New York a decade ago by the Symphony Society, Walter Damrosch, conductor. In the performance of the work Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky's string choirs gave an admirable account of themselves. The churchly, or rather cathedral mood of the music was especially well brought out. The program closed with Beethoven's seventh symphony, in which the second and third movements took the honors for elasticity of treatment by the orchestra.

Trans. Jan. 10

Albert Spalding, the violinist, has vanished as "assisting artist" in the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday next. Mr. Burgin, deputy conductor, has re-made the program accordingly. It now traverses Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral Symphony"; Musorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain"; the Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

PORTSMOUTH, O.
TIMES

JAN 11 1933

Boston Leader

Dr. Serge Kroussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony, now heard ~~over NBC net~~works in its first radio series.

Gibes at Prokofiev

Trans. Jan 11

"Bout with Euterpe"

TWICE from the Boston Orchestra and the composer, New York heard, last week, the new Piano-Concerto of Prokofiev already played twice at Symphony Hall. About it the Manhattan reviewers wrote variously and amusingly. Said Mr. Gilman in The Herald Tribune: "The concerto is likable and amusing, lusty, insouciant, adolescent. Mr. Prokofiev, after the manner of his period, regards the piano as an antagonist rather than as a confidante or a mistress. He has no secrets for Euterpe's ear, and he would consider it disgraceful to make love to her. He treats the keyboard, for the most part, as an instrument of percussion—even his melodic utterances have a belligerent tone; and his energetic bouts with the adversary were as exhilarating to those at the ringside as they evidently were to him. Nothing could have been better sport than watching Mr. Prokofiev's Muse as she sparred with him in this concerto. It was, all of it, good, clean fun, and most of the audience seemed to enjoy the match."

"Xylophonics"

The Sun's recorder confesses to a carefully hidden enjoyment of the Prokofiev xylophonics, though he knows that they do not permit the piano to show its best qualities. But there is something of virility and defiant independence in the style, which forces upon us a kind of unwilling admiration. It does not create love, nor does it stir any emotion. And one is compelled to admit that it makes slight pretense to what has generally been regarded as the beautiful in piano-art. The audience of last evening received the work with equanimity, not to say coolness. There was the customary applause at the end, but it was of the politest kind. [Mr. Henderson

Suiting the Times

The Concerto has plenty of "go." The orchestra is the big flywheel; the piano, the piston. The results are not so much harsh as merely mechanistic. . . . All is vigorously percussive, highly geared as to rhythms and open and above board as to dynamics. The piano-writing was precise and clearly defined. So was Mr. Prokofiev's playing of it. The orchestral scoring had the same outspoken quality, including a part for drum. The concerto interested the audience and so did the composer, who was recalled to the platform several times. Additions of this kind to the repertory of orchestral soloists are not common. Still, it seems unlikely that the composer and his offspring will be soon parted. [Mr. Thompson in The Evening Post

Continued on Following Page

Gibes at Prokofiev

Continued from Preceding Page

Tartly

A single hearing is enough to convince one that the Fifth Concerto, in common and war-worn parlance, is scarcely more than pretentious piffle. There is a Moderato which seemingly tries to emulate the charming march in "Love for Three Oranges"—a pitiable specimen of unsuccess. There is a Larghetto that sounds like ambitious variations on the famous tune the old cow died on. And these are quite the best of the affair. [Mr. Sanborn in The World-Telegram.

Supplement

The concert ended with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," also as lately heard in Boston. "Like most conductors," said Mr. Gilman, "Mr. Koussevitzky is fond of the 'Fantastique.' There are concert-goers who share his evident regard for it. Let us respect their sentiments." . . . Mr. Thompson found "the performance altogether in the spirit of the work, with much nicely calculated and admirably achieved detail along the way." . . . In the ears of The Times, "the orchestra played the music with extraordinary subtlety and suggestion"; while the conductor gave it "a peculiarly poetic and imaginative character by the emphasis of under-statement." But the reviewer, like Mr. Sanborn for The World-Telegram, would have enjoyed "more reckless performance."

Away from Custom

As guest-conductor at the Symphony Concerts of next week, Albert Stoessel promises adventure. He has assembled a program of six miscellaneous pieces, all relatively short, which is new departure on the Fridays and Saturdays of Symphony Hall. It comprises:

Fantasia in G major for Strings with Organ Accompaniment (Arranged by Volkel)	Bach
Symphony in D major ("Haffner")	Mozart
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"	Chaikovsky
On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring	Delius
Polka and Fugue from the Opera, "Schwanda the Bagpiper"	Weinberger
Station W G B Z X	James

The transcribed Fantasia from Bach appears to be new to these concerts; Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" had place in a program of 1926. The polka from "Schwanda" was played at The Pops last spring, but without the attached fugue. The radio-piece, so-called, is a "tone-picture" of an imaginary station—"In the Lobby," "Interference," "Slumber Hour," "Mikestruck" and that sort of thing. It won a prize in a radio competition. Philip James, who wrote it, is a broadcasting conductor and a teacher of music in New York.

Trans

JANUARY 12, 1933

S --- Films

The Symphony That Is Like No Other Work

Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' At Last Gains Place At Symphony Hall

THIS WEEK, with Dr. Koussevitzky on winter vacation, Richard Burgin in annual appearance as deputy-conductor, takes over the Symphony Concerts. For them he sets a varied and interesting program. Two numbers for violin and orchestra—a Concerto by Mozart in D major and Chausson's "Poem"—fall to the "assisting artist," Albert Spalding, once more returned to Symphony Hall. The familiar Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka," is final item. At the beginning stands Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral Symphony," the composer's ripest and most individual orchestral work. Hitherto it has been heard in Boston only from Mr. Goodrich and the student orchestra of the New England Conservatory—seven years ago. Now, by Mr. Burgin's choice and will, it passes to Symphony Hall where, a month ago, the composer himself was honored guest.

To Ralph Vaughan Williams and his Pastoral Symphony this article then addresses itself. A personal study of the score; an excellent monograph, "An Introduction to the Music of R. Vaughan Williams," by A. E. F. Dickinson, published by the Oxford University Press; a valuable article in "Music and Letters" on this symphony by Herbert Howells, are its sources. Mr. Dickinson may lead with introductory remarks about the composer: "First, he is one of the most downright composers that ever lived. At every stage of his work he has shown his determination to speak plainly, in both senses of the word, and to speak about something fundamental. He chose London and the country, or Walt Whitman and the Bible, as his subjects, because he felt he could sincerely concentrate upon them all the vital experience at his command. . . . He has thus, in general, not only meant what he said, but also said what he meant. The absence in his music of every form of rhetorical address, of all those 'effects' which are really so monotonously ineffective, is the expression not of incompetence but of the belief that every individual conception must have its own unique presentation. He has his mannerisms, but they never distract the listener from the essence of what he has to say."

Earmarks

Vaughan Williams pursued his studies under eminent musicians in England and later in France under Ravel. Not an iota of French atmosphere, however, crept into his style. Rather it springs from the vast store of English folk-music (of which he is an ardent collector and compiler); from Tudor church-music, from the older Plain Song. Thus Vaughan Williams often abandons the modern major in favor of the medieval churchly modes, which also haunt much English folk-music; sometimes compromises with what one writer has called a "modal-minor" scale; or forthrightly invents his own scales. The Pastoral Symphony itself provides an example in a scale used often and running G-A-B-flat-B-natural-C-D-E-F-G. The B-flat and B-natural (or their equivalents in transposition) are used together in more than one chord. The Debussyan scheme of scalewise successions of common chords (fifths included) is utilized with a frequency that makes it a dominant factor in Vaughan Williams's style; but for most un-Debussyan and indeed un-French effects. Whereas Debussy employs this device so often for shimmering, evanescent sonorities and moods, with the Englishman it is chief source for those things which Mr. Dickinson has in mind when he calls him a "downright composer." Still another typical device forbidden by all conventional harmonists, consists in long successions of "six-four" chords. There are many examples in the Pastoral Symphony.

Probably the outstanding characteristic of the music, (which has earned it many reproaches)—is evenness of mood, avoidance of emotional or dramatic excesses. There is not more than one point of considerable dramatic tension or considerable rhythmic activity in the whole music. Vaughan Williams's idea of the pastoral vein excludes such things; Vaughan Williams's artistic integrity is too great to permit the insertion of "effects" contrary to that idea. Thus the term "moderato" is used in modification of the tempo indication of each of the four movements: Molto moderato; Lento moderato; Moderato pesante; Moderato maestoso. He himself has written about the "Pastoral" as a symphony of "contemplation," and such variety as it offers is variety within the wide field of contemplative mood.

This fundamental fact established, we may allow Mr. Howells to furnish further introduction: "There was an element of 'damn the consequences' about the first performance (1922). . . . The first source of friction lay in the term 'pastoral' . . . There will be many opinions of what a symphony ought to be like; much more so one that calls itself 'pastoral'." Some want a thunderstorm, others 'trees brilliant with the wings of angels'; a third, 'a dynamic field-day'; a fourth, 'a different species of excitement'; all 'would monotonously adopt the child-like policy of realism.' Of this type of music-making this symphony is not . "The composer neither depicts nor describes. It is not his concern to 'make the universe his box of toys.' He builds up a great mood, insistent to an unusual degree, but having in itself far more variety than slight acquaintance would suggest. In manner and matter it is intensely personal. Even its detractors will admit its compelling sense of unity, though they count it death to the work. If you like, it is a frame of mind (not consciously promoted). The country is like that; so, too, is any place, village or town; you may not like the frame of mind; but there it is, strong and courageous. It is the truth of the symphony, and out of it would naturally arise whatever risk it has run of being publicly cold-shouldered."

Analytically

The themes are many. Each of the four movements contributes at least four. They are mostly melodic. Of the first movement Mr. Howells says: "'Tune' never ceases. One after another come tributary themes, short in themselves, and so fashioned as to throw one into doubting their being new; one suspects that, in them, what was a part has become a whole." Though the movement begins in fullness, it presently thins out to chamber proportions, again ascends. It is in sonata-form; establishes firmly the mood that dominates the whole. The climax is marked "forte dolce."

In the second movement the mood attains its very essence. Mr. Howells writes: "You think you have had contemplation in the first movement; and judged by common standards you have. But what Vaughan Williams means by 'contemplation' you will only know when the second movement is reached. The beginning of it suggests great distance. . . . When the horn has finished its tune the music takes to great heights, emphasizing stillness, remoteness. . . . The next theme . . . further emphasizes the prevailing mood. Common practice would have brought about a change here." For the middle portion of this movement Vaughan Williams prescribes a natural trumpet in E-flat, which plays improvisatory solo-passages. These solo-passages frequently contain the seventh harmonic, a tone that stands about halfway between the note as indicated by our notation and the next note lower. There is no doubt in the world that Vaughan Williams especially wanted this tone, softening by an approximate quarter-tone the upper portion of the scale. That this softening of the very scale itself is to lead to the uttermost extreme of the contemplative mood is perfectly patent."

The third movement, per contra, goes as far in the opposite direction as the symphony permits. The composer has written that it is "of the nature of a slow dance." Mr. Howells comments: "It seems to me to come much nearer than the rest of the work to being on speaking terms with ordinary man. I am not sure that a peasant could not come straight from his fields to it and feel it to be friendly. That is not to imply that the method or manner is more conventional, but merely that of its six or seven different themes, some there are in the first part to which the plain man will always be immediately friendly. . . . The trio . . . stands out dynamically from the rest of the symphony. Here are fortissimos in plenty, sheer directness and less subtle rhythms; and before the coda is reached there is a repetition of pre-trio ideas: all daylight-clear to any gaze."

The distinguishing mark of the fourth movement is the first theme sung by a solo-voice (or in its absence a clarinet) in a plain-song-like florid line. Again and for the last time Mr. Howells may describe: "The fourth movement gets back to the predominant mood of contemplation. In a real sense it is a summing up; it is in effect a coda to the rest of the work. 'Visible silence' was in one's thoughts in the second movement. Here it is as if great distances were surveyed. But analogy is too sharply defined to be really useful here.

To Conclude

"The mood and manner of this symphony are such as to appeal to constitutional likes and dislikes. According as we feel individually, reticence may be the gift of the devil or of the gods; folksong origin a limitation or an expansion; 'fifths' a thorn in the flesh or a blessed relief; common chords an intolerable platitude or a newly discovered beauty; modal inflection mere mannerism or a world of color. Vaughan Williams believes in these; they are in the heart and mind of his Pastoral Symphony. He has expressed strong beliefs without thought or fear of 'consequences.' Men have been burnt at the stake for less."

A. H. M.

Trans Jan 13

Vaughan Williams From Mr. Burgin

LEAVING his concert-master's chair to assume, for the occasion, Dr. Koussevitzky's usual place before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Richard Burgin last evening made a notable contribution to the Cambridge series of concerts in Sanders Theater. His services were of merit principally because they brought to performance the Pastoral Symphony of Vaughan Williams. With this uncommonly interesting work, moreover, he presented other music of refreshing variety—a program equally divided between English and Russian composers. Walton's boisterous overture, "Portsmouth Point," began the evening. The symphony of Williams came second. Musorgsky's Orchestral Fantasy, "A Night on Bald Mountain," and the Suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "Petrushka," completed the list. No less admirable was Mr. Burgin's firm grip upon the performance. The orchestra was, of course, its accurate and responsive self.

The virtues of the evening were less in evidence at the beginning than at the close. Walton's "Portsmouth Point" was the bustling and spicy overture that Dr. Koussevitzky made familiar yet; its breathless progress under Mr. Burgin had fewer stimulating incidents than usually is the case. Prepared as an emergency number to take the place of pieces in which Mr. Albert Spalding was to have played, it appeared to carry along the musicians and conductor as much as it was kept in motion by them. Some sections wanted a climatic style of approach; others might have been treated less emphatically. The music lacked clear contours.

It was apparent from the outset that the Pastoral Symphony—unknown to Boston and vicinity except for the performance under Mr. Wallace Goodrich at the Conservatory in 1925—was Mr. Burgin's main consideration. It deserved this attention. A matter of surprise and pleasure to the individual listener was the irresistible manner in which this piece gradually secured its hold upon the attention. It seemed at first hearing as music in which the element of mood transcends that of design, although design has its place as a means to the primary accomplishment. The initial movement, rich in model harmony, gave an English folk-flavor and exhaled an atmosphere of English countryside. Structurally, it appeared fashioned of extended and flexible tonal planes rather than of the stripped and skipping contrapuntal figures which are the familiar device of modernist composers. From these planes—each contributing its special coloring toward the prevailing mood—there arose, in the slow movement, single instrumental voices—first a horn and later a trumpet. Contemplation was the mood evoked by the ensemble, and the solo passages were the wandering wisps of fancy. The third division, more rapid and vigorous, carried into a new intensity and concentration. It was in this movement that the listener's interest became complete engrossment. These measures sounded with greater sonority from an aroused brass section with throbbing strings, yet—unlike the conventional sonority of Beethoven, Brahms or Strauss—it retained an individuality of choirs. There were likewise some thrilling unisons. Beginning the final movement, a strain of pure vocalization—simple, artless and appealing—was heard from an unnamed singer off-stage. Then the orchestra idealized the strain. At the end, this vocal melody again, singing the final note of the symphony as the distilled essence of the whole.

Mr. Burgin felt this music as he has few other pieces in earlier programs of his choice. Understanding its purpose and disclosing a temperamental affinity with the composer, he shaped phrasing and nuance sympathetically; was more unbending and absorbed in the task that is his usual wont. Passing to the Fantasy of Musorgsky, he conducted with authority. Finally, in the Ballet of Stravinsky, his manner was again alert, intent and at times inspired; the music had lost none of its seldom-failing fascination. The response of Mr. Burgin's audience was more than cordial. It applauded Williams's Symphony with enthusiasm and twice recalled the conductor to the stage after Stravinsky's Ballet.

N. M. J.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 12 1933

MUSIC CRITIC TO DISCUSS NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr. Chapman Will Give Free Lecture Sunday at Library.

The second in the series of free lectures by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal, on the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert programs will be given at 4 o'clock Sunday in the Children's Room of the Providence Public Library.

Dr. Chapman will discuss the program for Tuesday evening's concert, giving a resume of the lives and the works of Bach, Mozart, Tschaikovsky, Debussy, Wagner and Rimsky-Korsakov, the composers who are represented on the program, talking upon their particular works which the orchestra is to play. The lecture will be illustrated by music.

This series of lectures is a project of the Monday Morning Musical Club, originated by Mrs. Ada Holding Miller three ago.

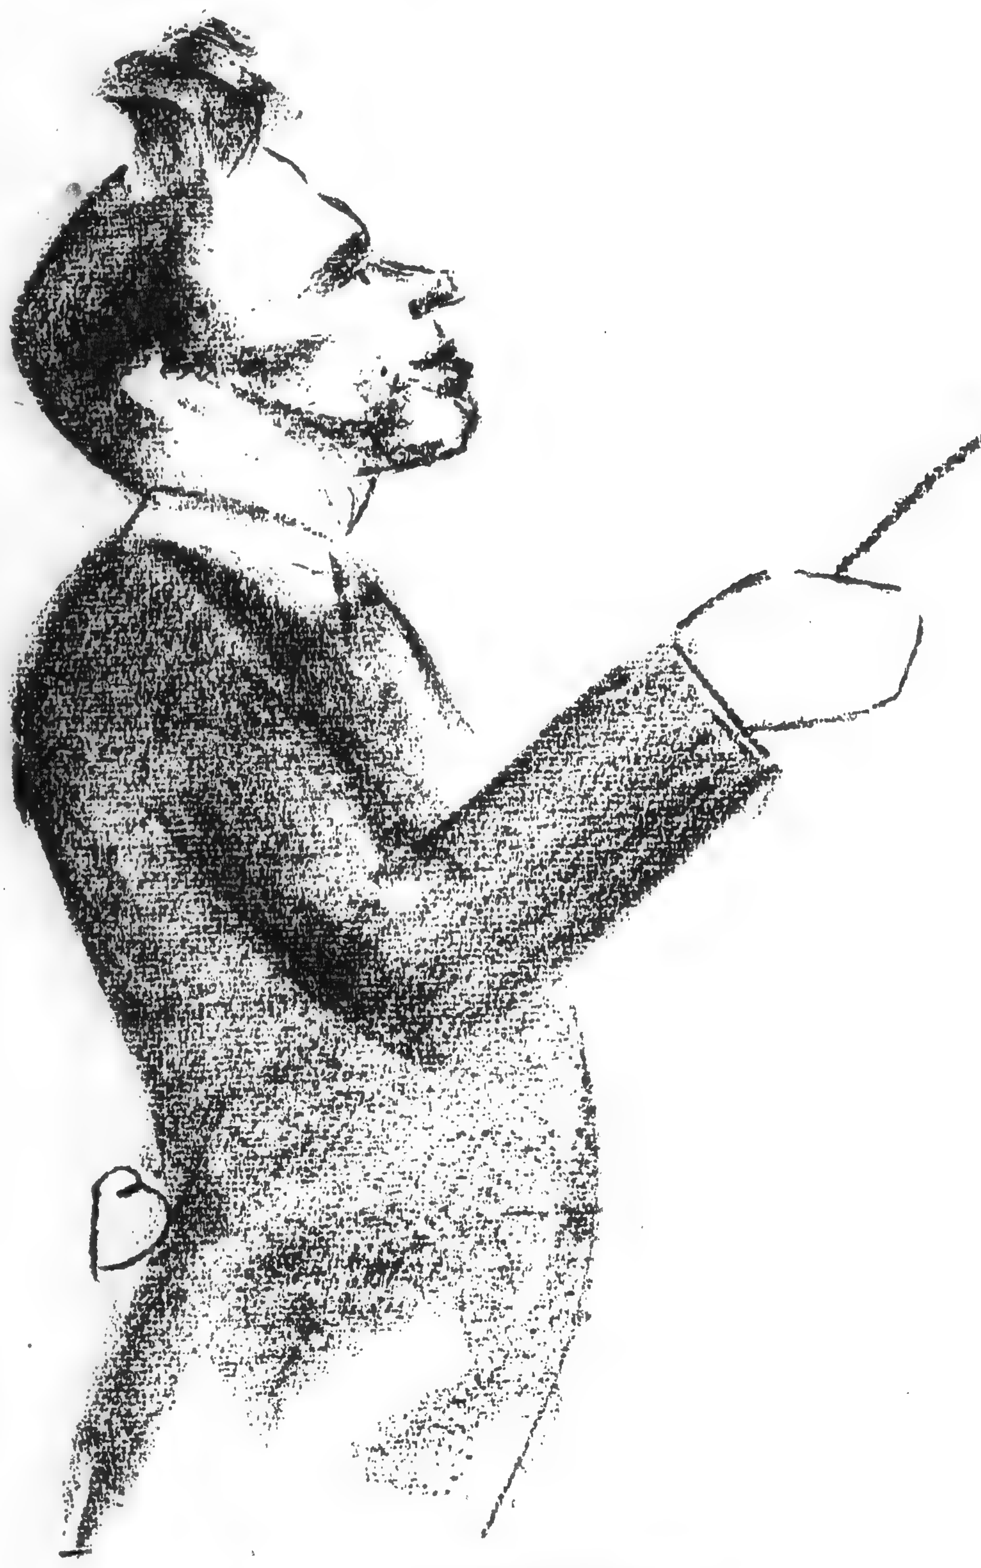
886

Jan 13

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, J

Plays and Player

In the Very Act



Richard Burgin

Conducting at the Symphony Concerts of Today and Tomorrow

Richard Burgin Leads Symphony

Trav Jan 14

In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, who was enjoying his customary mid-season vacation, Richard Burgin, concert master and first-chair violinist, led the Boston symphony orchestra in its regular concert yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall.

With a steady beat and a firm hand over the orchestra, Burgin proved a thoroughly competent conductor. His readings were precise, accurate. And his conducting was unaffected and entirely free from mannerisms.

He chose for his program, four interesting and varied works: Vaughan Williams's pastoral symphony; Mozart's concerto for violin in D major; Chausson's "Poeme" for violin and orchestra, and Stravinsky's suite from the ballet "Petrouchka."

Albert Spalding, heard here many times before, both in recital and with the symphony orchestra, appeared as violin soloist in the Mozart and Chausson pieces. Especially effective was his playing of the delicate Chausson "Poeme." Long passages unaccompanied were given in a beautifully modulated tone, and there were remarkable contrasts as bright flashes of technique sparkled against the dreamy background of the orchestral accompaniment.

Greatest interest was evidenced, perhaps, in the first performance at these concerts of the pastoral symphony by Williams, English composer, who was present at Symphony hall earlier in the season to hear his fantasia on a Tallis theme from the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky.

Throughout the four movements of this work, there is but a single mood—that of the calm, unruffled English countryside. "Contemplation" is the word most often and most aptly used to characterize it. Adelle Alberts sang the theme for soprano solo voice, which so effectively opens the last movement, and finally brings the symphony to a close.

Inte

8 Post Jan 14

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS' PASTORAL

English Work Played by Symphony Under Burgin

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the most individual and important of modern symphonies, the "Pastoral" of Vaughan Williams, came belatedly to the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, brought there by Mr. Burgin who, as assistant conductor as well as concert-master of the orchestra, annually presides over one pair of concerts.

IS ELEVEN YEARS OLD

This Symphony was first heard in London 11 years ago. There have been two performances in Boston, one by the orchestra of the Conservatory, one by the People's Symphony, both under the baton of Wallace Goodrich. But while Mr. Goodrich, like Mr. Burgin yesterday, was in complete sympathy with the composer, this most recent performance was, for obvious reasons, more revealing of the rare beauties of the score.

Those who have known Vaughan Williams through the song-cycle "On Wenlock Edge," the first Norfolk Rhapsody introduced to us by Dr. Koussevitzky, and the "Tallis" Variations might picture in advance the idiom of the "Pastoral" Symphony. The roots of Vaughan Williams' more characteristic music are to be found in English folk-song, at least when it is modal in character, and in the works of the Tudor composers. Yet, together with the remoteness, the earthiness and the characteristically British flavor that such origins imply, there is modernity in his music as well. Vaughan Williams knows the uses, if not the abuses of clashing tonalities and linear counter-point. In his sober fashion he displays conspicuous mastery of contemporary orchestral resource.

Its Unique Appeal

Possibly only those who have known the English countryside and who are at the same time responsive to the charm of modal harmony, which Vaughan Williams uses as though it were for him a wholly natural speech, will feel the peculiar spell of the "Pastoral" Symphony. But for the listener thus predisposed this Symphony may make a unique appeal. There are vistas in this music and there is intimacy as well. There is rugged strength and there is tenderness and an indefinable nostalgia. And there is above all that sense of steadfastness and of peace that come from a solitary communing with a nature.

It should be added that the wordless measures for soprano solo, so tellingly introduced into the final movement, were effectively sung yesterday by Adelle Alberts.

Albert Spaulding Soloist

After the pure and rarified air in which this Symphony moves, even the music of Mozart sounded a little tawdry as it was heard in the D major Violin Concerto, a not too significant work, its solo part admirably played yesterday by Albert Spalding. It was more satisfying to hear Mr. Spalding on his second appearance when his chosen piece was Chausson's Poem, too rarely heard with orchestra, too often heard with piano as unsatisfactory substitute. Here soloist, conductor and ever-responsive orchestra were alike sensitive to the peculiar charm, the sensuous melancholy, if that expression may be permitted, of Chausson's music. Nor did they fail the composer in his moments of exaltation.

The Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" made brilliant conclusion to a concert that in the main was of outstanding interest.

MUSIC

Herald Jan 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

In Dr. Koussevitzky's absence, Richard Burgin conducted yesterday afternoon the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vaughan Williams, Pastoral Symphony (first time at these concerts). Mozart, violin concerto, D major (K. 218). Chausson, "Poeme" for violin. Stravinsky, suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka." Albert Spalding was the solo violinist; Adelle Alberts sang the wordless soprano solos in the last movement of the symphony.

The English critics speak of this Pastoral Symphony as contemplative, meditative music, but here is not a case of Omphalic contemplation. The composer, like Isaac of old, went in the fields to meditate. His Rebekah met him there in the form of the Muse. While Vaughan Williams was meditating he remembered Debussy, of whom he took some lessons and whose influence is here more than once apparent; he hummed English folk songs to put himself in the mood for composing a lusty scherzo. He did not attempt to people hills and plains as if they were a zoological museum; he left the cuckoo ichard

autiful itation find it with from as an ere is ay but calm;
s ner-
ing of y first surely would
. The gave inter-was field ome."
dra-finely cherzo of the e, ining in finale
hony!
sung
r way was even been rches-

tra itself is hushed.

This symphony, completed in 1921, performed for the first time two months afterwards in London, was brought out in Boston by Wallace Goodrich, conducting in 1925 a concert of the New England Conservatory orchestra. The wonder is that this symphony was not performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra before yesterday. Mr. Burgin, who entered into the sentiment of the music, is to be heartily thanked for allowing the audience the pleasure of becoming acquainted with this work.

For once the Suite from "Petrouchka" seemed heavy and ineffectively noisy. Has the Suite been heard too often? It is true it is not a concert piece, not one for a symphony concert. It needs the ballet; the sight and action of the mimes and dancers. Without them the music seems, to some, labored and futile. In the theatre it has marked meaning; it is a different thing.

Mr. Spalding played the concerto without attempting to give it undue importance, without attempting to "modernize" it. His performance was delightfully in keeping with the composition. Ernest Newman is never weary of referring to the melancholy or demoniacal side of Mozart's nature. This melancholy does not assert itself in this concerto. There is rollicking gaiety in the Rondo. The Andante is suavely tender; but melancholy, profound melancholy is the chief characteristic of Chausson's "Poeme." Yet Chausson more than once here rises to eloquence that is not merely rhetoric. In the interpretation Mr. Spalding brought out the poetic side of his own nature. He was deservedly and loudly applauded. Mr. Burgin gave him sympathetic accompaniments.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The concerts of next week will be conducted by Albert Stoessel of New York. Bach-Volkel, Fantasia in G major for strings. Mozart, "Haffner" symphony: Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet." Philip James, station WGBZX. Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." Weinberger, Polka and Fugue from the opera "Schwanda der Dudelsackpfeiffer."

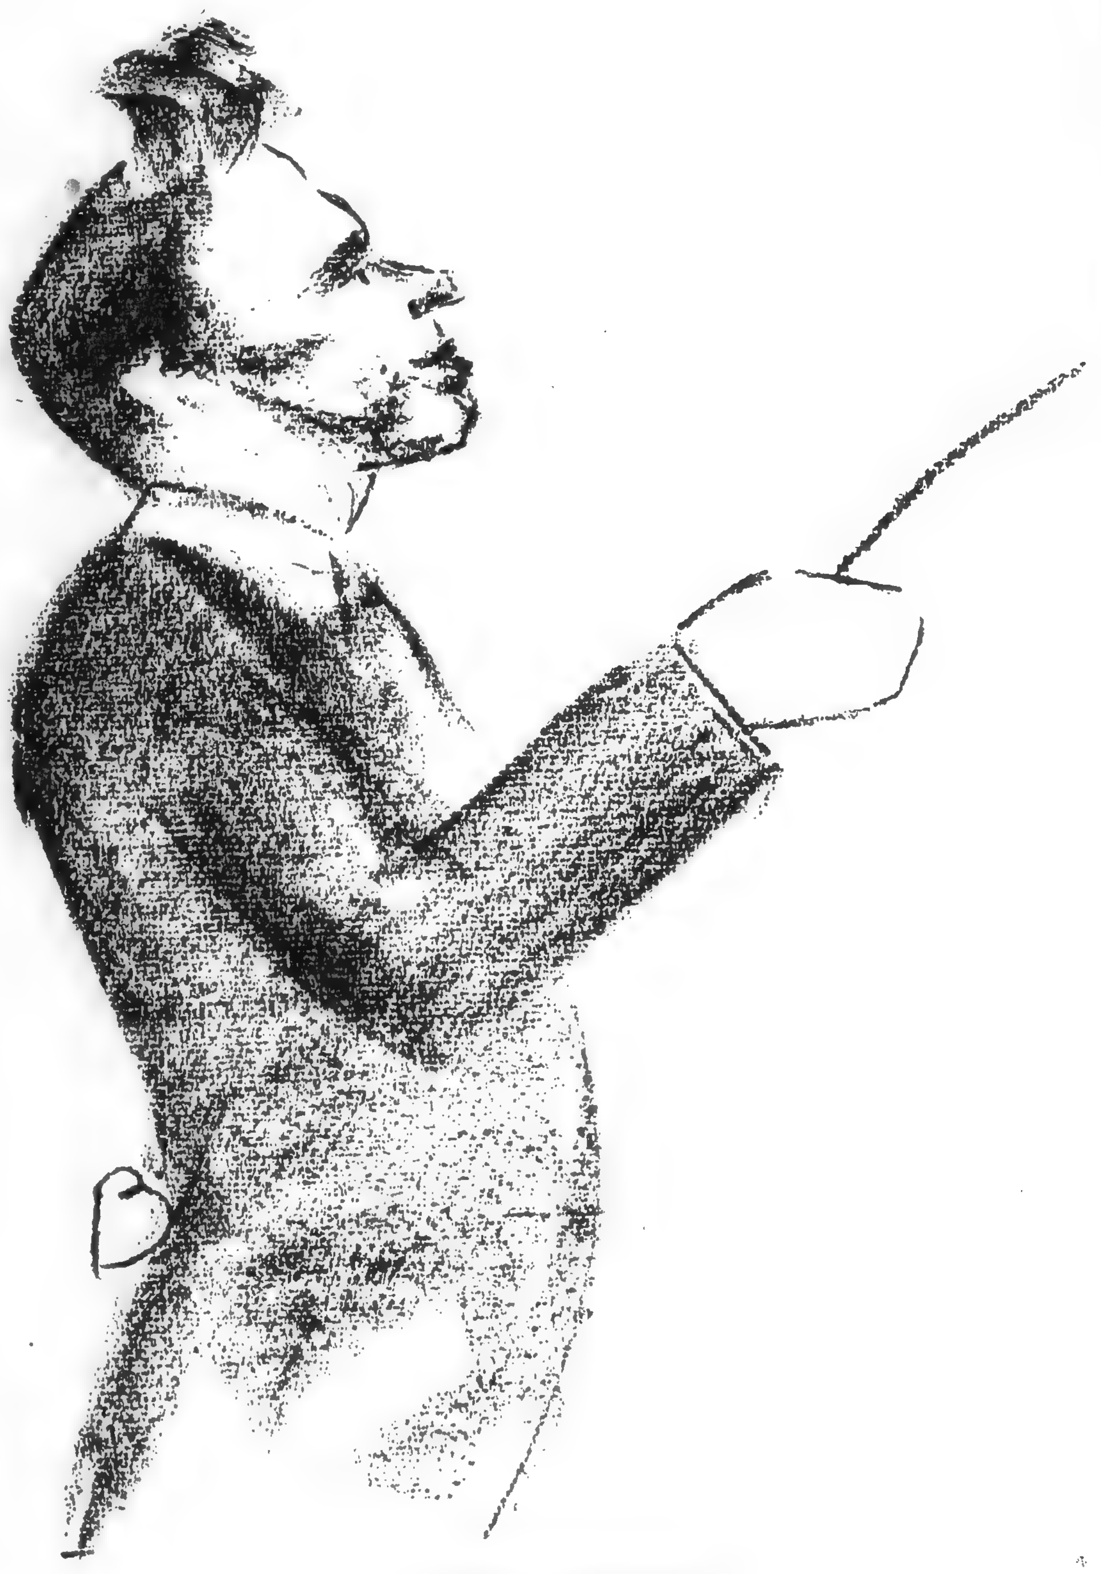
86

Jan 13

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, J

; --- Plays and Player

In the Very Act



Richard Burgin

Conducting at the Symphony Concerts of Today and Tomorrow

Richard Burgin Leads Symphony

Trav Jan 14

In the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, who was enjoying his customary mid-season vacation, Richard Burgin, concert master and first-chair violinist, led the Boston symphony orchestra in its regular concert yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall.

With a steady beat and a firm hand over the orchestra, Burgin proved a thoroughly competent conductor. His readings were precise, accurate. And his conducting was unaffected and entirely free from mannerisms.

He chose for his program, four interesting and varied works: Vaughan Williams's pastoral symphony; Mozart's concerto for violin in D major; Chausson's "Poeme" for violin and orchestra, and Stravinsky's suite from the ballet "Petrouchka."

Albert Spalding, heard here many times before, both in recital and with the symphony orchestra, appeared as violin soloist in the Mozart and Chausson pieces. Especially effective was his playing of the delicate Chausson "Poeme." Long passages unaccompanied were given in a beautifully modulated tone, and there were remarkable contrasts as bright flashes of technique sparkled against the dreamy background of the orchestral accompaniment.

Greatest interest was evidenced, perhaps, in the first performance at these concerts of the pastoral symphony by Williams, English composer, who was present at Symphony hall earlier in the season to hear his fantasia on a Tallis theme from the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky.

Throughout the four movements of this work, there is but a single mood—that of the calm, unruffled English countryside. "Contemplation" is the word most often and most aptly used to characterize it. Adelle Alberts sang the theme for soprano solo voice, which so effectively opens the last movement, and finally brings the symphony to a close.

Inter

8 Post Jan 14

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS' PASTORAL

English Work Played by Symphony Under Burgin

players then all passed, whereupon the bidder wanted to change her bid to 'one no-trump.' Had she a right to do so?"

No; there can be no change in the bid after three players have passed in succession.

"To the Editor of the Post:

"Sir—A performer shows a metal which, when thrown into lukewarm water, not even boiling hot, dissolves like ice. Yet it undoubtedly is a metal. What is it?"

Probably a mixture of bismuth, lead, tin and cadmium, technically known as Wood's metal, which melts at 60 degrees centigrade.

When you see a performer handling melted metal without being burned thereby, this is what it probably is, as it melts at a temperature so low that water would not be even scalding hot.

"To the Editor of the Post:

"Sir—To decide an argument: Could a live dog be sent by parcel post from one city to another?"

The postal regulations say: "Live domestic animals are not mailable."

"To the Editor of the Post:

"Sir—How long ago was the rule adopted that no buildings should be erected on Boston Common or on the tions might picture in advance the idiom of the "Pastoral" Symphony. The roots of Vaughan Williams' more characteristic music are to be found in English folk-song, at least when it is modal in character, and in the works of the Tudor composers. Yet, together with the remoteness, the earthiness and the characteristically British flavor that such origins imply, there is modernity in his music as well. Vaughan Williams knows the uses, if not the abuses of clashing tonalities and linear counter-point. In his sober fashion he displays conspicuous mastery of contemporary orchestral resource.

Its Unique Appeal

Possibly only those who have known the English countryside and who are at the same time responsive to the charm of modal harmony, which Vaughan Williams uses as though it were for him a wholly natural speech, will feel the peculiar spell of the "Pastoral" Symphony. But for the listener thus predisposed this Symphony may make a unique appeal. There are vistas in this music and there is intimacy as well. There is rugged strength and there is tenderness and an indefinable nostalgia. And there is

---

MUSIC

Herald Jan 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

In Dr. Koussevitzky's absence, Richard Burgin conducted yesterday afternoon the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Vaughan Williams, Pastoral Symphony (first time at these concerts). Mozart, violin concerto, D major (K. 218). Chausson, "Poeme" for violin. Stravinsky, suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka." Albert Spalding was the solo violinist; Adelle Alberts sang the wordless soprano solos in the last movement of the symphony.

The English critics speak of this Pastoral Symphony as contemplative, meditative music, but here is not a case of Omphalic contemplation. The composer, like Isaac of old, went in the fields to meditate. His Rebekah met him there in the form of the Muse. While Vaughan Williams was meditating he remembered Debussy, of whom he took some lessons and whose influence is here more than once apparent; he hummed English folk songs to put himself in the mood for composing a lusty scherzo. He did not attempt to people hills and plains as if they were a zoological museum; he left the cuckoo to Beethoven; the sheep to Richard Strauss. He simply wrote beautiful music as the result of his meditation and contemplation. Nor did he find it necessary to provide the listener with a verbal program, a quotation from some poet, essayist, naturalist; as an English reviewer has said: "There is nothing in the Pastoral Symphony but music."

The prevailing mood is one of calm; peacefulness, so welcome in this nervous, turbulent age. It was daring of this composer to follow a leisurely first movement with a still more leisurely second movement; but the hearer would not have the spell broken so soon. The scherzo with its folk-dance tang gave sufficient contrast a needed interruption, as if the composer was awakened from his meditation by field hands celebrating "harvest-home." And in the second movement is a dramatic touch, the trumpet solo, finely played by Mr. Mayer. After the scherzo a pompous apotheosis, full force of the orchestra, would be out of place, intolerable. How exquisite the ending in keeping with beginning of the finale and the mood of the whole symphony! A wordless singer, a melody as if sung by a girl leaving the field, on her way home in the evening after work was done. Words for the melody, even those of a folk song, would have been disturbing. Quiet reigns; the orchestra itself is hushed.

This symphony, completed in 1921, performed for the first time two months afterwards in London, was brought out in Boston by Wallace Goodrich, conducting in 1925 a concert of the New England Conservatory orchestra. The wonder is that this symphony was not performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra before yesterday. Mr. Burgin, who entered into the sentiment of the music, is to be heartily thanked for allowing the audience the pleasure of becoming acquainted with this work.

For once the Suite from "Petrouchka" seemed heavy and ineffectively noisy. Has the Suite been heard too often? It is true it is not a concert piece, not one for a symphony concert. It needs the ballet; the sight and action of the mimes and dancers. Without them the music seems, to some, labored and futile. In the theatre it has marked meaning; it is a different thing.

Mr. Spalding played the concerto without attempting to give it undue importance, without attempting to "modernize" it. His performance was delightfully in keeping with the composition. Ernest Newman is never weary of referring to the melancholy or demoniacal side of Mozart's nature. This melancholy does not assert itself in this concerto. There is rollicking gaiety in the Rondo. The Andante is suavely tender; but melancholy, profound melancholy is the chief characteristic of Chausson's "Poeme." Yet Chausson more than once here rises to eloquence that is not merely rhetoric. In the interpretation Mr. Spalding brought out the poetic side of his own nature. He was deservedly and loudly applauded. Mr. Burgin gave him sympathetic accompaniments.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The concerts of next week will be conducted by Albert Stoessel of New York. Bach-Volkel, Fantasia in G major for strings. Mozart, "Haffner" symphony: Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet." Philip James, station WGBZX. Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." Weinberger, Polka and Fugue from the opera "Schwanda der Dudelsackpfeiffer."

Symphony Concert === Memories of Duse === Orche

The Symphony That Differs From the Rest

Remote and Rarefied Music From Vaughan Williams, Spalding's Mozart

THE MUSICIAN who takes no pleasure in Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral Symphony" will complain of monotony in means and method. The layman, to whom it was equally pleasureless at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, will repine under monotony of mood and impression. For both reproaches the music in itself will give reason. It teems with fifths. It reiterates other chordal successions. Throughout it is slow-paced. Not even the Scherzo, save in a few pianissimo measures at the end, is in quick motion. Throughout again, changes in an ever undulating rhythm are few. None is abrupt. There is little resort, besides, to the dynamic range of the orchestra which is modern and full—not one fortissimo for convenient example. Enough to Vaughan Williams that it is in perpetual flow—sounding one line in the music above another, often as though they were clamped together.

Join to this characteristic, the persistent use of the old modal harmonies as they filtered out of the English church into the English folk, and tonality remains vague, as though by imperceptible touches the four movements rose one after the other; fell away again; faded at last into silence. Add one other recurring singularity, the rhapsodic voice of a single instrument or group of instruments rising above a hushed, motionless background. So the woodwinds sound above the divided strings in the first movement; the solo-horn and the solo-trumpet in the second; the wordless soprano voice at the beginning and the end of the last division. The reproachful musician is right. The methods and the procedure of Vaughan Williams throughout the Pastoral Symphony are monotonous. They are also monotonous by will and of purpose.

Turn now to the repining layman. In first instance he misses every attribute that he commonly associates with a Pastoral Symphony. No birds sing in the woodwind choir. No brooks purl in the strings. No thunder-shower in the basses rumbles over the landscape. No sights, no sounds, in tonal suggestion or delineation. Instead, a sense of stillness evoked by musical sound unalloyed; a sense of distance as well. . . . In second instance, a single pervading mood continuously intensified; the mood of contemplation. At the beginning, it enters mysteriously in the basses under the rising fifths of the woodwinds. At the end, it vanishes as mysteriously under the high soft A of the violins.

Contemplation in the first movement through undulating rhythm, a tonal texture woven of many strands, a flat tonal color out of the archaic harmonies. Contemplation through the second movement, in an atmosphere rarefied by the measures of solo-horn and solo-trumpet, solitary, remote. A certain animation stirs in the third movement. Figures as from a dance cross the ear. But a dance less translated into tones than vaguely remembered, seen and heard as between dream and waking; so put to music-paper. In the closing movemtnt. contemplation yet more rarefied. The remoteness has become endless distance; stillness unbroken. Out of them sounds into them returns, the singing voice. Tension rises and relaxes. Still brooding, the music dies away. . . . The repining layman is right. The mood and the impression of Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral Symphony" are monotonous. But again by will and of purpose.

For in these monotonies lie the spell, the illusion, the beauty, apart and like no other, of this selfsame symphony. Five years ago when Bártók's Piano-Concerto was played at Symphony Hall, it sounded in some ears as a music born of the folk-song they had heard across Hungarian fields in summer wanderings along Hungarian roads. To those same ears this Pastoral Symphony seems born of the English summer on the English countryside; in both is drenched. In an objective music its calm, its quiet—its drowsiness, if the reader will; its gentleness and its everlastingness—to use a clumsy word—are all incarnate in sound; its homeliness and familiarity withal. The transitions are the image of this gentleness. In the undulating rhythm, seldom broken, abides the calm. Out of the changeless, ceaseless flow—the lack of plasticity and of dynamics as the reproachful call it —rises the everlastingness. From the ancient modal idiom seeps the color. In the very flatness, beside modern harmonic coloring, dwells the charm.

Before this countryside, when the magic of summer is upon it, sits Vaughan Williams in contemplation rapt. By the responsive magic of musical imagination, by matter and means markedly and insidiously his own, he evokes this stillness, this remoteness, this pathos of distance, this silence out of sound. Once only does he break through his objective mood; at the rising climax, midway in the final movement, release, as it seems, his own particular rapture. Elsewhere a nature-music at purest unspotted with the egotisms, unflawed by the passions of us mortal men. Monotonous if the listener will—but nature itself is oftenest monotonous on the English countryside. Brief withal in the musical expression. Among modern symphonies few are shorter than this Pastoral of Vaughan Williams. . . . Intelligently, sympathetically, faithfully Mr. Burgin conducted in it. His reward is the bringing of a unique music into the Symphony Concerts. The orchestra gave him what he asked. Miss Alberts sang her few plain-song phrases in fittingly impersonal tones. The Friday audience heard too impassively. This evening there should be more applause. In sensitive Cambridge there was on Thursday.

For the rest Mr. Albert Spalding reappeared as "assisting artist" after longer absence from "these concerts" than his high place as violinist and his frequent association with them warrant. He played, first, the Concerto of Mozart in D major seldom hard at Symphony Hall; second, after intermission, the "Poem" of Chausson. The contrast between the two pieces was graphic. The Concerto dates from 1775; was written in Mozart's twentieth year. After a century and a half, it keeps untarnished its felicity and transparency, its gentleness and gayety; momentary withdrawals from the middle movement onward into an enigmatical, passing melancholy. By the conventions of the kind and the time, the final rondo should be all high spirits. Yet through this Andante grazioso, Mozart more than once veils his face, as though he had forgotten for the instant his virtuoso-piece. A mood of youth these pensive lapses. To this day the Concerto remains a young man's music.

On the other hand Chausson's "Poem" is not yet forty years old; was written in the composer's prime. Already it dates; bears witness to a romantical fashion that has waned in our ears. These somber, restless melancholies, these resorts to sensuous dreamfulness, these Franckian tones that time steadily thins, no longer touch our sympathies. The tradition among violinists preserves the "Poem," but it is doubtful whether it still deserves place in the symphonic repertory.

Mr. Spalding played the piece for all that it contains, and more, but it still sounded tame and staled. His truer measure as violinist shone out of Mozart's concerto in the purity of every note, the flow of every line, grace for the ornament, lightness in the accents, the luminous tone, the mingled impulsiveness and felicity of the whole. A musician at rich maturity, a violinist in full prime are still the words for Mr. Spalding. Through both the solo-numbers Mr. Burgin conducted as one sensitive violinist for another. But in the familiar Suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "Petrushka" he was on alien ground. Even so—and the more for Mr. Sanromá in the salient piano part—the rhythms, the colors, the dissonances, still send the tingles of modernism down the most habituated spines.

[Concluded on col. 2 below]

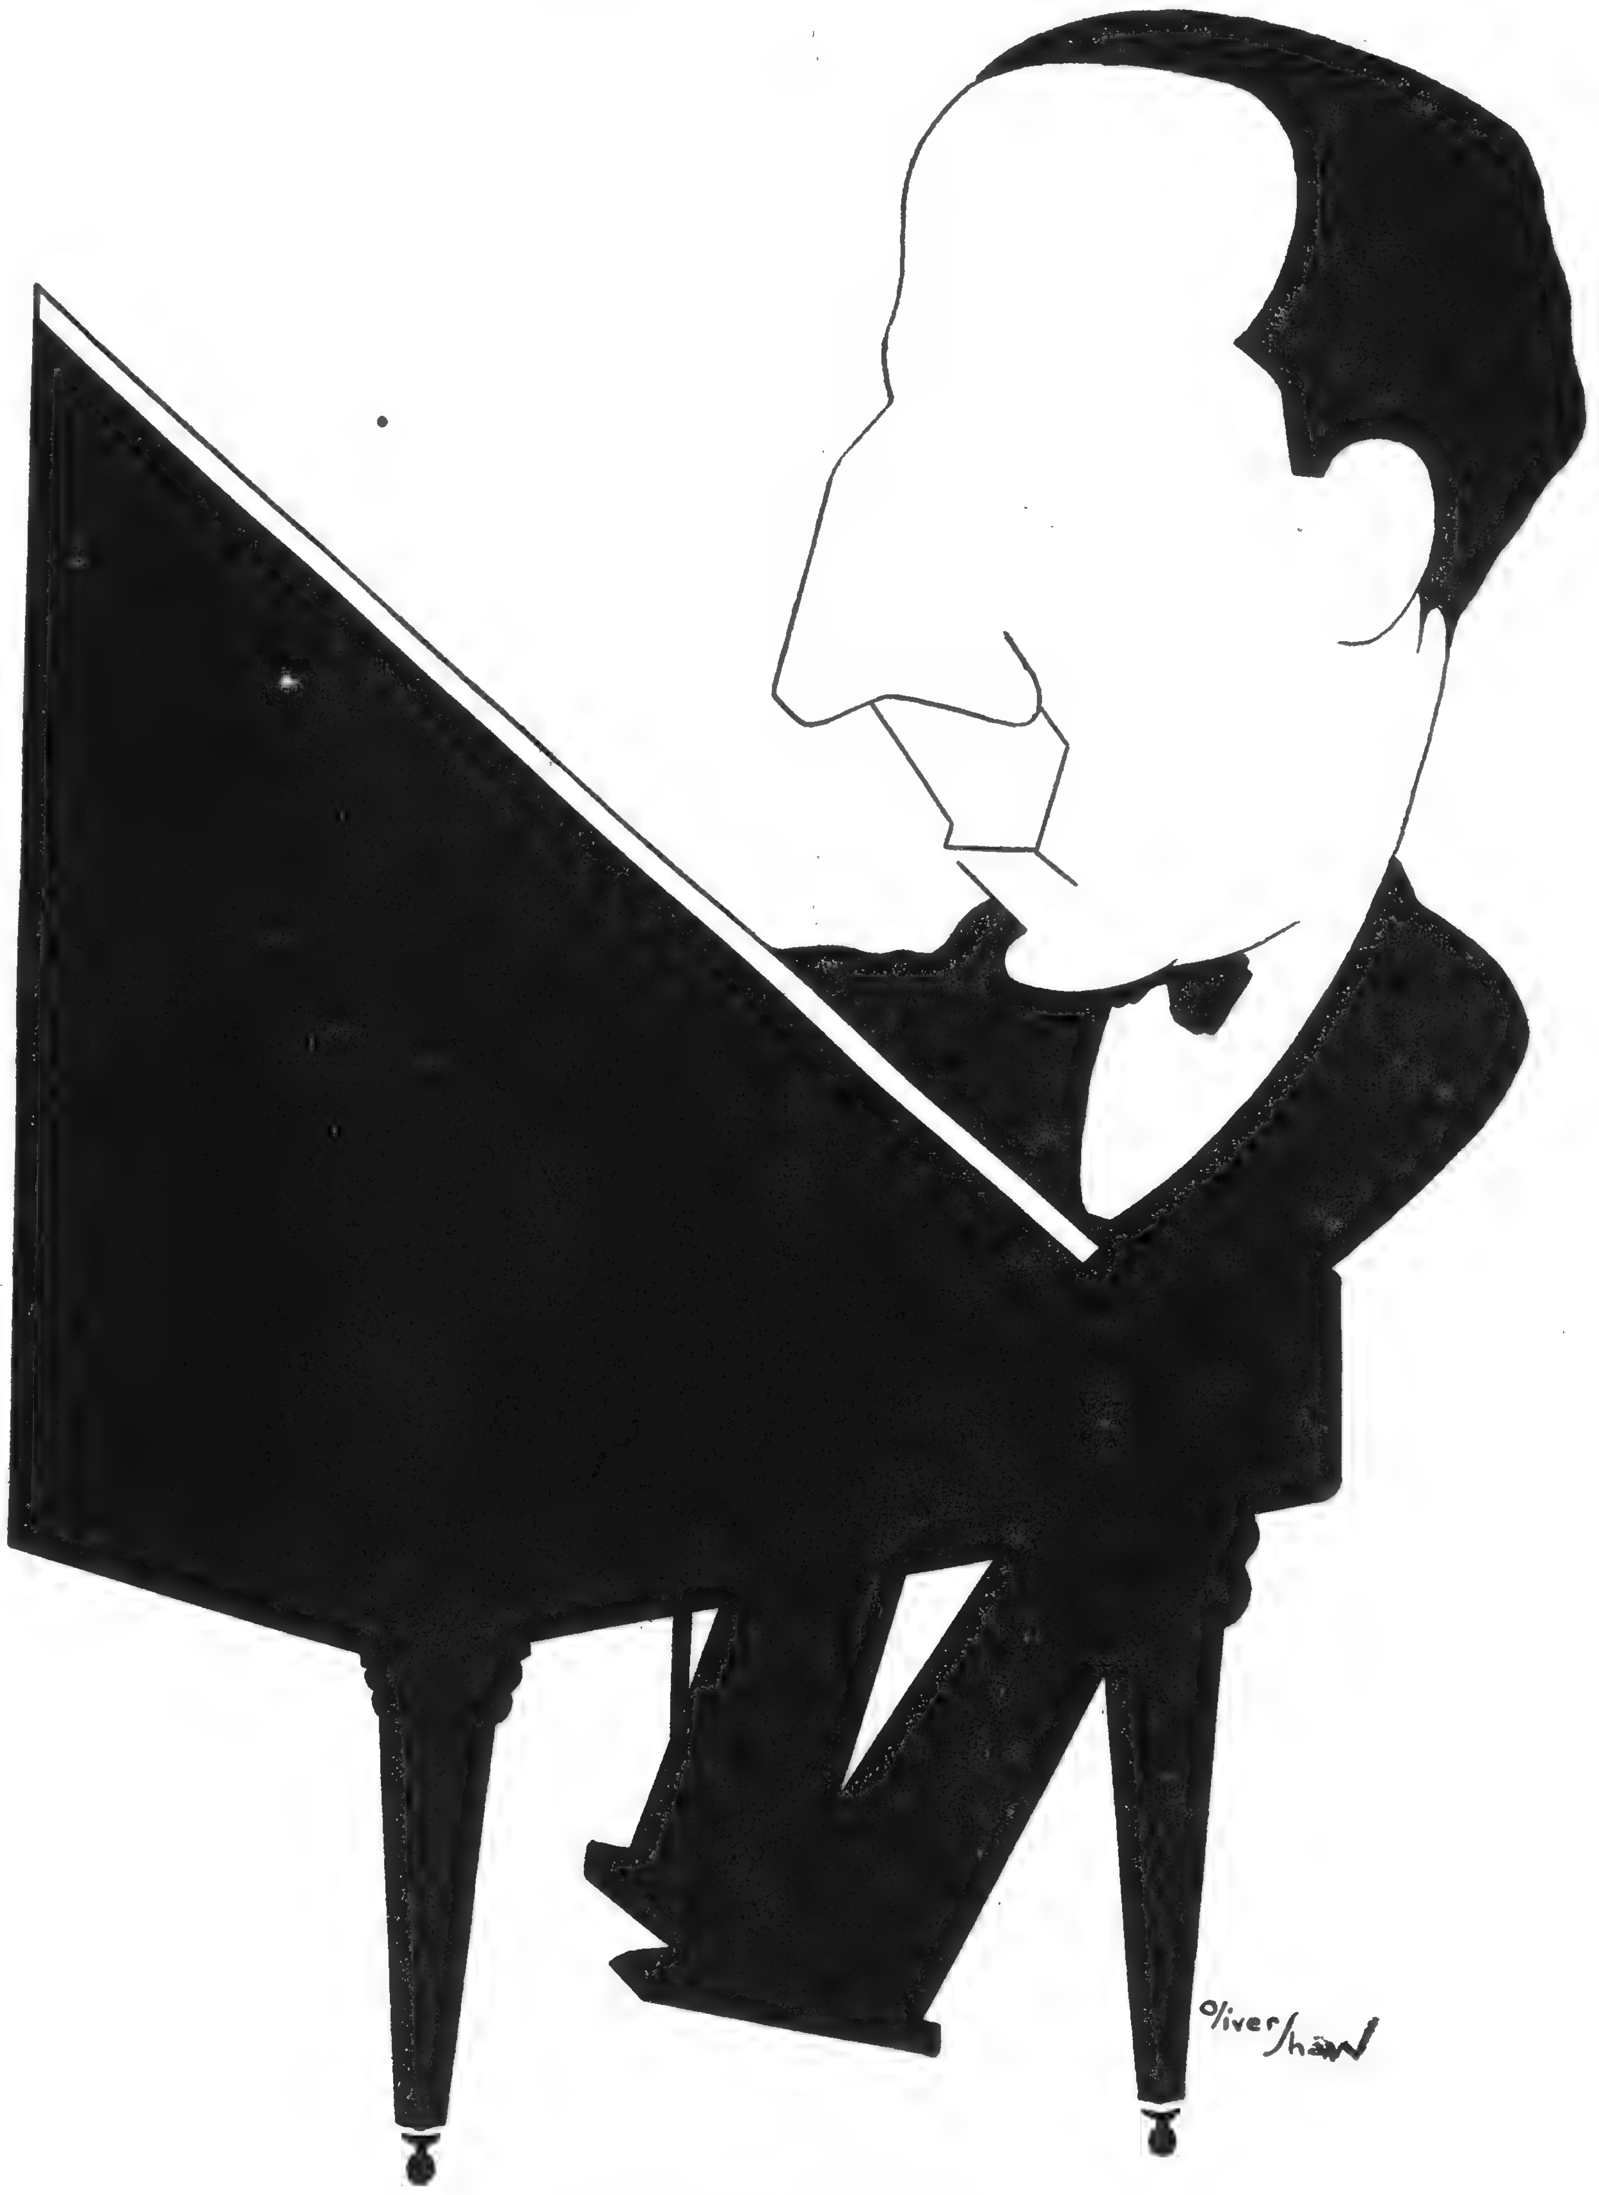
H. T. P

Outward and Visible Sign



Jesus Maria Sanroma

To Be Heard Again in a Concert of Piano-Pieces at Symphony Hall on Sunday Afternoon, Jan. 22

Th

REDUCTION RATIO
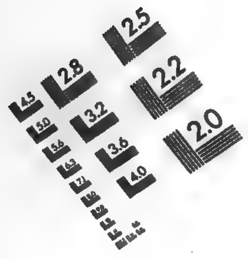
19x

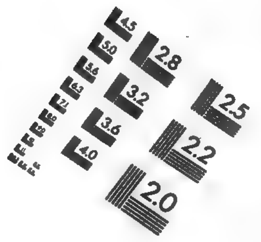
2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

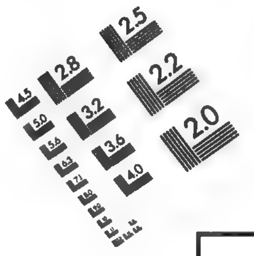


2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

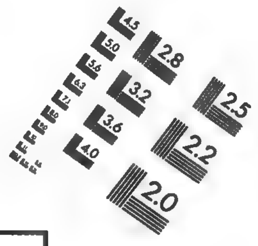


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

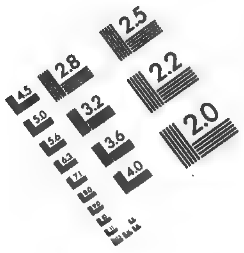
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



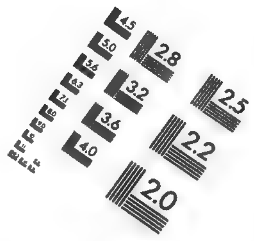
2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0



4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0

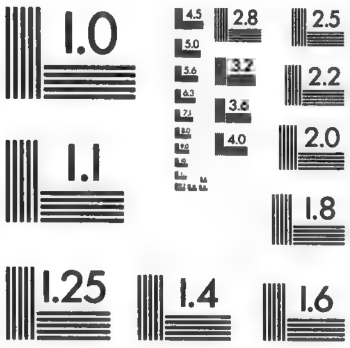


4.5
2.8
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
2.2
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
2.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

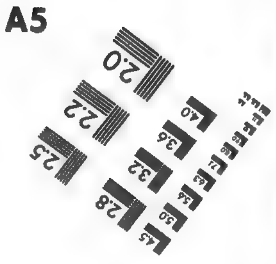
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

A5

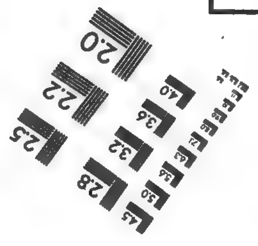


2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5

A4

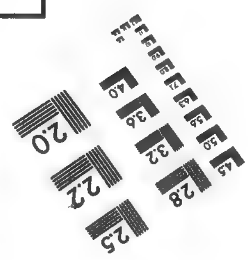
A3



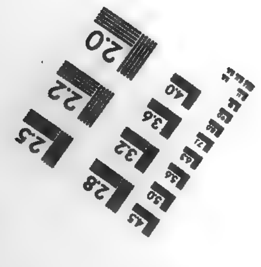
2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



2.0
4.0
3.6
2.2
3.2
2.8
2.5



2.0
2.2
2.5
4.0
3.6
3.2
2.8
4.5

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

5.0
4.0
3.6
2.0
3.2
2.2
2.8
2.5

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Do Like This, Do Like That, So Go on Tour

Symphonic Expedition Into Parts Hitherto Unknown

By A. Fiedler et Al

Trans Jan 14

WHEN there are no Symphony Concerts at a week-end it means that the orchestra is playing outside the State. It also means that the players are journeying in a special railroad car. But the tick-tock of steel wheels on rail joints must remind fifteen of them now and again of their contrasting bus tour a while back.

To load a bus with Boston Symphony players, bag and baggage—including $13,000 worth of instruments—and take them a-touring among small and remote communities of Pennsylvania and Virginia is something one would not ordinarily think of. Or, even so, one would be told that it could not be done. In the first place, the musicians could not be persuaded. Furthermore, they would be too brittle, physically and temperamentally, to last out such a trip. In the third place, such a venture would not succeed. It would not "do business." But the idea was conceived, and in face of these hazards, accomplished by a hypnotic-eyed—one would almost say Paganini-visaged—son of Bulgaria, and Boston concert manager, Demeter Zachareff.

Intelligent populations were known to Mr. Zachareff, around the course of the Mason and Dixon Line, where possibly papers on the Three B's were read, but where not even a really good orchestral performance of the "Beautiful Blue Danube" had been heard. He saw to it that they should have such a treat at the hands of the Boston Sinfonietta. Mr. Fiedler, for his part, insisted that they should have also either a Haydn or a Mozart symphony, and a Corelli or Rameau Suite to boot, among other far cries from a Strauss waltz. Local papers made front page news and double-column editorials of the concerts.

The revelation which the Sinfonietta proved to be for the country auditors was equalled by the revelation which they were to the visitors, in the matter of simple, whole-souled responsiveness. After that engaging trifle, Bolzoni's Minuet, had been led and played with extremely pretty grace by Fiedler and his men, an audience in one remote town seemed, after a hush of strained attention, to give way to a general gasp of astonished delight. And a co-ed behind the historian of the tour exclaimed in a stage whisper: "That was dam pretty, if you ask me!"

And if one were to ask the historian, that was refreshing music criticism, well worth journeying several thousand miles by bus to hear. Rrefreshing also was the experience of having this group for fellow-travelers. They were "good fun" in relaxation, but in concert were artists to the full, and not vacationers. They were always practicing.

To those who thought of New York as a city, as a symbol for skyscrapers, the meanderings of the bus through the countryside in the State of New York was the revelation of a new and beautiful association with the name. The mountains and valleys of Pennsylvania equally or better delighted eyes which had seen many views in Europe. The first two concerts were at Kutztown and Millersville, Pa. Isolated and small though the towns were, the audiences were of student teachers who showed a breathless attention and whole-hearted responsiveness that greatly pleased the musicians. This quality was to prove characteristic of audiences throughout the tour. If listeners were not entirely "up" on music, they acted as if the coming of the Sinfonietta were such a climax in their experience that they must make up in attention what they might lack in knowledge.

It might have been supposed that the party of musicians, predominantly French, would bewail a limitation of facilities which prevented them from enjoying a little vin blanc or vin rouge. But no, what they searched for on each abbreviated main street, and sighed vainly not to find—these Frenchmen—was a delicatessen shop. At Lock Haven, Pa., Mr. Zachareff magically produced a bounteous delicatessen after-concert supper, complete down to Swiss cheese sandwiches on rye bread and something sudsy in a keg, served with pretzels. And so all was "bon."

"For goodness sakes, what's that—the tall black thing?" came a voice abaft the historian at Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, Pa.

"Why, that's an oboe," was the very positively-voiced identification of the bassoon. Something much like this was repeated at intervals at different concerts. The idea seemed to be, that the volunteer informant had encountered the word—perhaps in a crossword puzzle. Then, hastily eyeing familiar instruments, he would mistake the oboe for a clarinet, fix on the bassoon as the one instrument awaiting a name from him, and cheerfully hail it by the name he had left over—oboe.

The Sinfonietta had finished playing the opening number. It was a Corelli Suite—Corelli brought to Bloomsburg, to launch an "entertainment." "Victor Herbert Favorites" was set down by Fiedler for next to last piece on the program. A youth and two co-eds seated behind the historian were merry chatterboxes before the program started, gushing over dozens of topics except music. Now they had heard a Sarabanda, Giga, and Badinerie.

"Gosh!" exclaimed the Chatterbox-in-Chief. "I liked that. I thought this program was going to be dull."

But thoughts would wander from the plane of musical responsiveness. . . . "Oh, look!" . . . What at?" . . . "That violinist" . . . "What about him? You can have him—I don't want him." . . . "Oh, I don't mean that." . . . "Nor anything else, as far as I can make out." . . . "I mean his feet. Look at them! Did you ever see such long ones in all your days?"

The craning of a neck could be sensed from the rustle of a squirming body on the chair at the historian's back. . . . "You're right! Just how long are his feet, anyway?" . . .

Under the spell of supposedly admiring feminine glances, he of the feet blushed and adjusted his tie.

Back to the music turned the chattering group. A Mozart symphony had been played.

"Funny thing," said the co-ed commentator. "Stuff like this bores me on the radio. But with the players right in front of me, I like it." A similar mood seemed roused in the audience all together. It had been argued to Fiedler that the Mozart symphony would prove to be too rich diet for this audience. He was immoveable. "If they don't like it," he had said, "it won't be our fault." Here, now, was vindication and artistic satisfaction.

Max Kunze's grand old Barzoni double-bass had been an important artistic factor in the powers revealed by the Sinfonietta. The richness of its tone and the excellence of the playing behind it—infinitely more than routine accompaniment—did much to prevent the small number of instruments from sounding inadequate, particularly in the Mozart and Haydn symphonies.

The arrivals and departures of the orchestra were stamped strongly with an impression of personality attaching to the Barzoni. First of instruments to be unpacked from the bus, and last to return aboard, by reason of its bulk and venerability, it demanded solicitude which kept it continually in the consciousness of the voyagers. On the stage, needless to say, it was a dominating apparition. And to the orchestrally trained ear, it was noticeable for its agile, singing tone, a blend of majesty and delight.

Perhaps the Grand Old Man of the string instruments had been only pretending that the rigors of journeying over the road were of no consequence to his patriarchal frame. Without warning the concert at Farmville proved too much for him. Old Barzoni had joined his grandeur to that of the sarabande of the Corelli suite for many splendid measures. Then, as if a grenade had exploded on the stage,

Continued on Following Page

MUSIC

Globe Jan 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, making his annual appearance as conductor, brought Vaughan Williams' Pastoral Symphony to a first performance in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Albert Spalding was soloist in Mozart's D major violin concerto (K 218) and Chausson's "Poeme." The suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" completed the program.

Although Dr Williams' Symphony was written a little more than 11 years ago, it had been heard here only once previously, in 1925, when played by the Conservatory Orchestra under Mr Goodrich. The adjective "pastoral" to the contrary, there is no "program" in this symphony, not even the slightest bit of acknowledged tone painting. Dr Williams has taken pains to let the music speak for itself, and his music appears to be an expression of a general effect made upon him by contemplating a quiet English countryside.

The work is modal in melody and harmony. Dr Williams also has utilized some devices not sanctioned by conservative musical pedagogues. These include writing in several keys at once. Because he is an artist of taste and skill and not an exhibitionist dilettante seeking notoriety, Dr Williams has handled these devices sanely and well. His work, therefore, neither offends one's ears nor taxes one's nerves in a chaos of confused rhythm.

Folksong is not used perse, but the general character of the melodies is folkish. Perhaps one of the strongest evidences of this composer's vitality and genius lies in the fact that here and elsewhere he has succeeded in recreating the spirit of archaic music. A lesser musician, in adopting Dr Williams' unusual methods, would probably succeed only in being affected and unnatural.

Save for the third movement, there is no loud playing to signify any sudden bursts of feeling. Otherwise the music moves—rambles, almost—sedately, imperturbably, in keeping with the peace and quiet of the scene portrayed. This makes, of course, for monotony. Because we know the composer intended such an effect, and his reason for doing so, no differences may logically be taken with his procedure. But if we judge the piece purely as music, disregarding what was in the composer's mind, this lack of dynamic variety lends justification for calling the work intermittently dull. On the whole, however, this pastoral symphony is a characteristic creation of a unique and notable musician of the day. Adelle Alberts sang the nostalgic measures for soprano voice in the last movement.

The solo part in Mozart's concerto was played by Mr Spalding about as well as it is likely to be, in regard to perfection of style and beauty of tone and phrasing. Furthermore, this violinist—one of the really great contempoary artists of the instrument—adds a certain warmth of his own that supplements but does not distort what the composer wrote down. Yet curiously, the sparkle that ought to characterize Mozart's fast movements was missing from both the soloist's and the orchestra's playing. More than once there seemed to be differences between them in tempo and rhythm.

The poetry and emotional flutterings of Chausson's Wagnerian "poeme" were brought out beautifully. This music is far removed from Mozart, but Mr Spalding, it must be remembered, counts versatility among his virtues.

Mr Burgin's conducting served to exhibit once again the authority and sensitiveness that indicate him to be a first-rank musician.

Albert Stoessel will conduct the Symphony concerts next week. His program will include Philip James' "Station WGBZX," new to Boston; a Bach fantasia arranged for strings and organ, by G. W. Volkel; Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia, Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and the polka and fugue from Weinberger's opera "Schwanda, the Bagpiper." C. W. D.

Radio in Mu Symphony N

Post Jan 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"Station WGBZX," the work by Philip James which stands on the programme of the Symphony Concerts of this week, was the first prize-winner in a contest held last spring by the National Broadcasting Company. It was then heard over the air, but these will be its first concert performances. It has four movements and their titles, taken together with that of the piece itself, are sufficiently suggestive: "In the Lobby," "Interference," "A Slumber Hour" and "Mikestruck." The score calls for numerous extra instruments to reproduce the various noises familiar to listeners-in.

* * * *

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will terminate his mid-winter vacation and the audience of the Monday evening Symphony Concert on January 23 will be the first to greet him. Meanwhile he has intimated that the succeeding Monday evening concert, which falls on February 13, the exact anniversary of the death of Wagner in 1883, will in all probability be devoted to the music of that composer.

* * * *

This 50th anniversary of the death of the master of music-drama will be widely observed. Originally it was intended to commemorate it at the regular Symphony Concerts of Feb. 10 and 11, but since Walter Gieseking is to be soloist that Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Wagner memorial programme will be postponed for a week and will come on Feb. 17 and 18. At that time, according to present plans, will be heard excerpts from "Parsifal" and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

* * * *

This Ninth Symphony was the work which, of all orchestral music, Wagner the most admired and cherished, and as conductor he was most eloquent in it. Certain changes which he made in its instrumentation, notably in the Scherzo, are generally followed today, wherein advantage was taken of a development in instruments and in the technique of performers subsequent to Beethoven's time. And it was the choral finale of this symphony to which Wagner liked to point as justification of his own form of music-drama: there Beethoven had proved, claimed Wagner, that purely instrumental music had been carried to its furthest pitch and the vocal element must be called upon for greater expressive possibilities. Hence the appropriateness of this Ninth Symphony, in Dr. Koussevitzky's eyes, to serve as memorial to Richard Wagner.

Do Like This, Do Like That, So Go on Tour

Continued from Preceding Page

there was a thud and a boom and a flying of things loose. The old man's underpinning had given way, his massive bulk had struck the stage boards with a shock which had knocked loose his bridgework. Like the frantic outflinging of arms to catch balance was the recoil of the untensed strings.

Kunze, after one all-comprehending glance, took firm hold of the stricken veteran and quickly edged off stage with him. Fiedler and the Sinfonietta continued their efforts as if totally unmindful of an accident. Actually, as was learned later, the conductor's heart had sunk with dismay. The Haydn symphony was to follow, and whence would come sufficient body of tone to lend the conviction of symphonic majesty? The answer was supplied as if by miracle. A tall gentleman arose, made his way through a thicket of auditors' knees, and vanished from the hall by a side exit. Shortly he reappeared. Before him he propelled—of all things to produce at will in a country town—a double-bass, and passed with it through the door to the stage wings.

"My son used to take lessons on this," the professor introduced it simply.

"Good. Thank you. How many strings—four? [illegible]

When Fiedler came off stage at the end of the bass-bereft program number, his concern over any impending loss of effectiveness in the Haydn smphony subsided. Kunze was ready to go on, the substitute instrument all tuned. The performance of the Haydn score was not marred by thinness of tone. True, the emergency instrument had not the rich voice of old broken-legged Barzoni. But gratitude in plenty was felt by leader and contrabassist for the twist of fate by which, at just the right juncture they could meet a professor of English with a son who studied the "bull fiddle" and decided to leave it at home when packing for a distant college.

A large, friendly—and exceedingly energetic—Virginian woman, who proved to be the music editor of a daily paper, pricked up her ears upon mention of the fine makes of violin used in the Sinfonietta. "I have a hobby," she said, with Southern inflection, but Northern briskness of utterance, "of looking over any extra fine fiddles I get a chance to." She was gladly invited to see what the Sinfonietta had to offer. "Maybe," she hesitated, "I could have a fiddle shown which would interest your Boston musicians. I know people are always being fooled by thinking they have a Stradivarius, but this isn't claimed to be. This is supposed to be a Nicholas."

Gaston, being well versed in violins fashioned by French masters, volunteered to pass judgment on the heirloom described to him. At lunch time the owner left her business office to fetch her treasure. She had kept it for years in a bank vault. A light of recognition flashed across the face of Gaston as he caught sight of the brass hinged, coffin shaped, black-stained wooden case on the office table.

"Ah—a regular old-fashioned case."

"Well, the case and the violin have been in our family for about a hundred years," the grey-haired woman recounted. "My father, a seafaring man from New Bedford, bought them in Europe. He lived to be quite old and played this violin for years. From my girlhood I remember that it seemed to have an exceptionally fine tone, and that everyone considered it better than what they usually heard. I've been keeping the instrument until I could have it properly appraised. If it should prove to be something exceptional, I wanted my children to benefit, and in the meantime while they were growing up, I wouldn't let them use it for fear of some carelessness that might affect its value.

The violin was orange-hued. Although at first glance the varnish gave hardly the appearance of the hundred years claimed, as Gaston turned the instrument this way and that to catch the light, tokens of age were revealed. There was a heavy incrustation of rosin between the f-holes. Where a fiddle is held between the player's left thumb and forefinger, the varnish had been worn through to the wood, and even the top surface of the wood was well worn. Without a word, seemingly for many minutes, the Frenchman studied the wood, the proportions, the workmanship, and—snapping a finger against the stringless body—the resonance of the instrument. Almost holding her breath, the gray-haired woman watched the violinist's face. It remained impassive. At length Gaston turned his eyes to her.

"Madame, I am very sorry—very sorry, but this is not val-u-able," he said, slowly and gently. "To keep it in the vault is not necessary. The violin would be worth maybe fifty, maybe sixty dollars, if an original Nicholas. That is a good, but not rare make. This looks to me like a German copy. At least, Madame," he said consolingly, "it is hand-made, and not a factory violin. The workmanship is pretty good. It will have a good enough tone. This instrument will be very well for a beginner. It will be better than one he would probably get from a store. It will train the ear better. You will be able to make a student very happy with such a violin. And I would be very happy, Madame, if I could tell you that you could sell this for a high price. But it is not possible. I am ver-ry sorry, re-al-ly."

Bowing low, Gaston departed—and with him, the long-dreamed golden expectations of the inheritor of the violin.

The audience at Sweet Briar women's college had been prophetically pictured as the most musically knowing to be met on the tour. It was. After the concert, when the historian sought an extra program or two for future reference, he found one inscribed with some of the less easily indentifiable time indications. Then, too, there was a program with pencillings in lighter vein. The wording, in two hands, read: "Did you know Celia was engaged?" . . . "Not really—how do you know?" . . . "She told me so herself."

In honor of the musical repute of the Sweet Briar audience, Fiedler set the "stiffest" program of the tour. It ran: Bach, Suite for Flute and Strings; Mozart, Symphony in G-minor; Corelli, Suite for Strings; Granados, Jota; Debussy, Petite Suite; Ravel, Pavane pour une Infante Defunte; Overture to "Der Freischütz."

Audience and orchestra met with high anticipation, fulfilled on both sides. Discerning intelligence, equal to the occasion, could be read in the responses of the audience, in attentiveness and in spontaneity of applause. Nor was it one of these inhumanly musically sophisticated (or rather pretending) student groups. Here, one felt a vibrant youthful liveness which lived and breathed the beauty of the music and the playing of it.

The Sweet Briar concert yielded probably the best conducting Arthur Fiedler has achieved. The excellence reached at the Virginian college had been anticipated by those with him. Penned up in the bus, Fiedler would seek relief from ennui by pondering over his scores. Then, above the rumble of the wheels, his voice would be heard calling out a warning of change, to the men involved. Thus he made alterations repeatedly. And, these being usually for the better, his conducting developed progressively with the length of his cloistering in the bus.

LANING HUMPHREY

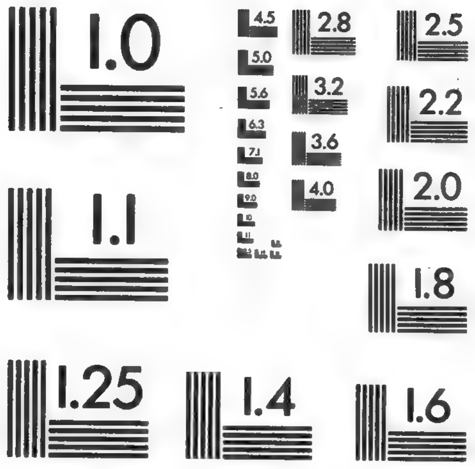
REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

88

Do Like This, Do Like That, So Go on Tour

Symphonic Expedition Into Parts Hitherto Unknown

By A. Fiedler et Al

Trans Jan 14

WHEN there are no Symphony Concerts at a week-end it means that the orchestra is playing outside the State. It also means that the players are journeying in a special railroad car. But the tick-tock of steel wheels on rail joints must remind fifteen of them now and again of their contrasting bus tour a while back.

To load a bus with Boston Symphony players, bag and baggage—including $13,000 worth of instruments—and take them a-touring among small and remote communities of Pennsylvania and Virginia is something one would not ordinarily think of. Or, even so, one would be told that it could not be done. In the first place, the musicians could not be persuaded. Furthermore, they would be too brittle, physically and temperamentally, to last out such a trip. In the third place, such a venture would not succeed. It would not "do business." But the idea was conceived, and in face of these hazards, accomplished by a hypnotic-eyed—one would almost say Paganini-visaged—son of Bulgaria, and Boston concert manager, Demeter Zachareff.

Intelligent populations were known to Mr. Zachareff, around the course of the Mason and Dixon Line, where possibly papers on the Three B's were read, but where not even a really good orchestral performance of the "Beautiful Blue Danube" had been heard. He saw to it that they should have such a treat at the hands of the Boston Sinfonietta. Mr. Fiedler, for his part, insisted that they should have also either a Haydn or a Mozart symphony, and a Corelli or Rameau Suite to boot, among other far cries from a Strauss waltz. Local papers made front page news and double-column editorials of the concerts.

The revelation which the Sinfonietta proved to be for the country auditors was equalled by the revelation which they were to the visitors, in the matter of simple, whole-souled responsiveness. After that engaging trifle, Bolzoni's Minuet, had been led and played with extremely pretty grace by Fiedler and his men, an audience in one remote town seemed, after a hush of strained attention, to give way to a general gasp of astonished delight. And a co-ed behind the historian of the tour exclaimed in a stage whisper: "That was dam pretty, if you ask me!"

And if one were to ask the historian, that was refreshing music criticism, well worth journeying several thousand miles by bus to hear. Rrefreshing also was the experience of having this group for fellow-travelers. They were "good fun" in relaxation, but in concert were artists to the full, and not vacationers. They were always practicing.

To those who thought of New York as a city, as a symbol for skyscrapers, the meanderings of the bus through the countryside in the State of New York was the revelation of a new and beautiful association with the name. The mountains and valleys of Pennsylvania equally or better delighted eyes which had seen many views in Europe. The first two concerts were at Kutztown and Millersville, Pa. Isolated and small though the towns were, the audiences were of student teachers who showed a breathless attention and whole-hearted responsiveness that greatly pleased the musicians. This quality was to prove characteristic of audiences throughout the tour. If listeners were not entirely "up" on music, they acted as if the coming of the Sinfonietta were such a climax in their experience that they must make up in attention what they might lack in knowledge.

It might have been supposed that the party of musicians, predominantly French, would bewail a limitation of facilities which prevented them from enjoying a little vin blanc or vin rouge. But no, what they searched for on each abbreviated main street, and sighed vainly not to find—these Frenchmen—was a delicatessen shop. At Lock Haven, Pa., Mr. Zachareff magically produced a bounteous delicatessen after-concert supper, complete down to Swiss cheese sandwiches on rye bread and something sudsy in a keg, served with pretzels. And so all was "bon."

"For goodness sakes, what's that—the tall black thing?" came a voice abaft the historian at Susquehanna University, Selinsgrove, Pa.

"Why, that's an oboe," was the very positively-voiced identification of the bassoon. Something much like this was repeated at intervals at different concerts. The idea seemed to be, that the volunteer informant had encountered the word—perhaps in a crossword puzzle Then, hastily eyeing familiar instruments, he would mistake the oboe for a clarinet fix on the bassoon as the one instrument awaiting a name from him, and cheerfully hail it by the name he had left over—oboe.

The Sinfonietta had finished playing the opening number. It was a Corelli Suite—Corelli brought to Bloomsburg, to launch an "entertainment." "Victor Herbert Favorites" was set down by Fiedler for next to last piece on the program. A youth and two co-eds seated behind the historian were merry chatterboxes before the program started. gushing over dozens of topics except music. Now they had heard a Sarabanda, Giga, and Badinerie.

"Gosh!" exclaimed the Chatterbox-in-Chief. "I liked that. I thought this program was going to be dull."

But thoughts would wander from the plane of musical responsiveness. . . . "Oh, look!" . . . What at?" . . . "That violinist" . . . "What about him? You can have him—I don't want him." . . . "Oh, I don't mean that." . . . "Nor anything else. as far as I can make out." . . . "I mean his feet Look at them: Did you ever see such long ones in all your days?"

The craning of a neck could be sensed from the rustle of a squirming body on the chair at the historian's back. . . . "You're right! Just how long are his feet, anyway?" . . .

Under the spell of supposedly admiring feminine glances, he of the feet blushed and adjusted his tie.

Back to the music turned the chattering group. A Mozart symphony had been played.

"Funny thing," said the co-ed commentator. "Stuff like this bores me on the radio. But with the players right in front of me, I like it." A similar mood seemed roused in the audience all together. It had been argued to Fiedler that the Mozart symphony would prove to be too rich diet for this audience. He was immoveable. "If they don't like it," he had said, "it won't be our fault." Here, now, was vindication and artistic satisfaction.

Max Kunze's grand old Barzoni double-bass had been an important artistic factor in the powers revealed by the Sinfonietta. The richness of its tone and the excellence of the playing behind it—infinitely more than routine accompaniment—did much to prevent the small number of instruments from sounding inadequate, particularly in the Mozart and Haydn symphonies.

The arrivals and departures of the orchestra were stamped strongly with an impression of personality attaching to the Barzoni. First of instruments to be unpacked from the bus, and last to return aboard, by reason of its bulk and venerability, it demanded solicitude which kept it continually in the consciousness of the voyagers. On the stage, needless to say, it was a dominating apparition. And to the orchestrally trained ear, it was noticeable for its agile, singing tone, a blend of majesty and delight.

Perhaps the Grand Old Man of the string instruments had been only pretending that the rigors of journeying over the road were of no consequence to his patriarchal frame. Without warning. the concert at Farmville proved too much for him. Old Barzoni had joined his grandeur to that of the sarabande of the Corelli suite for many splendid measures. Then, as if a grenade had exploded on the stage, there was a thud and a boom and a flying of things loose. The old man's underpinning had given way. his massive bulk had struck the stage boards with a shock which had knocked loose his bridge-work. Like the frantic outflinging of arms to catch balance was the recoil of the untensed strings.

Continued on Following Page

Do Like This, Do Like That, So Go on Tour

Continued from Preceding Page

Kunze, after one all-comprehending glance, took firm hold of the stricken veteran and quickly edged off stage with him. Fiedler and the Sinfonietta continued their efforts as if totally unmindful of an accident. Actually, as was learned later, the conductor's heart had sunk with dismay. The Haydn symphony was to follow, and whence would come sufficient body of tone to lend the conviction of symphonic majesty? The answer was supplied as if by miracle. A tall gentleman arose, made his way through a thicket of auditors' knees, and vanished from the hall by a side exit. Shortly he reappeared. Before him he propelled—of all things to produce at will in a country town—a double-bass, and passed with it through the door to the stage wings.

"My son used to take lessons on this," the professor introduced it simply.

"Good. Thank you. How many strings—four? Yes, fine." Fiedler came off stage at the

When the bass-bereft program number, his concern over any impending loss of effectiveness in the Haydn smphony subsided. Kunze was ready to go on, the substitute instrument all tuned. The performance of the Haydn score was not marred by thinness of tone. True, the emergency instrument had not the rich voice of old broken-legged Barzoni. But gratitude in plenty was felt by leader and contrabassist for the twist of fate by which, at just the right juncture they could meet a professor of English with a son who studied the "bull fiddle" and decided to leave it at home when packing for a distant college.

MUSIC

Globe Jan 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, making his annual appearance as conductor, brought Vaughan Williams' Pastoral Symphony to a first performance in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Albert Spalding was soloist in Mozart's D major violin concerto (K 218) and Chausson's "Poeme." The suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" completed the program.

Although Dr Williams' Symphony was written a little more than 11 years ago, it had been heard here only once previously, in 1925, when played by the Conservatory Orchestra under Mr Goodrich. The adjective "pastoral" to the contrary, there is no "program" in this symphony, not even the slightest bit of acknowledged tone painting. Dr Williams has taken pains to let the music speak for itself, and his music appears to be an expression of a general effect made upon him by contemplating a quiet English countryside.

The work is modal in melody and harmony. Dr Williams also has utilized some devices not sanctioned by conservative musical pedagogues. These include writing in several keys at once. Because he is an artist of taste and skill and not an exhibitionist dilettante seeking notoriety, Dr Williams has handled these devices sanely and well. His work, therefore, neither offends one's ears nor taxes one's nerves in a chaos of confused rhythm.

Folksong is not used perse, but the general character of the melodies is folkish. Perhaps one of the strongest evidences of this composer's vitality and genius lies in the fact that here and elsewhere he has succeeded in recreating the spirit of archaic music. A lesser musician, in adopting Dr Williams' unusual methods, would probably succeed only in being affected and unnatural.

Save for the third movement, there is no loud playing to signify any sudden bursts of feeling. Otherwise the music moves—rambles, almost—sedately, imperturbably, in keeping with the peace and quiet of the scene portrayed. This makes, of course, for monotony. Because we know the composer intended such an effect, and his reason for doing so, no differences may logically be taken with his procedure. But if we judge the piece purely as music, disregarding what was in the composer's mind, this lack of dynamic variety lends justification for calling the work intermittently dull. On the whole, however, this pastoral symphony is a characteristic creation of a unique and notable musician of the day. Adelle Alberts sang the nostalgic measures for soprano voice in the last movement.

The solo part in Mozart's concerto was played by Mr Spalding about as well as it is likely to be, in regard to perfection of style and beauty of tone and phrasing. Furthermore, this violinist—one of the really great contemporary artists of the instrument—adds a certain warmth of his own that supplements but does not distort what the composer wrote down. Yet curiously, the sparkle that ought to characterize Mozart's fast movements was missing from both the soloist's and the orchestra's playing. More than once there seemed to be differences between them in tempo and rhythm.

The poetry and emotional flutterings of Chausson's Wagnerian "poeme" were brought out beautifully. This music is far removed from Mozart, but Mr Spalding, it must be remembered, counts versatility among his virtues.

Mr Burgin's conducting served to exhibit once again the authority and sensitiveness that indicate him to be a first-rank musician.

Albert Stoessel will conduct the Symphony concerts next week. His program will include Philip James' "Station WGBZX," new to Boston; a Bach fantasia arranged for strings and organ, by G. W. Volkel; Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia, Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and the polka and fugue from Weinberger's opera "Schwanda, the Bagpiper." C. W. D.

Radio in Mu Symphony N

Post Jan 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"Station WGBZX," the work by Philip James which stands on the programme of the Symphony Concerts of this week, was the first prize-winner in a contest held last spring by the National Broadcasting Company. It was then heard over the air, but these will be its first concert performances. It has four movements and their titles, taken together with that of the piece itself, are sufficiently suggestive: "In the Lobby," "Interference," "A Slumber Hour" and "Mikestruck." The score calls for numerous extra instruments to reproduce the various noises familiar to listeners-in.

* * * *

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will terminate his mid-winter vacation and the audience of the Monday evening Symphony Concert on January 23 will be the first to greet him. Meanwhile he has intimated that the succeeding Monday evening concert, which falls on February 13, the exact anniversary of the death of Wagner in 1883, will in all probability be devoted to the music of that composer.

* * * *

This 50th anniversary of the death of the master of music-drama will be widely observed. Originally it was intended to commemorate it at the regular Symphony Concerts of Feb. 10 and 11, but since Walter Gieseking is to be soloist that Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Wagner memorial programme will be postponed for a week and will come on Feb. 17 and 18. At that time, according to present plans, will be heard excerpts from "Parsifal" and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

* * * *

This Ninth Symphony was the work which, of all orchestral music, Wagner the most admired and cherished, and as conductor he was most eloquent in it. Certain changes which he made in its instrumentation, notably in the Scherzo, are generally followed today, wherein advantage was taken of a development in instruments and in the technique of performers subsequent to Beethoven's time. And it was the choral finale of this symphony to which Wagner liked to point as justification of his own form of music-drama: there Beethoven had proved, claimed Wagner, that purely instrumental music had been carried to its furthest pitch and the vocal element must be called upon for greater expressive possibilities. Hence the appropriateness of this Ninth Symphony, in Dr. Koussevitzky's eyes, to serve as memorial to Richard Wagner.

Continued from Preceding Page

there was a thud and a boom and a flying of things loose. The old man's underpinning had given way. his massive bulk had struck the stage boards with a shock which had knocked loose his bridgework. Like the frantic outflinging of arms to catch balance was the recoil of the untensed strings.

Kunze, after one all-comprehending glance, took firm hold of the stricken veteran and quickly edged off stage with him. Fiedler and the Sinfonietta continued their efforts as if totally unmindful of an accident. Actually, as was learned later, the conductor's heart had sunk with dismay. The Haydn symphony was to follow, and whence would come sufficient body of tone to lend the conviction of symphonic majesty? The answer was supplied as if by miracle. A tall gentleman arose, made his way through a thicket of auditors' knees, and vanished from the hall by a side exit. Shortly he reappeared. Before him he propelled—of all things to produce at will in a country town—a double-bass, and passed with it through the door to the stage wings.

"My son used to take lessons on this," the professor introduced it simply.

"Good. Thank you. How many strings—four? Yes—fine."

When Fiedler came off stage at the end of the bass-bereft program number, his concern over any impending loss of effectiveness in the Haydn smphony subsided. Kunze was ready to go on, the substitute instrument all tuned. The performance of the Haydn score was not marred by thinness of tone. True, the emergency instrument had not the rich voice of old broken-legged Barzoni. But gratitude in plenty was felt by leader and contrabassist for the twist of fate by which, at just the right juncture they could meet a professor of English with a son who studied the "bull fiddle" and decided to leave it at home when packing for a distant college.

A large, friendly—and exceedingly energetic—Virginian woman, who proved to be the music editor of a daily paper, pricked up her ears upon mention of the fine makes of violin used in the Sinfonietta. "I have a hobby," she said, with Southern inflection, but Northern briskness of utterance, "of looking over any extra fine fiddles I get a chance to." She was gladly invited to see what the Sinfonietta had to offer. "Maybe," she hesitated, "I could have a fiddle shown which would interest your Boston musicians. I know people are always being fooled by thinking they have a Stradivarius, but this isn't claimed to be. This is supposed to be a Nicholas."

Gaston, being well versed in violins fashioned by French masters, voluntered to pass judgment on the heirloom described to him. At lunch time the owner left her business office to fetch her treasure. She had kept it for years in a bank vault. A light of recognition flashed across the face of Gaston as he caught sight of the brass hinged, coffin shaped, black-stained wooden case on the office table.

"Aha, a regular old-fashioned case."

"Well, the case and the violin have been in our family for about a hundred years," the grey-haired woman recounted. "My father, a seafaring man from New Bedford, bought them in Europe. He lived to be quite old and played this violin for years. From my girlhood I remember that it seemed to have an exceptionally fine tone, and that everyone considered it better than what they usually heard. I've been keeping the instrument until I could have it properly appraised. If it should prove to be something exceptional, I wanted my children to benefit, and in the meantime while they were growing up, I wouldn't let them use it for fear of some carelessness that might affect its value.

The violin was orange-hued. Although at first glance the varnish gave hardly the appearance of the hundred years claimed, as Gaston turned the instrument this way and that to catch the light, tokens of age were revealed. There was a heavy incrustation of rosin between the f-holes. Where a fiddle is held between the player's left thumb and forefinger, the varnish had been worn through to the wood, and even the top surface of the wood was well worn. Without a word, seemingly for many minutes, the Frenchman studied the wood, the proportions, the workmanship, and—snapping a finger against the stringless body—the resonance of the instrument. Almost holding her breath, the gray-haired woman watched the violinist's face. It remained impassive. At length Gaston turned his eyes to her.

"Madame, I am very sorry—very sorry, but this is not val-u-able," he said, slowly and gently. "To keep it in the vault is not necessary. The violin would be worth maybe fifty, maybe sixty dollars, if an original Nicholas. That is a good, but not rare make. This looks to me like a German copy. At least, Madame," he said consolingly, "it is hand-made, and not a factory violin. The workmanship is pretty good. It will have a good enough tone. This instrument will be very well for a beginner. It will be better than one he would probably get from a store. It will train the ear better. You will be able to make a student very happy with such a violin. And I would be very happy, Madame, if I could tell you that you could sell this for a high price. But it is not possible. I am ver-ry sorry, re-al-ly."

Bowing low, Gaston departed—and with him, the long-dreamed golden expectations of the inheritor of the violin.

The audience at Sweet Briar women's college had been prophetically pictured as the most musically knowing to be met on the tour. It was. After the concert, when the historian sought an extra program or two for future reference, he found one inscribed with some of the less easily indentifiable time indications. Then, too, there was a program with pencillings in lighter vein. The wording, in two hands, read: "Did you know Celia was engaged?" . . . "Not really—how do you know?" . . . "She told me so herself."

In honor of the musical repute of the Sweet Briar audience, Fiedler set the "stiffest" program of the tour. It ran: Bach, Suite for Flute and Strings; Mozart, Symphony in G-minor; Corelli, Suite for Strings; Granados, Jota; Debussy, Petite Suite; Ravel, Pavane pour une Infante Defunte; Overture to "Der Freischütz."

Audience and orchestra met with high anticipation, fulfilled on both sides. Discerning intelligence, equal to the occasion, could be read in the responses of the audience, in attentiveness and in spontaneity of applause. Nor was it one of these inhumanly musically sophisticated (or rather pretending) student groups. Here, one felt a vibrant youthful liveness which lived and breathed the beauty of the music and the playing of it.

The Sweet Briar concert yielded probably the best conducting Arthur Fiedler has achieved. The excellence reached at the Virginian college had been anticipated by those with him. Penned up in the bus, Fiedler would seek relief from ennui by pondering over his scores. Then, above the rumble of the wheels, his voice would be heard calling out a warning of change, to the men involved. Thus he made alterations repeatedly. And, these being usually for the better, his conducting developed progressively with the length of his cloistering in the bus.

LANING HUMPHREY

89

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe Jan 12

A New Trend In Music? There are a few who think that the end of a swing of the musical pendulum has been reached, that a trend toward simplicity and concord has become discernible. This may be true. Perhaps we are bound from the bright lights and intoxication of musical ultramodernism back to a tonal home and mother. Just how much evidence there is to prove this is, however, difficult to say. Possibly this trend is sensed, rather than observed, by those who are tired of the fatuities and complicated piffle of some contemporary musical creations.

On the other hand, 10 Italian composers got together the other day and signed a manifesto declaring themselves "against this art which cannot have and does not have any human content and desires to be a mechanical demonstration and a cerebral puzzle." (That is well put, by the way). Possibly anticipating that they will immediately be called reactionary, these composers went on to say: "We know that the rhythm of life and art are in continual movement which does not stop. A logical chain binds the past and the future—the romanticism of yesterday will again be the romanticism of tomorrow."

Of course, no manifesto signed by a handful of composers can arbitrarily affect the development of their art as a whole. That art will develop according to the esthetic viewpoints and the technical craftsmanship of its creative workers. In this respect music is like Topsy, it just grows. The only value that such a manifesto can have is the supposition that its views may be the unspoken and unwritten thoughts of gifted creative musicians sufficiently large in number to have an influence upon the trend of music.

As Ernest Newman well said, no one can really prophesy the development of music. Looking back casually over the last century or so, progress from Beethoven seems for the most part to have been logical and gradual. This being so, there may be no reason to expect that we have reached an impasse where an about face is the only way out.

But what is to follow the present complexity of music? Can music keep on becoming thicker and more dissonant, even more nervous or more mechanical than ultra-modern specimens are now? There must be a limit to the number of tones a composer can put together so that simultaneously they sound like anything but chaos, that they make sense, so to speak. The same thing applies to rhythm.

Some present day musicians have with uncanny technical skill so combined these elements in such profusion that the result is a mass of incoherent sound and motion. A few examples can be given: Florent Schmitt's new "Symphonie Concertante," heard here last Fall, Prokofieff's "Gambler" Suite, the suite of piano dance pieces by Schoenberg that Hortense Monath played last month. The present writer has praised some of these compositions. But he did so from the viewpoint of their being unusual expressions—more or less original in style—of a certain esthetic ideal. And the suspicions persists that a few years from now these examples will have taken on the aspect of museum pieces, interesting only as expressions of a peculiar period in esthetic thought.

But one wouldn't want to live with these pieces, with their complete lack of warmth, repose, of discernible variety of material and treatment, of melodic beauty and simplicity. They do not seem to reflect any emotion on the part of the composer, nor do they arouse any feeling in the breast of the listener.

fantasia in G major, transcribed for string orchestra with organ accompaniment by George William Volkel. The remaining numbers in a curiously-selected program are Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D major (K No. 385);!. Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasia "Romeo and Juliet"; Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and the polka and fugue from Jaromir Weinberger's opera "Schwanda, the Bagpiper."

Music Notes and Comment

Albert Stoessel, guest conductor at the Symphony concerts this week, used to be a violinist, and has played that instrument several times in Boston, including an appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony in 1920. But he has not, according to record, conducted an orchestra in this city before.

Mr Stoessel was born in St Louis in 1894. He studied at the Berlin Hochschule and was a member of the Willy Hess Quartet. Hess and Emanuel Wirth were among Mr Stoessel's teachers. Since 1922 he has been conductor of the New York Oratorio Society and of the annual Worcester Festivals since 1925. He has also conducted at Chautauqua. Mr Stoessel has found time to compose, having written a string quintet, a string quartet, a violin sonata and various other pieces.

◆

Philip James, whose "Station WGBZX" Mr Stoessel will play, is an American composer, now living and working in New York. According to record and memory, only one piece by James has been heard in Boston in recent seasons, that an "Overture in Olden Style on French Noels," performed by the People's Symphony in February, 1932. Mr James was originally an organist, and during the war was master of Gen Pershing's Band. He has done considerable composing.

◆

The next Monday evening concert by the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Dr Koussevitzky, then returning from his fortnight's respite, on Jan 23.

---

tonight at 8:15 o'clock. Tchaikovsky, Quartet in E flat minor; Bartock, Quartet No. 1; Mozart, Quintet (with two violas).

Harold Schwab will play piano music by Respighi, Beethoven, Dennee, Chopin, Wagner, Ravel and Debussy and organ pieces by Bach, Reger, Burdett, Feller, Yon, Vierne and Capon tonight at 8:15 o'clock in Jordan hall.

Her. Ja 19

Dr. Koussevitzky is no doubt enjoying his vacation. Albert Stoessel of New York will conduct the symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. There have been conductors who did not welcome guests. Mr. Gericke refused to allow Colonne and others who had been engaged by the Philharmonic orchestra of New York to take his place in Symphony hall. He argued that the orchestra would suffer thereby, not that he doubted the ability of the strangers; he thought that the players would be upset by unaccustomed interpretation. Nor was he pleased when Vincent d'Indy was invited to conduct the orchestra's two concerts in Boston and the concerts on the trip to New York and other cities. Mr. Stoessel, born in St. Louis, studied in Berlin (1910-1915), served during the world war as infantry lieutenant, and after the armistice as director of the A. E. F. school for bandmasters in France. Returning to this country he is conductor of the Oratorio Society of New York, of the Westchester Festival, of the Worcester Festival and is the head of the Opera and Orchestra departments of the Juilliard Graduate School, New York. He has arranged a decidedly varied program for tomorrow. Bach, Fantasia in G major arranged by G. W. Volkel of New York for strings; Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony; Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." There follows, Station WGBZK by Philip James, descriptive of scenes and noises in a radio station. We understand that this "humorous" piece has been heard in Boston "over the air," but that this will be the first performance by a symphony orchestra in a concert hall. Delius will be represented by his beautiful "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," which was brought out by Mr. Goossens as a guest conductor of the orchestra. The final number will be the polka and fugue from Weinberger's opera "Schwanda." This polka with a fugue—the two numbers occur in different parts of the opera—has been performed by several of this country's leading orchestras—it comes late to Symphony hall—but it should none the less be welcomed.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 13 1933

"POP" CONCERTS PLANNED AFTER SEASON CLOSES

The Springfield Symphony orchestra will give four "pop" concerts at the Auditorium at the close of its present season on March 10, according to action taken yesterday at a meeting of the directors. The full orchestra will be employed, and the programs will be modeled somewhat after the "pops" given by the Boston Symphony.

A maximum admission fee of 25 cents for adults and a minimum of 10 cents for children will be charged. The dates are as follows: Monday night, March 27; Friday night, April 28; Friday night, May 12, and Monday night, May 22.

The purpose of these concerts, according to the directors is threefold: To provide additional income for the players, to keep the orchestra in practice two months after the close of the regular season, and to present four concerts that will appeal to all lovers of good music.

The directors feel that the offering of these popular programs by the full orchestra "will not only afford great pleasure to many persons but will make new friends for the orchestra." The concerts will be run on a strictly cooperative basis, and the entire proceeds above actual expenses will be divided among the players.

NEW YORK SUN

JAN 14 1933

Symphony 'Station WGBZX' To Be Repeated Jan. 21

Two young composers, an American, Philip James, and a Czech, Jaromir Weinberger, will be represented in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert when it is carried a week from today by WJZ. Albert Stoessel will conduct the musicians.

The James composition will be "Station WGBZX," the work which won for the young composer the NBC orchestral award in 1932. His manuscript was one of 573 submitted for the award.

Weinberger's opera is "Schwanda, der Dudelsackpfeifer." It was first performed at the Metropolitan in 1931, but has been heard several thousands of times in Europe. It is based on an old folk-theme.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

JAN 13 1933

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its second concert of the present season in Carnegie Hall, here, this past week. The usual large, but not capacity, audience heard this concert.

It looks strange to see vacant seats at one of the Boston Symphony concerts. For many years it was almost impossible to gain admittance to these superb musical events. However, these lean times are making it difficult for all musical organizations.

Some of the musical societies here of long and honorable careers are off as much as 50 per cent this season; most of them operating at a loss hoping for better times next season.

Mr. Koussevitzky presented an admirable concert in this program. To begin was Vaughn Williams' "Fantasia" on a theme by Thomas Tallis for string orchestra. This talented English composer has woven music of much lovliness around the simple theme by Tallis.

The supreme beauty of the string section of the Boston Orchestra here shone with beauty of tone and shimmering lovliness. The audience was most enthusiastic over this music and both conductor and orchestra were made known that it was well liked. After this came the soloist of the concert, Serge Prokofieff, the famous Russian pianist, playing his own Concerto No. 5, in G-major.

This work is in five movements. Naturally is is all in the modern vein (for Mr. Prokofieff is one of the original modernists). This writer has heard considerable of this composer's music and liked this particular work better than that heard before. Mr. Prokofieff is a brilliant pianist and played his music with great gusto and commanding style.

He was brought back to the stage many times at the conclusion of the concerto. To finish the program was Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major. Here the Boston Orchestra was heard at its best. The performance of this symphony was ideal in every way; it was played with great virtuosity and enthusiastically acclaimed.

* * *

Over in Italy there is a revolt against modernistic music. Some 10 of the most famous of Italian composers issued a protest against the ultra-modern school of composition. Among the signers of this sharply worded protest are such eminent composers as Ottorino Respighi and Ildebrando Pizzetti whose music is well known over here, having been widely performed by the major symphony orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 14 1933

SYMPHONY CONCERT SLATED FOR TUESDAY

The second concert of the Providence season by the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra will be given in the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15. Albert Stoessel, the guest conductor of the week in Providence and Boston, announces a program of notable interest for this occasion.

He will open it with a Fantasia in G major of Sebastian Bach, which has been transcribed for strings by George William Volkel. Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major, K. No. 385, will also be played, and Tchaikovsky's Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." He will also present his own transcription for full orchestra of Debussy's piano poem in miniature, "The Engulfed Cathedral," together with Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes." Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes will complete the program.

Albert Stoessel has been conductor of the Oratorio Society of New York since 1922, when he succeeded Walter Damrosch in that position. He has conducted the Worcester Festivals since 1925 and other noted musical festivals. Before he became a conductor, he acquired a very high reputation as a violin virtuoso.

90

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JAN 14 1933

Boston Symphony In Second Concert Here Next Tuesday

The second concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Albee theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15. Albert Stoessel, guest conductor of the week in Providence and Boston, announces a program of notable interest for this occasion.

He will open it with a Fantasia in G-Major of Sebastian Bach, which has been transcribed for strings by George William Volkel. Mozart's Haffner" Symphony in D-Major, K. No. 385, will also be played, and Tschaikovsky's Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." He will also present his own transcription for full orchestra of Debussy's piano poem in miniature, "The Engulfed Cathedral," together with Debussy's Nocturne "Fetes." Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes will complete the program.

Albert Stoessel has been conductor of the Oratorio Society of New York since 1922, when he succeeded Walter Damrosch in that position. He had conducted the Worcester Festivals since 1925 and other noted musical festivals. Before he became a conductor he acquired a high reputation as a violin virtuoso.

Boston Symphony

Jan 14 Mon.

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky away for his fortnight's midwinter holidays, Mr. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, took over the baton for the twelfth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Jan. 13-14. He opened his program with the "Pastoral" Symphony of Dr. Ralph Vaughan Williams. Last fall, Dr. Vaughan Williams was the guest of the orchestra, and his Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, played in honor of the occasion, attracted much interest and caused a desire to hear more of his music. It was recalled that the "London" Symphony had not been heard in Boston for nearly 10 years, and that neither the "Pastoral" nor the "Sea" Symphony ever had figured on a program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, though the "Pastoral" had been played by the New England Conservatory Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Wallace Goodrich. The selection of this symphony by Mr. Burgin was, therefore, a timely response to public demand.

A second hearing of the symphony tends to confirm the belief that there is an excellent reason why American conductors do not run to perform it, a reason unconnected with its musical qualities. The fact is, this is not grateful music for conductors. "Quiet and contemplative," the composer calls it, and the music abides by the description. Dwelling in modal remoteness, it never raises its voice or dances about except mildly in the third movement; but always sings sweetly and plaintively through misty valleys. We like this music for much the same reason that we like the Fourth Symphony of Sibelius, which it does not resemble, except in its spareness and its avoidance of anything in the way of "effectiveness." Mr. A. E. F. Dickinson has described its mood as one of "dreamy but impassioned contemplation." Dreamy it was, under Mr. Burgin's baton, but hardly impassioned. Possibly a more emotive reading would leave less sense of monotony. We should like to hear the score again; also the "Sea" Symphony.

Mr. Albert Spalding, soloist of the occasion, played the Mozart D major Concerto and the Chausson "Poème" for violin and orchestra. Mr. Spalding, one of the foremost of living violinists, is sufficiently versatile to adapt his style successfully to these disparate compositions—gracile and aristocratic for the Mozart, warmly emotional in the Chausson. This Franckish "Poème," we fear, is not destined to live forever; it begins to smell a little musty.

The concert closed with the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pétrouchka." Even without the stage spectacle, this can be delightful music. On this occasion the notes were all there, the phrasings, the rhythms, the tempi, the accents—everything was there but the breath of life.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JN 15 1933

Stoessel to Conduct Boston Symphony in Second Concert

Noted American Batonist Will Lead Orchestra Tuesday Night at Albee Theatre in Place of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.—The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appears for the second concert of its Providence series Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. Keeping up the custom of having a guest conductor at one of the concerts Albert Stoessel, the noted American conductor, will lead the orchestra in place of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. He has arranged a program of unusual interest including Mozart's Symphony in D-major and his own transcription for full orchestra of Debussy's piano poem in miniature, "The Engulfed Cathedral," together with that composer's nocturne, "Fetes."

The usual lecture on the Symphony's program will be given by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, in the Providence Public Library at 4 o'clock this afternoon. The lecture, which will be accompanied by musical illustrations, is offered free to the public under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club in co-operation with the library. The order of the Boston Symphony's program follows:

TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Albert Stoessel, conductor; Albee Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

Fantasia in G-major, arranged for string orchestra by G. W. Volkal .... Bach Symphony in D-major, "Haffner" (Koechal No. 385) .... Mozart
I. Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Finale: Presto
"Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia after Shakespeare .... Tschaikowski
a. "Le Cathedrale Engloutie" (Orchestrated by Albert Stoessel) . . Debussy
b. Nocturne, "Fetes" .... Debussy
Prelude and Leibestod, from "Tristan and Isodle" .... Wagner
Caprice on Spanish Theme, opus 34 Rimsky-Korsakoff
I. Alborada
II. Variations
III. Alborada
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song
V. Fandango of the Asturias
(Played without pause)

NEWS AND COMMENT

The MacDowell Club will meet tomorrow night at the home of Mrs. Mark N. Bennett, 97 Benevolent street, when the following program will be given in charge of the assisting hostess, Mrs. Ernest L. Sperry: Piano duets, "Scenes de Ballet," Glazonow, "Preambule," "Marionettes," "Mazurka," "Scherzino," "Pas d'Action," "Danse Orientale," "Valse," "Polonaise," Miss Lydia Bell, Miss Christine Gladhill; soprano solos, "Until You Came," Metcalf; "Little Lady of the Moon," Coates; "A Lullaby," Wild, Miss Helen Bissell Pettis, Miss Elizabeth Hope Higgins, accompanist. Musical items, Miss Mary E. Davis; 'cello solos, "Apres un Reve," Faure; Gavotte in D, Popper; "Herbstblume," Popper, Miss Louise S. Waterman, Miss Lydia Bell, accompanist. Vocal trio, "Behold the Golden Sun Upsoaring," from "The Magic Flute," Mozart; "Were I a Gardener," Chaminade, "Gute Nacht," German folk song; Czecho-Slovakian Dance Song, arr. Charles F. Manney, Mrs. Sarah Henley Ide, Mrs. Emily Amidon Hampton, Mrs. Evelyn E. Clarke, Miss Elizabeth Hope Higgins, accompanist.

◆ ◆ ◆

Albert Stoessel, who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night, has been conductor of the Oratorio Society of New York since 1922 when he succeeded Walter Damrosch in that position. He has conducted the Worcester Festival since 1925 and other noted music festivals. Before he became a conductor he acquired a very high reputation as a violin virtuoso.

◆ ◆ ◆

Application for student cards to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Tuesday night should be made to Miss Mary Cull, 615 Jackson building, or to Miss Carrie Schmitt, 15 Conrad building, members of the music committee of the R. I. Federation of Music Clubs. Students must be 25 years of age or under and at present studying. Their application blank must be signed by the teacher.

◆ ◆ ◆

Pierre Pelletier will present his advanced pupils in the ninth of a series of vocal recitals in the Outlet Auditorium Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock. Those taking part are Gladys Silva, Mrs. Cornelius Cummiskey, Beatrice Koger, Yvonne Lacasse, Evelyn Blanchette, Agnes Demers, Geraldine Fraise, Andrew Grant, James C. Byrne, Charles Savoie, Matthew Lockhart, Harry Parkin and Melvin Mahon.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

15 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts the Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is now directing his Saturday night concerts for the entire country. This famous musical organization is presented at 7:15 o'clock each Saturday night over station WREN, Lawrence, Kas. Koussevitzky has conducted the Boston orchestra longer than any other man in its half century history.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 15 1933

The Boston Symphony.

Every visit here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event. For it is one of the greatest orchestras ever put together—sometimes, of late, I have felt it to be the finest now playing. Certainly its strings have both the mellowness of youth and the authority of maturity. Its wind sections, also are beautiful in tone; while from technical and musicianly standpoints there is little that is not forthcoming.

Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, by degrees, into a ripened conductorial period. Not that he completely satisfies me; I doubt that he ever will. But he is far and away an abler leader than when he first stood before this Boston band. Incidentally, he radiates that touch of aristocracy which I have always believed was one quality that endeared him to Bostonians.

The recent two concerts in Carnegie Hall were occasions of interest and accomplishment. At the first the novelty was Serge Prokofieff's scintillating concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with the composer playing the solo portions . . . . and in just the degree of abandon which this composition needs.

At the second concert Prokofieff was again the soloist. Still it was the orchestra which held the limelight—with Koussevitzky on the podium. The compositions, on both programs, were varied and performed with all the excellences of which the Boston Symphony is capable.

A Distinguished Singer.

Heinrich Schlusnus made arances in this coun-ago he gave the im-al singing quali-r his return ap-ernoons ago
re of his made of r such sing-art

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

15 1933

As Music Goes
By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Program of Boston Symphony Tuesday Evening to Range From Bach and Mozart to Wagner, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given next Tuesday evening offers two interesting and important extremes of the realm of music. Each must be considered one of the very earliest to write finished music, bearing mature material of worth and distinction. At the other end of the scale are Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakoff, of our own time, and Wagner in the full flower of his worth and fame.

It has become the fashion to arrange some of the glorious works of Bach for the full orchestra or for the string section alone. This is a testimony to its great musical value and a phase of our musical development which would have been unnecessary had organists made their concerts more vital and interesting and less dull and stodgy. Among the many reasons for the great musical value of Bach are wealth and beauty of melodic invention and perfection of workmanship in the technique of composition. We must also recall that there are far more concerts today than formerly, many more orchestras and virtuose performers. It must be remembered that Wagner never heard his "Tristan and Isolde" properly performed because of a lack of suitable, capable vocalists and orchestral performers. What would Bach, Mozart, Wagner, Tschaikowski think could they hear their works performed as our present day orchestras render them?

The "Fantasia" form of musical composition has always been a favorite. It is less formal, allows more free and spontaneous musical expression and has not as yet been developed to its fullest possibilities. We have already had ample opportunity to hear the string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in many "feature presentations." It has many times demonstrated that it is incomparable.

Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony

The Bach "Fantasia" is especially arranged for strings and the symphonies of Mozart are essentially of "string character." Brass and woodwind were then in their infancy; they are now in their full flower of perfection. Although many prefer the E-flat and G-minor symphonies to all others of Mozart, the "Haffner," dedicated to Mozart's best loved and most substantial patron is in the most classic Mozartian vein and one of the most enjoyable of all his 41 symphonies. Of these, 14 are in the key of D-major, a key which undoubtedly made for facility of performance, then as now. One does not in this time and generation note the commanding of a symphony and its performance to grace a wedding, a thing that is unfortunate for our culture, for the bride and for contemporaneous composers. Doubtless the name of Haffner would long since have been forgotten were it not for this symphony of Mozart.

Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy to "Romeo and Juliet" is not one of his greatest works, but is well worth hearing. It abounds in rapid-fire violin figures which suggest the quarrels of the Montagues and the Capulets, religious and legato andante depicts the benediction of Friar Lawrence and the rhythmic throbbings, the ardor of the ill-fated lovers. The love song, largamente, is full of passionate appeal and poignant sadness.

It is curious that the "Cathedrale Engloutie" has not been arranged for orchestra long before now. Had Debussy been less industrious and occupied by recording the workings of his colossal genius he would have undoubtedly done it himself. Albert Stoessel has rendered a distinct service to music in arranging this well known work for the piano for full orchestra.

A Vigorous Rhapsody

"Fetes" heard not long ago from this orchestra, is a most brilliant and vigorous rhapsody which recalls Berlioz' Roman Carnival for rhythmic swirl. Woodwinds must be indeed nimble to do this work justice, for it is a composition only for performers of the highest virtuosity.

Seldom does one hear two such tremendous orchestral pieces as near neighbors at the end of a program composed of less stern stuff. The "Prelude and Liebestod" of Richard Wagner beggars description. It is one of the greatest of all works for the orchestra and is the closing thought of a veritable delirium of composition which concluded the incomparable master's residence in Venice. It is one of the most tremendously effective works in all musical literature, a concert in itself. If there is any composition worthy to follow it it must be the vigorous "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a suite of contrasting emotions characterised by swirling dances, plaintive love songs, with vigorous and brilliant tone colorings. Unusual orchestra figures such as five part figures for brass instruments, violin cadenzas over a vibrating drum roll, together with brilliant harp cadenzas make this work one of most effective brilliance.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AN 15 1933

Public Library Music Collection Includes All Program Offerings

Works That Throw Light On Boston Symphony Concert Available

The music collection at the Providence Public Library contains all of the music on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here Tuesday. The Fantasia in G-major, by Bach, is found in Bach's Organ Works of which the library has an edition with critical notes by Widor and Schweitzer. The Symphony in D-major, by Mozart, is arranged for piano solo in the Analytic Symphony series, edited by Goetschius; also for piano duet in a collection of his symphonies edited by Ulrich. The Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowski, is for piano solo.

Also for piano is "La Cathedrale Engloutie," by Debussy, to be found in his first book of "Preludes." There is a miniature orchestral score of his "Fetes" in addition to a transcription for piano by Borwick. Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" is represented by several transcriptions, fantasies and other arrangements for piano, by Franz Liszt, Otto Singer, G. F. Kogel and others. The "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by Rimsky-Korsakoff is in the form of a piano duet.

The books on the subject of orchestral conducting include one by Albert Stoessel, guest conductor for this concert, entitled "The Technic of the Baton," a most useful handbook for musicians unacquainted with this difficult art.

The library invites all who attend Dr. Chapman's lecture on the music of the concert this afternoon to visit the Art library on the third floor where music scores and books of interest in connection with the program will be displayed.

Among the new books received is "Music Through the Ages" by Marion Bauer and Ethel Peyser, authors of the admirable history, "How Music Grew." This new volume should enable students to pick out salient points of music history from remote days of primitive man to the era in which he is now living. Several chapters devoted to the new tendencies in music, in America as well as in European countries, should appeal to those interested in modern music. The lists of books and periodical articles compiled at the end of each chapter are most valuable, and those who are stimulated to pursue the subject further will find that the library can supply the majority of the titles listed.

91

SUNDAY STANDARD-TIMES, NEW BEDFORD, MASS., JANUARY 15. 1933.

Youth's Dream of Musical Heights and Fame Fulfilled When Albert Stoessel Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra

Well Known in New Bedford, Musician Has Had Picturesque Career

Seventeen years ago Albert Stoessel was living in Boston with his sister, the present Mrs. Edna Stoessel Saltmarsh, teaching violin, writing an occasional composition and playing now and then in private recitals. This month he returns to Boston as guest conductor of one of America's finest musical aggregations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He will conduct at a concert in Providence Tuesday night, Jan. 17, and at concerts in Boston Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Jan. 20 and 21. The city where he lived as a lad in his teens waits to acclaim him as one of the outstanding figures in the musical world.

New Bedford likes to think of him as a local boy. His father, Albert J. Stoessel, himself an orchestra and band leader of note, lives in Mattapoisett. Mrs. Saltmarsh has long been a resident of this city. Albert has visited here frequently and has Summered at Mattapoisett. A number from this section will go to Boston to see him wield the baton in Dr. Koussevitsky's place the last of next week.

Studied in Germany.

Mr. Stoessel was born in St. Louis in 1894. When he was 16 he entered the Royal Academic High School of Music in Berlin for study of violin under Emmanuel Wirth and Willy Hess. Soon he was concert master of the school orchestra.

In 1913 he entered upon his professional career as a member of the Hess String Quartet, one of the most celebrated in Europe. His debut as a violin soloist was made in Berlin with the Bluethner Orchestra in 1914 and there followed concerts through Germany, Holland and Switzerland.

Outbreak of the World War abruptly ended Mr. Stoessel's successful concertizing in Europe. Home again, he made his American debut with the St. Louis Symphony, appearing in concerts in various cities. He lived with his sister in Boston from 1915 to 1917, studying, teaching and writing.

He was engaged to become concert master of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in 1917 but entrance of the United States into the war led him to cancel that engagement and enlist in the Army. He served for 12 months with the 301st Infantry at Camp Devens as private, sergeant, bandmaster and lieutenant. Then he went overseas with that unit and after the Armistice was stationed as director of the A. E. F. Bandmasters School at Chaumont, founded by Walter Damrosch and General Pershing.

Commandeered by French.

Prior to that, his conducting of the 85 piece 301st Infantry band had won him notice and the French government commandeered his band for a tour through the important cities of France. It was while associated with Walter Damrosch at Chaumont that he wrote a treatise, "The Technic of the Baton," which has become a popular work of its kind.

Demobilized in 1919, Mr. Stoessell re-entered the concert field as soloist with the Boston Symphony and other leading orchestras. A tour with Caruso in 1919-1920—the last the great tenor made—in the role of concert violinist, won Mr. Stoessel wide recognition as master of the violin. From Boston to the West Coast the larger cities heard and applauded him.

Then Mr. Damrosch invited him to be his assistant and in 1921 Mr. Stoessel succeeded Damrosch as conductor of the Oratorio Society of New York, a choral group organized by Dr. Leopold Damrosch in 1873. In the Summer of 1921 he conducted the New York Symphony Orchestra in 21 concerts at Lake Chautauqua. He has returned to Chautauqua each Summer since then until last year when he spent the Summer months in Germany.

For eight seasons he has acted as choral and orchestral conductor of the Worcester Music Festival. He is director of the Juillard School of Music's opera department in New York and conductor of the Westchester, N. Y. festival each Spring and of the New York Bach Cantata Club.

Mr. Stoessel can scarcely remember when his musical training began. Music was his heritage. At the age of nine he won a prize offered by the San Francisco exposition with a march, his first attempt at composing.

Mr. Stoessel has played here on several occasions, once in a joint recital with Mrs. Saltmarsh, who is an accomplished pianist, once at the Rotary Club and on other occasions. His wife is a violinist of note. They have two sons.

The Boston Symphony, which recently observed its golden jubilee, ranks among the greatest on earth. In its 50 years of existence nine celebrated conductors have swung the baton and each year has brought it renewed successes and acclaim.

The orchestra, organized in 1881, was the realization of the life-long dream of Henry L. Higginson of Boston. It was his aspiration that America should have a permanent orchestra made up of the best musicians living. For 36 years he carried the orchestra alone giving a succession of famous leaders a free hand in shaping it to the utmost perfection and virtuosity.

First conductor was Sir George Henschel, a singer and composer of high repute, who later established his own orchestra and was knighted by the British king. He led the Boston Symphony from 1881 to 1884. Last year he came from England to open the jubilee season, conducting his original program.

There were but 70 men in the original group. Today there are practically double that number in the Symphony.

Successive Conductors.

Wilhelm Gericke was conductor for the seasons of 1884-1889 and again from 1898 to 1906, raising the standard of the programs and drilling the players into the perfected ensemble which first gave the orchestra world renown.

Gericke's successor, Arthur Nikisch, conductor from 1889 to 1893, brough the orchestra to new heights of eloquence. The famous romantic Hungarian leader's four years at the helm were among the most brilliant of all.

Another conductor of temperamental brilliance was Emil Paur, a contemporary of Nikisch, who had succeeded him in Leipsic and who followed him at Boston. In the six seasons he conducted the Symphony he introduced several new composers, notably Richard Strauss, to the musical public.

Next came Dr. Karl Muck, a conductor who demanded that his hundred musicians play as one and for whom no nuance was too fine to be captured. He led the orchestra from 1906 to 1908 and again from 1912 to 1918.

In the interim between Dr. Muck's two terms, Max Fiedler conducted from 1908 to 1912. In contrast to his predecessor's high program standards he showed a distinct popular tendency, which found favor with many patrons.

Henri Rabaud, the orchestra's first French conductor, a distinguished composer, and one of the finest musicians of France, conducted for two seasons, 1918-1919.

He was followed by Pierre Monteaux, another Frenchman, but of a vastly different type. He proved an invaluable technician and enlarged the repertory, taking new paths which have since come to be regarded as indispensable.

The present conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, succeeded Monteaux in 1924. Traits in him recall the past but all his work bears the personal stamp of a great genius. His intensity of utterance, his height of virtuosity, his fine artist's visualization of music past and present, his popular appeal, which never compromises his true musician's nature—these are some of the prominent qualities of leadership which have lifted the Boston Symphony Orchestra to fresh heights of achievement and fame.

Mr. Stoessel, at 38, is one of the youngest men to ever conduct the Boston Symphony. Like Koussevitzky he looks more youthful than his years and smooth-shaven, hair neatly trimmed, he displays little of the traditional aspect of an artist in his personal appearance.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Albert Stoessel.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 15 1933

Koussevitzky.

Announcement is made by Mrs. Wilson-Greene that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its world-renowned Russian conductor, will make its only concert appearance of the season in Washington two weeks from next Tuesday—Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30 o'clock—as the fourth attraction of her artists' series of afternoon concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky has not yet announced his program.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
Jan 15 1933

Every visit here of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an event. For it is one of the greatest orchestras ever put together—sometimes, of late, I have felt it to be the finest now playing. Certainly its strings have both the mellowness of youth and the authority of maturity. Its wind sections, also are beautiful in tone; while from technical and musicianly standpoints there is little that is not forthcoming.

Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, by degrees, into a ripened conductorial period. Not that he completely satisfies me; I doubt that he ever will. But he is far and away an abler leader than when he first stood before this Boston band. Incidentally, he radiates that touch of aristocracy which I have always believed was one quality that endeared him to Bostonians.

The recent two concerts in Carnegie hall were occasions of interest and accomplishment. At the first the novelty was Serge Prokofieff's scintillating concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with the composer playing the solo portion . . . and in just the degree of abandon which this composition needs.

NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 15 1933

Albert Stoessel
ductor of the Bos chestra at its c ternoon and Sa
Boston. The pr
Bach's fantasia ranged for string orchestra by G. W. Volkel; Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D major, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia, Philip James's "Station WGBZX," Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" and the polka and fugue from Weinberger's "Schwanda."

9A

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 15 1933

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Emperor Serge

IT WAS some years ago that Mr. Serge Sergievich Prokofieff, the Russian musician now in this country, informed an attentive world that he was the second most important of living Russian composers—Stravinsky, according to Mr. Prokofieff, being the first. In view of the increasing frequency with which Mr. Stravinsky gives us things like "Apollon Musagète" and the ineffable Concerto for Violin, it would not be surprising to learn from Mr. Prokofieff that his rank and Stravinsky's have now been exchanged, and that we actually have among us today the most important of living Russian composers. It would be pleasant to think that this is the case, and that we are now free to honor Mr. Prokofieff as the chief of the musical Muscovites (with due respect to Mr. Shostakovitch, Composer-Laureate to the Soviet State).

Certainly Mr. Prokofieff's eminence is being duly honored hereabouts In America—in Eastern America, at least—he dominates the musical scene. Within the last fortnight he has appeared as composer-pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and as composer-conductor with the Musicians' Symphony Orchestra. During the next two weeks he will play his Third Piano Concerto at three concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; his "Classical Symphony" will be heard at three concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra; and his new suite, "The Gambler," will have four performances in Manhattan and Brooklyn under Mr. Walter's bâton. After that, Mr. Prokofieff will proceed westward to distribute sweetness and light on the shores of Lake Michigan.

* * *

A Prokofieff Novelty

THE current Prokofieff Festival will shortly yield us Mr. Prokofieff's so-called "Four Portraits," an orchestral suite unknown to New York, which Mr. Walter has placed upon this week's programs of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society.

There is much that is interesting about this novelty. Mr. Prokofieff some sixteen years ago made sketches for an opera, "The Gambler," based on Dostoievsky's partly autobiographical novel of the same title. He completed the opera in 1927, and in the spring of 1929 it was produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels. Afterward, Prokofieff extracted from the score the material for a concert suite, which he calls "Four Portraits from 'The Gambler.'" This suite was performed for the first time at a Colonne Concert in Paris last March; and Mr. Bruno Walter has recently conducted it in Germany. It was given under Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston two months ago.

* * *

Portraits From "The Gambler"

THE "Four Portraits" are those of characters in the novel—Alexis, the Grandmother, the General, Pauline. There is a concluding movement, entitled "Dénouement."

"In this orchestral suite," writes Mr. Prokofieff, "the composer has wished to present the principal characters that figure in his opera, 'The Gambler.' His procedure has been to co-ordinate all the musical material which in the course of the opera defines each character, and to shape it into an orchestral piece. Here is the amorous Alexis; here is Pauline, haughty, enigmatical, at the same time passionate, unhappy; here is the General, giving himself important airs, but trembling lest the Grandmother will not give him her money (he has lost his); and here is the Grandmother, rich, imperious, knowing that they await her death to inherit her property, nevertheless showing some tenderness in speech for Pauline. At last the dénouement, where events hurry one upon another, leading to a dramatic end." . . .

The plot of the novel (which was suggested by Dostoievsky's ungovernable passion for gambling and his somewhat less ungovernable passion for the conscienceless Pauline Souslov) may be recalled as follows: Among the guests in the Hotel-Casino at Roulettenburg, Germany (circa 1865), are a retired Russian general and his stepdaughter Pauline; Alexis, the teacher of his children; a French marquis and money-lender; a Parisian cocotte; a phlegmatic, cold, distant, timid Englishman; a German baron; a Russian prince; and some who are attracted by the roulette tables and the dancing. The General is infatuated with the cocotte; she would like to marry him for his title and for the money he may inherit from an old and sick grandmother. On the strength of this possible heritage, he has borrowed money from the Marquis; the family is living on it. This Marquis, knowing that the grandmother is fond of Pauline, who may share in the heritage, seduces Pauline. She becomes his mistress. If she shares in the inheritance, he will wed her. Alexis is madly in love with Pauline. She alternately encourages and flouts him, laughs at him; but he gratifies her every whim, is her slave. To the consternation of the mercenary group, the grandmother arrives with her servants and luggage. The description of her arrival is delightfully humorous. She has come to play roulette. She plays recklessly, this eighty-year-old lady, and loses a fortune. The cocotte tells the General what she really thinks of him, and leaves him for a Prince; the Marquis writes to Pauline that he cannot marry her, he is sorry to say, and reminds her that he had lent a large sum to the General.

Pauline, incensed, tells Alexis he must find 50,000 francs, that she may throw them in the face of the Marquis. Alexis rushes to the gaming table; plays furiously. He cleans one table after another, finds Pauline, offers her the 50,00 francs. She refuses: "I'll not take money for nothing. The mistress of the Marquis is not worth so much!" She breaks down, weeps. Alexis consoles her, holds her in his arms, and believes at last that she really loves him.

But when morning comes, after Pauline has abandoned herself to Alexis, she is haughty, spiteful. He hands her the 50,000 francs. She throws them in his face and rushes from the room. Alexis, stupefied, is left alone, wondering.

* * *

Dostoievsky and Pauline

WHEN Prokofieff's Suite was performed in Boston, the unrivalled Philip Hale illuminated the subject of the work by a characteristic and inimitable program-note. "It was probably in September, 1861," he wrote, "that Dostoievsky became acquainted with Apollinaria Pankratievna Souslov, the Pauline of 'The Gambler,' as he was the Alexis of that novel. She was a young university student at St. Petersburg. He had published his 'Memories of the Dead House,' and his first important novel, 'The Humiliated and Offended'; he was an idol of the students. According to the description of her given by Aimée, the daughter of Dostoievsky's second wife—a description to be taken with much salt—Pauline came from a Russian province. Her rich parents sent her enough money for her to live at ease as a student. She inscribed herself each Fall as a student at the University, but she never took examinations nor followed any particular study; but she flirted with the students, went to see them, hindered the young people in their work, led them to sign protestations in revolt, marched at the head of their processions, carried the red flag, sang the Marseillaise, insulted the Cossacks and police, passed the night in prison, and on her return to the university was carried in triumph by her fellow students. 'Free love was then in fashion. Pauline went from one student to another, and served Venus, believing that she thus served European civilization.' She was impressed by the fame of Dostoievsky; she made advances to him; wrote him a love letter, a simple, naïve, poetic one. This declaration of love came at the moment when he needed it, 'for he had been tortured by the treachery of his wife; he despised himself as a deceived, ridiculous husband.' And now he could be loved, even after he had been a convict, with thieves and assassins his companions.

"In September, 1861, a short story by Pauline was published in the 'Vremya.' No doubt Dostoievsky met her, but E. H. Carr in his carefully documented biography says: 'It does not appear that their intimate relations began at this time;' the beginning was in the winter of 1862-'63, The principal source of knowledge of the affair is Pauline's extremely frank diary. 'It was—for we have no reason to question her statement—Suslova's first adventure; and conventional sympathies should therefore be on her side. But no reader of her diary can regard Dostoievsky as a cool and calculating rake, or can doubt that Suslova was by nature salacious and by nature a coquette.

* * *

Love, Roulette, and a Novel

"THE pair had intended to travel together to France and Italy in the summer of 1863, but Pauline started alone for Paris in June. Dostoievsky followed in August, stopping at Wiesbaden, where he won 5,000 francs at roulette. He found in Paris a letter from Pauline reproaching him, but mildly. When he met her, she told him she was in love with Salvador, a young Spanish doctor or medical student. Salvador persuaded a friend to send a letter saying that her lover had typhus; 'for the first, and perhaps the last, time in her life, Suslova had allowed a man to tire of her before she tired of him.' Pauline met Salvador by chance. After a short talk, she went home, had a fit of hysterics, after which she records that she felt 'wonderfully well.'

"Early the next morning she went to Dostoievsky: 'Fyodor said that it was no use taking notice of the whole affair; I had of course besmirched myself, but that was incidental. Salvador was a young man who needed a mistress. I had come on the scene, and he had seized the opportunity. Why not? A pretty woman satisfies all tastes.' Then they agreed to go to Italy, as 'brother and sister.' She gives an amusing account of an extraordinary scene between them at Baden, where Dostoievsky lost 3,000 francs at roulette. At Geneva he pawned his watch; Pauline pawned a ring. They traveled to Genoa; took ship for Rome. He found Pauline an expensive companion; he sketched in a letter to a publisher a story suggested by the tour: the novel, 'The Gambler,' written three years later (1866). They went to Naples; embarked for Genoa; he went to Homburg, where he lost everything; he then wrote to Pauline, who was now in Paris; begged her to lend him the money to return home. She thought first of pawning her watch and chain; but she borrowed the money from friends in Paris.

"They did not meet again for almost two years; perhaps they were together for a few days at Wiesbaden; but their intimacy was not renewed. There were mutual reproaches. She saw in him the traditional seducer. In 1864 she wrote in her diary: 'I begin to hate Dostoievsky; it was he who first killed my faith.' He wrote, according to her diary: 'You cannot forgive me for the fact that you once gave yourself to me, and you are taking your revenge for that; that is a feminine trait.'"

* * *

In 1867, Dostoievsky married his stenographer, Anna Gregorevna, "a young and rather pretty girl of twenty, of good family," as he wrote to Pauline. "She has a heart, and can love." Dostoievsky dictated to Anna his novel, "The Gambler," the year before their marriage. It was written in twenty-six days.

In 1881, the year of Dostoievsky's death, Pauline married V. V. Rozanov, a university undergraduate. She left him six years later.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 16 1932

"A SEA SYMPHONY"

Facts Regarding Orchestral Rehearsals for the Work are Made Known

To the Editor of The Courant:—

In the review of the performance of "A Sea Symphony" by Vaughan Williams by the Hartford Oratorio Society, I stated that the orchestra had been rehearsed in its parts in Boston by Mr. Arthur Fiedler. Its playing led one to believe that it had studied the score thoroughly, but I learn that I was misinformed. Instead of long rehearsals, the orchestra had read the score but once, on the afternoon of the performance. Its superior performance consequently is even the more remarkable, and it reflects great credit, not only upon the technical skill, but the sound musicianship of the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who made up the orchestra on Tuesday. In justice to them the facts ought to be known.

W. K. S.

Hartford, Dec. 15, 1932.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

JAN 16 1933

Pierre Key's Music Article

New York, Jan. 16

The Boston Symphony

EVERY [redacted]Boston Symphony Orchestra is an event. For it is one of the greatest orchestras ever put together—sometimes, of late, I have felt it to be the finest now playing. Certainly its strings have both the mellowness of youth and the autority of maturity. Its wind sections, also are beautiful in tone; while from technical and musicianly standpoints there is little that is not forthcoming.

Mr. Koussevitzky has developed, by degrees, into a ripened conductorial period. Not that he completely satisfies me; I doubt that he ever will. But he is far and away an abler leader than when he first stood before this Boston band. Incidentally, he radiates that touch of aristocracy which I have always believed was one quality that endeared him to Bostonians.

The recent two concerts in Carnegie Hall were occasions of interest and accomplishment. At the first the novelty was Serge Prokofieff's scintillating concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with the composer playing the solo portion . . . and in just the degree of abandon which this composition needs.

At the second concert Prokofieff was again the soloist. Still, it was the orchestra which held the limelight—with Koussevitzky on the podium. The compositions, on both programs, were varied and performed with all the excellences of which the Boston Symphony is capable.

* * *

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Jan 17

Sibelius Delays

SIBELIUS'S Eighth Symphony, with which Dr. Koussevitzky intends to end and crown his current cycle of Sibelian symphonies, may not be available, after all, for performance this season. The Philharmonic Society in London had also announced it for a spring concert. Last November it sounded the composer as to the readiness of a manuscript or an engraved score. Early this month it received the following reply from Helsingfors:

> I thank you for your kind letter from Nov. 23. As I, unfortunately, cannot with certainty inform you about the time when I shall publish my Eighth Symphony, it will be best not to announce it definitely. At any rate the work will not be let for sale before the Royal Philharmonic Society has performed it.

The newest mails from London bring two foot-notes to this letter. The first, from The Daily Telegraph, says: "The advent of this new symphony has excited world-wide interest. Last summer Mr. Basil Cameron saw Sibelius when he was in Helsingfors, and the composer told him that the symphony was complete—in his head. He had not, however, at that time written any of it down, but he hoped that he would get it on paper after he returned from his summer holiday."

The second, from The Times, adds: "It will be remembered that the Philharmonic Society announced the Eighth Symphony of Sibelius for its concert of March 9, giving, however, Chaikovsky's practically unknown Second Symphony as alternative in case Sibelius's score should not be available, as now indeed seems doubtful. The composer's promise to the society of the first European performance holds good." Apparently the first performance in America and, possibly, anywhere is still reserved for the Boston Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 18 1933

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert at Albee Theatre is Marked by Extensive Scope of Expression Covered by Comprehensive Program

Nearly every form of emotion which the human mind is capable of comprehending found musical expression at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Albee Theatre.

"Pure music" had its place in the "Fantasia" of Bach, and Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony in D major. Atmosphere, mysticism, and legendary suggestion received poetic exposition in Debussy's "Submerged Cathedral," gaiety and the exuberance of carnival spirit laughed and sported freely in his "Fetes," love's ardors and frenzied passions surged and glowed in Richard Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" and the dramatism and passion of gypsy life received tonal teratment in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

Those who view the considable difficulties of Bach with disfavor should have heard his "Fantasia in G" as played by the incomparable string section of the orchestra, the poetry with which technical "exercises" may be invested, the effectiveness with which organ music may be arranged for a string orchestra, a medium of musical expression different from the organ of Bach's time and the fine degrees of tone shading which Albert Stoessel imparted to the assembled string choirs.

A Plastic Rendition

One heard a plastic and sympathetic rendition of the, delicious "Haffner" symphony. In this work Mozart did not strive for heroic and massive effects as in the "Jupiter" symphony but revealed his classic personality in a work which is as characteristic of his proper idiom as any of his symphonies or sonatas. The "minuette" was heard with the delicacy and charm of any courtly dance and in the other movements agile strings lent all possible eloquence to a rapidly-unfolding tale of tonal beauty. This orchestra is as capable and fluent with Mozart as any orchestra might be. Stoessel's treatment of the "Andante" was particularly enjoyable and artistic.

Seldom does any concert end with tours de force. Yet at the end of this we had music a large part of which is tremendous in volume and in impression.

Again matchless violoncelli in upswelling voice charmed, for this conductor did not overlook the magnificent crescendo of the "Prelude" to Tristan. If Wagner intended the reply of the woodwind to be like the crashing of a sea wave this orchestra was descriptively eloquent and in the unfolding of the tonal love-death many orchestral voices joined in richness, made possible by a most complicated score. It was a perfect rendition of the most glorious music that has as yet been given mankind.

The "Spanish Caprice," with which the concert closed, is one of the most rhythmic and vital compositions in all music. It is more than a caprice; it is a tone poem of bold and gorgeous orchestral colors, rhapsodic and firm in its instrumental expositions.

Little of Coquetry

Its thoughts are heroic and tremendous, even its Gypsy love song lacks the trivial and savors little of coquetry. With the exception of occasional floritura all its moods are full-bodied and their passion intense and vibrant. In this wise it was played, as a tour de force rather than as a play of wit and light humor, as the whirling of broad shouldered Andalusians rather and a play of wit among Court favorites and cavaliers. The beauty and clarity of Mr. Burgin's violin, his impeccable harmonics and faultless technique against the tenuous roll of the snare drum gave fascinating interest and charm. Sweeping glissandi gave surprising tonal amplitude to the harp often supposed to be of softer and less commanding voice, and Mr. Laurent in his cadenza for flute showed the pure and lucious tone quality which helps make this orchestra's wood wind choir justly famous. And where else would one hear a beautiful clarinet cadenza over cymbals vibrated with sponge-tipped drumsticks?

Albert Stoessel, new to this city save for his compositions, held his forces well in hand and directed with skill and authority. His arrangement of the "Cathedrale Engloutie" shows his ability in orchestration, a work which must be accepted as a distinct contribution to the literature of orchestral music. Surely Debussy himself would have approved.

The program:

Bach: Fantasia in G-major, arranged for String Orchestra by G. W. Volkel.
Mozart: Symphony in D-major, "Haffner" (Koechel No. 385)
  I. Allegro con spirito.
  II. Andante.
  III. Menuetto: Trio.
  IV. Finale: Presto
Tchaikovsky: "Romeo and Juliet":Overture-Fantasia after Shakespeare.
Debussy: a. "La Cathedral Engloutie" (Orchestrated by Albert Stoessel)
  b. Nocturne: "Fetes."
Wagner: Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
  I. Alborada.
  II. Variations.
  III. Alborada.
  IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
  V. Fandango of the Asturias. (Played without pause)

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

Concert-Chronicle

Ourselves and Others

FOR the while the Symphony Orchestra is making its second monthly journey to New York, giving concerts in Manhattan or in Brooklyn yesterday, today, tomorrow. There is, then, no program to report from Symphony Hall. In the other major cities the symphonic routine proceeds as usual. In New York, the Philharmonic Society is playing under Mr. Walter:

Symphony, No. 8, in F major........Beethoven
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra with Piano .... Bloch
(Pianist: The Conductor)
Suite from the Ballet, "Schlagobers"..Strauss

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski will divide his program between two symphonies that head the poll in a recent ballot of his audiences, viz.:

Symphony in D minor.................Franck
Symphony, No. 1, in C minor..........Brahms

In Chicago the concerts of the week honor the memory of Theodore Thomas, first conductor of the orchestra, with this program:

Overture to the Opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis". Gluck Symphony, No. 5, in C minor........Beethoven Tone-Poem, "Ein Heldenleben"........Strauss

Programs to Hand

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week, Mr. Burgin will be deputy-conductor, but Mr. Spalding will be unable to be present as visiting violinist. A new program consequently will be substituted for the one originally prepared.

Anton Witek, concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, will be "assisting artist" at the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 15. Thompson Stone, conductor, sets this program:

Classical Suite ... .Kempf
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra. Brahms Symphony in A major ("The Italian"). Mendelssohn
Overture to the Opera, "Jean de Paris" Boieldieu

At the concert of the orchestra of the MacDowell Club in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 18, Mr. Fiedler will revive a pretty, flavorsome little symphony which the eldest generation at Symphony Hall remembers and would like to hear anew—Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." Now, to put it bluntly, is their chance.

Miss Louise Bernhardt, who seemed a year ago as promising a young singer as the Chicago Company contained, has turned, for the while, from opera house to concert-room. In Jordan Hall next Tuesday evening, she will present herself as a singer of songs through a program that contains not one operatic item. The nearest approach to it are two songs, set to music by Beethoven, in Goethe's play, "Egmont." In these and in an air from Handel a string quartet will assist her. For the rest her program ranges freshly through songs of Brahms, Strauss, Wolf, Marx, Ravel, Debussy, French and American composers.

Chenkin Returns

Unexpectedly and with little heralding, Victor Chenkin, the remarkable singer of character-songs, already familiar figure with this public, is returning for an evening in Brookline on Monday next in Temple Israel at Riverway and Longwood Avenue, beginning at eight o'clock. He will be heard—and seen—in a wide repertory of character-songs—Russian, Italian, Ukranian, Yiddish, Gypsy.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JAN 19 1933

RADIO MUSIC

There is constant argument as to whether or not the radio has improved the musical taste of the public. The non-professional lover of good music usually thinks that it has; he is mindful of the fact that he is enabled to hear at home concerts which, either because of spatial or financial considerations, he cannot attend in person. He knows, of course, the handicaps and allows for them; he does not expect to get all the tonal nuances over the air, but he feels that he is extremely lucky to get all he does get.

Seeing what enthusiasm real music-lovers have for the finer programmes, it is sad to learn, as we have learned from more than one source, that stations which broadcast these programmes receive comparatively little encouragement in the way of letters from their audiences. If that neglect goes on, it will be very hard for the stations to keep up their good work. It may be granted that at no time will the number of those who enjoy a performance of a great symphony, for example, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky or Dr. Stokowski or Dr. Bruno Walter equal the number of those who enjoy the ululations of the currently most popular crooner. Yet we have a notion that the audience for the former is of much greater importance than that for the latter—even from the advertiser's point of view, that it makes up in quality what it lacks in quantity.

While we are on the subject of making acknowledgment for programmes really worth listening to, this newspaper may as well mention some for which it feels profoundly grateful. At all times it appreciates such blessings as the Sunday afternoon concert of the New York Philharmonic over WPRO, and the Saturday night concert by the Boston or the Philadelphia orchestra over WBZ or WEAN. Then there is the fine contribution of WBZ on Saturday afternoons—an opera from the Metropolitan stage, New York. How long should not we poor provincials have had to wait to know just what "Emperor Jones" was like but for the broadcast of its premiere a few weeks ago?

Such programmes are the highlights of the ordinary radio week. Less well-known but worthy of the most exacting music-lover's attention are the Sunday morning recitals by the Musical Art or the Gordon String Quartet (WJAR), the Compinsky Trio (WEAN) and George Rasely's hour over WBZ. These three programmes are so timed that they succeed each other in the order named and fill the period between 10 a. m. and high noon. Reviewing in this way what it is possible to hear every week over the air—and there is much that is meritorious which we have not mentioned—we cannot subscribe to the dictum that radio is not helping to develop the public's appreciation of great music played or sung with distinction. We are, indeed, emphatically of the opinion that it is.

94

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1933

-:- MUSIC -:-

A GUEST CONDUCTOR

It seems to be the settled policy of the Boston Symphony directorate that one ~~of the four con~~certs given in Providence each year shall have a guest conductor as its presiding genius. Devotees of Dr. Koussevitzky, and that means almost all of us, have been regretting it especially since the annual quota of concerts was cut down from five to four.

The reason for the regret, however, is not merely Dr. Koussevitzky's absence; it is the fact that rarely, if ever, is the substitute for him a leader who approaches him in quality. We can recall but one case where the audience seemed almost as satisfied as if Dr. Koussevitzky himself had been on the podium. That was a memorable night when Sir Thomas Beecham wielded the baton and showed us that magical power which has given him a world-wide fame.

The conductor last night was Mr. Albert Stoessel, who directs the New York Oratorical Society, and is undoubtedly one of the most distinguished musicians in the country. Hardy, indeed, would be the critic who would question the musicianship of Mr. Stoessel, and this column gladly pays homage to it. But a really great conductor must be more than a great musician; he must be a great magician as well, framing "out of three sounds not a fourth sound but a star," and he must have the magnetism of a compelling personality. No two men were ever more different in their ways on the podium than Koussevitzky and Felix Weingartner, for example, but in the art of each the authority of a distinctive personality has been evident. So, too, with Toscanini and Stokowski or, to go back a good many years, Hans Richter and Karl Muck or Arthur Nikisch.

This rare type of genius does not seem to belong to Mr. Stoessel so far as orchestral leadership goes. He gives the impression of regulating the work of his players rather than of directing and inspiring it. Scholarly, academic, accurate and meticulous in his readings, he seems to reserve for the fastnesses of his own mind whatever dramatic experience he is going through. He may set an audience thinking but he does not set it afire.

Mr. Stoessel, however, is an excellent programme maker as the following will show, being the record of what he accomplished last night:

Bach: Fantasia in G-major, arranged for String Orchestra by G. W. Volkel.
Mozart: Symphony in D-major, "Haffner" (Koechel No. 385)
I. Allegro con spirito.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Trio.
IV. Finale: Presto.
Tchaikovsky: "Romeo and Juliet": Overture-Fantasia after Shakespeare.
Debussy: a. "La Cathedral Engloutie" (Orchestrated in Albert Stoessel).
b. Nocturne: "Fetes."
Wagner: Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan und Isolde."
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause).

Everyone of these compositions must have been familiar to a large part of the audience. Dr. Koussevitzky had played at least four of them in recent years, so that Mr. Stoessel was not putting any unexpected test up to the players. Of the whole programme the Bach and the Mozart were done best, and the "Liebestod" was thte least satisfactory. Our use of the adjective "academic" above will explain why. It will suggest that the dark and moving tragedy of Wagner did not stir us as it should do, that the mysticism of Debussy was not as other-worldly as it should have been, and that Jasper Petulengro would hardly have acknowledged what there was of a picaresque quality in the Rimsky-Korsakoff work.

K. A.

Music and Musicians

A Guest Who Comes With Novel Gifts

Albert Stoessel as Conductor, The Heralded Radio-Piece, Other Fresh Items

Jan 19

To the Symphony Concerts this week comes an American conductor as guest. For the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's vacation Albert Stoessel is in charge of the orchestra. His activities as conductor of the New York Oratorio Society and of the Worcester Festival, as teacher at New York University and the Juillard School are too well known to Bostonians to require further introduction. For his program Mr. Stoessel has assembled a list of six pieces half of which are new to 'these concerts,' while the other half comes from the less active part of the orchestra's repertory. These latter include Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony; Chaikovsky's fantasia "Romeo and Juliet,' Delius's "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." The novelties are a Fantasia in G major by Bach, transcribed from organ to String Orchestra by G. W. Volkel; a Suite in four movements by the American composer, Philip James, "Station WGZBX"; the Polka and Fugue from Weinberger's opera, "Schwanda, the Bagpiper." This polka, but not the fugue, was played at The Pops last spring.

"Station WGZBX"

Chief interest will center in what popular parlance is already calling the "radio piece." The composer, Philip James, was born in Jersey City; received his education in New York, Paris and London. He is the composer of numerous orchestral and choral works, as well as of chamber music and organ-pieces. He is at present a member of the faculties of both New York and Columbia Universities.

A note about the origin of "Station WGZBX" says: "'Station WGZBX' was composed in 1931 and won the National Broadcasting Company's first prize of $5000 in 1932, in a contest which assembled 573 manuscripts from American composers. In this contest, five compositions were selected by a jury composed of Walter Damrosch, Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Tullio Serafin and Nikolai Sokolov, but the jurors did not rank them in order of merit. This task was entrusted to a national committee of award composed of 150 selected men and women scattered all over the United States, who on Sunday, May 1, 1932, listened by radio to the five winning works played by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Goossens, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and who telegraphed their votes to the NBC. The works were again played the following Sunday under Mr. Goossens, and awards made."

Mr. James's orchestra for his suite is of especial interest. The assemblage of strings, wood-winds and brass is for the most part conventional. Wood-winds are used in threes, brasses in threes and fours. The only thing that is unusual is the inclusion of three saxophones. The list of additional instruments looks almost like a dealer's catalogue—plus certain specimens contributed by the imagination of the composer: Voice of a Robot or electrically amplified speaking voice, timpani, side drum, bass drum, cymbals, tam-tam, Chinese temple-blocks, rattle, Indian tom-tom, xylophone, high-tension buzzer, tambourine, lion-roar, wind-machine, fire-siren, vibraphone, chimes, harp, piano, celesta.

Notes prepared for the radio performances of this work contained the following description of the several movements: "1. 'In the Lobby.' The first movement, in sonata form, is meant to portray the corridors of a large broadcasting station. After a few introductory measures the principal theme—a short, pert one, representing radio itself—is introduced. In the ensuing development we hear the varied sounds peculiar to a radio station. From reception rooms come the noise and bustle of crowds; from audition rooms, fragments of voice trials. Occasionally the doors of nearby studios open and we hear snatches of a Chinese or Indian program, or talks and announcements intermingled with the rhythm of a jazz band. The movement is, in fact, a kind of radio 'Grand Hotel.'" Though it is described as in sonata-form, the "short, pert" theme dominates it. This is a descending theme, mostly of eighth notes with syncopations.

"II. 'Interference.' The second movement, which is analogous to the symphonic scherzo, portrays the rather distressing moments caused by badly tuned receiving sets, blanketing of stations, static and the like. We are aware of garbled scraps of announcements, heterodyne 'squeals,' the dots and dashes of a code weather report and various other phenomena of 'interference' aggravated and supplemented by static and fading. In this movement the Voice of the Robot is introduced. We hear him reciting disjointed fragments of an announcement, crooning a phrase in the popular style. Finally he bursts into wild, inhuman laughter, thus typifying the humorous side of mechanical reproduction of music." This is the movement which principally makes use of the large list of instruments above enumerated. It may be of interest to quote some of the lines given to the Robot: "La- . . . and . . . we are a- . . . present a . . . -gram, sponsored by . . . makers of Domiak . . . Onomatopoéia . . . -tributing agents. . . . This concert . . . Overture on . . . -vanced composer. . . . Left the concert hall when . . ."

"III. 'A Slumber Hour.' This movement, naturally, expresses the quietude of a late evening broadcast. It begins with a majestic chord, built up tone by tone, followed by the chiming of a bell and solo passages for violin and 'cello." One need only add that the tempo indication "Con languore" discloses better than any comment the character of the movement. It is cast in free, irregular, continually changing rhythms.

"IV. 'Mikestruck.' The final movement is an exuberantly cheerful rondo in 'Tempo di Jazz,' suggesting the unquenchable enthusiasm of the 'mikestruck' amateur who feels the urge to express himself before the microphone." No further comment is to the point. The present performances of "Station WGZBX" will be the first in any concert hall.

Operatic Fugue

Jaromir Weinberger's folk-opera, "Schwanda the Bagpiper," proved one of the best-liked operas in recent years. Between the première at Prague in 1927 and the first American performance at the Metropolitan in New York in 1931, it is said to have had some 2000 performances in the theaters of Central Europe. The plot is taken from the folk-lore of Bohemia and neighboring countries, a fable about a bagpiper who by the witchery of his playing extricates himself from many trying situations on earth and in the devil's domains. Weinberger (who is a pupil of Max Reger) uses folk-tunes, and music written in the manner of folk-tunes, for the substance of his opera. These he combines with a scholarship which does justice to his teacher, but which is so deft in its manner that the general public is scarcely aware of it.

Excerpts from reviews written by Oscar Thompson in the New York Evening Post and by Pitts Sanborn in the New York World-Telegram, after the Metropolitan performance, may best be quoted for description. Says Mr. Thompson: "Weinberger's peculiar blend of the naive, the highly sophisticated, the ironic and the academic may be said to have rung another bell . . . the most attractive and satisfying combination of virtuoso craftsmanship and engaging melody since the Strauss 'Rosenkavalier' . . . often what lies behind brilliant effect is neither very original or thematically engrossing . . . but it accomplishes its mission. Moreover, it has bite . . . the several interludes are beautiful examples of craftsmanship united with almost popular melody." To which Mr. Sanborn may add: "A score overflowing with catchy music to a fantastically entertaining play. . . . The music is eclectic and by no means radical . . . as a whole it has verve, impetuosity and engaging tunefulness."

Verve and impetuosity are the earmarks of the two excerpts to be played at Symphony Hall. The polka, a trifle of two and one-half minutes' duration, frank and free as Smetana himself when writing in his folk-manner, has place in the second scene of the first act. The fugue is a perfect example of Weinberger's disregard for the seriousness of serious things. This most serious of forms, the fugue, begins as a ballet! The thematic matter and the general manner are akin to that of the polka itself. It occurs in the next to the last scene of the second act. From a simple beginning it grows larger and more expansive, eventually adding the choral forces of opera to the orchestral. For concert purposes the organ may take the parts given the chorus on the stage. The whole is upbuilt to a thrilling climax —probably the reason why Mr. Stoessel placed it last on his program.

Youthful Bach

George William Volkel, who made the transcription of Bach's Fantasia in G major, is a prominent organist in New York city and a member of the faculty of the Juillard School. The transcription is for string orchestra with organ ad libitum. Bach's fantasia is an early work. It belongs to the period "prior to his appointment to Weimar in June, 1708, in his twenty-fourth year" (Forkel). In the original, large portions are for a single melodic line, without accompaniment or interweaving voices. One considerable portion is in full, majestic style. The single line Mr. Volkel has treated in a way similar to that in which Pick-Mangiagalli treated the single line of Bach's violin-prelude in E major—with imitations and counterpoints, making a piece of complete polyphonic texture. It may be hoped that the result will prove to be something as engaging as was Pick-Mangiagalli's.

A. H. M.

LEBANON, PA.
NEWS-TIMES

JAN 20 1933

WILL PLAY AT READING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ conducting, will appear at Rajah Theatre in Reading, Pa., on Monday evening, January 30, in the last of the season's concerts under the management of George H. Haage.

POTTSVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 20 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT READING JANUARY 30TH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will be the attraction on Monday evening, January 30, at the last concert of the Geo. D. Haage series at Rajah Theatre, Reading, Pa., for this season. The orchestra will play two Bach Preludes for String Orchestra, arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, the Brahms Symphony No. 3, in F major, and three Wagner selections: "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried, "Prelude and Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture from "Tannhauser."

READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 22 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

As there is nothing in the world of performance quite comparable in emotional depth and tonal splendor to a fine symphony orchestra, such an experience becomes infinitely more rare when the orchestra to be heard is one of the greatest in existence.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to appear on Monday, Jan. 30, at Rajah Theatre, has held the distinction for many years is a matter of history. In the last eight years the continuous association of such a conductor as Serge Koussevitzky, and a personnel more illustrious than any of the past, has had its effect. An insatiable artist, Koussevitzky has shaped the Boston Symphony Orchestra season after season into a more nearly perfect instrument to express his fresh and vital conception of the "classics," his interest in music, his unique artistic personality. The concerts of this famous orchestra have reached new heights of beauty and importance. The management of the orchestra for Reading, therefore, is one of those events which may be counted upon to occur only at long intervals. This concert will be the fifth and last of the Haage series of concerts for 1932-33.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Tickets are now selling at Hangen's Music House. On Monday morning at 11 Mr. Haage will give a radio talk over Station WEEU. His subject will be "The History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Its Conductor."

STOESSEL CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

"Station WGZBX" a Novelty Well Received

Post Jan. 21

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Albert Stoessel, conductor of the Worcester Music Festivals, of the Oratorio Society of New York and of various other choral and instrumental bodies, made his first appearance here as orchestral director at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon.

THREE FOR FIRST TIME HERE

The programme which Mr. Stoessel had prepared for yesterday's concert and for that of this evening, which will be nationally broadcast, was rich in novel interest. Three of its six numbers were heard for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert, while a fourth, Delius' "On Hearing a Cuckoo in Spring," had appeared but once before upon a programme of this orchestra.

Furthermore, one piece of the afternoon, Philip James' "Station WGZBX," which last spring was awarded the National Broadcasting Company's prize of $5000, received its first performance in a concert hall, and the composer was on hand to grace the occasion. Previously known here only through the Pop concerts were the engaging Polka and Fugue from Jaromir Weinberger's Czech folk-opera, "Schwanda, the Bagpipe Player," while the arrangement by G. W. Volkel of Bach's Organ Fantasia in G major was yesterday heard for the first time in Boston. The remainder of the programme consisted of Mozart's so-called "Haffner" Symphony in D major and the familiar "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia of Tchaikovsky.

James' Radio Piece

Both Mr. James' radio piece and the excerpts from "Schwanda" further strengthened the conviction that the contemporary composer's strongest suit is the writing of music primarily designed to entertain and to amuse. The titles of the first three numbers of Mr. James' composition, "In the Lobby," "Interference" and "A Slumber Hour," are self-explanatory.

The fourth and final division, "Mike-struck," is, in the composer's own words, suggestive of the "unquenchable enthusiasm of the milkstruck amateur."

Though the least characteristic of the four, this movement boasts a compellingly vigorous chief theme. The first movement is clever and effective; the second, marred by a superabundance of detail, only slightly less so. The third establishes a mood but would gain by curtailment.

Mr. James handles the orchestra expertly and to the more usual percussion instruments adds Chinese blocks, a rattle, Indian tom-tom, high tension buzzer, lion-roar, wind-machine and fire-siren. There are also parts for vibraphone and for an electrically amplified speaking-voice. Plainly Mr. James is a sound and skillful musician blessed with ideas and with a sense of humor; yesterday's audience received him "Station WGZBX" and its composer with genuine enthusiasm.

There was unusually hearty applause, too, for the brilliant and diverting music of Weinberger, which deserves to become part of the regular repertory of the orchestra.

Reverently Transcribed

The G major Organ Fantasia of Bach, a work of the composer's 24th year, has a stateliness and a melodic breadth that remind one more of Handel than of Bach himself. Mr. Volkel, a New York organist and teacher, has made his transcription for strings reverently and adroitly.

The performances yesterday of Mozart's Symphony and of Tchaikovsky's Overture were of a routine nature, but those of the pieces by James and Weinberger were as witty and brilliant as the compositions themselves. Delius' wistful, reticent, tonal expression of the mood of one who finds sadness as well as joy in vernal things was sympathetically interpreted.

MUSIC

Globe Ja. 21

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Albert Stoessel conducted the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, bringing with him as "new" music Philip James' "Station WGZBX." The rather heterogeneous program included G. W. Volkel's transcription for string orchestra of a familiar Bach fantasy in G, Mozart's delightful little "Haffner" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia, Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" and the celebrated polka and fugue from Jaromir Weinberger's opera "Schwanda, the Bagpiper."

This was Mr Stoessel's first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. Back in 1920, however, he was violin soloist with the orchestra. A musician of varied activities—he teaches, conducts, and composes—Mr Stoessel is a familiar figure in the music of this country. His conducting yesterday proved him a leader of taste and sound principles, one inclined to sober, middle-course interpretations rather than to excesses of any sort.

He began with a brisk reading of Bach's orchestrated prelude. G. W. Volkel, who made the arrangement, is a colleague of Mr Stoessel at the Juilliard Music Foundation in New York. Had the balance of the prelude realized the promise of the first few measures, Mr Volkel's work might have been a notable example of its kind. He wrote with unimpeachable taste and with an idea of how the string choir, when properly used, can richen and intensify, without distorting, music originally conceived for another instrument. But the promise was not realized; a certain monotony of tone color soon prevailed, and the transcriber's excess of zeal in dividing his instruments into several small groups resulted in undue thinness of tone.

Mr James' "Station WGZBX" is an attempt to depict the sounds—musical and otherwise—to be heard when listening to a radio broadcast, and to create a sort of musical impression of radio studios. The work is bright, amusing, but quite without merit as serious music. Mr James succeeded best in his tone painting and reproduced graphically static, code signals, the chaos of jazz bands, crooners and miscellaneous auditions all going on at once. The score calls for many instruments foreign to a symphony orchestra, including a mechanically amplified human voice to suggest a crooner and an announcer. The music is scored so thickly that many of these instruments were lost in the maze of sound. The composer was present and acknowledged applause from the stage.

Weinberger's polka was heard at the "Pops" last Spring, but the fugue was presumably played here for the first time yesterday. The latter is the more notable of the two in ideas, although both are gay and spirited without being trivial. Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about the fugue is the surprising clarity of texture for a work written for full orchestra, plus organ and a brass section off stage.

Mr Stoessel's temperament seemed best suited to the Bach, to Mozart's Symphony, and Delius' delicate piece. He was most successful in these numbers, although the first movement of the Symphony might well have gone faster. Mr Stoessel appears to strive for clarity, strict tempo, euphony, and evenness of melodic line. These qualities he achieves, but subtlety and delicacy are less in evidence.

His interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" was less pleasing. This work requires—to borrow an adjective from Liszt—a transcendental, a super-eloquent and highly dramatized reading if it is to make any effect. Otherwise it is revealed to be commonplace and turgid. Tchaikovsky wrote some great music, but this overture-fantasy assuredly is not of it.

Next week Dr Koussekitzky will conduct "Delius' "Brigg Fair," Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, and Ravel's transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." C. W. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 21 1933

STATION WGBZX, BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Prize-Winning Composition of Philip James is Highlight of Broadcast This Evening on WBZ

Two young composers, an American and a Czech, will be represented in the Boston Symphony orchestra concert which will be carried over a National Broadcasting company network tonight. The American is Philip James, the Czech, Jaromir Weinberger.

Albert Stoessel will conduct the concert, one of a series by the Boston orchestra which are broadcast each Saturday evening over WBZ network at 8.15. The program follows:—

Fantasia in G Major arranged for string orchestra by G. W. Volkel....Bach
Symphony in D Major, "Haffner"...Mozart
I. Allegro con spirito
II. Andante
III. Menuetto; Trio
IV. Finale; Presto
Romeo and Juliet Overture, Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky
Station WGBZX .... James
On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring .... Delius
Polka and Fugue from "Schwanda" .... Weinberger

The Philip James composition is the one with which the young conductor won the NBC orchestral award last year, and this will be its first concert presentation, although it has been played over the air previously. James's manuscript was one of 573 submitted for the award. The composition, as the title indicates, is a musical picture of a broadcasting station.

Weinberger's opera, "Schwanda, der Dudelsackpfeifer," gained international fame for the young Czech composer. It was first performed at the Metropolitan in 1931, but has been heard more than 2000 times in Europe, and has been translated into 14 languages. The opera is based on an old Czech folk theme.

The Bach, Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Delius compositions are of course familiar to all followers of concert music.

The San Francisco Symphony orchestra and the Buffalo Civic symphony will also be heard over NBC networks. The Buffalo concert will be directed by John Ingram at 4 p. m., over WEAF, and the Pacific coast concert, under the baton of Bernardino Molinari, will reach listeners over the same hookup at 11.30 p. m.

The San Francisco concert is the last of a series presented over networks by the coast orchestra, but the Boston and Buffalo concerts will continue to be heard weekly throughout the winter.

Bori and Johnson In "Pelleas et Melisande"

Claude Debussy's opera "Pelleas et Melisande" will be heard on the air for the first time from the Metropolitan Opera house in New York city with Lucrezia Bori and Edward Johnson singing the title roles today at 2.30.

The opera, the second and third acts of which will be carried over a WJZ network, also will mark the first performance this season in the Metropolitan opera series by Mme Bori and Johnson.

Evening broadcasts worth while are:—

6.00 p.m.—WBZ: Irish minstrels.
8.15 to 10.15 p.m.—WBZ: Boston Symphony orchestra.
9.30 p.m.—WEAF: Ethel Shutta.
10.30 p.m.—WJZ: Raymond Knight.

Trans Jan 22

Orchestral Finance

Midwinter Report on Deficit and Guarantee from The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra

In the current program-book for the Symphony Concerts the Trustees of the orchestra do more bookkeeping. . . . Last season, 1931-32, left them with an unpaid deficit of $24,233.11. Last October they estimated the deficit for the current season at $93,218.60. From it they then deducted a cut in salaries amounting to $49,900. There remained, to be met by subscriptions, $43,318.60. Add the two deficits and the current Guarantee Fund should equal or exceed $67,551.71. Of that sum, by report of Jan. 17, $38,139.60 is now pledged or paid. To balance their books the Trustees now need $29,412.11, or, in round figures, $30,000.

Once more comes the familiar appeal: "The Orchestra can be carried on only by the active support of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially. All such are invited to join in the support of the Orchestra." Modesty and reticence do not disguise a genuine and important need if Boston is to keep prestige and pleasure as the seat of an illustrious orchestra at zenith. Three pages in the program-book list present subscribers to the Guarantee Fund. There is room for many more. Mr. E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon Street, will welcome their substriptions.

Afternoon of Mr. Stoessel As Conductor

A Miscellany of Six Pieces, Hard-Fisted Performance, Various Outcome

Trans Jan 21

By exception the Symphony Concert of yesterday asks little more than record. To it, from the Worcester Festival, the New York Oratorio Society and the Juilliard School of Music, likewise in Manhattan, came Albert Stoessel to be guest-conductor. In his younger years Bostonians knew him as resident or visiting violinist. They now renewed acquaintance with a well-reputed conductor at early middle age. Setting a program, Mr. Stoessel departed from custom "at these concerts." Instead of the usual three or four numbers, he assembled six short pieces ranging widely; packed them all into the usual hour and fifty minutes, intermission included. His pauses were short. Upon comings, goings, acknowledgment of applause he wasted no time—the clapping, the bow, the orchestra on its feet, the concert proceeding anew. Two or three times in the course of a season Mr. Stock makes a similar program for the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra. Less often, and unusually of more closely related pieces, Mr. Stokowski ventures one in Philadelphia.

To such innovation there should be welcome, not demur. For these departures from routine guest-conductors come to Symphony Hall. In choice of pieces, however, it was not always possible to see eye to eye with Mr. Stoessel. Obviously Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" is one of the conductor's battle-horses. He bestrides it vigorously. He has taught it new gaits and unexpected caracoles. But lapsing years, changing symphonic fashions, present mood in audiences have staled the Russian's Shakspearian fantasia. With difficulty Dr. Koussevitzky himself keeps it intermittently in the repertory. . . . The conductor has likewise accustomed the symphonic public to novel numbers from American composers. Mr. Stoessel would be as considerate. Yet his choice of Philip James's prize-piece for radio-consumption, "Station WGZBX," left much to be desired. Furthermore: Mr. Volkel's arrangement for string orchestra of the young Bach's Fantasia for Organ in G major—conveyed to Symphony Hall from the concerts of the Juilliard School—is undistinguished transcription beside Schönberg's or Elgar's or Pick-Mangiagalli's similar work familiar to Bostonian ears.

Mr. Stoessel's other numbers were more persuasive: Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, good to hear and not too often played at Symphony Hall; Delius's lyrical rhapsody "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," from a composer neglected in Boston; the amusing and displayful Polka and Fugue from Weinberger's folk-opera, "Schwanda the Bagpiper." Both opera and excerpts are now in declining vogue, European and American. Often, however, it is our habit hereabouts either to lead the symphonic procession or, else, to bring up the rear. Though the heyday of the opera dates from 1929, not until last spring did the Polka find place even in The Pops; while then and there Mr. Fiedler was hampered by a version for small orchestra.

Though the orchestra seemed to give Mr. Stoessel all that he asked, it would not be the truth to say that the performance of these pieces was highly individual or highly distinguished. In the transcription from Bach, which divides and subdivides the strings, to gain imitations and counterpoints of a single melodic line, the conductor evidently relied upon the incisive tone and the performing mettle of the Bostonian choir. It gave reason for that trust. . . . Taking the Symphony over-heavily and with singularly little shading along the way, Mr. Stoessel missed the gallant style, the freshness and buoyancy, the finer felicities of a time-defying music. Mozart little better than improvised it to please his father and a patron; but this time, off the fingers of genius ran the work of crowded days. . . . Vehement contrasts, swift, sudden, full-bodied strokes, rather than pervasive romantic ardor, marked Mr. Stoessel's version of Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The years have worn the piece hollow and blatant; sapped what its generation believed to be tragic intensity. Not even Mr. Stoessel's magniloquence could refill it.

Continued on Following Page

Afternoon of Mr. Stoessel As Conductor

Continued from Preceding Page

With Delius's rhapsody, the conductor kept to the true vein, but scarcely deepened it. The piece is minor Delius, occasionally mannered Delius; but it distills none the less a fine, if thin, ecstasy of musical imagination, a poetry intoned at once rapt and gentle and rueful. Brief as it was, it remains the memorable number of the day. . . . Nor was Mr. Stoessel at fault with the technical readiness, the gusto, the good tonal theater of Weinberger's stuff. In these irreverent days a fugue may do almost anything. Schwanda's dances. . . . In sum a direct-minded, heavy-handed, well-routined conductor more accustomed to pulling a student or a festival orchestra through than to playing upon a virtuoso-band as a many voiced, sensitive instrument. A "driver," as New England housewives say, which trait and condition is not exactly the approach to Bach or Mozart or Delius.

Mr. James's "radio piece" came—and went. It won him a prize; it serves the purpose "on the air" which is friendly mockery; it gained him, Friday, a call to the stage. In the concert-hall, however, it is paltry stuff—scrappy delineation in the first division; scrappy, obvious and common humor in the second; sweetish, stumbling sentiment in the third; lusty, jazzy formula in the fourth. Throughout Mr. James is contemporary, cheap and common. The free fantasia in the music of the air, the curious tribe that makes it, the curiouser mob that hears it—when it stops talking and bustling about—has yet to be written. It will ax the composer. H. T. P.

Guest Conductor Brings Novelties

By virtue of an eloquent guest conductor, three splendid works never before played here, and three more works almost as unfamiliar, the regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall proved the most unusual, and altogether one of the most interesting thus far in the season.

The conductor was the American, Albert Stoessel. He came preceded by a formidable reputation as composer, conductor and teacher in New York University and the Juillard graduate school. But his talents, both as program-maker and conductor, more than justified that reputation.

The novelties were Bach's fantasia in G major, arranged for string orchestra by George William Volkel, assistant to the conductor at the Juillard school; "Station WGZBX," prize suite by Philip James, professor of music at New York University, and a polka and fugue from Weinberger's popular opera, "Schwanda, the Bagpipe Player."

Too much cannot be said for the tact with which the program was arranged. All three pieces before intermission were designed to soothe the conservative ear. They were the charming Bach fantasia, Mozart's "Haffner" symphony in D major and Tchaikovsky's dramatic "Romeo and Juliet" overture fantasia.

But immediately after intermission came orchestral fireworks with "Station WGZBX." Ghastly details concerning robot voices, lion roars, high tension buzzers, fire sirens and sundry assorted noise-making machines were revealed in advance. But despite all this the conservative audience was completely won by the vigor and exuberance of this tone caricature of a radio station. The composer was present to acknowledge the applause. H. C. C.

96

1933 Herald Jan 21

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Albert Stoessel of New York, as a guest, conducted yesterday afternoon the thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His program was as follows: Bach-Volkel, Fantasia in G Major arranged for string orchestra (first time in Boston); Mozart, Symphony, D Major (Haffner). Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet," overture-fantasia. Philip James, Station WGBZX (first time in a concert hall). Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring." Weinberger Polka and Fugue from "Schwanda, der Dudelsackpfeiffer" (first time at these concerts).

It was to be expected that Mr. Stoessel, to show that he is a member of Bach's church in good and regular standing, should offer sacrifice to him if only in the shape of a transcription. Mr. Voekel, an organist in New York, has made several transcriptions for strings of Bach's organ works with Mr. Stossel aiding and abetting. The trouble with most transcriptions of pieces for the organ is that they remind one of Herbert Pocket's answer to Mr. Wopsle who asked his visitors how they liked his reading of Hamlet's character: "Massive and concrete," replied Pip prompted by his companion. Or the transcription is a long see-saw between twiddle-diddle and thunder-claps. Mr. Voelkel's arrangement was no better or worse than the majority of these arrangements; but the sacrifice was duly offered; great was the joy of the faithful.

The guest conductor treated Mozart with respect except in the minuet in which Mozart's straightforward simplicity was exchanged for singular mannerisms, especially in the trio. Mr. Stoessel was more fortunate with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The reading was carefully planned and gloriously carried out, a performance glowing with passion; a performance of tragic intensity in the Friar Laurence and street brawl music and in the closing measures. For once the horns in the syncopated accompaniment to the famous love melody were effectively brought out; were inseparable from the melody itself, the one not to be thought of without the other. Arthur Nikisch, the first to conduct this overture fantasia in Boston, made a great point of this horn accompaniment, this sobbing as if in ecstasy of amorous delight. On the other hand, Mr. Stoessel might have made more of the mysterious chords which led Hanslick in Vienna to liken them to the effect produced by the rubbing of wet fingers on a pane of glass. Tchaikovsky and Wagner alike were honored by Hanslick's lack of comprehension and the cheap abuse that passed for sparkling wit in the camp of Johannes Brahms.

The only possible excuse for putting Philip James's "Station WGBZX" before the Symphony audience must have been that he was born in Jersey City. Mr. James supplied a Baedeker-like analysis, which is more entertaining than the music to which it is a guide. The sections "In the lobby" and "Interference" might do to entertain an audience at a "Pop" concert. The third movement "A Slumber Hour" is a serious attempt to write music worthy the name. Here the composer reveals a paucity of ideas, a rambling in the vain search for them, awkwardness in forming the structure and a lack of taste in even superficial decoration. The finale is described by him as "exuberantly cheerful." It is exuberant, also noisy and cheap.

The peculiar idiom and the sensitiveness of Delius's musical nature are not for every conductor. "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," is more beautiful than it was made to sound yesterday afternoon. Nor was the polka from "Schwanda" an unmixed joy, especially after the fuss that has been made over it in other cities. If we must have a polka for a finale of a Symphony concert, let us have one, or a polka-mazurka, by Johann Strauss.

Mr. Stoessel made a favorable impression on the audience. He was warmly welcomed and loudly applauded, even after the performance of "Station WGBZX."

The concert will be repeated tonight. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the concerts of next week. The program, as now announced will comprise "Brigg-fair: an English rhapsody" which has not been heard at a symphony concert since Max Fiedler introduced it: the 5th Symphony of Sibelius; and Ravel's arrangement by Mousorgsky's pianaforte pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

TONIGHT AT THE THEATRES

BOSTON OPERA HOUSE — "Melody," George White's new musical comedy, with Evelyn Herbert, Everett Marshall, Walter Woolf, Jeanne Aubert, and many others; 8:15 P. M.

HOLLIS STREET—Shan-Kar and company of Hindu dancers; 8:20 P. M.

PEABODY PLAYHOUSE, 357 Charles street—"Gold in the Hills," satirical melodrama, by The Stagers; 8:20 P. M.

PLYMOUTH—"There's Always Juliet," John Van Druten's comedy, with Violet Heming, Roger Prior; 8:30 P. M.

SHUBERT — "Counsellor-at-Law," Elmer Rice's comedy-drama, with Paul Muni; 8:20 P. M.

DR. REDLICH NAMED ON U. S., EGYPT BOARD

WASHINGT

Setting Forth the Case Of Ultra-Modern Music

By Moses Smith
Music Editor

Adv Jan 22

MODERN MUSIC is now as popular and stimulating a subject for controversy as the merits of parlor socialism or of Shaw's plays 25 years ago.

Mr. Leo Gaffney, my genial colleague who occupies neighboring columns, heard at a recent Boston Symphony concert the performance of the new piano concerto by Serge Prokofieff. Mr. Gaffney was not pleased with this music, as his disturbed countenance made immediately clear. He had been fairly enchanted by the rest of the program, but could make nothing of the Prokofieff concerto. There might be merit in this music, but for him, at least, for the present, its language was strange.

Others are not so tolerant. Imagine a Mr. Jones, who is representative of many with whom I have talked on the subject. As we meet in the lobby of the concert-hall some time after such a performance. Mr. Jones promptly attacks.

"I read your review of the Prokofieff concerto. And do you really like that music?" he demands belligerently. "It sounded to me as if Prokofieff had set his mind on playing as loudly and rapidly and discordantly as possible, and on making the total effect with orchestra constitute an assault on the ears of honest people."

Disregarding the questioner's implication that a critic sometimes does not "really" like a performance when he writes a favorable notice, I proceed to point out to Mr. Jones the naivete in his attitude. Confessedly he knows little about modern music, but he insists that he can see nothing in it to admire. Here is no beauty, such as we hear in the works of the great masters, nor any melody that we can hear even in the effusions from tin-pan alley. Here, apparently, is studied ugliness.

This argument is an old one. Beethoven, in his day, was belabored by the public and even the critics with almost the identical invective which greets the modernist composer. Wagner fared even worse; and Brahms was labelled "cold, academic and over-intellectual." These names are now household necessities for the musical luncheon-table. The critics and majority of the public of those days were wrong, it is now obvious.

Continued on Page 8, Column 3

MODERN MUSIC DISCUSSED

Continued From Page 6

This does not mean, I grant quite readily, that Prokofieff and Stravinsky, Hindemith and Honegger will necessarily be idolized by future musical generations. But it does mean that they, or perhaps some other unpopular composer, MAY survive the current torrent of abuse. If Beethoven was not understood by most people in his time, why is it not likely that Stravinsky or Prokofieff is unintelligible to most contemporary ears?

My symbolic Mr. Jones assents quite readily. I hasten to drive the weapon of my argument home. Why is this music unintelligible? Because it is almost a new language. Music does not stand still. For centuries it has been changing, its vocabulary becoming enlarged with new phrases and ideas, with new harmony, while old cliches have become obsolete. Just as it was unthinkable that Beethoven should write his music in the language of Bach, so it is impossible that a modernist write in Beethoven's language. An art either grows or dies; it does not stand still.

Imagine now, I urge Mr. Jones as I sieze metaphorically his coat lapel, imagine yourself in the streets of Shanghai, listening to the cries of Chinese as they address each other hurriedly, to the excited sounds as they converse. You can make nothing of it. If you were to assume that because these sounds are meaningless to you they are unintelligible to the Chinese and that therefore these Chinese are idiots, would you not be ten times the idiot yourself?

My friend becomes uneasy. But the quarry is too near, and I press on in my ponderous fashion. This new music is a new language. If you plan to spend some time in China you will agree that it would be helpful to learn Chinese. You don't have to, of course, but it will make your stay much more pleasant if you do. And if you want to add to your enjoyment in the concert-hall it will be helpful if instead of shutting your ears to modern music, you open them up and try to listen sympathetically. You may find that there is sense in this Chinese after all.

Stoessel as Symphony Guest Directs Absorbing Concert

Amer Jan 22

By MOSES SMITH

Albert Stoessel, New York musician, is guest conductor of this week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Making up his program he departed from routine by including six works rather than three or four longer compositions, and by choosing three which had never previously been performed at these concerts.

The novelties were a transcription for string orchestra of Bach's G major fantasie by G. W. Volkel, colleague of Stoessel; "Station WGZBX," a satire on radio, by Philip James, and two excerpts from "Schwanda, der Dudelsackpfeifer" ("Schwanda, the Bagpiper"), recent popular operatic success by Weinberger. Mozart's "Heffner" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and Delius' "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" completed a varied, attractive list.

No doubt Mr. Stoessel had in mind not only the listener (for whom the program was excellently made) but himself, wishing to show his mastery over a wide range of music. He was eminently successful. From the opening Bach transcription it was apparent that Stoessel is a conductor of authority, of first-rate technic, of sensitiveness to musical line, and a man endowed with knowledge of orchestral balance and tone quality.

There was not a dull moment in the concert. Where the listeners dissented, the difference was of opinion, as in the Mozart symphony, the performance of which I thought over-studied; or as in the "Romeo and Juliet," which did not generate sufficient intensity and heat. Elsewhere there was nothing but praise. And throughout the program the orchestra played under Stoessel's baton with brilliance and precision.

The audience was most responsive to Stoessel's conducting and to the novelties as well. Weinberger's music is light and pleasant. Mr. James' score, if regarded similarly as light satire, is also most pleasing. But there is evidence here and there that the composer was more serious in his intention, and then interest sags.

The audience was delighted with the work, which makes use of such phenomena as the voice of a crooner, heterodyne squeals, static and interference. All this implies a huge orchestra, which the composer employed with great skill.

Boston Symphony

Mon Jan 22

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter absentation, his scepter was intrusted to Mr. Albert Stoessel, who prepared for the thirteenth pair of Boston Symphony concerts (Jan. 20-21) this rather oddly assorted list of compositions: Bach, Fantasia in G, arranged for string orchestra by G. W. Volkel; Mozart, "Haffner" Symphony; Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia; Philip James, "Station WGZBX"; Delius, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring"; Weinberger, Polka and Fugue from "Schwanda."

Mr. Stoessel, conductor of the New York Oratorio Society and the Westchester and the Worcester Music Festivals, and head of the opera and orchestral department of the Juilliard Graduate School, is a well-grounded and practiced, authoritative and musicianly leader. He has a firm grasp of the music he undertakes to perform, and has no difficulty in obtaining from his players the effects he is after. He had of course, in this instance, a superb instrument to play upon, and he was quick to acknowledge the players' part in his unquestionable success; indeed he was almost too generous in sharing the applause with them.

The Bach arrangement and the compositions by James and Weinberger were heard for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert. The Bach transcription seemed to us competent and respectful, but unnecessary. Mr. James's satirical suite, describing life in the radio studios, introduced, appropriately enough, a note of rather elementary humor into the proceedings. There are four movements. "In the Lobby" is intended to portray the corridors of a large radiocasting station, with the sounds peculiar to it—"a kind of radio 'Grand Hotel,'" the composer calls it. The title, "interference," gives an idea of the next movement, in which are employed not only virtually the complete modern "battery" but a "voice of the Robot." "A Slumber Hour" is mild; "Mikestruck," the final section, is jazzy in intention. The work on the whole is ingenious and amusing, but of little musical moment.

Weinberger's riotous Fugue had upon the Boston audience the same effect it has had upon many others. The Delius number, sandwiched between these two exuberant neighbors, was hardly noticeable. The Tchaikovsky item had a well-designed performance, if one less dramatically effective than we are accustomed to. But for one listener at least, the Mozart symphony, exquisitely read and articulated, marked the musical summit.

L. A. S.

Page Eight

Music and

Music As It Traverses Our Concert Halls

Guest-Conductors in Decline, The Maturing Sanroma, Schlusnus Comes

THE POWERS that be at Symphony Hall may becomingly take thought before they make another choice of guest-conductors. They chose admirably during the earlier years of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter holiday: Casella and Respighi in 1927; Beecham and Ravel in 1928; Arbos and Honegger in 1929; Goossens and Glazunov in 1930—a composer for one pair of concerts; a conductor or a conductor who was also composer, for the other. Unwisdom and decline began in 1931, when the choice alighted upon Mr. Arbos and Mr. Henry Hadley. It was hardly more fortunate in 1932 when Mr. Chalmers Clifton and Mr. Holst, then in residence at Harvard College, were called. The standard fell again within the last fortnight when Mr. Burgin and Mr. Stoessel took over each a pair of concerts.

Respighi, Ravel, Honegger, Glazunov, Holst, are eminent composers of our time. Whatever their ability as conductors—in some instances it was considerable—their presence gave luster to the concerts in which they took part. Usually new or hitherto unheard work of their hands added interest to the program. Internationally, they were shrewdly chosen—an Italian, two Frenchmen, a Russian, an Englishman. Casella, who is both composer and conductor of parts, stands midway between the two categories; on both scores deserved place. Sir T. Beecham and Mr. Goossens are distinguished conductors, as they amply proved on the stage of Symphony Hall. Mr. Arbos enjoys an appreciable reputation in Spain and elsewhere in Europe; was once concert-master in Boston; gave pleasure to the elderly public.

So far, so good. But it may reasonably be asked whether Mr. Hadley, and especially Mr. Hadley in his own works, is a conductor within the standards of the Symphony Concerts; whether Mr. Clifton, curiously ineffectual with a well-chosen program, reached them; whether Mr. Stoessel, in both program and performance, did not obviously fall below. Of course extenuating circumstances will be urged: Mr. Hadley is Bostonian by origin and relatively frequent return; Mr. Clifton made his studies and beginnings hereabouts; Mr. Stoessel is no stranger to this community. All three, it will be added, are Americans. Quite so; but the one and only test for a guest-conductor at the Symphony Concerts is ability to reach their standards. Whether he is American or Patagonian, whether he was born in Somerville or Stamboul, matter little so long as he does a distinguished job. It is here politely but firmly submitted that neither Mr. Hadley, nor Mr. Clifton, nor Mr. Stoessel, did such a job. In the judgment of audiences, reviewers and the orchestra itself they fell below the just standard of these concerts. Though it wear an American label, mediocrity remains mediocrity.

Mr. Burgin has little opportunity and little ambition to conduct, but it is within tho truth that his concerts as deputy have been as a rule more interesting and impressive than those of the three American guests. American conductors should indeed be encouraged; but like American composers, only when they attain the desirable and necessary standard. True enough, few European composers or conductors of eminence have recently visited the United States. Or if they have come, like Mr. Walter to the Philharmonic Concerts in New York, their prescribed work has narrowly restricted them. But Mr. Goossens might on occasion escape from Cincinnati, or Mr. Golschmann from St. Louis; while by common consent, Mr. Ormandy of Minneapolis is a rising, if not a risen, figure in American concert-halls. Even with dates to be considered, the field of choice may not be so restricted as Symphony Hall would tacitly have us believe. As for economies—that precious but occasionally overdone watchword—what aspiring conductor boggles over the fee, if and when the Boston Orchestra calls him to be guest?

In three concerts the Symphony Orchestra will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Wagner—at Venice on Feb. 13, 1883. The fourth concert in the Monday Series falls on the anniversary day. Orchestral excerpts from Wagner's operas will fill it. At the following pair of concerts on Friday, Feb. 17, and Saturday, Feb. 18, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be heard as memorial piece, along with fragments from the rites of the grail in the first act of "Parsifal." The Bach Cantata Club will assist as chorus.

Trans Jan 23

Dr. Koussevitzky Resumes His Baton

Jan 24 — Trans

LAST evening brought Dr. Koussevitzky back to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Discriminating listeners who heard both last Saturday's concert and that of last evening, must surely have learned a lesson in appreciating their own conductor. The program consisted of a suite drawn from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan"; Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The spell was upon one with the first measures of the little march which Rimsky-Korsakov's suite begins. One inquired how this magic of tones might be wrought. One found part of the answer in the conducto's rhythm, its inevitable certainty and its buoyant elasticity. One found it in the clarity with which the voices and choirs of the orchestra went their several ways. One found it in the satisfying way in which the phrases and melodies took shape. And having enumerated these, there remained a residue as unaccounted for, that communicated itself directly and equally to orchestra and audience. The spell remained unbroken through the little march, through the delineative movements out of Rimsky's suite, through the clever realism of his piece of the fleeing bumble-bee, through the far-flung reaches of Strauss's tone poem, through the four rhythmic studies which make up Beethoven's symphony.

It is good Strauss-criticism to write that in the great majority of his scores, no matter how excellent the plan, no matter how shrewd or how clever Strauss is in carrying it into execution, there is almost always an element of dross mixed with the pure gold. Sometimes it is a platitudinous cast somewhere in the theme; sometimes it is a piece of cheap and over-done realism; sometimes it is a naive cadence of other harmonic progression. The works of Strauss that escape entirely such criticism are few in number. "Till Eulenspiegel" is undoubtedly one of them; less completely, perhaps, also "Don Juan" and the "Domestic Symphony." There are those who would add "Death and Transfiguration." This reviewer has always felt that the Transfiguration theme, where it makes its large upward leap, is a little too lush in its sentimentality, is a somewhat too rank growth of the emotion of the moment, to permit it to be given such place. He has heard it from conductor after conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky included, has always felt the same, had come to believe that the opinion could hardly be shaken.

Now it is well known to all who follow minutely the course of the conductor's way, that at no time is his reading of a work exactly the same as when it previously went the rounds of the orchestra's series. At almost every reappearance of a given work there is evidence that a broadening or a refining process has been going on in the conductor's mind. More than once it has given to a work a validity and a justice that can not with fairness be ascribed in its entirety to the composer; the conductor has magnified the work's excellences, has minimized its defects. "Death and Transfiguration" is a case in point. At this year's performances of the tone poem the Transfiguration motive has lost the trace of vulgarity which was believed to be inherent to it. Once more the conductor has performed the feat of raising a work above its self.

Thus also Dr. Koussevitzky has found the succession of moods which are the spiritual substance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It strikes a note of buoyant exuberance in its first movement, descends to the gravest depths to which a mood of resigned cheerfulness can descend, in the third returns with a light heart to the implications of the first, at the last whips itself up into a demoniac fury with which it would seem to desire to scale the very heavens themselves. Thus the conductor feels it, thus he draws it out of his men.

One of the greatest difficulties in symphonic literature consists in keeping the triple rhythm of this first movement in actual fact a triple triple rhythm. The exigencies of frequent performance tend almost irresistibly to convert it into the easier duple rhythm. No matter how carefully the work has been rehearsed in the first instance, repeated performance under concert conditions seldom fails to bring about this state. The frequency of performances of the work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since it was last in detailed rehearsal (performances on Friday and Saturday, at Cambridge, at a Tuesday concert, not to enumerate performances "on the road") has again had this effect.

It was more than interesting then to observe the course of the subtle shifting of rhythms. The exposition proceeded to a nicety with the expected three beats to a half-measure. With the entrance of the heavy brass in the development the threes subtly changed to two to a half-measure. With the recapitulation the earlier rhythm was restored. With the entry of the double basses in the coda once more one heard twos rather than threes. This is not written by way of castigating orchestra or conductor; it is rather related as an example of what can happen to a well studied work from frequent repetition. Beyond doubt the conductor senses these subtle rhythmical shiftings. They will be his reason for throwing the movement at some future date back into rehearsal as minutely careful of detail as though it were receiving its première. Such is the way of a symphony orchestra of the first rank. It is perhaps unnecessary to add that the mood evoked is the same whether the orchestra played actual threes or pseudo-threes. But Beethoven wrote threes and the connoisseur wants them. A. H. M.

Music

Monday Symphony Concert

At Symphony Hall last evening Dr. Koussevitzky, visibly refreshed, returned from a fortnight's vacation to conduct the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series. He offered his audience Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite from the opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," that brilliantly scored and vividly suggestive little group of musical scenes which he revived recently for Friday and Saturday subscribers; Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Last night's audience heard a conductor and an orchestra in high fettle. That was evident not merely in their sparkling performance of Rimsky's gorgeous miniatures or in their fine redistillation of Strauss's brooding and mellifluous melancholy, but principally and most surprisingly in a presentation of Beethoven's Seventh that for electrifying verve surpassed any of Dr. Koussevitzky's previous encounters with this work. Often before this he has labored as harder or harder but last night as never before the music seemed to dance and sing out of the fullness of its own exuberant vitality.

Dr. Koussevitzky brought the orchestra to its feet to share in the enthusiastic applause with which the audience responded. S. S.

Her MUSIC Jan 24

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

The third program of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Monday evening series was as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov....Suite from the Opera, "The Fairy Tale of the Tsar Saltan"
Strauss..........Death and Transfiguration
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 7 in A major

There is a peculiarly satisfying atmosphere about this Monday evening series, perhaps because the audience, coming as it does so seldom throughout the season, considers the concert more of an occasion, perhaps in this instance because of the presence of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony on the program. Surely there is no more satisfying symphony than this. Other adjectives may apply to it than the humdrum "satisfying," but none is more comprehensive, more final.

No such adjective can be applied to the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." It partakes of the same pretentiousness that mars the "Heldenleben" and has the same padded, long-winded conclusion that is so often found in Strauss. It may be argued that the best of Strauss are those which have the least sentimental "programs,"—the "Till Eulenspiegel," the "Don Quixote," the "Don Juan" (even after Lenau), but emphatically not "Death and Transfiguration."

The Rimsky-Korsakov Suite from "Tsar Saltan" is theatrical music of the most charming kind. Even the famous "Flight of the Bumble-Bee," in this setting and with this performance, seems purely graceful and quite unhackneyed. The final number of the suite is especially delightful as played last night, and indeed this music, neither serious nor brooding, is Rimsky-Korsakov at his best. A. W. W.

Globe MUSIC Jan 24

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky returned from his annual midseason vacation last evening to conduct the third Boston Symphony concert of the Monday series. The pleasure aroused by his return to the podium was intensified by the fact that his program, without exception, contained music that he conducts with incomparable eloquence and fire. There was no soloist, no piece new to Boston. Instead there were three familiar pieces, two of which were well-timed favorites. Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from the opera, "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan," was followed by Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony as final number.

This order of performance, diametrically opposite to the historical sequence in which the pieces were written, provided opportunity to glance backward over the development of modern symphonic music and instrumentation—a sort of musical shedding of the veils of Istar.

Although the oldest piece, Beethoven's Symphony, has little orchestral color as we regard it today, thematic ideas and the inexhaustible variety of their development make the work as fresh as it was in 1813. This would indicate, perhaps, that ideas count for more in music than mere resplendent instrumental garb, for Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite, with its lush, brilliant instrumentation making up for a lack of salient musical ideas and development, seems to be ingenious artifice beside the natural, spontaneous art of Beethoven. Strauss' Tone Poem, one of his finest creations in that genre, occupies a middle ground, its important musical thoughts mingled with some of lesser value, and the whole clothed in a polyphonic texture that is rich but not garish.

All the pieces were interpreted with the authoritative, instinctive technique, and the intensity and grandeur that make Dr Koussevitzky's conducting one of the phenomena of present-day music.

The next concert of this series will be played Feb 13, the 50th anniversary of the day on which Richard Wagner died in Venice. The program will, therefore, be devoted to music from his operas. C. W. D.

SYMPHONY IN THIRD MONDAY

Dr. Koussevitzky Ends Vacation and Conducts

His annual winter holiday ended, Dr. Koussevitzky returned last evening to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in the third of the supplementary series of Monday evening concerts led that band through a programme of pieces already heard at one time or another this season.

In detail this programme was the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera out of Russian folk-and-fairy-tale, "Tsar Saltan," Strauss' tone-poem "Death and Transfiguration," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. Included in the "Tsar Saltan" excerpt, as it was when the suite was played at the pair of concerts which fell closest to Christmas, was the delightful tidbit "The Flight of the Bumble-Bee" which has become a widely popular piece and has been heard in various instrumental arrangements since Mr. Monteux introduced it to Boston some 10 years ago. Dr. Koussevitzky has always been singularly fortunate with the music of Rimsky-Korsakov and his and the orchestra's eloquence with Strauss' tone-poem and Beethoven's Symphony, already a subject for praise in these columns, was again to be noted and admired last evening.

Dr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed on his first appearance, and there was liberal applause throughout the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JAN 25 1933

Mrs. Hoover Attends Boston Symphony Concert.

MRS. HOOVER ATTENDED the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon having as guests Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, wife of the Chief Justice; Mrs. William DeWitt Mitchell, wife of the Attorney General; Mrs. Thomas D. Thacher, wife of the Solicitor General, and Miss Doris Goss.

Incidents and Prospects

A correspondent who joins this department in complaint against the quality of guest-conductors at Symphony Hall, also reminds it that one distinguished European conductor was in America and might have been available last week—Sir Hamilton Harty of the Hallé Concerts at Manchester and of the London Symphony Orchestra. As guest, Sir Hamilton lately conducted at two pairs of concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra, finishing his work there on Saturday, Jan. 14. He had, moreover, proved his interest and merit when he appeared at a "Sunday Pop" in Boston a year ago last June.

Apropos Pops, Mr. Fiedler and a contingent of the Symphony Orchestra will play the following pieces in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening at a revival of the "Gay Nineties Nights" of last spring for the profit of a charity. The hall, of course, will be laid out as it is for a Pop Concert:

March, "Only One Vienna"........Schrammel
Invitation to the Dance.................Weber
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz)
Soprano Solo, "O Promise Me," from the Operetta, "Robin Hood".........De Koven
Mrs. Bernice Fisher Butler
Overture to the Opera, "Martha"......Flotow
Intermission and Costume Parade
Largo from the Opera, "Xerxes".......Handel
(Played by All the Strings in Unison Accompanied by the Grand Organ and Harp)
Sextet from the Musical Play, "Florodora," ("Tell me pretty maiden")............Stuart
(With the Florodora Girls)
"On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes Strauss
Intermission and Program-Drawing
Grand Selection: "The Fortune Teller"..Herbert
The Mosquito Parade................Whitney
Popular Song Hits of the Nineties
Everyone is Requested to Sing

Mr. Gieseking, the eminent pianist, will be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts of Feb. 10 and 11. . . . There are vague rumors of a revival of Stravinsky's "Œdipus Rex," in the latter half of the season. It deserves to be heard again.

Jan 26

Johann Strauss is returning to the Symphony Concerts for the first time in thirty-eight years. In April, 1895, Emil Paur set his "Perpetuum Mobile" on a program. Dr. Koussevitzky will not only revive the piece at the concerts of Feb. 11 and 12, but add to it the waltz, "Voices of Spring." At Pension-Fund matinées "The Blue Danube" has been twice played; but hitherto no waltz of Strauss has had place in the subscription concerts. . . . The program for Feb. 11 and 12 will also include the First Symphony of Louis Gruenberg, now the renowned composer of "The Emperor Jones" as opera.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 26 1933

CONCERT MANAGER DIES OF PNEUMONIA

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene Brought Many Musical Stars to Capital.

Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene, who brought to the Capital virtually every famous musical artist during the past 25 years, died today of pneumonia at the home of her niece, Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, her associate in the Wilson-Greene Concert Bureau, at 1629 Irving street.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene had been identified with Washington music for about 50 years. She had been ill for several months and recently pneumonia set in, ending her life.

She was the widow of Thomas Evans Greene, well known operatic and concert tenor and member of a prominent Eastern Shore family, who died several years ago. Christened Katie Wilson, the concert manager changed her name upon marrying to Wilson-Greene, hyphenating the name, and formed a business partnership with her husband, which resulted in the establishment of one of the city's most successful concert bureaus.

Directed Marine Band.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene was probably the only woman who ever conducted the Marine Band through an entire opera. Believing the regular leader not familiar with opera, she took over leadership of the service band, some 30 years ago, during presentation at the Columbia Theater of the opera, "Samson and Delilah."

During her long managerial career she had the distinction of bringing to Washington the Metropolitan and Chicago Civic Opera Cos., leading symphony orchestras and the world's most prominent concert and operatic artists.

Her first professional venture was the presentation to Washington audiences of Nordica, the famous singer. She launched her professional career as a result of her success in planning and presenting amateur entertainments throughout the city.

Grace Moore, famous Metropolitan star, was one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's pupils at the time she and her husband were conducting the Wilson-Greene School of Music at 2601 Connecticut avenue before the war. Miss Moore's first professional appearance occurred under Mrs. Wilson-Greene's direction, when the concert manager persuaded Giovanni Martinelli of the Metropolitan to allow her to appear in the same concert with him.

Miss Moore made an instant hit with the audience, going almost immediately on the stage, from which she graduated to the Metropolitan.

Opera Project Failed.

One of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's greatest disappointments was the failure of Washington to support the six-year series of Metropolitan Opera productions, which she introduced in 1925. After the second year management of the series had to be taken over by a citizens' committee, the affair having proved a heavy loss to Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

This year she had scheduled 16 presentations for Washington, two of which later were cancelled, and of which only four remain to be presented, the Boston Symphony, January 31; Paderewski, March 22; the violin prodigy, Yehudi Menuhin, March 29, and Lily Pons, at a date to be set later, due to her present illness.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene was the daughter of Leander G. and Amanda R. (Miles) Wilson and had lived in Washington all her life. She first came into musical prominence as a singer, but early in life displayed the managerial ability which led to her later success. She was a sister of Edwin L. Wilson, well known attorney, who died here about 18 months ago. She is survived by another brother, J. M. Wilson of Washington, and a number of nieces, in addition to Mrs. Dorsey, who plans to continue the business pending settlement of her aunt's estate.

No funeral arrangements have yet been made, but burial is tentatively planned for Saturday.

Music Leader Dies

CLINEDINST.

MRS. KATIE WILSON-GREENE.

New Bedford, Mass.
MERCURY

JAN 23 1933

Albert Stoessel received the attention of the musical critics of Boston, who acted as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week. The Globe reviewer said in part:

This was Mr. Stossel's first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. Back in 1920, however, he was violin soloist with the orchestra. A musician of varied activities—he teaches, conducts, and composes—Mr. Stoessel is a familiar figure in the music of this country. His conducting yesterday proved him a leader of taste and sound principles, one inclined to sober, middle-course interpretations rather than to excesses of any sort.

He began with a brisk reading of Bach's orchestrated prelude. G. W. Volkel, who made the arrangement, is a colleague of Mr. Stoessel at the Juilliard Music Foundation in New York. Had the balance of the prelude realized the promise of the first few measures, Mr. Volkel's work might have been a notable example of its kind. He wrote with unimpeachable taste and with an idea of how the string choir, when properly used, can richen and intensify, without distorting, music originally conceived for another instrument. But the promise was not realized; a certain monotony of tone color soon prevailed, and the transcriber's excess of zeal in dividing his instruments into several small groups resulted in undue thinness of tone.

Mr. James' "Station WGZBX" is an attempt to depict the sounds—musical and otherwise—to be heard when listening to a radio broadcast, and to create a sort of musical impression of radio studios. The work is bright, amusing, but quite without merit as serious music. Mr. James succeeded best in his tone painting and reproduced graphically static, code signals, the chaos of jazz bands, crooners and miscellaneous auditions all going on at once. The score calls for many instruments foreign to a symphony orchestra, including a mechanically amplified human voice to suggest a crooner and an announcer. The music is scored so thickly that many of these instruments were lost in the maze of sound. The composer was present and acknowledged applause from the stage.

Weinberger's polka was heard at the "Pops" last spring, but the fugue was presumably played here for the first time yesterday. The latter is the more notable of the two in ideas, although both are gay and spirited without being trivial. Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about the fugue is the surprising clarity of texture for a work written for full orchestra, plus organ and a brass section off stage.

Mr. Stoessel's temperament seemed best suited to the Bach, to Mozart's Symphony, and Delius' delicate piece. He was most successful in these numbers, although tht first movement of the Symphony might well have gone faster. Mr. Stoessel appears to strive for clarity, strict tempo, euphony, and evenness of melodic line. These qualities he achieves, but subtlety and delicacy are less in evidence.

H. T. Parker in the Transcript said:

Though the orchestra seemed to give Mr. Stoessel all that he asked, it would not be the truth to say that the performances of these pieces was highly individual or highly distinguished. In the transcription from Bach, which divides and subdivides the strings, to gain imitations and counterpoints of a single melodic line, the conductor evidently relied upon the incisive tone and the performing mettle of the Bostonian choir. It gave reason for that trust. . . . Taking the Symphony over-heavily and with singularly little shading along the way, Mr. Stoessel missed the gallant style, the freshness and buoyancy, the finer felicities of a time-defying music. Mozart little better than improvised it to please his father and a patron; but this time, off the fingers of genius ran the work of crowded days. . . . Vehement contrasts, swift, sudden, full-bodied strokes, rather than pervasive romantic ardor, marked Mr. Stoessel's version of Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The years have worn the piece hollow and blatant; sapped what its generation believed to be tragic intensity. Not even Mr. Stoessel's magniloquence could refill it.

With Delius's rhapsody, the conductor kept to the true vein, but scarcely deepened it. The piece is minor Delius, occasionally mannered Delius; but it distills none the less a fine, if thin, ecstasy of musical imagination, a poetry intoned at once rapt and gentle and rueful. Brief as it was, it remains the memorable number of the day. . . . Nor was Mr. Stoessel at fault with the technical readiness, the gusto, the good tonal theater of Weinberger's stuff. In these irreverent days a fugue may do almost anything. Schwanda's dances. . . . In sum a direct-minded, heavy-minded, well-routined conductor more accustomed to pulling a student or a festival orchestra through than to playing upon a virtuoso-band as a many voiced, sensitive instrument. A "driver," as New England housewives say, which trait and condition is not exactly the approach to Bach or Mozart or Delius.

Mr. James's "radio piece" came—and went. It won him a prize; it serves the purpose "on the air" which is friendly mockery; it gained him, Friday, a call to the stage. In the concert hall, however, it is paltry stuff—scrappy delineation in the first division; scrappy, obvious and common humor in the second; sweetist, stumbling sentiment in the third; lusty, jazzy formula in the fourth. Throughout Mr. James is contemporary, cheap and common. The free fantasia in the music of the air, the curious tribe that makes it, the curioser mob that hears it—when it stops talking and bustling about—has yet to be written. It will tax the composer.

And Philip Hale said in the course of his review:

The guest conductor treated Mozart with respect except in the minuet in which Mozart's straightforward simplicity was exchanged for singular mannerisms, especially in the trio. Mr. Stoessel was more fortunate with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." The reading was carefully planned and gloriously carried out, a performance glowing with passion; a performance of tragic intensity in the Friar Laurence and street brawl music and in the closing measures. For once the horns in the syncopated accompaniment to the famous love melody were effectively brought out; were inseparable from the melody itself, the one not to be thought of without the other. Arthur Nikisch, the first to conduct this overture fantasia in Boston, made a great point of this horn accompaniment, his sobbing as if in ecstasy of amorous delight. On the other hand, Mr. Stoessel might have made more of the mysterious chords which led Hanslick in Vienna to liken them to the effect produced by the rubbing of wet fingers on a pane of glass. Tchaikovsky and Wagner alike were honored by Hanslick's lack of comprehension and the cheap abuse that passed for sparkling wit in the camp of Johannes Brahms.

Mr. Stoessel made a favorable impression on the audience. He was warmly welcomed and loudly applauded.

Music in The Land

Foolish and False Tran Jan 28

HOW curious, prejudiced and false is a too common Western view of Eastern conductors in relation to American composers! A weekly review, published in Los Angeles lately reaffirmed it; between heavy scrawls in blue pencil invites this department to heed its sayings. "An American composer of today who gives himself to the production of symphonic music, is not only fighting the eternal and exhausting battle of one who seeks the bright face of Truth. He is also fighting a strongly intrenched prejudice led by the European Pharisees who have monopolized our musical life. It is quite a triumph for American composers, once they have won the major action of writing solid stuff, to get a hearing from conductors and orchestras who are inherently antagonistic to their ideas and processes.

"Conductors of major orchestras nowadays are glorified primi donne, mindful only of their own advancement and popularity. They are jobbers in the concert industry, and not priests before the altar of Music. Their orchestras are composed principally of imported instrumentalists, whose mentalities were formed in the ante-bellum atmosphere of traditional conservatories. It is idle to expect them to take up with enthusiasm the music of a country which socially, politically and esthetically denies and refutes European concepts."

. . . And for this Dr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Stock (who is "Eastern" in these Far-Western eyes), or Mr. Stokowski, spends days and nights reading the manuscripts of American composers, making choice from them, playing the chosen piece to the best of his own and his orchestra's ability. For this has the Boston Orchestra cultivated Copland and learned to play "symphonic jazz" with a flair. Even Mr. Cowell has his Slo-

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Player

Symphony Hall Finds Another Tempting Mark

Rite for the Long-Neglected Delius in the Seventieth Year of His Age

NEXT Sunday is the seventieth—or as a few say, doubting the dictionaries, the seventy-first—birthday of Frederick Delius, ostensibly an eminent English composer, though he was born of German parents, has lived his life in the United States, in Germany, in France, now dwells, blind and paralyzed at a village within reach of Paris. At Symphony Hall, as in other American concert-rooms, his music has been long neglected. Twenty years ago, Max Fiedler, conductor of the Symphony Concerts from the autumn of 1908 through the spring of 1912, had a liking for it; brought into them the [illegible] forgotten "Paris"; the persisting "Brigg Fair" and "In a Summer Garden,' by many counted his two most characteristic orchestral works. The catholic-minded Monteux remembered Delius; in 1920 added "A Dance Rhapsody." As guest-conductor in 1926 Mr. Goossens produced a fifth piece "On hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," repeated only last week under Mr. Stoessel. In 1928, Sir T. Beecham, as guest and as high priest of Delius in English concert-halls, introduced the intermezzo—"The Walk to the Paradise Garden"—from the opera, "A Village Romeo and Juliet," another noted and representative piece. Hitherto Dr. Koussevitzky has taken thought but once of Delius when he included "The Song of the High Hills" in a choral concert in 1927. Tomorrow and Saturday, with his well known penchant for anniersaries, he will mark the composer's seventieth birthday with the first performances in Boston, since 1910, of "Brigg Fair."

In the autumn of 1929, Delius touched the climax of belated note, when a "Delius Festival" in London, organized and conducted by Sir T. Beecham, set in array his more important music of the concert-hall. Persuaded with difficulty from his retreat in France, the invalid-composer made the journey; was wheeled at each concert into a balcony box improvised for him in the Queen's Hall; there received the homage of audiences and performers. (At that time Augustus John made the sketch accompanying this article). His sovereign honored him with a decoration. There was every evidence of interest and acclaim. The festival called forth many generalized articles about Delius and his music, written by the ablest reviewers in the English press. One, from Mr. Neville Cardus of The Manchester Guardian, follows herewith. It is less intended as guideboard to "Brigg Fair" at the week end than as introduction of Delius to an audience that barely know him.

Singularities

The critic's difficulty with Delius (writes Mr. Cardus) is to give to the lay public, without the aid of musical illustrations, some idea of the style and the poetic significance of a composer who is quite unlike any other in his technical means of expression and in his emotional reactions to the art of music—his use of it as a means of self-expression. To discuss a work of Delius purely as music would not get us all the way; on the other hand, we are not much the wiser when we are told that Delius is a mystic. A man might be beatific with mysticism and yet write bad music, just as a man might exploit cadences of descending sevenths (as Delius does) and yet fail entirely to force his music upon our attention. Difficult the task indeed; but at this time of homage to Delius some effort must be made by all of us to show exactly where Delius is different from the rest of the great music-makers, and why his music is not only different but beautiful.

To describe to the layman Delius's technical apparatus, his style of expression, is almost impossible, for the simple reason that, as I have suggested, there is nothing else in music to which we can compare it. During the last half-century and more, music has developed along two main tracks, and Delius has avoided both. We can call these the tracks of symphonic and of illustrative music—music "absolute" and "program" music. On the one hand we have had development (or derivations) from the classical forms. The first condition of these classical forms is thematic statement, contrast, transformation, and a final synthesis—with the rhythm and harmony as products of the melodic idea and sequence. It is fairly well known that Delius has written few if any masterpieces of music in which a classical formalism is observed. As I will try to explain later, Delius is a writer whose music lives less in contrasts of thematic material (which of course are indispensable to the "absolute" forms of music) than in a homogeneous continuity or enlargement of melodic phrase and harmonic texture. Had Delius written nothing but his works in sonata or concerto form we should not today be hailing him a master.

But while even the layman is aware that Delius's music turns away from the traditional molds, too many folk (musicians included) jump to the view that Delius is a tone-painter, an "impressionist," a maker of "program-music." The truth is that Delius at his most typical is a writer of music pure and undefiled. If you do not respond musically to "Brigg Fair," to "Sea Drift," to the "Mass of Life," to "In a Summer Garden," or even to the opera "A Village Romeo and Juliet," you will get little satisfaction out of Delius. There is no listening to Delius in terms of the realism of a Strauss on the one hand, or on the other hand in terms of the very tangible impressionism of a Debussy. In Strauss there are concrete images, literary and dramatic, to stir the imagination of the non-musical mind; in Debussy the languorous atmosphere of "The Afternoon of a Faun" is entirely tangible, and evocative of poetic as distinct from purely musical associations. With Delius it is music or nothing. . . .

Means and Methods

If we look at one of Delius's loveliest but simplest works, "In a Summer Garden," (continues Mr. Cardus), we can get a good notion of those traits in his style which are the most important, the most original. A realist, or an impressionist, could hardly have written to such a title without a few touches of realism, or (to suggest a less stark method) "pictorialism." A Debussy would have given us a summer heat and languor which could have been felt physically. There is no tone painting in the "Summer Garden" of Delius; the wood wind's delicious flutterings at the outset might possibly hint of bird-music to many listeners, but they are not essential parts of the texture; they are exquisite decorations upon it.

The work begins with a melody which Grieg could easily have composed. Delius makes it his own by quickly drawing it into the tissue of his orchestra, until it is perceived only as we perceive a single strand of a texture; or, rather, we see it as though lapped by waves of sound—washed in them. The melody is lost, but—and here is the secret of Delius's way of sustaining his form—other melodies grow out of it; fragments are used almost as motivs; the thought is continuous; the melody is but one factor in a process of musical thinking and feeling which works according to the comprehensive logic of changeful emotion, in which the "what-comes-next" is spontaneously prompted from Delius's heart and not by a logic taught formally in the schools.

The other musical factors—rhythm and harmony—are inseparable from the melodic idea. Harmony in Delius does not support, by blocks, a melodic line, nor is the rhythm an effect of the recurrent stresses of harmonic supports. Delius's melodies—and, contrary to the general idea, his music is full of tunes—possess a lovely trick of dissolving the moment you have heard them, dissolving into a harmony of which it is difficult to name the tonal center. This, of course, is due to the well-known chromaticism of Delius, and, of course, none of the conventional measured rhythms of music could go with it. As well might we try to measure and fit into bar-divisions the rhythm of changing light. Harmonic variation, as Mr. Heseltine has acutely written, takes the place in Delius of the usual linear thematic developments. But I find it hard to agree with Mr. Heseltine that melody in Delius is dependent upon and conditioned by its harmonic background. In my ears, there is in Delius no one dominating factor, melodic, rhythmical or harmonic. All of these factors mingle in one another's being. We can only speak of a texture which, indeed, is the texture of one of the purest musical natures mankind has ever known.

Self-Expression

In the whole of the "Summer Garden," as I say, there is no tone painting. It gives us not the scene but the mind and heart of the artist in the scene, or rather after the scene and the hour have passed for ever. Nearly all of Delius's music recollects emotion in tranquility. The sudden climaxes of passion—and we get one of the most beautiful in all music in the "Summer Garden"—are not climaxes caused by excitement of blood or nerve. They do not work us up into a physical elevation or activity. They are the climaxes of a mind moved by the poetry that comes of beauty remembered.

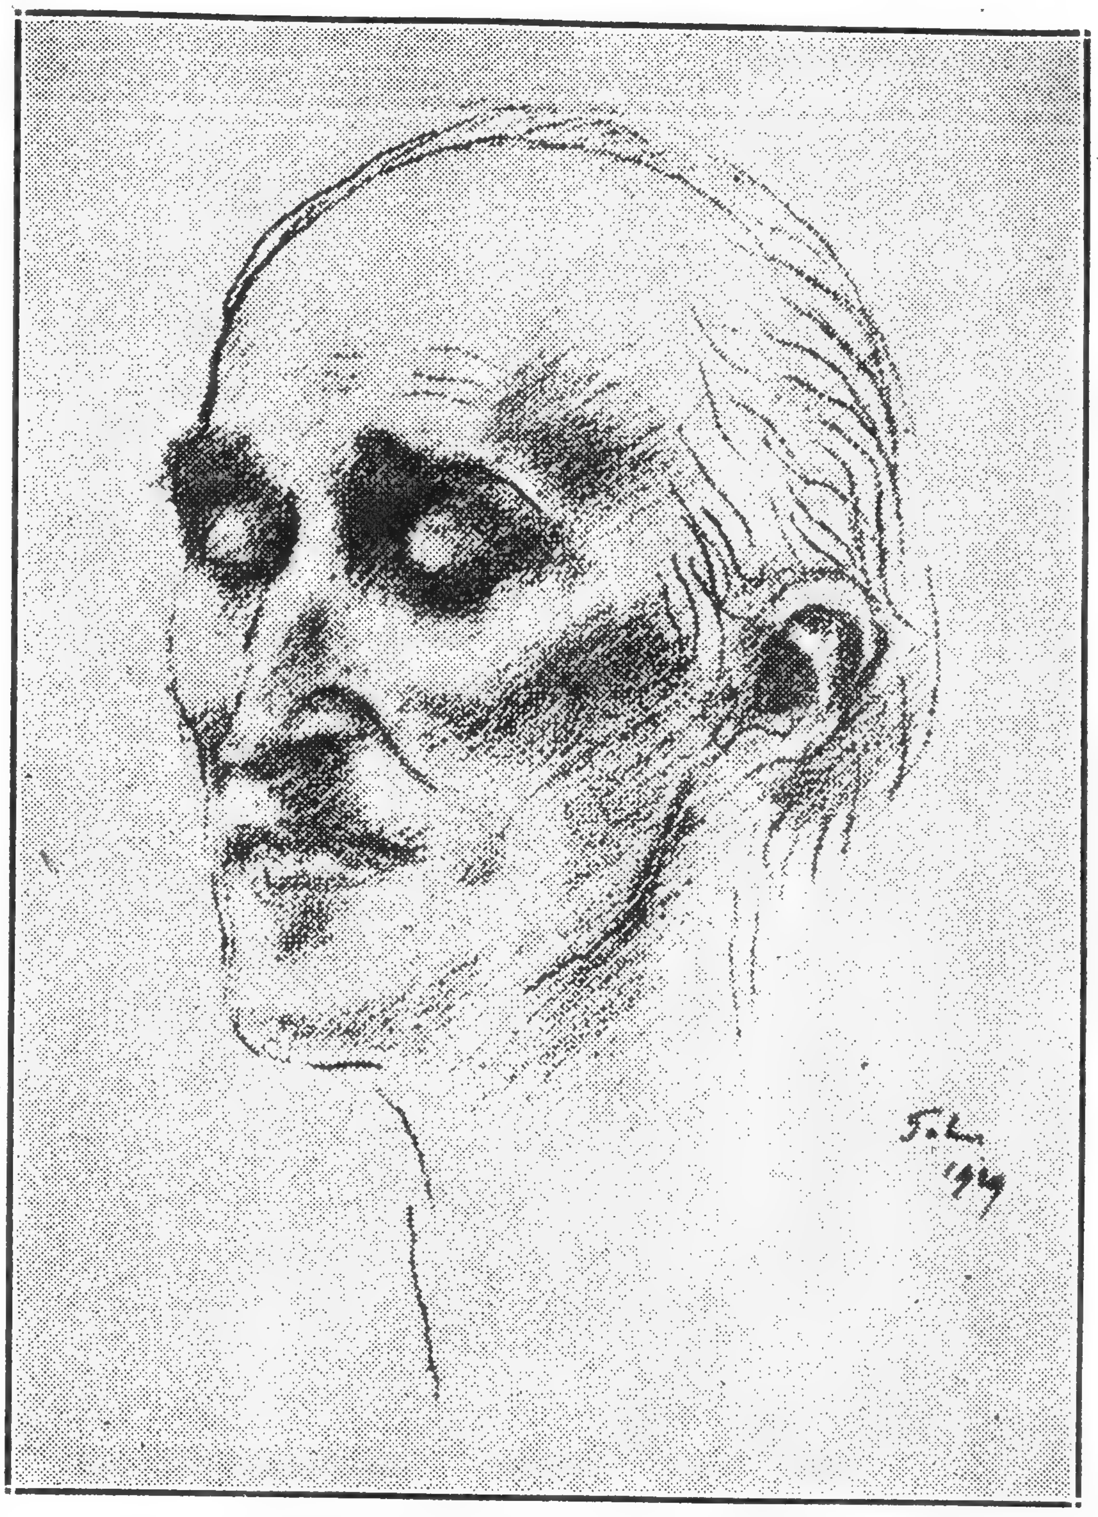
Delius is always reminding us that beauty is born by contemplation after the event, not while it is vigorously growing and taking shape before us. It is the "timelessness" of Delius's music that gives us the impression of its all-pervading beauty; for beauty is what is left for us when the show of life has passed on. Experiences have all sorts of values and significances while they are actually happening to us. The poet is interested only in the beauty that remains. Other composers are more human than Delius, because their music contains the dynamics of life and action felt immediately—now! Delius seems almost always t be aloof from the life active—life whi [illegible] it is active, is transitory. Th unique quality of his music is what I ca only, for want of a better word, ca bloom.' And by that I mean an essen tial peacefulness, a poise won by poeti [illegible]pation.

Delius has so refined his emotional ex periences down to sheer musical sens bility that some of us would welcome i a score by him an occasional roughnes or even harshness. Even in "Brigg Fair" the flesh-and-blood jollity of coun tryside revels is forgotten; the music tells us only of the bloom that was on the hour, long ago. A study of "Brigg Fair," from the passage marked Lento molto tranquillato, where the tempo changes to 4-4 time, to the close of the climax which leads to the transformation of the main theme into a new melody for trumpet and trombone, with an occasional toll of the bell—a study of this indescribably beautiful passage will bring us into the very heart of Delius the composer and Delius the man.

In Brief Sum

Perhaps in the long run (Mr. Cardus concludes) it is the artist of the broad and not only the intense appeal who lasts the longest. At the present time Delius's music is becoming loved, not merely liked, because in an age when most of the arts have little to do with beauty, but have apparently been overwhelmed by the complexity, the cynicism and even the haste and noise of modern civilization—in this age Delius has made for us a music which is serene and never unbeautiful.

Years and The Man



Frederick Delius, 1863-1933

The Eminent Composer Whose Seventieth Birthday Will Be Marked This Week at the Symphony Concerts

(From a Sketch by Augustus John, Courtesy of Messrs. Tooth of London)

Coward

Her. Jan 28

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Dr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation, was greeted warmly. The program was as follows: Mozart, "Eine Kleine nacht Musik" (serenade) for string orchestra. Sibelius, symphony No. 5, E flat major. Delius, "Brigg Fair: an English Rhapsody." Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This concert was one of the most interesting of the season; interesting throughout from the charming serenade of Mozart to the ingenious, at times witty, at times brilliant orchestration by Ravel of Moussorgsky's piano pieces which were first performed in their original form, a piano suite, by Harold Bauer over 15 years ago. Mozart's Serenade was appropriately performed by a reduced orchestra. The music is of the kind that does not age; it bids fair to outlive huge symphonic poems that attempt to portray vexed or storm-tossed souls; to set forth with the full force of the orchestra the horrors of death, or a metaphysical problem; for Mozart, composing, had beauty of form and substance, euphony and rhythm in mind, even though the composition were of small dimensions. The performance was delightfully clear, now playful, now gay or momentarily tender, but without the underlying melancholy that distresses certain English and German critics, or at least sets them to inquiring into physical or psychical causes for it.

It is not easy to speak in measured terms of Sibelius's fifth symphony. There is a story that it was planned in commemoration of the composer's 50th birthday, but the dates given of the first performance (at Helsingfors) are conflicting. If Sibelius had his birthday in mind that may account for the magnificent jubilation in the Finale. There are other pages, however, that are almost as engrossing: the pastoral hints at the beginning; the dance pattern that grows more and more exciting, forbidding any monotony by the repetition; at last a frenzied pace, music for Whirling Dervishes; the haunting slow movement, based on a single musical idea; then the superb peroration, apotheosis—whatever one may call the final measures. Music that is singularly original and individual; at times a glorification of material that worked by other composers with less imagination, skill and temperament might be dry, monotonous, but is here vivified by the genius of Silbelius—yes, genius, for this composer has more than talent. Hearing this symphony gloriously performed as it was yesterday, one is tempted to exclaim: "Great is Sibelius, and Koussevitzky is his prophet."

There is this that Delius has in common with Sibelius though their musical expression is often widely different: The ability to use economy of means so that the material seems important, and emotional. One might easily infer from the title "Brigg Fair" that Delius would endeavor to describe in music, and in a realistic manner, the scenes, the confusion, din attending an English fair. He is not concerned with the fair itself, but with a lover, who is thinking to meet his "dear long time I wished to see." To her he vows unending fidelity.

"The green leaves they shall wither
And the branches they shall die
If ever I prove false to her,
To the girl that loves me."

"Brigg Fair" is a naive Lincolnshire folk song found by Percy Grainger who gave it to Delius. The rhapsody, in truth, is for the most part a set of variations, but not in conventional form, not in disfigurements, not in hiding of the tune, first announced by an oboe; but in variations of harmony and of orchestration. There is one jubilant outburst which may be taken for the lover's amorous rapture, with his pledge of fidelity. The variations are a comment on the ballad, a gloss, verse by verse; chiefly contemplative music, not sensuous, not descriptive; only beautiful.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of next week, as now announced, will be as follows: Mendelssohn, overture, "The Hebrides," Gruenberg, Symphony No. 1 (first time in Boston); Mozart, Piano concerto, C Major (K467); Johann Strauss, "Perpetuum Mobile" and "Fruehlingstimmen," waltzes. Walter Gieseking will be the soloist.

28, 1933 Globe Jan 28

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky was greeted by a rising orchestra and an unusually cordial audience at his return yesterday afternoon to the regular Symphony concerts after his vacation. The fact that all present were glad to have him back could not have been demonstrated more plainly than it was. The program comprised Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik" (K No. 525); Sibelius' Fifth Symphony; Delius' English Rhapsody "Brigg Fair," and Ravel's orchestral transcription of the suite of piano pieces that Moussorgsky called "Pictures At An Exhibition."

This little serenade of Mozart's is the master at his best in light vein. From beginning to end the melody and the rhythm flow like a rippling brook. The seriousness that seems to lie beneath so much of Mozart's music is missing here; refined gayety and warmth of spirit prevail. The performance was crisp and delicate, one of the best of this sort of music that one has been privileged to hear from Dr Koussevitzky.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony is on the surface an anomalous work. After the gauntness and austerity of the Fourth it seems, by comparison, almost jovial. Yet on closer examination such proves not to be the case, for most of Sibelius' music is tinged with solemnity. The difference here lies in the degree. In this Fifth Symphony, the composer turned about face and retreated from the startling modernity of expression that characterizes the Fourth. In respect of style and mood, generally speaking, this E-flat Symphony seems to bear greater relationship to the Third Symphony.

This conspicuous difference between the Third and Fifth on the one hand, and the Fourth on the other, provides a puzzle. In spite of the extreme manner of its utterance, the Fourth Symphony is, perhaps, grasped more quickly than the other two. These require a little time to sink in. Of course this in no way reflects unfavorably upon the worth of the Fourth Symphony, a proven masterpiece.

Two qualities—peculiarities might be a better word—of Sibelius are especially noticeable in the Fifth Symphony: His abrupt ending of movements and his habit of writing at length passages of deepest gloom, and without warning changing to a mood almost trifling by comparison. Trying as best one can to adopt the "long view," as if contemplating it from a distant age, as Ernest Newman advises in forming judgments about music, this Fifth Symphony has the aspect of an immortal masterpiece.

Delius' "Brigg Fair" had not been played by the Boston Symphony since 1910, when it was introduced here by Max Fiedler. At that time some were baffled by it. But 20 years have worked miracles of change in the general attitude toward modern music, and today "Brigg Fair" is easily digested. This rhapsody is far more vital and distinctive music than "On Hearing the First Cuckoo of Spring," which was performed in Symphony Hall last week. Delius has, in "Brigg Fair," superimposed upon the modal melody of old English folksong his own pungent individuality that is plainly of the early 20th century.

It was most fortunate that Dr Koussevitzky asked Ravel to orchestrate Moussorgsky's piano pieces. The fruit of this charge is something unique. Ravel's genius for instrumentation, plus his imagination and sympathy for Moussorgsky's music, enhanced but did not distort the delineative power of the Russian's work. Such unmixed success like this does not often occur, especially when the original composer had been dead for 40 years. The "Great Gate at Kiev" is one of the genuine thrills of modern music.

The orchestra will go to New York and elsewhere next week. For the next regular concerts, on Feb 10 and 11. Dr Koussevitzky has announced Louis Gruenberg's First Symphony, a Mozart's C major piano concerto (K No. 467) with Walter Gieseking as soloist; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and the "Perpetual Motion" and "Spring Voices" waltzes of Johann Strauss.

C. W. D.

SYMPHONY IN TRIBUTE TO DELIUS

Post Jan 28

Sibelius' Fifth Given in Series of His Works

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A continuing of the series of Sibelius' symphonies with a performance of the Fifth and a tribute to Frederick Delius, who will be 70 tomorrow, marked Dr. Koussevitzky's return yesterday to the regular Symphony Concerts. The conductor was farmly welcomed.

DELIUS' "BRIGG FAIR"

After a Delius famine, a Delius feast, if not a very extensive or elaborate one. A week ago from Mr. Stoessel and the orchestra we were listening to the tone-poem, "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring," and yesterday it was the English rhapsody, "Brigg Fair," unheard here since Max Fiedler introduced it to us in 1910.

Delius, now blind and paralyzed, yet still carrying on, dictating his new scores to an amanuensis, is a figure to awaken both compassion and admiration. To his music, whether past or present, we will naturally give sympathetic ear. Yet it is not easy to follow the most enthusiastic of his admirers and champions all the way.

Sibelius Repressed

Undeniably Delius' more individual music has both charm and distinction. In it is often a wistful, haunting quality, together with a pleasing warmth of harmonic and orchestral treatment. But there is also a disturbing lack of saliency and vigor, of forthrightness and authority. Delius never speaks out, at least in the music that is known to us here. Possibly the choral "Mass of Life," hailed in England as his masterpiece, would make possible a new estimate of the composer.

Not reticence so much as repression characterizes the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. And it seemed yesterday as though Dr. Koussevitzky were repressing still further an already repressed composer. When Mr. Monteux made known to us this symphony, its simplicity of utterance, that amounts at times almost to baldness and bareness, was both impressive and refreshing. But the asceticism and self-denial that mark the symphonies of Sibelius from this one onward are not in and of themselves endearing qualities or qualities of lasting appeal.

Dull in Spots

Yesterday the Fifth Symphony did not altogether escape dryness and dullness, and it was easier than ever before to regret and to resent its touches of thematic commonplace, such as the suggestion of Neapolitan folk-song in the second movement and the unfortunate reference in the third to the song, "Oh, Dry Those Tears."

By way of beginning Dr. Koussevitzky offered the slight but perennially delightful "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart, and Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," one of the happiest and most brilliant examples of orchestral transcription, brought the end.

Boston Symphony

Ready for new conquests, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned from his midwinter fortnight of quiescence to direct the fourteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 27-28. He was greeted warmly by the Friday afternoon audience. The welcome was justified, for certainly the orchestra plays under his baton as under no other, and his programs are almost invariably full of substance and engagingly put together. Witness the list on this occasion: Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik"; Sibelius. Symphony No. 5, in E flat major; Delius, "Brigg Fair"; Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition." From Mozart to Sibelius, you might think, is quite a leap; yet it is an easy one, for these composers have in common the qualities of simplicity and transparency. There is musical kinship between Sibelius and Delius; and Moussorgsky, sharing a folk quality with both of them, has been dressed up by Ravel in this composition to bring festivities to a prismatic conclusion.

The Mozart was a delight, lucid, supple and deft. The symphony, continuing the Sibelius series which, it is hoped, will close in the spring with the new Eighth, was due for revival in any case, since it had not been heard at Symphony Hall for five years. Again it stirred admiration for the mastery with which it makes compelling music from unpromising material. The performance brought clearly to attention, too, the subtlety of rhythm and accent and phrasing with which the voices are deployed and contrasted. In unimaginative performance, we fancy, this score would seem hopelessly dull; chiefly a monotonous drone of solo or choir chants against a sullen background. Galvanized by a conductor of genius, it is revealed as a glowing tapestry of changing shapes, formed by a master workman who disdains display. The crescendo of the final pages, though less theatrical than that of the Finale of the Second Symphony, will perhaps be longer effective. In detail and in architectural conception, the performance was superb.

L. A. S.

Koussevitzky Gets Ovation

Amer By MOSES SMITH Jan 28

Returning to the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts after almost a month's absence, Serge Kousevitzky was warmly greeted as he set out to conduct the following program: Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik", Sibelius' fifth symphony, Delius' English Rhapsody, 'Brigg Fair", and Ravel's scintillating orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition".

Conductor and orchestra gave their characteristic performances of each of these works, none of which was definitely a novelty, though the symphony and the rhapsody were both compositions next each other on the program, distinctive creations of two great composers who are almost alone today in abstaining from the modernistic drift, and who persist in being themselves.

The Sibelius fifth symphony, dramatically and energetically recreated by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton, has not the austere, other-earthly beauty of his great fourth symphony, but it is of the big Sibelius, none the less, for its more mundane moments. Musically, the outstanding pages are the slow movement, which is built entirely on a single theme, a theme having at first comparatively little significance, but which is developed with such masterly ingenuity and with such heroic persistence that the result is overwhelming.

Fine Program By Symphony

Dr. Koussevitzky signalized his return to the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall by returning also to the Sibelian cycle. And his reading of Sibelius's fifth symphony was received with a great ovation from the audience, eager to greet the conductor after his mid-season vacation.

This fifth symphony provides a distinct contrast to the four previously played this season. There are certain elements which we have come to expect from Sibelius: sparing use of orchestral colors; that shimmering background in the strings, for example. But beyond that, there is a brightness not usually associated with the stern Finnish composer.

Of the four movements only one, the third, is slow. And what is more surprising, two of them are distinctly fast. The second movement, which is not separated from the first by a pause, is scherzo-like, in rhythm that strangely suggests the gay Viennese waltz.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik" opened the concert. Whether or not it was chosen to invite comparisons, differences between this lovely serenade and the hastily-written "Haffner" symphony, played last week, were apparent. And it was not difficult to realize that the delicate touch of a Koussevitzky is more becoming to Mozart than the military touch of a Stoessel.

After intermission came the "Brigg Fair," English rhapsody by Delius, to mark the 70th birthday of the composer, which falls on Sunday. Though his main theme is a folk-song, Delius has neglected the boisterous side of a country fair. But there are few who cannot forget this in admiration for a musical gem of beauty and serenity.

The final item was "Pictures at an Exhibition," written for piano by Moussorgsky and arranged for orchestra by Ravel. This work brings together two great masters at their best: Moussorgsky, the creator, with his genius for original composition; Ravel, the technician, with his command of orchestral resources. And the result is a fine example of vivid tone-portrayal and droll tone-humor.

H. C. C.

Page Six

Symphony

The Master Returns To His Charge

Ja 28 — Trans

A Notable Symphony Concert Under Dr. Koussevitzky, Sibelius to Delius

GUEST-CONDUCTORS are one thing at the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky in full mettle with a responsive orchestra before him and a responsive audience behind him, is another. No one begrudges him a winter-leave from the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall; but seldom has there been heartier welcome than yesterday to his return. As many of the orchestra as were in presence for a little Serenade of Mozart rose ceremonially; while in all directions applause rattled. The Serenade, which was "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," had not proceeded far before the change in performing atmosphere filled the concert-room. At first thought the listener might be disposed to chide the conductor as one who played a minor piece too often. At second the perfection of performance waived away reproach.

The flower of the string choir deployed its lightest and most shimmering tone; through the Romanze, which is second movement, seemed less to read from the outspread music-sheets than to conjure out of the air. Through the whole Serenade balance and euphony were flawless; through it with one mind and one stroke, the choir shaped phrases, sustained periods, as so many little masters of instrumental song. As swift, sure and clean were the accents in the momentary Minuet and the two Allegros—a sense of rhythm that kept all three in unceasing and heightened flow. And this virtuosity with none of the finicking that might have made a gallant and spontaneous music sound exquisite and "precious." An illusion of the happiest improvisation, though for aught any of us know Mozart may have toiled for days upon it; a certainty of rare felicity in performance, pervaded the whole. The impression of an instant but evanescent beauty matched the "O stay, but thou art fleeting" of Marlowe's Dr. Faustus. A conductor ever pursuing, and often overtaking, an ideal perfection was leader in the deed.

So again with the final number on the program—Monsieur Ravel's arrangement for full orchestra of Musorgsky's variegated piano-pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition." Once more came the will to reproach Dr. Koussevitzky with too frequent performance of a favorite piece, in a sense of his own creation. Seemingly we listeners must sit before it every second year, as with so many numbers in the active repertory. It is music, moreover, that once and twice heard, remains well in mind. By this time most of us appreciate the range and resource, the skill and the imagination, of Ravel as orchestrator, especially when Musorgsky gave him so plentiful and diversified matter to clothe. By the same token most of us have discovered the invention, aptitude and sympathy with which the Russian translates the visual images of his dead friend into aural impressions upon all that hear. Where we once marvelled at such feats of transfer as the episode of the contrasted Jews or of the Witch's Hut, we have come, at least in recollection, to take them for granted.

On the other hand, "Pictures at an Exhibition" repeats its pleasure to audiences; while on Friday the manifold virtuosity of the performance kept pace with Ravel's in the scoring. Conductor and orchestra played con amore. Yet to sonorous and full-rhythmed ardors added scrupulous finesse. ~~(The crescendo~~ and diminuendo of "Bydlo" is an instance in point.) Timely also came fresh flavor. For on this occasion, as program-books like to say, with performance in New York in prospect (which fact they omit) Dr. Koussevitzky included Picture, Number Two, "The Old (Italian) Tower" that he has often omitted. In it Musorgsky tinges an Italianate melody with Slavic melancholy, while the astute Ravel summons a saxophone to color it. (Mr. Tapley is now uncommonly sensitive, skillful saxophonist.) Not all of Musorgsky's quasi-Italian ventures were fortunate, as we know whenever we hear the "Polish Scene" in "Boris Godunov." But in this "Vecchio Castello," what with himself, Ravel and Mr. Tapley, he pleases both ear and fancy.

The centerpieces of the concert outshone both the beginning and the end. The ironically minded might smile at the marking of Delius's seventieth birthday (which falls of Sunday) by a revival, after twenty years of neglect, of his Rhapsody, "Brigg Fair." In those twenty years exactly seven specimens of his work have come to ten hearings at Symphony Hall—on three occasions at the instance of visiting conductors, Mr. Goossens, Sir T. Beecham and Mr. Stoessel. Neither his Concerto for Violin, or Violoncello, has passed the sacred portals, though each contains measures of touching beauty. We in Boston know his choral works only by "The Song of the High Hills" with a wondrous choral entrance, while our ears have never heard the larger-scaled "Mass of Life"—there are enough Masses for the dead," he once told Ernest Newman—or "Sea Drift," commonly accounted his masterpieces along with his opera, "The Village Romeo and Juliet" (Fancy any American opera house mounting that!). In fine, and not merely in Boston, we Americans have nearly ignored Delius, with our usual shrug—until recent years—toward English composers. In point of fact Delius is neither English nor of any audible nationality. A purer individualist has not written music in our time.

The more, then, the welcome for the resurrected "Brigg Fair." Twenty-five years old though it is, it contains not little of the quintessence of Delius in prime. Out of the rhapsody sounds his characteristic procedure; his disregard of the orthodox formulas born of sonata-form—the contrasts of themes, the rhythm by bar-divisions, the super-imposed harmony, the advance by modulation or sequence. Instead, his music proceeds from melody that, dissolving, engenders other melodies; while around them he weaves an harmonic web in incessant variation. The flow of the rhythm is as changeful, seeming likewise to outspring from itself. In a word, the aural impression of "Brigg Fair" suggests a music of unfolding and unbroken texture, melodically, harmonically, rhythmically, as the thought and the feeling of the composer generate it, regardless of formula, independent of prescribed division, "washed in waves of sound," as Mr. Cardus put it in his article of Thursday. It is music, through and through, of an individualist composer, expressing himself regardless.

More important to the lay hearer are the qualities of thought and feeling in "Brigg Fair" that draw him to emotional response. First of all, Delius writes throughout a poetry of tones. There is not a hint of the musical prose in which Musorgsky, as the one composer followed the other in yesterday's concert, seemed so often a master. No hint, either, of the charactering realisms with which Strauss often savors his tone-poems. The old English ballad of "Brigg Fair," which Delius quotes on the fly-leaf, might here and there suggest descriptive music. He eschews it. No more would he be strange or fantastical. He is all for the emotion recollected in tranquility, distilled into quintessence, then transfused into musical shape and substance, so conveyed in an ecstasy of musical sound.

To Delius this folk-verse is a poetry "of old, forgotten, far-off things"; of the meetings and partings, the faiths and unfaiths of lovers; of the beauty of this earth that is about them; of the mystery and the melancholy of their fleeting loves behind the veils of time. Quickened he transfuses these sensations into a music of poignant melody, luminous harmonies, intensive rhythms, music written in a twilight ecstasy. For in these changing days Delius is the last of the romantic composers, singing into their sunset. Inevitably he shapes form, distills substance, sublimates emotion into rhapsody. Dr. Koussevitzky suffused performance with Delius's sensibility and ecstasy; kept it free from the perils of sentiment and languor that ever threaten so soft-surfaced and slow-motioned a music.

Though of far different mettle, another individualist of this musical day, Sibelius, companioned Delius. In his cycle of the Sibelian symphonies Dr. Koussevitzky now reached the Fifth, in E-flat major; played it obviously after sedulous study and exacting rehearsal. He left not a detail in the musical structure obscure or unadjusted. He missed no shading of instrumental or harmonic color, especially when the composer recurs to a cherished device—the setting of wind instruments in plangent contrast to a background of whirring, neutral strings. He spaced the long accelerando of the first movement with adroit care; measured diviningly the intensive rhythm that drives it forward to the scherzo-like end. He distributed the variations of the Andante so that each should have clear shape and quality against the reiterations of the plucked strings. He broadened and deepened the finale into full tide of mounting musical sound.

Yet upon some ears, one and another page in the Symphony sounded from Dr. Koussevitzky too sumptuous, too sensuous, to be truly Sibelian. Admittedly this Fifth is ampler-bodied and warmer colored than the preceding Fourth or the succeeding Sixth and Seventh. Yet too rich an orchestral tone seemed now and then to swathe it. At moments a certain incisiveness was lacking. By exception Sibelius may have written so in what by common consent is one of his softer symphonies. Beyond doubting the conductor so heard and felt him. But there is room for question, if not for friendly dissent. Most of us smiled when Mr. Newman began to preach from London his gospel of the Finnish interpreter of Sibelius—the veteran conductor, Kajanus. But records of his making are coming to hand. They hint that conductors in Western Europe and in America refine upon Sibelius; address him overmuch to the sensuous ear.

Enough and more remained to stamp this Fifth Symphony with the mature Sibelius. Compare the simultaneous expansion, deepening and ascent of the finale with the similarly planned finale of the Second Symphony. The earlier piece is merely magniloquent, Chaikovskian, beside it. How simple is the theme from which the variations of the Andante are derived. Yet how Sibelian is the fusing of matter and means—motiv, rhythm, harmony and color—to achieve them. How light also over some of them plays the composing hand. The scherzo-like measures with which the first movement finally dances suggest the Sibelius who can look out upon the Finnish folk in the northern summer as well as into his own darkling, brooding spirit. Yet out it will for the while—in the graying and troubled course into which the first movement recedes from brighter beginning. The intrinsic Sibelius, though he smiles in the Andante and strikes his orchestral lyre bard-like in the finale.

H. T. P.

THE QUICKER
YOUR "Want" Advertisement Is Printed in the BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
THE SOONER
IT Will Be Satisfactorily Filled. Hundreds Read the Transcript's Classified Advertising Columns
EVERY EVENING
Telephone LIBerty 6600
Ask for Classified Ad Department

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
POST
JAN 28 1933

Mrs. Wilson-Greene

WITH THE DEATH of Katie Wilson-Greene there ended an astonishingly dynamic and successful career. Starting in the field of concert management years ago at a time when it was almost entirely controlled by men, Mrs. Greene quickly proved that she was perfectly capable of handling its difficulties, which were not only many but frequently baffling, owing to personal peculiarities and eccentricities which make the temperament of musical artists more than something at which fun can be poked.

Her remarkable flair for business soon won national recognition and placed her in a foremost position among the concert managers of this country. She had been well equipped by the experience of her early life to approach intelligently the less tangible phases of the manager's work, since she had been trained as a musician and had been thrown into constant contact with singers and virtuosi; her viewpoint had further been broadened by the work she did with her husband, the late Thomas Greene, himself a well-known tenor of his day, in conducting a music school.

While Mrs. Greene's home was in Washington, a generous part of her interests lay in Baltimore, owing to the concerts she had been managing for many seasons at the Lyric. Baltimore music lovers have enduring cause to be grateful to her memory because of the brilliant array of talent she brought here. Her concerts presented in long succession one great artist after another, some for their local debuts and others in oft-repeated engagements, such as Kreisler and Rachmaninoff. She sponsored the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Baltimore appearances ~~after the~~ World War and the concert it is to give at the Lyric next Wednesday night was arranged by her. This and the recital by Lily Pons, postponed by the diva's illness, are the only events remaining of her 1933 bookings.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
JAN 28 1933

Wilson-Greene Concerts To Be Given by Niece

Mrs. Dorsey Posts $20,000 Bond; Boston Symphony Plays Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled to play here Tuesday under the management of the Wilson-Greene Concert Bureau, hearing of the death of Mrs. Katie Wilson-Greene on Thursday, clamored yesterday to know what guarantees it might hope to have for its concert. It is customary for members of orchestras and artists to be paid before they play.

The question caused momentary chaos in Mrs. Greene's immediate family. A search revealed that she had left no will.

Mrs. Dorothy H. Dorsey, Mrs. Greene's niece and associate in the business, with the assistance of her lawyer, Robert L. Handwerk, was finally able to unravel the tangle. With the consent of the heirs, an order was secured from Justice Luhring of the District Supreme Court appointing Mrs. Dorsey collector of the estate.

By posting a $20,000 bond she is permitted to take over all assets of the business and disburse what is necessary to meet current obligations.

The Boston Symphony will, therefore, appear on Tuesday as previously arranged and all other concerts will be held as originally planned.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
JAN 28 1933

Boston Symphony Programs

Philharmonic, Manhattan and Other Programs—Chamber Music of the Coming Week

NOVELTIES are lacking in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, only one being scheduled in the first performance in New York of Frederick Shepherd's Tone Poem, "Prophecy," for soprano and orchestra, with Beata Malkin as soloist, given a month ago in Boston, which will be given at the matinee together with Delius's "Brigg Fair," Sibelius's Fifth Symphony and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." The program for Friday evening will be made up of Beck's "Innominata," Brahms's Third Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN
JAN 29 1933

Koussevitzky To Conduct Orchestra

Weber, Beethoven, Strauss And Wagner Among The Composers Represented In Program

Violinist And Actor To Appear With Baltimore Symphony In Concert February 12

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it gives its only concert here this season at the Lyric on Wednesday evening.

The program will open with the overture to Weber's Oberon, and other numbers will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Strauss' tone poem, Tod and Verklarung, and the overture to Wagner's Tannhauser.

FOUNDED IN 1881

The Boston Symphony is over fifty years old, having been founded in 1881 by Henry Higginson, a resident of the city from which it derives its name. The orchestra at first had a membership of 60 men and Georg Henschel was its leader. Later William Gericke drilled it through many years into a body that claimed the world's attention and respect, and then Arthur Nikisch became its director. When Mr. Higginson was able to engage such a conductor as Dr. Karl Muck he followed up the advantage by keeping him many seasons.

However, war troubles brought this epoch to an end and, after being the sole supporter of the orchestra for thirty-seven years, Mr. Higginson yielded its destinies to a board of trustees in 1918. Dr. Koussevitzky became the director in 1924 and has remained in that position ever since, his term being the longest unbroken one in the symphony's history, exceeded only by Gericke's two terms.

LINCOLN DAY CONCERT

A number of interesting features will mark the Lincoln Day concert of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, which will take place at the Lyric Sunday afternoon, February 12, according to the announcement of Municipal Director of Music Frederick R. Huber.

Frank Kneisel, violinist and son of the famous founder of the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist. In addition, for the first time in the history of the organization, a dramatic actor will contribute to the program. Robert Loraine will read Alfred Noyes' Ode to Victory as a prelude to the orchestral playing of Ernest Schelling's Victory Ball.

Mr. Loraine was recently seen in New York in support of Katharine Cornell when she presented Lucrece. He has not been in Baltimore since his appearance some years ago opposite Miss Cornell in Tiger Cats. Many Baltimoreans will remember him for his portrayal of John Tanner in Shaw's Man and Superman.

Conductor Of Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

He will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at the Lyric on Wednesday evening

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

9 1933

Koussevitzky Will Direct Bostonians

By CARROLL DULANEY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its only Baltimore concert at the Lyric next Wednesday evening.

The program will open with Weber's "Oberon" overture, the other numbers being Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Strauss tone poem, "Tod und Verklarung," which the Lyric has heard twice this season, and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," which matters not how often it is played.

Koussevitzky became director of the Boston orchestra in 1924, after the war debacle, and has restored the organization to the position it held 25 to 30 years ago.

LEADER

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it presents its only concert of the season in Baltimore at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

Peabody Recital

he outstanding regular Peabody Consere annual relexander
Bart take eb-

NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 29 1933

Photo by Aime Dupont.

Beata Malkin, Soprano Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday Afternoon.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

JAN 29 1933

Koussevitzky Here Friday

Boston Symphony Will Introduce Conrad Beck's "Innominata."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the third visit of the season to New York for a pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall next Friday evening at 8.45 (instead of the usual Thursday evening) and Saturday afternoon at 2.30.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to New York Conrad Beck's "Innominata", at the evening concert. He will then also present the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, and Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures At An Exhibition."

On the Saturday afternoon program, Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of "Prophecy," a new score by Frederick Converse, which had its first performance in Boston by this orchestra. The piece is drawn from the Old Testament and is written for orchestra with soprano solo. The vocal part will be taken by Miss Beata Malkin, a Russian singer, who has had a considerable career in European opera houses.

Koussevitzky, who is conducting in Boston all of the symphonies of Sibelius in their order, will present the Fifth Symphony of the Finnish composer at this concert. The program will open with "Brigg Fair," the English Fantasy of Frederick Delius, who celebrates his seventieth birthday today.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JAN 29 1933

ORCHES

Reversing the usual order of its evening concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday and its Carnegie Hall concert on Friday, while the afternoon Carnegie Hall program will, as usual, take place on Saturday. Dr. Koussevitzky's novelty for Friday evening is "Innominata," by the Swiss composer, Conrad Beck. On Saturday afternoon he will introduce to New York Frederick Converse's "Prophecy," for soprano and orchestra, with Beata Malkin, a Russian singer who took part in the first performances of the work on December 16 and 17 in Boston, as soloist.

In a note supplied for the Boston performances of this work Mr. Converse stated that "Prophecy" was written at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion for Mme. Malkin and dedicated to her. "The text," he writes, "I drew from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of the Book of Isaiah, and arranged the lines in a dramatic sequence to express a certain spiritual idea, which I think will be clear to all who read it. The music is entirely free in form, but follows the psychological and dramatic development of the text."

Sibelius's fifth symphony, which has not been heard here for seven years, will also be included in Saturday's program by Dr. Koussevitzky, who is playing for his Boston audiences all the Finnish composer's symphonies in numerical order.

Reversing the usual order of its evening concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give its concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday and its Carnegie Hall concert on Friday, while the afternoon Carnegie Hall program will, as usual, take place on Saturday. Dr. Koussevitzky's novelty for Friday evening is "Innominata," by the Swiss composer, Conrad Beck. On Saturday afternoon he will introduce to New York Frederick Converse's "Prophecy," for soprano and orchestra, with Beata Malkin, a Russian singer who took part in the first performances of the work on December 16 and 17 in Boston, as soloist.

In a note supplied for the Boston performances of this work Mr. Converse stated that "Prophecy" was written at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion for Mme. Malkin and dedicated to her. "The text," he writes, "I drew from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of the Book of Isaiah, and arranged the lines in a dramatic sequence to express a certain spiritual idea, which I think will be clear to all who read it. The music is entirely free in form, but follows the psychological and dramatic development of the text."

Sibelius's fifth symphony, which has not been heard here for seven years, will also be included in Saturday's program by Dr. Koussevitzky, who is playing for his Boston audiences all the Finnish composer's symphonies in numerical order.

Jan 29 [illegible] NY

Man-

103

NEW YORK TIMES

JAN 29 1933

THE NATIVE CONDUCTOR

The Need and Problem of Developing American Orchestral Directors

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE ferocious demand for orchestral conductors of the highest possible rank and the most sensational attractiveness to the public is exhausting the available supply. What is to be done about it? Where are we in America going for new lions of the baton? Nearly every conductor of repute in Europe has been here. Some of them have succeeded. Others have failed. Others are logically nervous about leaving secure positions in Europe and gambling on an American success. An American success rewards them handsomely and adds materially to their reputation. A failure in America, although European musicians regret very much to admit it, and seldom do admit it, is decidedly disadvantageous to an artist's reputation.

One or two European conductors, not yet known here, might bring the box-office receipts for which the manager prays by night and by day. But certainly the main source of supply in the past is becoming exhausted. As a result we will have to develop conductors of our own in the next few years, and high time, too. But how will they secure promotion and where will they get experience?

If a native son who is also a great conductor is discovered he will command almost any rewards within reason. He may have a hard time, this native son, at the beginning. His progress may be delayed if his name is Jones. But he can live that down, and ultimately become, as Jones, the pride of the nation. It is not that the American people wish forever to go to Europe for their musicians. Their feeling is quite the contrary, but they must first be shown. They would be only too glad to develop a great conductor from within the nation. But they still distrust the quality of American training for a musician's career, and a background only American, and American standards of criticism, when local pride is involved. There are existing conditions which make it difficult in America to develop conductors.

* * *

The present situation in orchestral circles is a good illustration of the problem. We have with the Eastern orchestras in America today four conductors of the highest rank, Messrs. Toscanini and Walter of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia, Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston. Of these four ~~men Mr.~~ Koussevitzky is the only one who now finds it possible to serve his public throughout the musical season. The Boston orchestra has one conductor, whose appearances are interspersed occasionally with short visits of guest leaders or the conducting of the concertmaster. That the orchestra benefits by this arrangement is obvious. No other American orchestra has today such fineness of tone and consistency of style. With the other orchestras, for various reasons, first conductors find it impossible to work straight through the season. This is not good for the orchestras or the audiences.

Various guest conductors have appeared this season in alternation with the Toscaninis and Walters and Stokowskis. They have not proved capable of giving the audiences the same degree of satisfaction as the aforesaid leaders, and the technical standards of the orchestras have suffered. So much for the present. Who will follow the present group of great conductors? What arrangement, if any, can be made to fill in the gaps between their appearances?

In this, of course, the public is its own victim. It wants "only the best"—or thinks it does. It goes to hear the favorite leader whom musical acquaintances and the newspapers announce as king. The popularity of the music per se is growing, but it is the man of figure and reputation who fills the house. To be just to public choice, he is usually a musician competent and brilliant in his field. But what happens in the absence of the paragon? Usually, even when a conductor of real talent substitutes, a poor house! There is little curiosity to hear a good program, least of all a program presenting new music. Concerning performance and interpretation there will be lively discussion, but the music itself? Who conducted? "Oh, I didn't think I'd go tonight. You know, Toscanini (or Walter, or Stokowski) is away and I didn't think I'd bother." Presently we shall run out of Toscaninis, Koussevitzkys, Walters and Stokowskis. Then where will we be?

* * *

The situation will only be satisfactorily solved when we produce our own conductors. To produce them we must encourage them and give them opportunity for experience. Where, and how? The public wants only the superattractions. The American conductor must grow up, but the great orchestras are not going to give him the facilities to do so and there are virtually no opera houses in which he can gain his routine. This is the more unfortunate because it has proved in most cases that nothing is so valuable for the orchestral conductor as experience in the opera house. There the conductor learns sureness, command and flexibility of style. Most of the great conductors, though not all of them, have thus graduated into the symphonic field. Europe, particulary Central Europe, is checkered with opera houses large and small. The young orchestral assistants and chorus-masters acquire in these places a routine for which there is little opportunity in this land of ours. Nor have we so many minor orchestras that, lacking the opera house, young and serious conductors can find opportunity of maturing their gifts. What is to be done? Where and whither the native conductor?

* * *

He has really only two opportunities for experiment and growth not provided by either opera house or concert hall. They come the form of a certain few moving-picture theatres and with the orchestras of the radio stations. these places the conductors get good deal of routine, and interpret week in and week out, a great deal of music. Too often they must mutilate masterpieces to conform with time requirements and the nature of the entertainment, but the orchestral feature of radio entertainment is interesting the public very much, and complete performances of orchestral compositions are becoming more frequent. Some of the young conductors known to those who listen over the air have gone through a large part of the orchestral repertory. They have gained in this way practical experience of the baton, and the ones who are serious listen whenever they can, by means of a transmitter or by personal attendance at the concerts, to the great masters of their art. They should be learning fast from such "master courses." Let us hope that in this way a future American conductor is laying the cornerstones of his career. It is certainly a possibility.

* * *

Unfortunately, these positions do not offer all the desirable conditions for work. Quite frequently the conductors have excellent men under them, but limitations of time and of rehearsal embarrass them, and transmitting facilities have not yet reached the perfection where the concert given on the air must have as sensitively adjusted values as the performance in the concert room. Therefore the difficulty of polishing and sensitizing performances and of gaining the habit of doing so. In the big moving-picture theatres the condition is more dangerous, because the dimensions of these places and the taste of the audiences require a louder, coarser, more flamboyant approach to a score than is appropriate in concert. The mental atttitude rubs off musical sensibility and almost inevitably results in a coarse and sensational style.

Nevertheless, these are opportunities and incentive stimulating to the development of American conductors. Perhaps such opportunities confer another thing which the European background would not provide. Perhaps they will give the art of the American conductor qualities of his people and his nation. It is to be remembered that only a very few conductors who are successful in Europe meet the wishes of the public in America. The foreign conductor has seldom, in the first place, presented the eclectic repertory that the American audience wants. And, quite naturally, it is rarely that he is sympathetic toward American compositions—a respect in which Mr. Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony stands head and shoulders over all his colleagues, for no European or Russian conductor has done nearly as much for native composers. These are tangible aspects of the matter. The deeper aspects are the possibility of American temperament, which is very nervous and responsive, creating a school of conducting of its own. It will come some day, and for such an end the radio headquarters and the picture houses may be doing much more than we realize. Furthermore, their artistic standards are rising, though against vast obstacles of commercialism and ignorance. With the elevation of these standards will come, in turn, always more exacting requirements of orchestral interpretation.

1933. Reading Eagle Jan 31

BOSTON SYMPHONY GRAND CLIMAX OF HAAGE SEASON

Reading Sponsor's Jubilee Year of Highest Grade Attractions Comes to Impressive Close—Over 2,000 Hear Concert at Rajah

There might have been a more fitting way to climax the silver anniversary of the George D. Haage concert series, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the fifth and final concert of the current series, brought to an auspicious close the 25th year of concert presentations in this city with one of the finest performances ever presented in Reading. It received a mighty welcome in return.

More than 2,000 persons, close to a capacity house, crowded the Rajah Theatre to hear the orchestra and its famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A group of 110 men, with an established reputation, came to Reading with a difficult role to fill. The Cleveland Orchestra had preceded them on several occasions and established an enviable record. The Cincinnati, the New York Philharmonic and other notable organizations had left their imprint in the minds of music lovers here.

Ovation for Conductor.

But from the very moment Koussevitzky lifted his baton after mounting the podium, commanding utter silence from players and audience alike, he wielded a perfect mastery that ended with deafening applause when he strode from the stage. Silence, inspired by awe and admiration held the audience throughout the concert, but it accorded the conductor a tremendous ovation when his night was over, and the last strains of the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner floated over the hall.

Five times the leader was called to take a bow, but each time he quietly smiled and deferred to his men. There were no encores and if any that was the only regret that could be uttered of the evening. The orchestra was finely trained and the players' performances was a credit to the traditions of the organization and leaders.

"Two Preludes" by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, introduced the accomplishments and possibilities of the orchestra. It displayed the absolute mastery that Koussevitzky wielded his magic baton. Graceful, commanding and dynamic, three personalities in one, as the mood required, was the tall, gray-haired leader as he moved from one eminent German composer to another and climaxed his performance with the ever-popular Wagner overture, "Tannhauser."

Bach to Brahms.

From the Bach preludes, the first fleeting and graceful, almost completely dominated by the first strings, and the second, dashing and vibrant, Koussevitzky moved to his major work of the evening — the Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Op. 90, by Brahms.

The first movement, allegro con brio, was light and airy as the orchestra introduced the theme of the composition. Next came the "andante, soft and prayer-like, ending with an organ-like effect that won instant favor with the audience. In the third poco allegretto, Koussevitzky literally carried along his men as he wove the intricate passages into delightful harmony. The fourth and final allegro movement brought back the theme of the symphony and ended with the strings and horns softly blending.

Three Wagner Numbers.

For the second part of his program, the leader devoted his attention to three of the better known works of Wagner. Calm and reserved he took his bow after the symphony and with his last bow, smiled quietly, obviously pleased with the reception accorded him. Even the players entered into the spirit of the occasion, for the performance in the second part, if possible, was better than the first.

The first was the descriptive "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," with the wind rustling through the trees, the woodland birds calling to one and another and then softly fading away as twilight covered the land. As the number was introduced it seemed almost impossible for a group of 100 or more to play so softly and still be heard throughout the spacious hall.

Dramatic Finish of Series.

The greatest applause was given the leader following his rendition of the "Prelude and Love-Death," from "Tristan und Isolde." His overture completed the program.

Perhaps greater ovations have been accorded concert artists in Reading in the past, but none was more spontaneous or enthusiastic than that accorded the Boston Symphony. Many warm admirers here were won by this group of musicians, and it put a dramatic touch to the close of the present series and 25 years of concert direction by Mr. Haage in Reading.

Today the orchestra left by the special train, over the Pennsylvania Railroad, for Washington, D. C., where it will appear in another concert of the tour. It will play in Baltimore, Brooklyn and end the tour in New York on Saturday, with a performance in Carnegie Hall.

Concert-Chronicle

Of Broadcasting

SINCE the Symphony Concerts, as broadcast on Saturdays, are, fortunately, little smeared by announcers or lecturers or dispensers of "Hours with Music," these paragraphs from an article by Mr. Mendl in The Nation seem worth reprinting: "To those of us who need no salesmanship to make us listen to music, the broadcasters' efforts in that direction are, of course, revolting. That is because we are primarily interested in music and not in broadcasting. But to the broadcaster, highbrow music is simply one of a dozen different kinds of sustaining program from which he gets no direct returns. It represents a substantial investment which must pay for itself in habitual listeners who will buy the products his advertisers wish to sell them.

"It is doubtless true that if symphonic broadcasts were accompanied by no comment at all, the people who really wish to listen to symphonic music would listen just as readily. But if thousands who otherwise would not be interested can be persuaded to listen to highbrow music by salesmanship of one kind or another, the broadcaster cannot afford to neglect this opportunity.

"It is a mistake to think that this salesmanship does not work or that the high-toned nonsense the announcers read, the highfalutin accents in which they read it, and even more the enthusiastic indorsements of the critic of The Times do not carry weight with the audience. The pompous nonsense that the broadcasters love is not something they foist on a public that has no preferences; that public is not unlike the personnel of the broadcasting companies themselves, and has similar preferences. If the broadcasters have reason to think that salesmanship in the shape of 'music-appreciation talks' enlarges their audience, they are, as business men, obliged to use it. They can hardly be expected to give the public what it should have, whether it likes it or not."

On a Journey

The Symphony Orchestra is making this week its longest expedition abroad. Last evening it was heard at Reading in Pennsylvania, in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions from Bach; numbers from Wagner's operas. This afternoon it plays in Washington Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Tapiola"; Weber's overture to "Oberon"; numbers, again, from Wagner. Tomorrow evening in Baltimore, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony yet again; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," the overtures to "Oberon" and to "Tannhaüser." Brooklyn, on Thursday evening will hear the Seventh Symphony and four numbers from Wagner. The first program in New York assembles "Innominata," piece by the Swiss-Parisian, Conrad Beck, as yet unheard in Boston; Brahms's Third Symphony; Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." The second program on Saturday traverses Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, Delius's "Brigg Fair"; Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; exhibits Mme. Beata Malkin in Mr. Converse's "Prophecy."

Incidents and Prospects

The Harvard Glee Club, with Dr. Davison conducting, announces a concert in Symphony Hall for Thursday evening, March 16. On April 13, it will join with the Pierian Sodality in a concert in Sanders Theater. The Pierian, assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, will give a concert of its own at Paine Hall at the University on Feb. 17.

From the Symphony Concerts that will mark the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death, Dr. Koussevitzky has dropped the choral fragments from the first act of "Parsifal." Orchestral numbers from Wagner will replace them.

Miss Hess will play the piano-part in Schumann's Concerto when she appears with the Symphony Orchestra to increase its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 26. . . . Mr. Menuhin's concert in Boston is announced for Saturday evening, March 4.

Philip Merivale, who has now become a movie actor, will be seen in a film version of the play, "I Loved You Wednesday."

It is reported that efforts have been made to secure the movie rights to the play, "Dinner at Eight." Difficulty lies in the price asked and what Hollywood is willing to pay.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 29, 1

Koussevitzky Made Them Scream With Laughter--Over in Poland

Boston's Symphony Conductor, Home From Vacation, Reveals Differences in International Audiences—What He Thinks of Guest Conductors—Future American Genius

Koussevitzky—just back from his winter vacation—compares the modern "trick" music to the modern novel—an appetizing tidbit, but no meat in it.

He discusses the problem of guest conductors that has brought forth so much criticism lately.

He tells why people scream with laughter at "Pictures on Exhibition," and explains why he changed the arrangement of the players in the Boston Symphony, why his arrangement differs from all other symphony orchestras.

BY JOHN WOODBURY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is back on his conductor's pedestal, to very warm and grateful applause, after his winter's holiday.

His vacation, mostly of hard work, he said to me, smiling; the selection of pieces and the arrangement of programmes; very important and difficult, but at least it is work of a different kind, and he has, for that time a certain solitude and isolation, very grateful.

Sergo Koussevitsky.

Eleanora Duse, the marvelous Italian actress, who had touched her thousands of audiences to ecstasy and tears, said once, "I would live on a ship at sea, and never come nearer than that to humanity." Though she had given all her genius to the public, did to the very day of her passing hence.

Very enthusiastic about his work, and delighting in all phases of it, Dr. Koussevitzky would not go as far as did the Duse, but he understands how she felt. "A painter, a sculptor, a composer," said he, "all have quiet and isolation for their creative work, but a conductor—he is constantly in touch with so many people."

If you had a hundred and seventy thousand people, nearly, in Boston, during the year watching your every gesture before them, and insisting that it be fraught with beauty and inspiration, not to mention other thousands, equally attentive in London and Paris during the summer, hundreds of necessary social and artistic contacts, and the Apollonian yet none the less Herculean task of rehearsing great orchestras to the very highest point of perfection, with a world-reputation to sustain at every second of play, then you, too, would appreciate a little isolation, would understand, perhaps, how the pre-eminant conductor of our pre-eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra delights for a while in the goldenness of silence and seclusion.

"Popular—Like a Novel"

I asked him about a recent programme piece descriptive of a radio station. "Very cleverly made," he said, "but not original, profound or of any enduring nature; interesting for the moment, perhaps, like a popular novel."

"But the 'Paintings on Exhibition,' the piano pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Revel, which you play this week, is it not something the same," I asked.

"Ah, that is another matter," smiled Dr. Koussevitzky, "Moussorgsky was one of the world's greatest musicians, and this work is most delicate and joyous, most marvelous!

"Just today, at the last rehearsal, I have all the time in my mind the thought this piece will forever remain as a supreme work of beauty and instrumentation, the greatest character-piece of the century." A thing to say!

Two Geniuses Working Together

Though he is very modest about it, Dr. Koussevitzky is very happy in the thought that it was he who persuaded the French composer Ravel to orchestrate this work written originally for piano alone. "Two geniuses working together, though in different times, to the achievement of a masterpiece of musical perfection; a very rare and happy thing," declared the Boston Symphony conductor with a most justifiable fervor.

"All the instruments are employed in threes," Dr. Zederbaum explains, "and Ravel uses two harps, kettledrums, bass drum, snare drum, celesta, xylophone, glockenspiel, rattle, bells; the xylophone used only in 'The Old Castle.'

"The rights of all Moussorgsky's compositions are held by the publishers Bessel. Dr. Koussevitzky, therefore, had to ask permission from the firm for Ravel's orchestration. The Bessels granted permission on the condition that he should not rent or give the score to any other conductor, even at a Koussevitzky concert. Our conductor has the original manuscript, though now, after seven years, it is open for every conductor to use."

The motive of the "Pictures at an Exhibition" and its delicate and delightful picturing in music has thus been described:—

The composer, wishing to show his affection for the great architect and artist, Hartmann, his friend, who had died an untimely death, decided to pay him a tribute by "drawing in music" the best of his sketches. The introduction, "Promenade," as the Russian art critic, Stassov, writes, portrays the composer walking now right, now left, now as an idle person, now urged to go near a picture; at times his joyous feeling dampened as he thinks in sadness of his dead friend.

Swarm of Nurses and Children

First there comes "Gnomes," a drawing of a little fellow drawing himself along on his short, bandy legs, now crawling, now jumping; there is The Old Castle, where an old troubador sings a melancholy song before an old tower of the Middle Ages. Then the Tuileries—children disputing after their play, an alley in the Paris gardens with a swarm of nurses and children.

Among the other pictures "pictured" in music are: a ballet of chickens in their shells, from a drawing made by Hartmann for the staging of "Trilby." There is the picture of the episode from the painting of two Polish Jews. As Pierre d'Alheim described it, "Two Jewish melodies, one replying to the other; one grave, imposing, decisively marked; the other lively, skipping, supplicating. One cannot be deceived in the two persons; one of them, the portly one, walks square-toed; the other, the thin one, hurries along and twists about. He revolves in a funny way, courts a look from the other. One sees them!" Then there is the Market-Place of Limoges, in France, the stall women disputing furiously.

A Wonderful Witch!

"The Hut on Fowls' Legs," is one of the funniest and most fantastic of all. The drawing showed a clock in the form of the witch Baba-Yaga's hut on the legs of fowls. Moussorgsky added the witch rushing on her way seated on her mortar. In Russian legends Baba-Yaga flies through the air; on the Witches Sabbath, "she rides in a mortar of glowing iron which she pushes along with a pestle, brushing out the traces behind her with a fiery broom."

Baba-Yaga would turn her victims to stone and then reduce them to "convenient fragments" by pounding them in her mortar.

"For seven years I have played this work, alone; many times, in Paris, in London, in Berlin, in Liverpool, in Edinburgh, in Barcelona, in Madrid, in New York, and here in Boston, and it is still fresh and as fairylike and delightful to me as the first time I conducted it. All the orchestra is happy with it, too, playing with vigor and joy; it is a marvelous piece, with the rarest feeling and color and form."

"And funny?" I asked.

Delightfully Comic

"So delightfully comic! Take the chickens dancing in their shells; it is just that, in the orchestral characterization. You hear the cracking of the shell, the squeeking, the flopping of the little fluffy chicks in air. It is so extremely difficult to play, but everything is in the music. And if interpreted rightly, the audience always laughs and has a great time.

"When I played the 'Pictures at an Exhibition' in Warsaw, Poland, the audience laughed hysterically, recognizing the perfect picturing of their own people; they literally screamed with laughter. In England and America, where people miss that intimate touch, the effect is not so powerful, of course. In France, the 'picture' of the market women disputing over their goods, the children in the garden, always produces quick laughter. The whole work is really magical in its power of evocation."

"What is the difference between a great work like this and other very startling pieces?" I asked.

"Well," Dr. Koussevitzky replied, "take Ravel's 'Bolero,' the Spanish dance piece. At first, when we played it here in Boston, it created, you might say, a shock, an extraordinary sensation. But, after the second hearing, you knew all the effects. You knew all the effects which were coming; it did not move you as at first. Such music, with so many of our modern things, is not profound and great enough; it is amazingly constructed, you might say, for a dynamic effect."

Spiritual Dynamism

"But, it is a physical, and not a spiritual dynamism, with no profound, searching spiritual quality," I interjected.

"Yes, exactly," Dr. Koussevitzky replied. "And it is these enduring qualities, these living powers, which a great composer like Moussorgsky has in all their plenitude."

"What was the reason for your different arrangement of the men here in the Boston Symphony?" I asked.

"Yes," he said, "my orchestra is differently placed. Generally the first violins are on the left, the second violins on the right, the cellos on the left by the first violins. Then the altos, the violas, next to second violins. But I had already changes this even when I was in Russia. Why? You have noticed that, when a string quartet plays, almost always the first violin is beside the second, and on the other side the viola and the cello. I have always believed this arrangement very good and that it should be followed in the arrangement of an orchestra.

"Then, in the second place, when the violas are in the centre of the orchestra, the harmony, in general, because of the position of the player, goes into the orchestra instead of out into the audience, and the harmony does not sound so round; put on the right side they sound much stronger. Thirdly, the first and second violins very, very often play in unison, and when they are together give an extraordinary force in tone. When, too, 30 or 40 violins are all in the same wave of movement, the esthetic visual effect is very excellent.

Guest Conductors

"Instead of being grouped together, as in other orchestras, in my orchestra the cellos are on the right and the double basses on the left, and the balance is much better. Many people ask me what is the reason my orchestra sounds so much fuller and rounder. I think I have given you the reasons."

"About the problem of guest conductors?" I suggested.

"Guest conductors, yes, but I think very rarely. Occasionally I believe it is good to have a guest conductor for two or three concerts during a season. Not over a long period, however, for the orchestra loses its discipline. There are some conductors who have no discipline, you know. I prefer, if we may not have one like Toscanini or Beacham or Walter, that Burgin, our own concert-master, conduct, for he goes in my way; I feel that my orchestra remains in its same artistical discipline.

"I understand, too, why a young American conductor should be given the chance to conduct a great orchestra, like the Boston Symphony; it is good for the development of American musical art; Clifton and Stoessel we have had. In the future we may very well develop a great American conductor, so we must give the worthy ones a chance."

A Super Instrument—of Men

"An orchestra is really an instrument in the hands of the conductor, I suppose," said I.

"Exactly," Dr. Koussevitzky assented. "And he plays it as a great pianist plays his instrument. An orchestra, like a piano, may be good or bad, but the conductor is responsible for the results, absolutely. If the orchestra plays badly, then the conductor is himself at fault. He is a bad conductor."

That seemed to me like a real taking of responsibility. And I thought how perfect society might be if every leader in every walk of life carried on with such conscientiousness and with such insistent power and joyousness.

Should the guest conductors be composers, too? "Well," he replied, "if a good composer is also a fine conductor it is rare and unusual."

"What do you consider the greatest piece of music?" I asked.

"For me, personally, the greatest music is the first part of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, after Bach. Bach's B Minor Mass is the greatest movement for me, but because it is choral, and not orchestral, I put Beethoven first. Orchestrally, the Ninth Symphony is unsurpassed."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

JAN 29 1933

Visiting Orchestras Are Musical Asset to a City

Give Opportunities to Audiences to Hear New Readings and New Performances—Philadelphia's Position Past and Present

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

THE recently announced decision of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra to omit its series of five concerts in Philadelphia next season, if it be actually ultimate, will remove from this city's season a series of important and interesting concerts. The action was not taken as a discriminatory one against this city, because all out-of-town concerts of this organization are to be canceled next season, the dates being thus gained to be given over to extra concerts in New York City. Nevertheless, it is a fair guess that, had the support in Philadelphia been as satisfactory as it was a few seasons ago, the concerts in this city would have been continued. A series of five concerts does not make any perceptible impression in the number of concerts given here in the course of a season, but it is true that these concerts, though few in number, are among the important ones of the season.

The principal reason for this is that they have given the music-lovers of Philadelphia their only chance for several seasons past of hearing one of the great American orchestras other than our own—a chance which ,it must regretfully be admitted, the aforesaid music-lovers have not shown themselves very desirous of improving, by the manner in which they have remained away; even though these concerts have brought such conductors to Philadelphia as Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Erich Kleiber and others of the most distinguished of European orchestra leaders. However, in spite of the apparent finality of the announcement, there is still something of a chance that these concerts may be resumed in future seasons when conditions are more normal than they are at the present time.

It is unquestionably to the musical advantage of every American city maintaining an important orchestra of its own, to have the opportunity of hearing other similar organizations of the country. This is not for the purpose of comparison, as to which one Shakespeare once made a pungent comment, but for the reason that it gives a chance to hear other conductors, either in numbers chosen from the standard repertoire or in new works. Having these men as guest conductors does not answer the same purpose at all, for in the latter case the leaders are working with a body of instrumentalists as strange to them as they are to the members of the orchestra. Under these circumstances, no matter how great the conductor nor how willing the men, the results cannot possibly be so good as with a conductor leading his own orchestra, where each is thoroughly accustomed to the other.

Former Visiting Orchestras

IN THIS respect, the early years of the Philadelphia Orchestra offered considerably greater opportunities than the later ones, when the fame of the local organization had grown so vastly. In those days, when the season of the Philadelphia Orchestra was less than half of what it is at the present time, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Society orchestras all visited Philadelphia, the Boston every month during the season and the New York orchestras for a lesser number of concerts. At that time the Boston Symphony was admittedly the greatest of American orchestras by a very large margin, if not the greatest in the world. This was partly compensated for by the fact that Gustav Mahler conducted a number of the Philharmonic concerts here and that Walter Damrosch had a great personal following in Philadelphia.

All of these concerts here were well attended. The Boston Symphony began with a series of concerts on Monday evenings, but shortly after the formation of the Philadelphia Orchestra, it added a second series on the Wednesday evening of the same week as the Monday concert. It also developed a disconcerting habit of playing at one or the other of these concerts virtually the same program as that scheduled by the Philadelphia Orchestra for its next appearance, a fact which roused the wrath of Fritz Scheel, the first conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, to a degree which more than once reached the point of verbal explosion; for none knew better than Mr. Scheel the disadvantage under which he labored with a newly organized orchestra in trying to compete with the mighty Bostonians in a similar program.

However, the support of the Philadelphia Orchestra grew, very slowly at first, it is true, but steadily and the Boston Symphony gradually withdrew its Philadelphia concerts. First the Wednesday series was withdrawn and after a time, as popular support was given more and more to the local organization the Monday concerts were also abandoned. Since then, if the writer remembers correctly, the Boston Orchestra has appeared but three times in Philadelphia, once under the auspices of the then existent Philharmonic Society of this city, once brought here by the Philadelphia Forum, and once when the organization gave a concert "on its own."

Other Orchestral Plans

THOUGH it was not officially announced at any time, it was generally understood that the last mentioned concert of the Boston Symphony was intended as a "feeler" toward the possible re-establishment of a Philadelphia series of concerts. The audience was excellent at all three of the concerts but nothing was ever heard about a return of a regular series here. The Philharmonic and the Forum concerts were, of course, semiprivate in nature and therefore could have no bearing on any series each season by the Boston organization. In the last season of the Philharmonic Society, Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, the manager of the organization, had laid plans for several of the great American orchestras to be heard here the following season, but it was never carried out, by reason of the dissolution of the society.

It was the Philharmonic Society, however, that brought the Cincinnati orchestra here, and it was at that concert that Fritz Reiner was first heard as an orchestra conductor in Philadelphia, which was later to know him so well and popularly to recognize his great abilities both in opera and in concert. It was regrettable for the musical interests of the city that Dr. Hirsch found himself unable to carry out the admirable idea which he had in mind for the Philharmonic Society in bringing not one, but four or five of the leading American orchestral organizations here in a single season. At that time, however, a vastly greater amount of traveling was done by the principal orchestras than is the case at the present time. This was probably due to the smaller size of the organizations then and the much lesser expense of traveling.

The inclination among American orchestras has grown more and more to play a constantly increasing number of their concerts in their own cities and, hence to do much less traveling. The result has been that, even in those cities which are still visited by orchestras from other places, the series has been reduced in the number of concerts and in most instances, the tours have been abandoned entirely. With the vastly increased expenses of traveling and the greater costs of maintaining an orchestra, which also increased immensely during the "boom" period, the expenses of giving out-of-town concerts with an organization of 100 or more men can scarcely be met, even though the last seat in the auditorium be sold—which is very seldom the case. And in these days no orchestra can afford to give any more concerts at a loss than is absolutely necessary. It may have to do it at home, but it will not do so in other places.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 29, 1933

Koussevitzky Made Them Scream With Laughter--Over in Poland

Boston's Symphony Conductor, Home From Vacation, Reveals Differences in International Audiences---What He Thinks of Guest Conductors---Future American Genius

Koussevitzky—just back from his winter vacation—compares the modern "trick" music to the modern novel—an appetizing tidbit, but no meat in it.

He discusses the problem of guest conductors that has brought forth so much criticism lately.

He tells why people scream with laughter at "Pictures on Exhibition," and explains why he changed the arrangement of the players in the Boston Symphony, why his arrangement differs from all other symphony orchestras.

BY JOHN WOODBURY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is back on his conductor's pedestal, to very warm and grateful applause, after his winter's holiday.

His vacation, mostly of hard work, he said to me, smiling; the selection of pieces and the arrangement of programmes; very important and difficult, but at least it is work of a different kind, and he has, for that time a certain solitude and isolation, very grateful.

Sergo Koussevitsky.

Eleanora Duse, the marvelous Italian actress, who had touched her thousands of audiences to ecstasy and tears, said once, "I would live on a ship at sea, and never come nearer than that to humanity." Though she had given all her genius to the public, did to the very day of her passing hence.

Very enthusiastic about his work, and delighting in all phases of it, Dr. Koussevitzky would not go as far as did the Duse, but he understands how she felt. "A painter, a sculptor, a composer," said he, "all have quiet and isolation for their creative work, but a conductor—he is constantly in touch with so many people."

If you had a hundred and seventy thousand people, nearly, in Boston, during the year watching your every gesture before them, and insisting that it be fraught with beauty and inspiration, not to mention other thousands, equally attentive in London and Paris during the summer, hundreds of necessary social and artistic contacts, and the Apollonian yet none the less Herculean task of rehearsing great orchestras to the very highest point of perfection, with a world-reputation to sustain at every second of play, then you, too, would appreciate a little isolation, would understand, perhaps, how the pre-eminant conductor of our pre-eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra delights for a while in the goldenness of silence and seclusion.

"Popular—Like a Novel"

I asked him about a recent programme piece descriptive of a radio station. "Very cleverly made," he said, "but not original, profound or of any enduring nature; interesting for the moment, perhaps, like a popular novel."

"But the 'Paintings on Exhibition,' the piano pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Revel, which you play this week, is it not something the same," I asked.

"Ah, that is another matter," smiled Dr. Koussevitzky, "Moussorgsky was one of the world's greatest musicians, and this work is most delicate and joyous, most marvelous!

"Just today, at the last rehearsal, I have all the time in my mind the thought this piece will forever remain as a supreme work of beauty and instrumentation, the greatest character-piece of the century." A thing to say!

Two Geniuses Working Together

Though he is very modest about it, Dr. Koussevitzky is very happy in the thought that it was he who persuaded the French composer Ravel to orchestrate this work written originally for piano alone. "Two geniuses working together, though in different times, to the achievement of a masterpiece of musical perfection; a very rare and happy thing," declared the Boston Symphony conductor with a most justifiable fervor.

"All the instruments are employed in threes," Dr. Zederbaum explains, "and Ravel uses two harps, kettledrums, bass drum, snare drum, celesta, xylophone, glockenspiel, rattle, bells; the xylophone used only in 'The Old Castle.'

"The rights of all Moussorgsky's compositions are held by the publishers Bessel. Dr. Koussevitzky, therefore, had to ask permission from the firm for Ravel's orchestration. The Bessels granted permission on the condition that he should not rent or give the score to any other conductor, even at a Koussevitzky concert. Our conductor has the original manuscript, though now, after seven years, it is open for every conductor to use."

The motive of the "Pictures at an Exhibition" and its delicate and delightful picturing in music has thus been described:—

The composer, wishing to show his affection for the great architect and artist, Hartmann, his friend, who had died an untimely death, decided to pay him a tribute by "drawing in music" the best of his sketches. The introduction, "Promenade," as the Russian art critic, Stassov, writes, portrays the composer walking now right, now left, now as an idle person, now urged to go near a picture; at times his joyous feeling dampened as he thinks in sadness of his dead friend.

Swarm of Nurses and Children

First there comes "Gnomes," a drawing of a little fellow drawing himself along on his short, bandy legs, now crawling, now jumping; there is The Old Castle, where an old troubador sings a melancholy song before an old tower of the Middle Ages. Then the Tuileries—children disputing after their play, an alley in the Paris gardens with a swarm of nurses and children.

Among the other pictures "pictured" in music are: a ballet of chickens in their shells, from a drawing made by Hartmann for the staging of "Trilby." There is the picture of the episode from the painting of two Polish Jews. As Pierre d'Alheim described it, "Two Jewish melodies, one replying to the other; one grave, imposing, decisively marked; the other lively, skipping, supplicating. One cannot be deceived in the two persons; one of them, the portly one, walks square-toed; the other, the thin one, hurries along and twists about. He revolves in a funny way, courts a look from the other. One sees them!" Then there is the Market-Place of Limoges, in France, the stall women disputing furiously.

A Wonderful Witch!

"The Hut on Fowls' Legs," is one of the funniest and most fantastic of all. The drawing showed a clock in the form of the witch Baba-Yaga's hut on the legs of fowls. Moussorgsky added the witch rushing on her way seated on her mortar. In Russian legends Baba-Yaga flies through the air; on the Witches Sabbath, "she rides in a mortar of glowing iron which she pushes along with a pestle, brushing out the traces behind her with a fiery broom."

Baba-Yaga would turn her victims to stone and then reduce them to "convenient fragments" by pounding them in her mortar.

"For seven years I have played this work, alone; many times, in Paris, in London, in Berlin, in Liverpool, in Edinburgh, in Barcelona, in Madrid, in New York, and here in Boston, and it is still fresh and as fairylike and delightful to me as the first time I conducted it. All the orchestra is happy with it, too, playing with vigor and joy; it is a marvelous piece, with the rarest feeling and color and form."

"And funny?" I asked.

Delightfully Comic

"So delightfully comic! Take the chickens dancing in their shells; it is just that, in the orchestral characterization. You hear the cracking of the shell, the squeeking, the flopping of the little fluffy chicks in air. It is so extremely difficult to play, but everything is in the music. And if interpreted rightly, the audience always laughs and has a great time.

"When I played the 'Pictures at an Exhibition' in Warsaw, Poland, the audience laughed hysterically, recognizing the perfect picturing of their own people; they literally screamed with laughter. In England and America, where people miss that intimate touch, the effect is not so powerful, of course. In France, the 'picture' of the market women disputing over their goods, the children in the garden, always produces quick laughter. The whole work is really magical in its power of evocation."

"What is the difference between a great work like this and other very startling pieces?" I asked.

"Well," Dr. Koussevitzky replied, "take Ravel's 'Bolero,' the Spanish dance piece. At first, when we played it here in Boston, it created, you might say, a shock, an extraordinary sensation. But, after the second hearing, you knew all the effects. You knew all the effects which were coming; it did not move you as at first. Such music, with so many of our modern things, is not profound and great enough; it is amazingly constructed, you might say, for a dynamic effect."

Spiritual Dynamism

"But, it is a physical, and not a spiritual dynamism, with no profound, searching spiritual quality," I interjected.

"Yes, exactly," Dr. Koussevitzky replied. "And it is these enduring qualities, these living powers, which a great composer like Moussorgsky has in all their plenitude."

"What was the reason for your different arrangement of the men here in the Boston Symphony?" I asked.

"Yes," he said, "my orchestra is differently placed. Generally the first violins are on the left, the second violins on the right, the cellos on the left by the first violins. Then the altos, the violas, next to second violins. But I had already changes this even when I was in Russia. Why? You have noticed that, when a string quartet plays, almost always the first violin is beside the second, and on the other side the viola and the cello. I have always believed this arrangement very good and that it should be followed in the arrangement of an orchestra.

"Then, in the second place, when the violas are in the centre of the orchestra, the harmony, in general, because of the position of the player, goes into the orchestra instead of out into the audience, and the harmony does not sound so round; put on the right side they sound much stronger. Thirdly, the first and second violins very, very often play in unison, and when they are together give an extraordinary force in tone. When, too, 30 or 40 violins are all in the same wave of movement, the esthetic visual effect is very excellent.

Guest Conductors

"Instead of being grouped together, as in other orchestras, in my orchestra the cellos are on the right and the double basses on the left, and the balance is much better. Many people ask me what is the reason my orchestra sounds so much fuller and rounder. I think I have given you the reasons."

"About the problem of guest conductors?" I suggested.

"Guest conductors, yes, but I think very rarely. Occasionally I believe it is good to have a guest conductor for two or three concerts during a season. Not over a long period, however, for the orchestra loses its discipline. There are some conductors who have no discipline, you know. I prefer, if we may not have one like Toscanini or Beacham or Walter, that Burgin, our own concert-master, conduct, for he goes in my way; I feel that my orchestra remains in its same artistical discipline.

"I understand, too, why a young American conductor should be given the chance to conduct a great orchestra, like the Boston Symphony; it is good for the development of American musical art; Clifton and Stoessel we have had. In the future we may very well develop a great American conductor, so we must give the worthy ones a chance."

A Super Instrument—of Men

"An orchestra is really an instrument in the hands of the conductor, I suppose," said I.

"Exactly," Dr. Koussevitzky assented. "And he plays it as a great pianist plays his instrument. An orchestra, like a piano, may be good or bad, but the conductor is responsible for the results, absolutely. If the orchestra plays badly, then the conductor is himself at fault. He is a bad conductor."

That seemed to me like a real taking of responsibility. And I thought how perfect society might be if every leader in every walk of life carried on with such conscientiousness and with such insistent power and joyousness.

Should the guest conductors be composers, too? "Well," he replied, "if a good composer is also a fine conductor it is rare and unusual."

"What do you consider the greatest piece of music?" I asked.

"For me, personally, the greatest music is the first part of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, after Bach. Bach's B Minor Mass is the greatest movement for me, but because it is choral, and not orchestral, I put Beethoven first. Orchestrally, the Ninth Symphony is unsurpassed."

ADELPHIA, PA.
IC LEDGER

JAN 29 1933

Visiting Orchestras Are Musical Asset to a City

Give Opportunities to Audiences to Hear New Readings and New Performances—Philadelphia's Position Past and Present

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

THE recently announced decision of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra to omit its series of five concerts in Philadelphia next season, if it be actually ultimate, will remove from this city's season a series of important and interesting concerts. The action was not taken as a discriminatory one against this city, because all out-of-town concerts of this organization are to be canceled next season, the dates being thus gained to be given over to extra concerts in New York City. Nevertheless, it is a fair guess that, had the support in Philadelphia been as satisfactory as it was a few seasons ago, the concerts in this city would have been continued. A series of five concerts does not make any perceptible impression in the number of concerts given here in the course of a season, but it is true that these concerts, though few in number, are among the important ones of the season.

The principal reason for this is that they have given the music-lovers of Philadelphia their only chance for several seasons past of hearing one of the great American orchestras other than our own—a chance which ,it must regretfully be admitted, the aforesaid music-lovers have not shown themselves very desirous of improving, by the manner in which they have remained away; even though these concerts have brought such conductors to Philadelphia as Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Erich Kleiber and others of the most distinguished of European orchestra leaders. However, in spite of the apparent finality of the announcement, there is still something of a chance that these concerts may be resumed in future seasons when conditions are more normal than they are at the present time.

It is unquestionably to the musical advantage of every American city maintaining an important orchestra of its own, to have the opportunity of hearing other similar organizations of the country. This is not for the purpose of comparison, as to which one Shakespeare once made a pungent comment, but for the reason that it gives a chance to hear other conductors, either in numbers chosen from the standard repertoire or in new works. Having these men as guest conductors does not answer the same purpose at all, for in the latter case the leaders are working with a body of instrumentalists as strange to them as they are to the members of the orchestra. Under these circumstances, no matter how great the conductor nor how willing the men, the results cannot possibly be so good as with a conductor leading his own orchestra, where each is thoroughly accustomed to the other.

Former Visiting Orchestras

IN THIS respect, the early years of the Philadelphia Orchestra offered considerably greater opportunities than the later ones, when the fame of the local organization had grown so vastly. In those days, when the season of the Philadelphia Orchestra was less than half of what it is at the present time, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic and the New York Symphony Society orchestras all visited Philadelphia, the Boston every month during the season and the New York orchestras for a lesser number of concerts. At that time the Boston Symphony was admittedly the greatest of American orchestras by a very large margin, if not the greatest in the world. This was partly compensated for by the fact that Gustav Mahler conducted a number of the Philharmonic concerts here and that Walter Damrosch had a great personal following in Philadelphia.

All of these concerts here were well attended. The Boston Symphony began with a series of concerts on Monday evenings, but shortly after the formation of the Philadelphia Orchestra, it added a second series on the Wednesday evening of the same week as the Monday concert. It also developed a disconcerting habit of playing at one or the other of these concerts virtually the same program as that scheduled by the Philadelphia Orchestra for its next appearance, a fact which roused the wrath of Fritz Scheel, the first conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, to a degree which more than once reached the point of verbal explosion; for none knew better than Mr. Scheel the disadvantage under which he labored with a newly organized orchestra in trying to compete with the mighty Bostonians in a similar program.

However, the support of the Philadelphia Orchestra grew, very slowly at first, it is true, but steadily and the Boston Symphony gradually withdrew its Philadelphia concerts. First the Wednesday series was withdrawn and after a time, as popular support was given more and more to the local organization, the Monday concerts were also abandoned. Since then, if the writer remembers correctly, the Boston Orchestra has appeared but three times in Philadelphia, once under the auspices of the then existent Philharmonic Society of this city, once brought here by the Philadelphia Forum, and once when the organization gave a concert "on its own."

Other Orchestral Plans

THOUGH it was not officially announced at any time, it was generally understood that the last mentioned concert of the Boston Symphony was intended as a "feeler" toward the possible reestablishment of a Philadelphia series of concerts. The audience was excellent at all three of the concerts but nothing was ever heard about a return of a regular series here. The Philharmonic and the Forum concerts were, of course, semiprivate in nature and therefore could have no bearing on any series each season by the Boston organization. In the last season of the Philharmonic Society, Dr. Charles S. Hirsch, the manager of the organization, had laid plans for several of the great American orchestras to be heard here the following season, but it was never carried out, by reason of the dissolution of the society.

It was the Philharmonic Society, owever, that brought the Cincinnati orchestra here, and it was at that concert that Fritz Reiner was first heard as an orchestra conductor in Philadelphia, which was later to know him so well and popularly to recognize his great abilities both in opera and in concert. It was regrettable for the musical interests of the city that Dr. Hirsch found himself unable to carry out the admirable idea which he had in mind for the Philharmonic Society in bringing not one, but four or five of the leading American orchestral organizations here in a single season. At that time, however, a vastly greater amount of traveling was done by the principal orchestras than is the case at the present time. This was probably due to the smaller size of the organizations then and the much lesser expense of traveling.

The inclination among American orchestras has grown more and more to play a constantly increasing number of their concerts in their own cities and, hence to do much less traveling. The result has been that, even in those cities which are still visited by orchestras from other places, the series has been reduced in the number of concerts and in most instances, the tours have been abandoned entirely. With the vastly increased expenses of traveling and the greater costs of maintaining an orchestra, which also increased immensely during the "boom" period, the expenses of giving out-of-town concerts with an organization of 100 or more men can scarcely be met, even though the last seat in the auditorium be sold—which is very seldom the case. And in these days no orchestra can afford to give any more concerts at a loss than is absolutely necessary. It may have to do it at home, but it will not do so in other places.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 29 1933

Famed Boston Symphony Once Student's Dream

Great Orchestra Originated in Idea of Henry Higginson, Young Harvard Scholar, Who Founded It and Later Contributed a Million Dollars.

By Alice Eversman.

ON Tuesday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzy will pay its only visit to Washington this season. Orchestra patrons of this city have had several occasions to hear and compare the most celebrated orchestras in this part of the country as well as enjoy the individuality of several famous conductors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra stands for stability and progressiveness and with the added brilliancy of the name of Koussevitzy it means originality and, above all, the quintessence of good musicianship.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the second oldest in the United States giving pre-eminence only to the New York Philharmonic which is its senior by 39 years. The story of the orchestra's inception and growth is a human story of benevolence and farsightedness, a man's dream realized, a conviction justified. It is an example of the strength of his belief in our ultimate reaction to music provided the opportunity was given us to hear it year by year until its power had had time to work upon us and we had grown to love it.

Henry L. Higginson was a young Bostonian student who first learned of cultural affairs at the University of Harvard. His intentions were to become a banker, but before completely finishing the course of studies, he left to go to Vienna to spend four years in training his voice, practicing the piano and trying his hand at composition. Then the Civil War claimed his services in America and he did his duty to his country, rising from rank to rank until, being seriously wounded, he was forced from action. After the war, when he took up the occupation of banker, which he had first decided upon, he nevertheless continued to be a part of every movement that had anything to do with music or any other educational undertakings. The impression of those student years when, day after day, he listened to the best music the great capital of Vienna had to offer, was never effaced and through the years of post-war readjustment and his own struggle to advance materially, he dreamed and planned.

During this time there had been many attempts to form an orchestra. Although orchestra musicians were scarce, the few there were, were gathered together periodically and a concert given. Theodore Thomas, at that time domiciled in New York, was the moving spirit in all things orchestral and with untiring zeal he managed to hold together an orchestra, and do some touring, so that various cities, including Boston had an opportunity to hear an orchestra and know something of the fine compositions that had been written for it.

With this as a foundation and with personal prosperity aiding him, Mr. Higginson finally reached the point where his dreaming and his planning could bear fruit. In 1881 he set aside $1,000,000 by way of endowment and announced to the Boston public that there would be established "an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way and give concerts to all who could pay a small price." He called on Europe to obtain good musicians and took the best America had to offer at that time. He formed an orchestra of 60 men to give 20 concerts from the middle of October to the middle of March on Saturday evenings in the Museum Hall of Boston. He paid them for the concerts and for their preliminary "careful training" and bought a substantial library. The public was charged from 25 to 75 cents for a single ticket.

George Henschel was the first conductor chosen. Born and educated in Germany, Mr. Henschel achieved fame before he reached Boston as a concert singer and, after his American sojourn returned to Europe to win further renown as a vocal teacher and the founder of the London Symphony concerts. However, his thorough training in all branches of music made him eminently fitted to carry out Mr. Higginson's idea. For the first three years of its existence Mr. Henschel directed the Boston Smphony Orchestra.

The second conductor, who succeeded him, was Wilhelm Gericke. Resembling Mr. Henschel, he, too, had a Viennese education and much practice as conductor of the Gesellschaft's Concerte in Vienna. When he took over the baton of the orchestra, he used his energy and knowledge to weed out the unworthy and replace them with experienced men and work for the highest proficiency in the public performances. His first important step was to engage Franz Kneisel, then with the Bilse Orchestra of Berlin, as concertmaster. During the five years that Gericke remained in Boston and for 13 years thereafter Kneisel held this position. At the concerts which the Boston Symphony gave at the Chicago World's Fair it was Kneisel who was called upon to direct them during the absence of the conductor.

Ill health compelled Mr. Gericke to pass on the baton to Arthur Nikisch. No more picturesque conductor than Nikisch has ever been known and from earliest childhood he had shown unusual talent for music. When still a student he was chosen to be spokesman for a group of musicians who were sent to welcome Wagner in the historical year of the laying of the corner stone of the Bayreuth Festspielhaus. At the concert which was given on that occasion, and where Wagner himself directed the performance of Beethoven's "Choral Symphony," Nikisch played in the orchestra among the first violins. Many triumphs followed each of his appearances when he later was a famed conductor and once, after an exceptionally fine performance of Schumann's "D Minor Symphony," he was publicly thanked by Mme. Schumann.

Such was the conductor who next took over the destinies of the Boston Symphony and brought to bear his profound musicianship on their further training. During the four years that he remained in this country, the public had many opportunities to hear a variety of works that heretofore had not been included in the orchestra's repertoire.

From Vienna again came his successor, Emil Pauer, who, after five years in Boston, continued in America as conductor of the New York Philharmonic concerts and eventually became director of the National Conservatory in New York. Dr. Carl Muck was another find of Mr. Higginson and he continued at his post for many years bringing the standard of the orchestra to as near perfection as possible.

War, that had interfered with Mr. Higginson's early life, came again to cause a temporary suspension of what he was trying to accomplish and after being the sole supporter of the orchestra for 37 years, he turned over the directing of its destinies in 1918 to a board of trustees.

In 1924 Serge Koussevitsky began the longest continuous term as conductor of that orchestra and has brought it to new and surpassing heights. He came, heralded by the fame of his "Concerts Koussevitsky" in Paris and the new impetus he had given to music in Russia. During the past nine years of his Boston leadership he has won a warm place in the appreciation of the American public for his upholding of ideals that were a part of Mr. Higginson's dream.

* * * *

THE passing of Katie Wilson-Greene writes finis to a glorious musical adventure. She braved many difficulties that the treasures of music could be accessible to the public of Washington. She laid the corner stone of a substantial musical edifice and saw it grow with surprising rapidity during her lifetime and had the consolation of knowing that what she had done was good. The impetus she has given will spread out in ever widening circles and to her will go the honor of having started it.

Were it not for her bigness of courage that made her willing to gamble everything she possessed to carry out her idea, the influx of famous artists and the forming of the habit of concert going would have been delayed many years. She it was who realized that there was culture here that was being starved and wealth enough willing to pay provided that need was satisfied.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene had the clearness to see that it was a delicate undertaking and that any effort to present but the best would bring a disgust that could never be overcome. For that reason she wasted no time, but began at the top, sought the best and paid the big prices for the best. In the struggle she made Washington known as a city where great artists would be welcomed and raised herself to the presidency of the National Concert Managers' Association, where she presided over the activities of artists and managers over the entire country.

From one initial concert to the complicated handling of big organizations, such as the Metropolitan and Chicago Operas, has been Mrs. Greene's record. Washington has become familiar with the elite of genius and musical talent, and to the memory of Katie Wilson-Greene, who made all this possible, goes the respect and gratitude of those who have enjoyed the fruits of her labors.

* * * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

JAN 29 1933

Very Few Cities Favored

NEW YORK is virtually the only American city today which has the opportunity of hearing great orchestras other than its own. Both the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony give an annual series of ten concerts in New York and are well supported. Other orchestras, such as the Cleveland and occasionally the Detroit Orchestra, formerly gave single concerts in New York, but this was apparently more with the idea of loosening reluctant purse-strings back home through the eclat of a successful metropolitan appearance than for any other reason. Outside of the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras, New York has not now, nor for a long time, had any series of orchestra concerts from foreign organizations.

Geographically, Philadelphia is in the best position of any of the American cities maintaining orchestras for such concerts. The run from New York is short, and it would seem to be a not impossible matter to secure orchestras giving concerts there to visit this city for a single event. This, however, does not apply to the Boston Symphony, which gives Saturday matinee concerts there. Saturday night in Philadelphia is impossible on account of our own orchestra and Sunday on account of the State law, while the expense involved in remaining over until Monday would be prohibitive. When the Boston Orchestra visited Washington and Baltimore, as it did a good many years ago, the Philadelphia stop was easy to arrange—in fact, it was the major concert of the tour together with that in New York. The Southern concerts, however, have since been taken over by our own orchestra.

There has been considerable disappointment expressed here about the announcement of the cancellation of the Philharmonic concerts next season. However, this will not restore them, in case it be still possible to do so. The only thing to do if the music-lovers of Philadelphia desire to hear the New York orchestra in the future, as they have for a number of seasons in the past, is either to raise a guarantee fund sufficient to insure the organization against loss or to obtain enough advance subscriptions to achieve the same purpose. Every orchestra in the United States, from San Francisco to Boston, is having the same trouble during the present season, to make the income from all sources, sale of tickets, interest on invested funds, or gifts, meet its expenditures, and none of them will take on future concerts which do not show at least a reasonable hope of meeting the cost of such events.

READING, PA.
TIMES

JAN 30 1933

CONDUCTOR

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear at Rajah theatre, tonight, with his orchestra, in the last concert of the series conducted by George D. Haage.

READING, PA.
TIMES

JAN 31 1933

SYMPHONY GIVES READING THRILL

Boston Orchestra Under Kousevitzky Heard in Haage Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony orchestra to Reading last night and gave music-lovers of Berks and half a dozen neighboring counties a thrill they'll not soon forget.

The concert was the last of the season's series under the imprimateur of George D. Haage. It marked the close of the twenty-fifth Haage season. That the impresario should choose the Boston symphony, that the symphony should choose to come to Reading, that Dr. Koussevitzky should choose an all-German program—these all were right and proper for the series' silver anniversary.

Honors Three Composers

Bach, Brahms, Wagner—these three and no more was L. J. Rogers, the Boston's librarian, required to browse through to find the scores for the concert. Because this year is the hundredth anniversary of Brahms' birth, there was the lovely, lively "Eroica" or Third symphony. Because this year also is the fiftieth anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, there were selections from three Wagner operas: "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried;" Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde;" and the mighty and mellifluous overture to Tannhauser. Two Bach string orchestra preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli opened the program.

The program, of course, was anything but "light." With three tolerably lengthy Wagner items, it could not possibly be so. But under the cunning of Koussevitzky's baton and restless hands, what might ordinarily be a weighty and somniferous program never came within a mile of letting down the large audience for a split second.

Glorious Golden Music

There was the music, of course—glorious, golden music dripping from the strings, flowing from the woodwinds, rushing pell-mell from basses and tympani. And there was Koussevitzky the inimitable—alive as electricity, dynamic as dynamite, always and ever moving, moving, moving. Here's a man, indeed, who, when he leads an orchestra, leads an orchestra, if you get the idea. His slender baton plays the least important part in his direction. His left hand does as much as his right, his shoulders and head almost as much as his hands and arms, and his continuous moving about the podium to "contact" the various sections of the orchestra gives his feet and legs a share of the conductor's job.

And there are moments when hands, arms, legs, shoulders and baton are too inorticulate, so Dr. Koussevitzky "speaks" to his men. Not aloud, of course. But he mouths his directions and with the formation of his lips, the lift of brows, indicates and transfers to the orchestra his feeling for the music's interpretation.

Gets Splendid Response

And what music this gyrating, graceful maestro elicits from his men. The audience seemed especially to like the symphony and the "Tristan and Isolde" and "Tannhauser" numbers, to which Koussevitzky seemed most devotedly attentive. His mastery over the brass section was particularly noticeable in the overture which closed the program, lifting his musicians to their very highest pitch.

A nearly-capacity house heard the program. There were no encores. Dr. Koussevitzky was called back for many bows, which he shared with his men. In the crowd were some scores from towns and cities within a 100-mile radius of Reading.

On Lengthy Tour

The orchestra's present tour, which opened in Reading, will take it to Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and, on Friday night and Saturday afternoon to Carnegie Hall, New York, where it will play, for the first time in the metropolis, "Prophecy," by Frederick Converse. It is arranged for soprano and orchestra. Beata Malkin, Russian soprano who sang it at its first performance in Boston last December, will sing the same part in New York, Saturday afternoon.

The first concert of the newly-organized Reading Madrigal society will be sung at the Rajah theatre, February 23. Willy Richter is conductor of the society, which will devote itself to the works of such composers as Palestriana, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Bateson and Dowland.

POTTSVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 31 1933

READING CONCERT SEASON CLOSED WITH SYMPHONY

The greatest musical season Reading has ever had was brought to a brilliant close Monday evening under the efficient management of Geo I Haage, with the initial appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~, conductor.

Mr. Haage has been untiringly spreading the gospel of music for 25 years, and, as a celebration of this anniversary, has given his patrons an almost unequaled array of talent, comprising as it did, Rosa Ponselle, who is generally acknowledged the greatest dramatic soprano in the world today; Fritz Kreisler, the mere mention of whose name tells the story of his place as perhaps one of the finest all around musicians in the world—some one has fittingly termed him "Dean of Violinists"; Leland Hayes, the negro tenor, who perhaps is better known through Europe than in his own country; Vladimir Horowitz, an especially brilliant pianist, and the Boston Symphony with its personnel of 110 men and Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. One could never hope to hear such a marvelous combination of concerts again outside the large musical centers, but Reading is rapidly becoming known for its increasing interest and appreciation of the best in all the various branches of art. Mr. Haage's belief in music has been justified by the enthusiastic support given him by patrons who come from a radius of 40 miles to enjoy these evenings.

While Mr. Haage has been fortunate in the past to number the Cleveland Orchestra as an outstanding feature of his course, he is to be especially congratulated in obtaining the Boston Symphony for this season. The Cleveland Orchestra, under Sokoloff, will be remembered as having played here in Pottsville some years past with Robert Braun as soloist. This orchestra has always delighted its audiences, but the renewed life that has been creeping into the Boston organization in the last half dozen years is rapidly bringing it back to its original high standard, when it was the only real orchestra in the country. With Dr. Karl Muck as conductor no other orchestra could compare with it, and it had the proud distinction of weathering a gratifying comparison with the best organizations of its kind in Europe. However, after Dr. Muck was no longer associated with it, this wonderful reputation sustained interest for a time but gradually faded until the happy arrival of Koussevitzky, who has imparted new life into it and brought it back to its present enviable standing among the splendid orchestras of the country.

With the marvelous background of 110 tried and experienced musicians, and a well balanced program of three masters, plus a vibrant and insatiable artist to lead them in their beautiful pianissimo and stirring fortissimo passages, who could fail to designate this concert as the climax of all the musical actiyities ever held in Reading?

Koussevitzky was particularly happy in his choice of Bach, Brahms and Wagner on the same program. Starting with the sweet tones of the entire string section in the opening Bach numbers—Two Preludes arranged by Pick-Maugiagalli, the first half ended with the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F. Major, op 90. The latter half of the program was given over to three numbers from the Wagner operas.

From the delicate trills and entrancing themes of the Forest Murmurs from Seigfried, through the exquisite and soulful strains of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," to the thrilling close of the Overture to Tannheuser, the audience seemed to be held spell bound by the inspired rendition of these numbers.

READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 31 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY GRAND CLIMAX OF HAAGE SEASON

Reading Sponsor's Jubilee Year of Highest Grade Attractions Comes to Impressive Close—Over 2,000 Hear Concert at Rajah

There might have been a more fitting way to climax the silver anniversary of the George D. Haage concert series, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the fifth and final concert of the current series, brought to an auspicious close the 25th year of concert presentations in this city with one of the finest performances ever presented in Reading. It received a mighty welcome in return.

More than 2,000 persons, close to a capacity house, crowded the Rajah Theatre to hear the orchestra and its famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A group of 110 men, with an established reputation, came to Reading with a difficult role to fill. The Cleveland Orchestra had preceded them on several occasions and established an enviable record. The Cincinnati, the New York Philharmonic and other notable organizations had left their imprint in the minds of music lovers here.

Ovation for Conductor.

But from the very moment Koussevitzky lifted his baton after mounting the podium, commanding utter silence from players and audience alike, he wielded a perfect mastery that ended with deafening applause when he strode from the stage. Silence, inspired by awe and admiration held the audience throughout the concert, but it accorded the conductor a tremendous ovation when his night was over, and the last strains of the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner floated over the hall.

Five times the leader was called to take a bow, but each time he quietly smiled and deferred to his men. There were no encores and if any that was the only regret that could be uttered of the evening. The orchestra was finely trained and the players' performances was a credit to the traditions of the organization and leaders.

"Two Preludes" by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, introduced the accomplishments and possibilities of the orchestra. It displayed the absolute mastery that Koussevitzky wielded his magic baton. Graceful, commanding and dynamic, three personalities in one, as the mood required, was the tall, gray-haired leader as he moved from one eminent German composer to another and climaxed his performance with the ever-popular Wagner overture, "Tannhauser."

Bach to Brahms.

From the Bach preludes, the first fleeting and graceful, almost completely dominated by the first strings, and the second, dashing and vibrant, Koussevitzky moved to his major work of the evening — the Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Op. 90, by Brahms.

The first movement, allegro con brio, was light and airy as the orchestra introduced the theme of the composition. Next came the "andante, soft and prayer-like, ending with an organ-like effect that won instant favor with the audience. In the third poco allegretto, Koussevitzky literally carried along his men as he wove the intricate passages into delightful harmony. The fourth and final allegro movement brought back the theme of the symphony and ended with the strings and horns softly blending.

Three Wagner Numbers.

For the second part of his program, the leader devoted his attention to three of the better known works of Wagner. Calm and reserved he took his bow after the symphony and with his last bow, smiled quietly, obviously pleased with the reception accorded him. Even the players entered into the spirit of the occasion, for the performance in the second part, if possible, was better than the first.

The first was the descriptive "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," with the wind rustling through the trees, the woodland birds calling to one and another and then softly fading away as twilight covered the land. As the number was introduced it seemed almost impossible for a group of 100 or more to play so softly and still be heard throughout the spacious hall.

Dramatic Finish of Series.

The greatest applause was given the leader following his rendition of the "Prelude and Love-Death," from "Tristan und Isolde." His overture completed the program.

Perhaps greater ovations have been accorded concert artists in Reading in the past, but none was more spontaneous or enthusiastic than that accorded the Boston Symphony. Many warm admirers here were won by this group of musicians, and it put a dramatic touch to the close of the present series and 25 years of concert direction by Mr. Haage in Reading.

Today the orchestra left by the special train, over the Pennsylvania Railroad, for Washington, D. C., where it will appear in another concert of the tour. It will play in Baltimore, Brooklyn and end the tour in New York on Saturday, with a performance in Carnegie Hall.

READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 31 1933

Boston Symphony Leader Here for Concert Says Music Is Like Food to Some

To some people music is a necessity like food or clothing. Thus declared Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a concert at the Rajah Theatre last night.

"To those people who love music, a depression makes no difference," explained Director Koussevitsky, "The real lover of music will spend his last money to hear good music. The love for the arts shows how high the culture of a country is, and music is the greatest art."

Rectnly Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra appeared on the radio for the first time. He admitted that while the radio has some value in popularizing music, he would much rather direct a concert in a hall or auditorium for an audience than present it over the radio.

"To play over the radio is much more difficult than to play for an audience in a ball," he said. "The personal contact is lost. A radio audience after all is passive. Your hearers might be smoking, eating or reading a newspaper for all you know. Then, too, the audience does not have the benefit of that personal contact with the artists. After all, when you are playing over the radio, you are playing to a machine and not to people. That makes it difficult.

"I think the radio is very good, however, to make music popular. It is good for those people who cannot come to the city to attend concerts. It is good for the people who live far away from the city, like farmers, and they can get an idea what is good music. The trouble with the radio is that there is too much different music. It makes it difficult for those people who have never heard good music for then they will not know what is bad music."

Dr. Koussevitsky believes that the day of jazz, that wild syncopation with its barbaric beat, is passing.

"Jazz is finished," he declared, "it remains because it cannot go immediately. For eight years jazz was with us but the mood is changing. In 10 years jazz will have been forgotten."

Dr. Koussevitsky does not mean that dance music will pass, but rather that the style of dancing will change. Each generation has its style of dancing, he explained, and he likened it to an overcoat.

"One time long overcoats are in style," he added. "Next season short overcoats are the style. There are styles in dancing, too."

Director Koussevitsky with the 110 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Reading Monday a. m. at 8 o'clock in a special train of five Pullman coaches and a baggage car over the Pennsylvania. They came here directly from Boston. They remained in Reading over night at the Hotel Abraham Lincoln and left this morning at 9 o'clock for Washington, D. C., where a concert will be played this afternoon. Other concerts will be presented at Baltimore and New York before the musicians return to Boston.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who was born in Russia 58 years ago, was decorated twice by the former Czar for his activities in music. He was the founder of the Koussevitsky Symphony Orchestra which made extensive tours of Russia before the advent of the Soviet. He also has directed orchestras throughout Europe, particularly in France, England, Germany, Itay and Spain. In 1920, Dr. Koussevitsky founded the Concerts Koussevitsky in Paris. Since 1924 he has been director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 31 1933

The Observ

BY CARL WALTON DECKELMAN.

It is rumored that Dr. Koussevitzky regards with a yawn ~~of indif~~ference the occasional excursions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the musical hinterland and that he considers Hartford to be located in the above mentioned region. This report brings to mind quite vividly the fact that some four or five seasons ago Dr. Koussevitzky sent his orchestra to Hartford for a Sunday afternoon concert in the Capitol Theater but neglected to come himself and in his absence the concert was conducted by the orchestra's concert-master, Richard Burgin. Nor if memory serves, was Dr. Koussevitzky's absence ever quite satisfactorily explained.

Although fully mindful of the fact that the Boston Symphony is intrinsically a superb instrument and has progressed mightily during the Koussevitzky administration, its most recent concert in the Bushnell Memorial seemed to many local observers, including the writer, to be a rather listless affair. If one were called upon to define precisely the missing element in this concert it would seem very much as though the conductor did not feel called upon to extend himself and, not being in the presence of a metropolitan audience, was satisfied to give merely a routine performance of the compositions listed. The subsequent appearance in the same hall of the Detroit Symphony, which, excellent orchestra though it is, is admittedly not the equal of the group from Boston, proved considerably more stimulating.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1933

"Finlandia."

Like Tapiola which Dr. Koussevitzky presented in the ~~first concert~~ of the Bushness series, Finlandia is an expression of the brooding love of Sibelius for his native land.

"I told Mr. Sibelius one summer day in Helsingfors," writes Olin Downes, "that I longed for the opportunity which would probably be forever denied a desk slave, to see Finland in the winter time. But I said I knew something about winter in Finland. I said I believed there were long, still, dark nights, when only light was the aurora borealis flickering in the skies; and over lake and fen and forest came sounds, probably the cries of animals, possibly those of disembodied spirits haunting the dark; and sometimes snow fell endlessly and silently on a land shrouded in ice, and sometimes the tempest whirled down with savage and terrifying power, shrieking like the banshee, while peasants out in the wastes huddled about fires, or drinking in taverns, thought perhaps of the ancient tales of the pagan north before Christianity came upon the world in a land where elves and mermaids, as Havelock Ellis remarked of Norway, were regarded as 'tame domestic animals'."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BRILLIANTLY TO AUDIENCE HERE

Carrying on the grand tradition established in over 50 years of its musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a familiar program yesterday afternoon in Constitution Hall. It included Weber, Beethoven and Wagner. Sibelius, this year's popular contemporary, was the only outsider admitted to the sacred circle.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky wielded the baton with ~~the ut~~most restraint, and pleaded eloquently for his effects with his left hand and a lowering head. A great intellectual, he worked out the Beethoven Seventh Symphony like a problem in higher mathematics, with almost too much precision. It was the music of Beethoven, the thinker, rather than the music of Beethoven, the man flayed by all human passions. The tones were incisive, the pauses abrupt, clean and clear, the whole performance held within sharp calculated outlines.

The strings sang with a velvet tone, the flutes with a piercing sweetness and the terrific tempo of the last movement crowded up to a brilliant crescendo that rattled the shields on the wall. It was a new Beethoven experience.

The second part of the program included Sibelius' "Tapiola," "Forest Murmurs" from Wagner's "Siegfried" and the Overture to Tannhauser.

"Tapiola" was composed in 1926 for the Symphony Society of New York at the request of Walter Damrosch. This was its first playing in Washington. It was a strange composition, not to be liked too well at first sight. The outpouring of a tortured soul in weird tonal combinations had its climax in a crashing crescendo of disharmonics that sent shudders through the hall.

After this the Wagner came as heavenly balm. Here again was the marvellous choir of violins and the stirring horns searching the old melodies for the new life, new hopes and new joy they always yield.

Hans Kindler was one of the most enthralled listeners. As he leaned over the box he probably dreamed of the day that Washington will have a 50-year-old orchestra and one that had its beginning under his enthusiastic and inspired leadership.

POTTSVILLE, PA.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 31 1933

READING CONCERT SEASON CLOSED WITH SYMPHONY

The greatest musical season Reading has ever had was brought to a brilliant close Monday evening under the efficient management of Geo I Haage, with the initial appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Mr. Haage has been untiringly spreading the gospel of music for 25 years, and, as a celebration of this anniversary, has given his patrons an almost unequaled array of talent, comprising as it did, Rosa Ponselle, who is generally acknowledged the greatest dramatic soprano in the world today; Fritz Kreisler, the mere mention of whose name tells the story of his place as perhaps one of the finest all around musicians in the world—some one has fittingly termed him "Dean of Violinists"; Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who perhaps is better known through Europe than in his own country; Vladimir Horowitz, an especially brilliant pianist, and the Boston Symphony with its personnel of 110 men and Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. One could never hope to hear such a marvelous combination of concerts again outside the large musical centers, but Reading is rapidly becoming known for its increasing interest and appreciation of the best in all the various branches of art. Mr. Haage's belief in music has been justified by the enthusiastic support given him by patrons who come from a radius of 40 miles to enjoy these evenings.

While Mr. Haage has been fortunate in the past to number the Cleveland Orchestra as an outstanding feature of his course, he is to be especially congratulated in obtaining the Boston Symphony for this season. The Cleveland Orchestra, under Sokoloff, will be remembered as having played here in Pottsville some years past with Robert Braun as soloist. This orchestra has always delighted its audiences, but the renewed life that has been creeping into the Boston organization in the last half dozen years is rapidly bringing it back to its original high standard, when it was the only real orchestra in the country. With Dr. Karl Muck as conductor no other orchestra could compare with it, and it had the proud distinction of weathering a gratifying comparison with the best organizations of its kind in Europe. However, after Dr. Muck was no longer associated with it, this wonderful reputation sustained interest for a time but gradually faded until the happy arrival of Koussevitzky, who has imparted new life into it and brought it back to its present enviable standing among the splendid orchestras of the country.

With the marvelous background of 110 tried and experienced musicians, and a well balanced program of three masters, plus a vibrant and insatiable artist to lead them in their beautiful pianissimo and stirring fortissimo passages, who could fail to designate this concert as the climax of all the musical activities ever held in Reading?

Koussevitzky was particularly happy in his choice of Bach, Brahms and Wagner on the same program. Starting with the sweet tones of the entire string section in the opening Bach numbers—Two Preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli, the first half ended with the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F. Major, op 90. The latter half of the program was given over to three numbers from the Wagner operas.

From the delicate trills and entrancing themes of the Forest Murmurs from Seigfried, through the exquisite and soulful strains of the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," to the thrilling close of the Overture to Tannheuser, the audience seemed to be held spell bound by the inspired rendition of these numbers.

READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 31 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY GRAND CLIMAX OF HAAGE SEASON

Reading Sponsor's Jubilee Year of Highest Grade Attractions Comes to Impressive Close—Over 2,000 Hear Concert at Rajah

There might have been a more fitting way to climax the silver anniversary of the George D. Haage concert series, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the fifth and final concert of the current series, brought to an auspicious close the 25th year of concert presentations in this city with one of the finest performances ever presented in Reading. It received a mighty welcome in return.

More than 2,000 persons, close to a capacity house, crowded the Rajah Theatre to hear the orchestra and its famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A group of 110 men, with an established reputation, came to Reading with a difficult role to fill. The Cleveland Orchestra had preceded them on several occasions and established an enviable record. The Cincinnati, the New York Philharmonic and other notable organizations had left their imprint in the minds of music lovers here.

Ovation for Conductor.

But from the very moment Koussevitzky lifted his baton after mounting the podium, commanding utter silence from players and audience alike, he wielded a perfect mastery that ended with deafening applause when he strode from the stage. Silence, inspired by awe and admiration held the audience throughout the concert, but it accorded the conductor a tremendous ovation when his night was over, and the last strains of the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner floated over the hall.

Five times the leader was called to take a bow, but each time he quietly smiled and deferred to his men. There were no encores and if any that was the only regret that could be uttered of the evening. The orchestra was finely trained and the players' performances was a credit to the traditions of the organization and leaders.

"Two Preludes" by Bach, arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli, introduced the accomplishments and possibilities of the orchestra. It displayed the absolute mastery that Koussevitzky wielded his magic baton. Graceful, commanding and dynamic, three personalities in one, as the mood required, was the tall, gray-haired leader as he moved from one eminent German composer to another and climaxed his performance with the ever-popular Wagner overture, "Tannhauser."

Bach to Brahms.

From the Bach preludes, the first fleeting and graceful, almost completely dominated by the first strings, and the second, dashing and vibrant, Koussevitzky moved to his major work of the evening — the Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Op. 90, by Brahms.

The first movement, allegro con brio, was light and airy as the orchestra introduced the theme of the composition. Next came the "andante, soft and prayer-like, ending with an organ-like effect that won instant favor with the audience. In the third poco allegretto, Koussevitzky literally carried along his men as he wove the intricate passages into delightful harmony. The fourth and final allegro movement brought back the theme of the symphony and ended with the strings and horns softly blending.

Three Wagner Numbers.

For the second part of his program, the leader devoted his attention to three of the better known works of Wagner. Calm and reserved he took his bow after the symphony and with his last bow, smiled quietly, obviously pleased with the reception accorded him. Even the players entered into the spirit of the occasion, for the performance in the second part, if possible, was better than the first.

The first was the descriptive "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," with the wind rustling through the trees, the woodland birds calling to one and another and then softly fading away as twilight covered the land. As the number was introduced it seemed almost impossible for a group of 100 or more to play so softly and still be heard throughout the spacious hall.

Dramatic Finish of Series.

The greatest applause was given the leader following his rendition of the "Prelude and Love-Death," from "Tristan und Isolde." His overture completed the program.

Perhaps greater ovations have been accorded concert artists in Reading in the past, but none was more spontaneous or enthusiastic than that accorded the Boston Symphony. Many warm admirers here were won by this group of musicians, and it put a dramatic touch to the close of the present series and 25 years of concert direction by Mr. Haage in Reading.

Today the orchestra left by the special train, over the Pennsylvania Railroad, for Washington, D. C., where it will appear in another concert of the tour. It will play in Baltimore, Brooklyn and end the tour in New York on Saturday, with a performance in Carnegie Hall.

READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 31 1933

Boston Symphony Leader Here for Concert Says Music Is Like Food to Some

To some people music is a necessity like food or clothing. Thus declared Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a concert at the Rajah Theatre last night.

"To those people who love music, a depression makes no difference," explained Director Koussevitsky, "The real lover of music will spend his last money to hear good music. The love for the arts shows how high the culture of a country is, and music is the greatest art."

Rectnly Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra appeared on the radio for the first time. He admitted that while the radio has some value in popularizing music, he would much rather direct a concert in a hall or auditorium for an audience than present it over the radio.

"To play over the radio is much more difficult than to play for an audience in a ball," he said. "The personal contact is lost. A radio audience after all is passive. Your hearers might be smoking, eating or reading a newspaper for all you know. Then, too, the audience does not have the benefit of that personal contact with the artists. After all, when you are playing over the radio, you are playing to a machine and not to people. That makes it difficult.

"I think the radio is very good, however, to make music popular. It is good for those people who cannot come to the city to attend concerts. It is good for the people who live far away from the city, like farmers, and they can get an idea what is good music. The trouble with the radio is that there is too much different music. It makes it difficult for those people who have never heard good music for then they will not know what is bad music."

Dr. Koussevitsky believes that the day of jazz, that wild syncopation with its barbaric beat, is passing.

"Jazz is finished," he declared, "it remains because it cannot go immediately. For eight years jazz was with us but the mood is changing. In 10 years jazz will have been forgotten."

Dr. Koussevitsky does not mean that dance music will pass, but rather that the style of dancing will change. Each generation has its style of dancing, he explained, and he likened it to an overcoat.

"One time long overcoats are in style," he added. "Next season short overcoats are the style. There are styles in dancing, too."

Director Koussevitsky with the 110 musicians in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Reading Monday a. m. at 8 o'clock in a special train of five Pullman coaches and a baggage car over the Pennsylvania. They came here directly from Boston. They remained in Reading over night at the Hotel Abraham Lincoln and left this morning at 9 o'clock for Washington, D C., where a concert will be played this afternoon. Other concerts will be presented at Baltimore and New York before the musicians return to Boston.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who was born in Russia 58 years ago, was decorated twice by the former Czar for his activities in music. He was the founder of the Koussevitsky Symphony Orchestra which made extensive tours of Russia before the advent of the Soviet. He also has directed orchestras throughout Europe, particularly in France, England, Germany, Itay and Spain. In 1920, Dr. Koussevitsky founded the Concerts Koussevitsky in Paris. Since 1924 he has been director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 31 1933

The Observ

BY CARL WALTON DECKELMAN.

It is rumored that Dr. Koussevitzky regards with a yawn of indifference the occasional excursions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the musical hinterland and that he considers Hartford to be located in the above mentioned region. This report brings to mind quite vividly the fact that some four or five seasons ago Dr. Koussevitzky sent his orchestra to Hartford for a Sunday afternoon concert in the Capitol Theater but neglected to come himself and in his absence the concert was conducted by the orchestra's concert-master, Richard Burgin. Nor if memory serves, was Dr. Koussevitzky's absence ever quite satisfactorily explained.

Although fully mindful of the fact that the Boston Symphony is intrinsically a superb instrument and has progressed mightily during the Koussevitzky administration, its most recent concert in the Bushnell Memorial seemed to many local observers, including the writer, to be a rather listless affair. If one were called upon to define precisely the missing element in this concert it would seem very much as though the conductor did not feel called upon to extend himself and, not being in the presence of a metropolitan audience, was satisfied to give merely a routine performance of the compositions listed. The subsequent appearance in the same hall of the Detroit Symphony, which, excellent orchestra though it is, is admittedly not the equal of the group from Boston, proved considerably more stimulating.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 31 1933

"Finlandia."

Like Tapiola which Dr. Koussevitzky presented in the first concert of the Bushness series, Finlandia is an expression of the brooding love of Sibelius for his native land.

"I told Mr. Sibelius one summer day in Helsingfors," writes Olin Downes, "that I longed for the opportunity which would probably be forever denied a desk slave, to see Finland in the winter time. But I said I knew something about winter in Finland. I said I believed there were long, still, dark nights, when only light was the aurora borealis flickering in the skies; and over lake and fen and forest came sounds, probably the cries of animals, possibly those of disembodied spirits haunting the dark; and sometimes snow fell endlessly and silently on a land shrouded in ice, and sometimes the tempest whirled down with savage and terrifying power, shrieking like the banshee, while peasants out in the wastes huddled about fires, or drinking in taverns, thought perhaps of the ancient tales of the pagan north before Christianity came upon the world in a land where elves and mermaids, as Havelock Ellis remarked of Norway, were regarded as 'tame domestic animals'."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BRILLIANTLY TO AUDIENCE HERE

Carrying on the grand tradition established in over 50 years of its musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a familiar program yesterday afternoon in Constitution Hall. It included Weber, Beethoven and Wagner. Sibelius, this year's popular contemporary, was the only outsider admitted to the sacred circle.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky wielded the baton with the utmost restraint, and pleaded eloquently for his effects with his left hand and a lowering head. A great intellectual, he worked out the Beethoven Seventh Symphony like a problem in higher mathematics, with almost too much precision. It was the music of Beethoven, the thinker, rather than the music of Beethoven, the man flayed by all human passions. The tones were incisive, the pauses abrupt, clean and clear, the whole performance held within sharp calculated outlines.

The strings sang with a velvet tone, the flutes with a piercing sweetness and the terrific tempo of the last movement crowded up to a brilliant crescendo that rattled the shields on the wall. It was a new Beethoven experience.

The second part of the program included Sibelius' "Tapiola," "Forest Murmurs" from Wagner's "Siegfried" and the Overture to Tannhauser.

"Tapiola" was composed in 1926 for the Symphony Society of New York at the request of Walter Damrosch. This was its first playing in Washington. It was a strange composition, not to be liked too well at first sight. The outpouring of a tortured soul in weird tonal combinations had its climax in a crashing crescendo of disharmonics that sent shudders through the hall.

After this the Wagner came as heavenly balm. Here again was the marvellous choir of violins and the stirring horns searching the old melodies for the new life, new hopes and new joy they always yield.

Hans Kindler was one of the most enthralled listeners. As he leaned over the box he probably dreamed of the day that Washington will have a 50-year-old orchestra and one that had its beginning under his enthusiastic and inspired leadership.

CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

FEB 1 - 1933

ASHTON STEVENS
DEPLORES COMPETITION OF SHOWS NOT ONLY GOOD, BUT FREE

By Ashton Stevens.

Staying away from the theater a couple of nights is as good a way as any of finding out what ails the theater. And then you don't know whether hard times makes us listen to the radio, or listening to the radio makes hard times.

Ashton Stevens.

But there's no doubt that the free shows which are brought to your fireside, or to your very bedside, are the most unmeetable competition faced by theatrical business.

"Why," you can hear the former patron of the drama argue, "should I pay even a cut price and risk rheumatism and flu to see this broadly acclaimed 'The Cat and the Fiddle' when I can sit here by the gas log and summon Rudy Valee to serve me not only his band and himself, but Leontovitch and Moffat Johnston in their wildest comedy scene from Broadway's new 'Twentieth Century'?"

Other former clients of the box office likewise wonder why they should leave their happy, mortgaged homes to pay for operetta in the great palace that Samuel Insull built, when without moving more than the dial on the receiving set they can listen to the distinguished singers of the Metropolitan Opera House or the accomplished bandsmen of the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony orchestras?

The admirers of the colored brother think not twice but thrice before they buy a cut-rate to the Darktown revue at the Garrick, knowing that punctually at 10 p. m. they will hear gratis those synthetic and matchless Afro-Americans whose real names are all but lost in the fame of Amos 'n' Andy.

Even Vaudeville.

Why, even the surviving vaudevillegoer hesitates to pay the paltry price of his loyalty when for nothing he can listen to half of the Four Marx Brothers, the entire Kate Smith, everything that remains of Morton Downey and all that is palatable of the medicinal "Chic" Sale.

What chance does an ordinary revue at any price stand against the shyly submitted wisecracks of Ben Bernie for nothing? Or again Eddie Cantor with or without Mr. Jessel? Or Graham McNamee assisted by the untameable Ed Wynn? Or the revival of the Germaniac rolling "r" by Jack Pearl?

And even if you had to drop a dime for him in the slot, Al Jolson still would be a menace to the stage any night he went on the air. And I have heard friendly listeners say that Harry Richman is no minor menace.

It's the Air!

To say nothing of Burns and Allen. Or Myrt and Marge, or the Mills Brothers, or the Sisters of the Skillet, or Jesse Crawford, the direful discoverer of the palsy stop.

I am confident that James Gleason and his Hollywood broadcasters keep thousands of people from patronizing the principal product of Hollywood.

And I am not so sure that night clubs and public ballrooms do not suffer with the theaters when brilliant bands go on the air under the batons of Weems, Whiteman, Lopez, King, Arnheim, McCoy and Calloway.

I read in a paper the other day that Herbert Hoover, instead of driving me and my kind out of business by writing a column, will help close the playhouses by doing a broadcast for General Motors.

You see, it's in the air that radio is killing the theater. Even if you can turn it off when you don't like Bing Crosby.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 1 - 1933

Mrs. Hoover Attends Boston Symphony Concert

MRS. HOOVER ATTENDED the concert of the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in Constitution Hall, when she had as her guests Mrs. Pierce Butler, wife of Mr. Justice Butler; Mrs. Edward Dunn, of Baltimore, the former Miss Anne Butler; Mrs. Joel T. Boone and Miss Doris Goss.

Mrs. Hoover will be the guest in whose honor a breakfast will be given by the Congressional Club on February 21 at the Shoreham.

The Ambassador of Japan and Mme. Debuchi, who are in New York, accompanied by the attache of the embassy, Mr. Jun Tsuchiya, were the guests of honor at a reception given yesterday by the Japanese Consul General in New York, Mr. Kensuke Horinouchi, at the Hotel Pierre. Preceding this the ambassador had been the guest of honor at a luncheon given at the Lawyers Club by the consul general.

Today the ambassador will again be the guest of honor at a luncheon that the consul general will give at the Lawyers Club, when a notable group will be asked to meet him, and Mme. Debuchi will be the guest at a luncheon given by Mme. Horinouchi at her home in Park avenue.

Tomorrow the ambassador will make an address at the luncheon meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, after which he and Mme. Debuchi will return to Washington.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

7

FEB 1 - 1933

Music and Musicians

Reviews and News of Capital's Programs.

Boston Orchestra Plays Superb Program.

ONE of the largest audiences of the season welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday on its only visit to Washington this season. That this hearing will not be repeated is to be regretted since two hours of superb playing the like of which has not been achieved by any visiting orchestra this year was given.

Serge Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky has discovered the art of giving the public the essence of music and to reduce to an infinitesimal degree the consciousness of the means used. It is music in which noble thought and sentiment dominate and Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting yesterday held this so clearly in view that at no moment was one distracted from following the unfolding story.

The harmony of sound was as near perfect as one is likely to hear, yet it was more than that. It was the soul of music with all its varied sentiment made clear. It is by means of the extreme clarity which Mr. Koussevitzky attains that the artistry of his conceptions are made evident. There is no blurring or inattention or overemphasis to mar the translucent beauty of his interpretations. He has sufficient amplitude of style in his conducting to give spaciousness to the quantity of detail so that the rounding out of the whole is done with splendor and authority.

Primarily, the orchestra units are perfectly matched. The violins, the horns and the basses seem to have the same texture of tone and to respond to all demands with extraordinary flexibility. With this extreme fineness and uniformity of quality and perfect control, the nuances are achieved with satisfying simplicity and the volume of sound never exaggerated.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a brilliant performance of the Beethoven Symphony in A major, in which poetry and grace marked the melodies and power and richness the animated rhythms. The famous allegro was majestically played with infinite care and a deliberateness that took time to make the beauty of each phrase apparent. This same lack of haste continued through the presto movement so that in spite of its lively nature the lovely melody was well defined, and the allegro con brio followed into a climax of magnificent beauty.

Sibelius' tone poem, "Tapiola," is an unusual composition in which the horns and woodwinds are given prominence and the strings are used as background. This peculiar arrangement gives an elemental atmosphere to the composition which is further accentuated by the broken variations of the theme. The orchestra played with reckless abandon and worked to a crashing finish in which the entire volume of the different instruments united in terrific force of sound.

Immediately following this Mr. Koussevitzky subdued the orchestra to the minute pianissimo of the "Forest Murmurs," from Siegfried, and attained a smallness of sound in exact imitation of the tiny voices of growing things with here and there the relief of a bird call. How well Mr. Koussevitzky understands the musical quality of Wagner's music was illustrated in the magnificently controlled rendering of the "Tannhauser" overture, in which all ponderousness was avoided, and which brought to a superb ending a concert of truly subline music.

The audience broke forth into wildest enthusiasm and applauded for many minutes after the finish of the program and seemed loath to leave even after the many acknowledgments Mr. Koussevitzky came out to make.

A. E.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACCORDED OVATION

Demonstrates Great Musical Capacities Under Direction of Koussevitzky.

The Seventh Symphony in A Major, by Beethoven, was the beautiful medium yesterday through which the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert at Constitution Hall demonstrated its great musical capacities under the dynamic baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Seldom has this noble symphony been as well played as it was yesterday by the Boston musicians. This orchestra, so adequately balanced in ensemble tone, so individual in its solo voices, shows the undeniable benefit of being under the direction of a single conductor season in and season out. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score was truly inspired, and at the conclusion of its final movement the audience applauded so spontaneously and so vigorously that the conductor was compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again.

The audience was enthralled by the romantic beauty of the symphony in its vivid moods, vivacious rhythms, exquisite thematic material, rich, velvety harmonies and dazzling modulations. This was apparent, at once, in the first movement, "the poco sostenuto" with its sudden flashes of fortissimo chords, succeeded by pianissimo passages and brilliant modulations to which the orchestra gave adequate attention.

The program was opened by an admirable presentation of that familiar classic, "Overture to Oberon," by Weber.

Other high points on the program were Sibelius' "Tapiola," tone poem, and two masterly played Wagnerian compositions, "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

The concert was given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's concert bureau.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 1 - 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY IS ACCORDED OVATION

By RONALD THORNE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, much to our regret, ordinarily visits Washington but once a season, but this serves to make those rare occasions all the more notable. Yesterday the orchestra appeared at Constitution Hall under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky in a program sufficiently varied to find a response in almost any musical taste of discrimination, and the enthusiasm with which Koussevitzky and his brilliant organization were received was a tribute to the conductor's canny selection of offerings, as well as to the interpretation accorded them.

Incidentally the concert was the first given under the local management of Mrs. Dorothy Dorsey, who has now assumed charge of the Wilson-Greene concert bureau for the remainder of the season.

The "Oberon" overture by Weber, a pleasing orchestral number, was first on the afternoon's program, and admirably presented. Next came the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, in A major, last played here by the Boston Symphony at the time of the Beethoven festival a few years ago. This work is particularly distinguished for the two closing movements, which were given every possible aid to effectiveness that the resources of a great orchestra, and the genuis of a great conductor, could bring to their rendition.

The Sibelius tone-poem "Tapiola," based upon the legends of the Finnish counterpart of the great god Pan, is relatively unfamiliar to Washington audiences; in fact, the writer does not recall that it has ever received a presentation in this city. It was composed at the request of Walter Damrosch only about six years ago. Its most notable feature is its vigorous climax, but it has little in common with the more familiar works of Sibelius that form a part of the typical orchestral program.

Two Wagnerian selections, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the "Tannhauser" overture, given with full Wagnerian intensity, completed a most enjoyable concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

FEB 1 1933

Is Invited to Play With Hub Symphony Orchestra

Miss Gladys F. Heathcock, 19-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney T. Heathcock of this city and a graduate of the N. E. Conservatory of Music, has been invited to be pianoforte soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra on Feb. 23. The invitation has been extended Miss Heathcock by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra. The Lowell girl will appear with the orchestra at its concert in Cambridge and will play the Liszt Concerto in E flat.

Miss Heathcock won the 23rd annual competition at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston on last April 27 when she was awarded a grand pianoforte. The judges in the contest were Mr. Koussevitzky, Lee Pattison and Richard Aldrich. A few weeks later Miss Heathcock graduated from the Conservatory with honors and had a place on the commencement concert program, playing two movements from the Beethoven concerto in C minor. This year she is studying at the Conservatory as a candidate for graduation as pianoforte soloist in 1933 and for the bachelor of music degree in 1934.

MISS GLADYS F. HEATHCOCK.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 2 - 1933

Boston Symphony Directed Here By Koussevitsky

It was an audience of unrestrained enthusiasm that greeted Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening for what has come to be their sole annual appearance—more's the pity—in this city by the Patapsco.

Perhaps the two outstanding qualities of the program's interpretation were the tempo and the phrasing. Concerning the former, Dr. Koussevitsky was relentless, conceding no iota to any technical obstacles, yet exacting a meticulous nicety of shading, as well as punctuation.

Perhaps the peak of the evening was reached with that apotheosis of the human and the spiritual, Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," regaling our ears for the third time this season, yet ever susceptible of yielding fresh veins of precious musical metal.

These pages of thrilling drama were sustained throughout their ascending challenge, against death, against chaos and void; then the chant begins to rise and light and color grow ever more intense till the blinding climax, as cherubim and seraphim seem verily giving voice, to the accompanying sound of the harp.

The symphony of the evening was the seventh of Beethoven, neither so beloved nor so majestic, perhaps, as the third and fifth of the master, but quite as lovely in its more Mozartian way, when the wood winds sing the theme against the staccato of the strings, modulating with extremest delicacy through the refinements of the vivace.

Then the somber opening of the allegretto echoed remotely before the violins speak the theme; it is repeated and answered, and footsteps seem to die away in distance.

Even in the presto and the allegro con brio Dr. Koussevitsky conducted with a distinguished restraint, holding much in reserve and making judicious use of accent.

The program opened with the lovely and gallant music of the overture to Weber's "Oberon," a thing of appropriately gossamer charm, whose familiar melodies caressed the ear in fairy magic.

And for finale the surpassing glories of the Tannhauser overture, wherein it must be admitted the orchestra failed a trifle in intonation in the opening strains of the pilgrims' chorus, though that "temporary aberration" could well be forgotten in the rosy ecstasy of the Venusberg music.

It is ever a regret that our New England cousins visit us so rarely.

H. A. F. P.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 6 - 1933

National Opera

For several seasons the Metropolitan Opera company of New York has been in sore straits, and the economies made this year, including large salary cuts, have failed to bring down the deficit to manageable dimensions. A few days ago it was made known that the future of the enterprise even for next year was in doubt. It will not be abandoned, however, without exploring every possibility, and thought is now being given to the suggestion that the company be reorganized on a national scale, with its season divided between New York and other cities.

In normal times New York, the richest city in the world, ought to be able to support an opera house of its own. It is not a paying enterprise, to be sure, but its normal deficit is not more than wealthy patrons of the arts can easily take care of. Maj Higginson, who for many years sustained the Boston Symphony orchestra, used to say that the cost was about that of a steam yacht and that he preferred the orchestra to a steam yacht. New York is not lacking in rich men with a similar perspective, but their resources are now limited and even the support of New York's great orchestra is a problem.

Opera presents an even more serious problem, because of its manifold and prodigious expenses. The operatic tradition is one of luxury, and in no activity does economy come harder. New York is proud of having the costliest and most magnificent opera in the world, with famous stars drawn from all countries. The New York public, and the American public in general, would have difficulty in adjusting itself to cheap and shabby productions such as even the minor cities of Germany have been able to finance. Something can be saved by deflating the excessive fees of leading singers, and it is believed that the days of $2000 or more for each appearance have passed and will not soon return. The golden age of opera was probably the age of Caruso.

But what can be saved by lower salaries for the principal singers is but a drop in the bucket. But the running costs and the overhead are so prodigious that what would seem like prosperity in an ordinary undertaking spells disaster. With so large a theater it ought not to be a terrible thing to have 200 seats for sale on Monday nights, for which the subscription is largest, and 450 on Thursday nights, when it is lightest. But the opera is conducted on a scale which makes no allowance for empty seats, and the slightest shrinkage due to hard times puts the enterprise on the rocks.

Whether a scheme for sharing the season with other cities could be made to work is a difficult question with several unknown or uncertain elements. In general large musical organizations in recent years have tended to shun out-of-town engagements because of the high cost of travel. Yet the Metropolitan company has made a few exceptions, including Hartford, which had a performance last year and will have another Tuesday evening of this week. Atlanta until recently has been able to support handsomely a series of performances. It is possible that by careful planning the number of short engagements in cities that have no opera might be somewhat increased, lightening by so much the load that New York has to carry. More hopeful, however, is the possibility of cooperation with Chicago, where opera giving has had to stop because of financial difficulties.

There is talk too of collaboration with San Francisco, which has an opera house—in this case the opera and chorus would be local so that the cost of transporation would be small. If such a provisional system could be worked out it would be a sensible solution of the problem of keeping a great undertaking intact through trying times. It is, at any rate, more hopeful than the wild proposal to reduce the company to a small concern giving only American operas. "The Emperor Jones" is hardly a repertory.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 1 - 1933

Mrs. Hoover Takes Box for Concert

Mrs. Hoover occupied a box for the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~concert~~ yesterday. With her were Mrs. Pierce Butler and her daughter, Mrs. Edward K. Dunn of Baltimore, Mrs. Joel T. Boone and Miss Doris Goss.

* * *

HAVERHILL, MASS.
EVE. GAZETTE

FEB 1 - 1933

MUSIC MISCELLANY

"THE NATIVE CONDUCTOR"

Within a radius of 50 miles of Boston, music lovers invariably refer to the Boston Symphony orchestra as "our Boston ~~Symphony orchestra~~" and similarly allude to Dr. Koussevitsky." as "our own conductor Koussevitsky." Olin Downes in the New York Times has written under the caption above from which the following paragraphs are of interest:

"We have with the eastern orchestras in America today four conductors of the highest rank, Messrs. Toscanini and Walter of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Dr. Koussevitsky in Boston. Of these four men Dr. Koussevitsky is the only one who now finds it possible to serve his public throughout the musical season. The Boston orchestra has one conductor, whose appearances are interspersed occasionally with short visits of guest leaders or the conducting of the concert master. That the orchestra benefits by this arrangement is obvious. No other American orchestra has today such fineness of tone and consistency of style. With the other orchestras, for various reasons, first conductors find it impossible to work straight through the season. This is not good for the orchestras or the audiences.

"Nearly every conductor of repute in Europe has been here. Some of them have succeeded. Others have failed. An American success rewards them handsomely and adds materially to their reputation. A failure in America, although European musicians regret very much to admit it, and seldom do admit it, is decidedly disadvantageous to an artist's reputation.

"If a native son who is also a great conductor is discovered he will command almost any rewards within reason. He may have a hard time, this native son, at the beginning. His program may be delayed if his name is Jones. But he can live that down, and ultimately become, as Jones, the pride of the nation. It is not that the American people wish forever to go to Europe for their musicians. They would be only too glad to develop a great conductor from within the nation. But they still distrust the quality of American training for a musician's career, and a background only American, and American standards of criticism, when local pride is involved. There are existing conditions which make it difficult in America to develop conductors.

"The American conductor must grow up, but the great orchestras are not going to give him the facilities to do so and there are virtually no opera houses in which he can gain his routine. This is the more unfortunate, because it has proved in most cases that there is nothing so valuable for the orchestral conductor as experience in the opera house. There the conductor learns sureness, command and flexibility of style. Most of the great conductors, have thus graduated into the symphonic field.

"The native conductor has really only two opportunities for experiment and growth, not provided by either opera house or concert hall. They come in the form of a certain few moving picture theaters and with the orchestras of the radio stations. In these places the conductors get a good deal of routine, and interpret, week in and week out, a great deal of music. They have gained in this way practical experience of the baton, and the ones who are serious, listen whenever they can, by means of a transmitter or by personal attendance at the concerts, to the great masters of their art. Let us hope that in this way a future American conductor is laying the cornerstone of his career. It is certainly a possibility."

E. B. F.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 1 1933

MUSIC MISCELLANY

"THE NATIVE CONDUCTOR"

Within a radius of 50 miles of Boston, music lovers invariably refer to the Boston Symphony orchestra as "our Boston Symphony orchestra" and similarly allude to Dr. Koussevitsky." as "our own conductor Koussevitsky." Olin Downes in the New York Times has written under the caption above from which the following paragraphs are of interest:

"We have with the eastern orchestras in America today four conductors of the highest rank, Messrs. Toscanini and Walter of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Dr. Koussevitsky in Boston. Of these four men Dr. Koussevitsky is the only one who now finds it possible to serve his public throughout the musical season. The Boston orchestra has one conductor, whose appearances are interspersed occasionally with short visits of guest leaders or the conducting of the concert master. That the orchestra benefits by this arrangement is obvious. No other American orchestra has today such fineness of tone and consistency of style. With the other orchestras, for various reasons, first conductors find it impossible to work straight through the season. This is not good for the orchestras or the audiences.

"Nearly every conductor of repute in Europe has been here. Some of them have succeeded. Others have failed. An American success rewards them handsomely and adds materially to their reputation. A failure in America, although European musicians regret very much to admit it, and seldom do admit it, is decidedly disadvantageous to an artist's reputation.

"If a native son who is also a great conductor is discovered he will command almost any rewards within reason. He may have a hard time, this native son, at the beginning. His program may be delayed if his name is Jones. But he can live that down, and ultimately become, as Jones, the pride of the nation. It is not that the American people wish forever to go to Europe for their musicians. They would be only too glad to develop a great conductor from within the nation. But they still distrust the quality of American training for a musician's career, and a background only American, and American standards of criticism, when local pride is involved. There are existing conditions which make it difficult in America to develop conductors.

"The American conductor must grow up, but the great orchestras are not going to give him the facilities to do so and there are virtually no opera houses in which he can gain his routine. This is the more unfortunate, because it has proved in most cases that there is nothing so valuable for the orchestral conductor as experience in the opera house. There the conductor learns sureness, command and flexibility of style. Most of the great conductors, have thus graduated into the symphonic field.

"The native conductor has really only two opportunities for experiment and growth, not provided by either opera house or concert hall. They come in the form of a certain few moving picture theaters and with the orchestras of the radio stations. In these places the conductors get a good deal of routine, and interpret, week in and week out, a great deal of music. They have gained in this way practical experience of the baton, and the ones who are serious, listen whenever they can, by means of a transmitter or by personal attendance at the concerts, to the great masters of their art. Let us hope that in this way a future American conductor is laying the cornerstone of his career. It is certainly a possibility."

E. B. F.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

EB 1 - 1933

Conductor

When Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at Lyric tonight Serge Koussevitzky (above) will act as conductor.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

FEB 2 - 1933

Boston Symphony Directed Here By Koussevitsky

It was an audience of unrestrained enthusiasm that greeted Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening for what has come to be their sole annual appearance—more's the pity—in this city by the Patapsco.

Perhaps the two outstanding qualities of the program's interpretation were the tempo and the phrasing. Concerning the former, Dr. Koussevitsky was relentless, conceding no iota to any technical obstacles, yet exacting a meticulous nicety of shading, as well as punctuation.

Perhaps the peak of the evening was reached with that apotheosis of the human and the spiritual, Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," regaling our ears for the third time this season, yet ever susceptible of yielding fresh veins of precious musical metal.

These pages of thrilling drama were sustained throughout their ascending challenge, against death, against chaos and void; then the chant begins to rise and light and color grow ever more intense till the blinding climax, as cherubim and seraphim seem verily giving voice, to the accompanying sound of the harp.

The symphony of the evening was the seventh of Beethoven, neither so beloved nor so majestic, perhaps, as the third and fifth of the master, but quite as lovely in its more Mozartian way, when the wood winds sing the theme against the staccato of the strings, modulating with extremest delicacy through the refinements of the vivace.

Then the somber opening of the allegretto echoed remotely before the violins speak the theme; it is repeated and answered, and footsteps seem to die away in distance.

Even in the presto and the allegro con brio Dr. Koussevitsky conducted with a distinguished restraint, holding much in reserve and making judicious use of accent.

The program opened with the lovely and gallant music of the overture to Weber's "Oberon," a thing of appropriately gossamer charm, whose familiar melodies caressed the ear in fairy magic.

And for finale the surpassing glories of the Tannhauser overture, wherein it must be admitted the orchestra failed a trifle in intonation in the opening strains of the pilgrims' chorus, though that "temporary aberration" could well be forgotten in the rosy ecstasy of the Venusberg music.

It is ever a regret that our New England cousins visit us so rarely. H. A. F. P.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 6 - 1933

National Opera

For several seasons the Metropolitan Opera company of New York has been in sore straits, and the economies made this year, including large salary cuts, have failed to bring down the deficit to manageable dimensions. A few days ago it was made known that the future of the enterprise even for next year was in doubt. It will not be abandoned, however, without exploring every possibility, and thought is now being given to the suggestion that the company be reorganized on a national scale, with its season divided between New York and other cities.

In normal times New York, the richest city in the world, ought to be able to support an opera house of its own. It is not a paying enterprise, to be sure, but its normal deficit is not more than wealthy patrons of the arts can easily take care of. Maj Higginson, who for many years sustained the Boston Symphony orchestra, used to say that the cost was about that of a steam yacht and that he preferred the orchestra to a steam yacht. New York is not lacking in rich men with a similar perspective, but their resources are now limited and even the support of New York's great orchestra is a problem.

Opera presents an even more serious problem, because of its manifold and prodigious expenses. The operatic tradition is one of luxury, and in no activity does economy come harder. New York is proud of having the costliest and most magnificent opera in the world, with famous stars drawn from all countries. The New York public, and the American public in general, would have difficulty in adjusting itself to cheap and shabby productions such as even the minor cities of Germany have been able to finance. Something can be saved by deflating the excessive fees of leading singers, and it is believed that the days of $2000 or more for each appearance have passed and will not soon return. The golden age of opera was probably the age of Caruso.

But what can be saved by lower salaries for the principal singers is but a drop in the bucket. But the running costs and the overhead are so prodigious that what would seem like prosperity in an ordinary undertaking spells disaster. With so large a theater it ought not to be a terrible thing to have 200 seats for sale on Monday nights, for which the subscription is largest, and 450 on Thursday nights, when it is lightest. But the opera is conducted on a scale which makes no allowance for empty seats, and the slightest shrinkage due to hard times puts the enterprise on the rocks.

Whether a scheme for sharing the season with other cities could be made to work is a difficult question with several unknown or uncertain elements. In general large musical organizations in recent years have tended to shun out-of-town engagements because of the high cost of travel. Yet the Metropolitan company has made a few exceptions, including Hartford, which had a performance last year and will have another Tuesday evening of this week. Atlanta until recently has been able to support handsomely a series of performances. It is possible that by careful planning the number of short engagements in cities that have no opera might be somewhat increased, lightening by so much the load that New York has to carry. More hopeful, however, is the possibility of cooperation with Chicago, where opera giving has had to stop because of financial difficulties.

There is talk too of collaboration with San Francisco, which has an opera house—in this case the opera and chorus would be local so that the cost of transporation would be small. If such a provisional system could be worked out it would be a sensible solution of the problem of keeping a great undertaking intact through trying times. It is, at any rate, more hopeful than the wild proposal to reduce the company to a small concern giving only American operas. "The Emperor Jones" is hardly a repertory.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 1 - 1933

Mrs. Hoover Takes Box for Concert

Mrs. Hoover occupied a box for the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~concert~~ yesterday. With her were Mrs. Pierce Butler and her daughter, Mrs. Edward K. Dunn of Baltimore, Mrs. Joel T. Boone and Miss Doris Goss.

* * *

HAVERHILL, MASS.
EVE. GAZETTE

FEB 1 - 1933

MUSIC MISCELLANY

"THE NATIVE CONDUCTOR"

Within a radius of 50 miles of Boston, music lovers invariably refer to the Boston Symphony orchestra as "our Boston ~~Symphony orchestra~~" and similarly allude to Dr. Koussevitsky." as "our own conductor Koussevitsky." Olin Downes in the New York Times has written under the caption above from which the following paragraphs are of interest:

"We have with the eastern orchestras in America today four conductors cf the highest rank, Messrs. Toscanini and Walter of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Dr. Koussevitsky in Boston. Of these four men Dr. Koussevitsky is the only one who now finds it possible to serve his public throughout the musical season. The Boston orchestra has one conductor, whose appearances are interspersed occasionally with short visits of guest leaders or the conducting of the concert master. That the orchestra benefits by this arrangement is obvious. No other American orchestra has today such fineness of tone and consistency of style. With the other orchestras, for various reasons, first conductors find it impossible to work straight through the season. This is not good for the orchestras or the audiences.

"Nearly every conductor of repute in Europe has been here. Some of them have succeeded. Others have failed. An American success rewards them handsomely and adds materially to their reputation. A failure in America, although European musicians regret very much to admit it, and seldom do admit it, is decidedly disadvantageous to an artist's reputation.

"If a native son who is also a great conductor is discovered he will command almost any rewards within reason. He may have a hard time, this native son, at the beginning. His program may be delayed if his name is Jones. But he can live that down, and ultimately become, as Jones, the pride of the nation. It is not that the American people wish forever to go to Europe for their musicians. They would be only too glad to develop a great conductor from within the nation. But they still distrust the quality of American training for a musician's career, and a background only American, and American standards of criticism, when local pride is involved. There are existing conditions which make it difficult in America to develop conductors.

"The American conductor must grow up, but the great orchestras are not going to give him the facilities to do so and there are virtually no opera houses in which he can gain his routine. This is the more unfortunate, because it has proved in most cases that there is nothing so valuable for the orchestral conductor as experience in the opera house. There the conductor learns sureness, command and flexibility of style. Most of the great conductors, have thus graduated into the symphonic field.

"The native conductor has really only two opportunities for experiment and growth, not provided by either opera house or concert hall. They come in the form of a certain few moving picture theaters and with the orchestras of the radio stations. In these places the conductors get a good deal of routine, and interpret, week in and week out, a great deal of music. They have gained in this way practical experience of the baton, and the ones who are serious, listen whenever they can, by means of a transmitter or by personal attendance at the concerts, to the great masters of their art. Let us hope that in this way a future American conductor is laying the cornerstone of his career. It is certainly a possibility." E. B. F.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 1 - 1933

MUSIC MISCELLANY

"THE NATIVE CONDUCTOR"

Within a radius of 50 miles of Boston, music lovers invariably refer to the Boston Symphony orchestra as "our Boston Symphony orchestra" and similarly allude to Dr. Koussevitsky." as "our own conductor Koussevitsky." Olin Downes in the New York Times has written under the caption above from which the following paragraphs are of interest:

"We have with the eastern orchestras in America today four conductors cf the highest rank, Messrs. Toscanini and Walter of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Dr. Koussevitsky in Boston. Of these four men Dr. Koussevitsky is the only one who now finds it possible to serve his public throughout the musical season. The Boston orchestra has one conductor, whose appearances are interspersed occasionally with short visits of guest leaders or the conducting of the concert master. That the orchestra benefits by this arrangement is obvious. No other American orchestra has today such fineness of tone and consistency of style. With the other orchestras, for various reasons, first conductors find it impossible to work straight through the season. This is not good for the orchestras or the audiences.

"Nearly every conductor of repute in Europe has been here. Some of them have succeeded. Others have failed. An American success rewards them handsomely and adds materially to their reputation. A failure in America, although European musicians regret very much to admit it, and seldom do admit it, is decidedly disadvantageous to an artist's reputation.

"If a native son who is also a great conductor is discovered he will command almost any rewards within reason. He may have a hard time, this native son, at the beginning. His program may be delayed if his name is Jones. But he can live that down, and ultimately become, as Jones, the pride of the nation. It is not that the American people wish forever to go to Europe for their musicians. They would be only too glad to develop a great conductor from within the nation. But they still distrust the quality of American training for a musician's career, and a background only American, and American standards of criticism, when local pride is involved. There are existing conditions which make it difficult in America to develop conductors.

"The American conductor must grow up, but the great orchestras are not going to give him the facilities to do so and there are virtually no opera houses in which he can gain his routine. This is the more unfortunate, because it has proved in most cases that there is nothing so valuable for the orchestral conductor as experience in the opera house. There the conductor learns sureness, command and flexibility of style. Most of the great conductors, have thus graduated into the symphonic field.

"The native conductor has really only two opportunities for experiment and growth, not provided by either opera house or concert hall. They come in the form of a certain few moving picture theaters and with the orchestras of the radio stations. In these places the conductors get a good deal of routine, and interpret, week in and week out, a great deal of music. They have gained in this way practical experience of the baton, and the ones who are serious, listen whenever they can, by means of a transmitter or by personal attendance at the concerts, to the great masters of their art. Let us hope that in this way a future American conductor is laying the cornerstone of his career. It is certainly a possibility." E. B. F.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

EB 1 - 1933

Conductor

When Boston Symphony Orchestra appears at Lyric tonight Serge Koussevitzky (above) will act as conductor.

PROGRAM M

Times NY

To the Music Editor:

A letter "On Making Programs" in the Sunday TIMES prompts me to add another voice asking for more original planning in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts which we hear over the radio Sunday afternoons.

I have long noticed that the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras almost always have far more interesting and generally worth-while programs than our New York orchestras.

Now that we have on the radio the incomparable Boston Symphony practically every Saturday night, things look a lot brighter; but why should we have had to wait years with hardly any Sibelius or Vaughan Williams (to name only two significant omissions from most of the Philharmonic seasons since 1924)? Why not an occasional Holst, such as "The Planets"? Why not a Sibelius cycle instead of yet another Beethoven cycle, as is now announced for five Sunday afternoons. Strauss's "Zarathustra" or "Domestic Symphony" could with profit, not to say variety, be sometimes played in place of another and yet another "Till" or "Don Juan." What a treat it was to hear Debussy's "Iberia" yesterday instead of the usual "Oberon" overture or Franck symphony!

How long shall we have to wait, I wonder, to hear "Le Sacre du Printemps," "Brigg Fair," Sibelius's Second and following symphonies; Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony, d'Indy's symphony, any Elgar save the "Enigma Variations," a little (if that is possible) Mahler, a "Poem of Ecstasy," "El Amor Brujo," a Bax symphony, played by our own orchestra?

I have only touched the surface here of the possibilities awaiting the attention of the Philharmonic, possibilities which have long been translated into facts, into lovely and stirring music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With all these complaints go my deep appreciation of the good things we do get, from time to time, in the way of original program planning, from the Philharmonic.

I do not want this to be interpreted as wishing to do away with Beethoven, Brahms and the familiar classics. They are our bread and butter. We need them. But not, in this writer's opinion, so many times every season, to the exclusion of important, and indeed great, modern music that Boston, London and Paris are familiar with.

JOHN C. W. BIRD.

Bloomfield, N. J., Feb. 6, 1933.

THE SIBELIUS SYMPHONIES.

To the Music Editor:

The recent performance of the powerful Fifth symphony of Sibelius by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves one speculating again about a curious mystery. Here is an engrossing score, certainly one of the most important composed in the past quarter century. Yet our Philharmonic Orchestra has played it but once. That performance occurred nearly twelve years ago, in 1921.

The only other performance in New York that the writer knows of was by Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1925. At that time the impression created was so favorable that Stokowski repeated the work later the same season. Since then we have waited in vain for a repetition by the Philharmonic.

This is by no means the only Sibelius symphony which our orchestra has unreasonably neglected. Since the 1921 performance it has played only two of these fine works: Mr. Toscanini has given a performance of the Fourth, and Mr. Stokowski (as guest conductor) played the First. That is all. There are at least four Sibelius symphonies that have never been played by the Philharmonic!

Mr. Toscanini is the regular conductor of the orchestra. If he is not responsible for its répertoire, who is? In his past seven seasons (during which he has found room for but one Sibelius symphony) he has played great quantities of music from men like Respighi, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, de Sabata, Pizzetti, Wetzler, Kodály and Tommasini. He has even revived long-cold corpses by Saint-Saëns, Raff, Martucci, Busoni, Rossini. One searches in vain for either logic or artistic insight to justify such program making.

There is no doubt that something ought to be done soon to raise the Philharmonic répertoire from its present wretched state. But considerable doubt exists that this will ever be done by Mr. Toscanini.

RICHARD LEONARD.

New York, Feb. 7, 1933.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

EB 2 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC

Orchestra, Under Direction Of Serge Koussevitzky, Gives Only Baltimore Concert, Which Opened With Weber's "Overture To Oberon"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the Lyric Theater last night in a concert which made a large audience regret that it was the only visit of the organization to Baltimore this season. It was a rich and wholly delightful feast, ranking with the best orchestral performances of the winter.

Perhaps the most complimentary thing that can be said about the orchestra and the direction of Serge Koussevitzky is that they furnished very little for the reporter to write about. For it was a smooth, dignified performance by musicians who respected intentions of the composer and knew how to get the most out of the four compositions played. It was an orchestra always under the control of a director who knew his business and went about it without display or mannerism.

—o—

Such a concert offers little in the way of news, but a very great deal in the way of enjoyment. It offers no food for heated discussion, but rather sends each auditor home in a warm and expansive mood of deep contentment.

Weber's "Overture to Oberon" established the right mood for the reception of the greater works to come. It was followed by Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92," a work received the more gratefully because it is heard none too often hereabouts.

Choosing the best among four movements, each of which was rendered with great and sustained skill, one might name the Allegretto. Certainly the second movement marked one of the finest orchestral achievements recorded here this season—and of all the beautiful things presented last night, it produced possibly the most profound pleasure for a majority of the audience.

—o—

Even so there may be those who will quarrel with this estimate, giving precedence to the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with which the second half of the program opened. It is difficult to imagine this moving piece being better played. In it the orchestra, superbly controlled by Mr. Koussevitsky, ran the whole scale from the extreme tenderness of the introduction to the magnificent crescendo of the final "Transfiguration" theme.

The "Overture to Tannhauser" was yet to come, and again the bigger and bolder adjectives must be called upon, if it is to be described properly. But for once the always risky use of superlatives may be forgiven, at least by those who heard the concert, for it is more than likely that most of those in the audience left the theater thinking also in terms of the highest praise.

D. K.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

FEB 3 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony in Brooklyn; a Matinee 'Die Walkuere'; Gieseking With the Philharmonic

In many respects it was unquestionably a fine performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony that Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening, yet the listener—one listener, at any rate—was conscious at the end of a definite dissatisfaction with what he had heard. This did not arise from any disagreement with Mr. Koussewitsky on points of interpretation, from any feeling that the conductor was expounding a too personal conception of the work, or that, on the other hand, he was indifferent to it. Nor was it traceable to any failure on the part of the orchestra to carry out Mr. Koussewitsky's wishes faithfully and well. On the contrary, describing in one word the impression it created, I should call it an overdisciplined performance. Obviously infinite pains had been expended on its preparation both by the conductor and his men, every nuance of tempo and phrasing and expression worked over with inexhaustible patience. The result was perfection, but of a lifeless and rather repellent sort. A certain effect of spontaneity is desirable in any performance of any work; from this one, it was entirely lacking. Exhuberant, even exultant it undoubtedly was—but too plainly by calculation, with an eye on the effect to be produced.

However, it is seldom that we have cause to complain of perfection, and the criticism that I have made of last evening's performance of the Seventh Symphony may in this sense be interpreted as a compliment to Mr. Koussewitsky and the splendid band of which he is the leader. Their intentions were the best; they were only a little overzealous in carrying them into effect.

Mr. Koussewitsky's program for this, the third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brooklyn concerts, included, in addition to the Beethoven symphony, Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere," the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. These Mr. Koussewitsky performed in anticipation of the approaching 50th anniversary of Wagner's death,

---

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1933

Concert Tuesday

An appreciative audience assembled in Constitution Hall Tuesday afternoon for the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Mrs. Herbert Hoover had a group of friends with her in the Presidential box which included Mrs. Pierce Butler, wife of the Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and her daughter, Mrs. Edward K. Dunn; Mrs. Joel T. Boone, and Miss Doris Goss.

The conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Hans Kindler occupied a box with a party of friends, and they were most enthusiastic in their applause. Mrs. Kindler wore an afternoon gown of terra-cotta silk crepe, which had a wide gold metal belt; and her black felt hat, which was devoid of trimming, had a narrow brim.

Among other box holders were Mrs. Frederic A. Keep, Mrs. Sol Bloom, Mrs. Maude L. Whitman, Mrs. Ellis Byrnes, Miss Alice Clapp, and Miss Mabel T. Boardman.

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 3 - 1933

Boston Symphony Gives Third Brooklyn Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the third of its local series of concerts at the Academy of Music last evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and a Citizens' Committee headed by Adrian Van Sinderen.

The program included the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and selections from the operas of Wagner.

Vice-chairmen of the Citizens' Committee are: Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. E. Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman.

N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 2 - 1933

Tune Detective Nabs Himself

Sigmund Spaeth Tracks Down His Own Melody to Another's Popular Song.

By JAMES CANNON,
World-Telegram Radio Editor.

Poll News.

THE Philadelphia Orchestra spurted into the lead today in the World-Telegram's second annual poll of radio editors to select national favorites on the networks. The following listing was compiled from sixty-five ballots. A vote for first place counts 3 points, a vote for second place means 2 points and third place votes count 1 point.

Name.	1st Place.	2nd Place.	3rd Place.	Points.
Philadelphia Orchestra	37	20	4	155
New York Philharmonic	22	24	6	120
Boston Symphony	4	12	29	65
San Francisco Symphony	—	2	6	10
Howard Barlow's Symphony	1	1	5	10
Roxy Symphony	1	1	2	7
Columbia Symphony	—	2	1	5

Brooklyn Times Union

FEB 3 - 1933

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Koussevitsky Here Again

Being permitted but one concert per season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I journeyed to the Academy of Music last night and speedily discovered that I had picked probably the worst performance by the Koussevitsky ensemble in many a moon.

It was an orthodox program which the Boston conductor elected to present and one which evidently had not been rehearsed carefully before being served to Brooklyn subscribers.

Starting with the No. 7 symphony of Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitsky selected Wagnerian excerpts for the second half of his program. The Beethoven was read in that style which for so many years kept Mr. Koussevitsky from attaining pre-eminence among our conductors, namely with a strong Russian flavor and very little of Beethoven. Moreover, the musicians seemed unable to ascertain their leader's desires.

Following a sparkling first movement, Mr. Koussevitsky read the allegretto as though it were an andante con grazione. Moreover, in the trio where the strings hold a pedal point and the woodwinds have the counter-melody, although Mr. Koussevitsky's beat was metronomic, the woods were lax in responding, so much so that he had to bend over and stress each count rather than the accented beat. The third movement was somewhat better although players and conductor were still out of sympathy while the finale section, a con brio, was read in presto tempo. It was an omen of what was to come.

Four seasons or so ago, I heard the orchestra give what to me was the outstanding reading of the "Lohengrin" prelude. Last night I heard it again and regretted that it had been repeated. Inaccurate and uncoordinated was the presentation.

"The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Walkuere" was brief but the best of the evening. The Siegfried funeral march from "Gotterdammerung," that magnificent apostrophe of nature, man and godhead to the death of a hero was an assortment of independent choirs, playing almost at will.

The overture to "Tannhauser," the concluding number was given an orthodox but uninspirational reading.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

FEB 3 - 1933

In the absence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the National Broadcasting Company will put on a two-hour carnival tomorrow night in the period normally occupied by the orchestra. Ray Perkins will be master of ceremonies and 25 acts have been arranged for the novel bill. In some quarters it is suggested that the program may be the forerunner of what may be a regular thing in the not too distant future.

* * *

The program will include everything from hot numbers and comedy chatter to classical and operatic selections by vocalists and a symphony orchestra, enlisting the services of 18 radio stars and stellar acts. One of the high spots will be a comedy drama of Tennessee mountain life.

* * *

Word comes from the West of an experimental license for station WLW at Cincinnati to operate a 500,000-watt station, 10 times as powerful as the biggest station in the country today. It will take a year to complete the instalation which will cost $400,000.

* * *

Beginning tomorrow Saturday broadcasts from the Metropolitan Opera House will be carried by both networks of the National Broadcasting Company. The Wagner cycle will continue on the WEAF side alone. Numerous requests from listeners served only by the WEAF network brought about the decision to give the concerts the widest possible reception.

* * *

For the next three weeks Edgar Guest will be absent from his recently created post of master of ceremonies of the Musical Moments programs on Tuesdays. Guest will leave Sunday with a party of explorers bent on an investigation of Aztec ruins in Mexico.

109

PROGRAM M.

Times NY Feb

To the Music Editor:

A letter "On Making Programs" in the Sunday TIMES prompts me to add another voice asking for more original planning in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts which we hear over the radio Sunday afternoons.

I have long noticed that the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras almost always have far more interesting and generally worth-while programs than our New York orchestras.

Now that we have on the radio the incomparable Boston Symphony practically every Saturday night, things look a lot brighter; but why should we have had to wait years with hardly any Sibelius or Vaughan Williams (to name only two significant omissions from most of the Philharmonic seasons since 1924)? Why not an occasional Holst, such as "The Planets"? Why not a Sibelius cycle instead of yet another Beethoven cycle, as is now announced for five Sunday afternoons. Strauss's "Zarathustra" or "Domestic Symphony" could with profit, not to say variety, be sometimes played in place of another and yet another "Till" or "Don Juan." What a treat it was to hear Debussy's "Iberia" yesterday instead of the usual "Oberon" overture or Franck symphony!

How long shall we have to wait, I wonder, to hear "Le Sacre du Printemps," "Brigg Fair," Sibelius's Second and following symphonies; Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony, d'Indy's symphony, any Elgar save the "Enigma Variations," a little (if that is possible) Mahler, a "Poem of Ecstasy," "El Amor Brujo," a Bax symphony, played by our own orchestra?

I have only touched the surface here of the possibilities awaiting the attention of the Philharmonic, possibilities which have long been translated into facts, into lovely and stirring music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With all these complaints go my deep appreciation of the good things we do get, from time to time, in the way of original program planning, from the Philharmonic.

I do not want this to be interpreted as wishing to do away with Beethoven, Brahms and the familiar classics. They are our bread and butter. We need them. But not, in this writer's opinion, so many times every season, to the exclusion of important, and indeed great, modern music that Boston, London and Paris are familiar with.

JOHN C. W. BIRD.
Bloomfield, N. J., Feb. 6, 1933.

THE SIBELIUS SYMPHONIES.

To the Music Editor:

The recent performance of the powerful Fifth symphony of Sibelius by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves one speculating again about a curious mystery. Here is an engrossing score, certainly one of the most important composed in the past quarter century. Yet our Philharmonic Orchestra has played it but once. That performance occurred nearly twelve years ago, in 1921.

The only other performance in New York that the writer knows of was by Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1925. At that time the impression created was so favorable that Stokowski repeated the work later the same season. Since then we have waited in vain for a repetition by the Philharmonic.

This is by no means the only Sibelius symphony which our orchestra has unreasonably neglected. Since the 1921 performance it has played only two of these fine works: Mr. Toscanini has given a performance of the Fourth, and Mr. Stokowski (as guest conductor) played the First. That is all. There are at least four Sibelius symphonies that have never been played by the Philharmonic!

Mr. Toscanini is the regular conductor of the orchestra. If he is not responsible for its répertoire, who is? In his past seven seasons (during which he has found room for but one Sibelius symphony) he has played great quantities of music from men like Respighi, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, de Sabata, Pizzetti, Wetzler, Kodály and Tommasini. He has even revived long-cold corpses by Saint-Saëns, Raff, Martucci, Busoni, Rossini. One searches in vain for either logic or artistic insight to justify such program making.

There is no doubt that something ought to be done soon to raise the Philharmonic répertoire from its present wretched state. But considerable doubt exists that this will ever be done by Mr. Toscanini.

RICHARD LEONARD.
New York, Feb. 7, 1933.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

FEB 2 - 1933

Concert Tuesday

An appreciative audience assembled in Constitution Hall Tuesday afternoon for the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Mrs. Herbert Hoover had a group of friends with her in the Presidential box which included Mrs. Pierce Butler, wife of the Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and her daughter, Mrs. Edward K. Dunn; Mrs. Joel T. Boone, and Miss Doris Goss.

The conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Hans Kindler occupied a box with a party of friends, and they were most enthusiastic in their applause. Mrs. Kindler wore an afternoon gown of terra-cotta silk crepe, which had a wide gold metal belt; and her black felt hat, which was devoid of trimming, had a narrow brim.

Among other box holders were Mrs. Frederic A. Keep, Mrs. Sol Bloom, Mrs. Maude L. Whitman, Mrs. Ellis Byrnes, Miss Alice Clapp, and Miss Mabel T. Boardman.

* * *

N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 2 - 1933

Tune Detective Nabs Himself

Sigmund Spaeth Tracks Down His Own Melody to Another's Popular Song.

By JAMES CANNON,
World-Telegram Radio Editor.

Poll News.

THE Philadelphia Orchestra spurted into the lead today in the World-Telegram's second annual poll of radio editors to select national favorites on the networks. The following listing was compiled from sixty-five ballots. A vote for first place counts 3 points, a vote for second place means 2 points and third place votes count 1 point.

Name.	1st Place.	2nd Place.	3rd Place.	Points.
Philadelphia Orchestra	37	20	4	155
New York Philharmonic	22	24	6	120
Boston Symphony	4	12	29	65
San Francisco Symphony	—	2	6	10
Howard Barlow's Symphony	1	1	5	10
Roxy Symphony	1	1	2	7
Columbia Symphony	—	2	1	5

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

EB 2 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LYRIC

Orchestra, Under Direction Of Serge Koussevitzky, Gives Only Baltimore Concert, Which Opened With Weber's "Overture To Oberon"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the Lyric Theater last night in a concert which made a large audience regret that it was the only visit of the organization to Baltimore this season. It was a rich and wholly delightful feast, ranking with the best orchestral performances of the winter.

Perhaps the most complimentary thing that can be said about the orchestra and the direction of Serge Koussevitzky is that they furnished very little for the reporter to write about. For it was a smooth, dignified performance by musicians who respected intentions of the composer and knew how to get the most out of the four compositions played. It was an orchestra always under the control of a director who knew his business and went about it without display or mannerism.

—o—

Such a concert offers little in the way of news, but a very great deal in the way of enjoyment. It offers no food for heated discussion, but rather sends each auditor home in a warm and expansive mood of deep contentment.

Weber's "Overture to Oberon" established the right mood for the reception of the greater works to come. It was followed by Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92," a work received the more gratefully because it is heard none too often hereabouts.

Choosing the best among four movements, each of which was rendered with great and sustained skill, one might name the Allegretto. Certainly the second movement marked one of the finest orchestral achievements recorded here this season—and of all the beautiful things presented last night, it produced possibly the most profound pleasure for a majority of the audience.

—o—

Even so there may be those who will quarrel with this estimate, giving precedence to the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with which the second half of the program opened. It is difficult to imagine this moving piece being better played. In it the orchestra, superbly controlled by Mr. Koussevitsky, ran the whole scale from the extreme tenderness of the introduction to the magnificent crescendo of the final "Transfiguration" theme.

The "Overture to Tannhauser" was yet to come, and again the bigger and bolder adjectives must be called upon, if it is to be described properly. But for once the always risky use of superlatives may be forgiven, at least by those who heard the concert, for it is more than likely that most of those in the audience left the theater thinking also in terms of the highest praise.

D. K.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

FEB 3 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony in Brooklyn; a Matinee 'Die Walkuere'; Gieseking With the Philharmonic

In many respects it was unquestionably a fine performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony that Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening, yet the listener—one listener, at any rate—was conscious at the end of a definite dissatisfaction with what he had heard. This did not arise from any disagreement with Mr. Koussewitsky on points of interpretation, from any feeling that the conductor was expounding a too personal conception of the work, or that, on the other hand, he was indifferent to it. Nor was it traceable to any failure on the part of the orchestra to carry out Mr. Koussewitsky's wishes faithfully and well. On the contrary, describing in one word the impression it created, I should call it an overdisciplined performance. Obviously infinite pains had been expended on its preparation both by the conductor and his men, every nuance of tempo and phrasing and expression worked over with inexhaustible patience. The result was perfection, but of a lifeless and rather repellent sort. A certain effect of spontaneity is desirable in any performance of any work; from this one, it was entirely lacking. Exhuberant, even exultant it undoubtedly was—but too plainly by calculation, with an eye on the effect to be produced.

However, it is seldom that we have cause to complain of perfection, and the criticism that I have made of last evening's performance of the Seventh Symphony may in this sense be interpreted as a compliment to Mr. Koussewitsky and the splendid band of which he is the leader. Their intentions were the best; they were only a little overzealous in carrying them into effect.

Mr. Koussewitsky's program for this, the third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brooklyn concerts, included, in addition to the Beethoven symphony, Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere," the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. These Mr. Koussewitsky performed in anticipation of the approaching 50th anniversary of Wagner's death,

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 3 - 1933

Boston Symphony Gives Third Brooklyn Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the third of its local series of concerts at the Academy of Music last evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and a Citizens' Committee headed by Adrian Van Sinderen.

The program included the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and selections from the operas of Wagner.

Vice-chairmen of the Citizens' Committee are: Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. E. Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith and R. Huntington Woodman.

Brooklyn Times Union

FEB 3 - 1933

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Koussevitsky Here Again

Being permitted but one concert per season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I journeyed to the Academy of Music last night and speedily discovered that I had picked probably the worst performance by the Koussevitsky ensemble in many a moon.

It was an orthodox program which the Boston conductor elected to present and one which evidently had not been rehearsed carefully before being served to Brooklyn subscribers.

Starting with the No. 7 symphony of Beethoven, Mr. Koussevitsky selected Wagnerian excerpts for the second half of his program. The Beethoven was read in that style which for so many years kept Mr. Koussevitsky from attaining pre-eminence among our conductors, namely with a strong Russian flavor and very little of Beethoven. Moreover, the musicians seemed unable to ascertain their leader's desires.

Following a sparkling first movement, Mr. Koussevitsky read the allegretto as though it were an andante con grazione. Moreover, in the trio where the strings hold a pedal point and the woodwinds have the counter-melody, although Mr. Koussevitsky's beat was metronomic, the woods were lax in responding, so much so that he had to bend over and stress each count rather than the accented beat. The third movement was somewhat better although players and conductor were still out of sympathy while the finale section, a con brio, was read in presto tempo. It was an omen of what was to come.

Four seasons or so ago, I heard the orchestra give what to me was the outstanding reading of the "Lohengrin" prelude. Last night I heard it again and regretted that it had been repeated. Inaccurate and uncoordinated was the presentation.

"The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Walkuere" was brief but the best of the evening. The Siegfried funeral march from "Gotterdammerung," that magnificent apostrophe of nature, man and godhead to the death of a hero was an assortment of independent choirs, playing almost at will.

The overture to "Tannhauser," the concluding number was given an orthodox but uninspirational reading.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

FEB 3 - 1933

In the absence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the National Broadcasting Company will put on a two-hour carnival tomorrow night in the period normally occupied by the orchestra. Ray Perkins will be master of ceremonies and 25 acts have been arranged for the novel bill. In some quarters it is suggested that the program may be the forerunner of what may be a regular thing in the not too distant future.

* * *

The program will include everything from hot numbers and comedy chatter to classical and operatic selections by vocalists and a symphony orchestra, enlisting the services of 18 radio stars and stellar acts. One of the high spots will be a comedy drama of Tennessee mountain life.

* * *

Word comes from the West of an experimental license for station WLW at Cincinnati to operate a 500,000-watt station, 10 times as powerful as the biggest station in the country today. It will take a year to complete the instalation which will cost $400,000.

* * *

Beginning tomorrow Saturday broadcasts from the Metropolitan Opera House will be carried by both networks of the National Broadcasting Company. The Wagner cycle will continue on the WEAF side alone. Numerous requests from listeners served only by the WEAF network brought about the decision to give the concerts the widest possible reception.

* * *

For the next three weeks Edgar Guest will be absent from his recently created post of master of ceremonies of the Musical Moments programs on Tuesdays. Guest will leave Sunday with a party of explorers bent on an investigation of Aztec ruins in Mexico.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 3 - 1933

BEETHOVEN-WAGNER PROGRAM HEARD HERE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky gave another of his interesting programs, last evening, in the opera house of the Academy of Music. The concert, the third in a series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pleased a large and enthusiastic audience.

In the first part, Koussevitzky gave a remarkably shaded, deft and graceful performance, marked by his usual definite and explicit relation of thematic material set off against exquisite tonal background of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, op. 92. The four movements, replete with charm and grace, varied in character, were done with the Koussevitzky magic which imparts an especial interest to each and every passage. All was set forth gem-like, with lightness of touch, delicacy and beauty.

It was in the second part that Koussevitzky unleashed his big guns. This portion of the program consisted of all Wagner compositions, and included the Prelude to "Lohengrin;" the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure;" Death Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

FEB 4 - 1933

Music

A Sixth and Last 'Elektra' —The Boston Symphony Plays

Mr. Koussevitsky opened the program of ~~last night's~~ Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall with a novelty: an orchestral piece entitled "Innominata," by Conrad Back, a Swiss composer, a pupil of Honegger's, whose music had not previously been heard in this country. An intricate but arid contrapuntal essay, it exercised the virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra while it bored the audience. It was followed by performance of Brahm's F major symphony directed along orthodox lines. The second half of the program, after the intermission, was devoted to Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition in the orchestral arrangement made by Ravel.

N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 4 - 1933

Other Music

A New Elektra at the Metropolitan —Boston Symphony Orchestra

By OSCAR THOMPSON

TIME was when music most needed a traffic policeman with "stop" and "go" signs to regulate an excess of concerts. The present lull in debut recitals might be made the occasion for directing the attention of the technocrats to the quantities of new music being produced without relation to world needs or possibilities of assimilation. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony raised the issue in Carnegie Hall last night by a profitless performance of a work called "Innominata," by a contemporaneous young Swiss, Conrad Beck, which had figured on the programs of the International Music Festival held in Vienna last June. "The new counterpoint" of a few years back was put through its paces industriously after the fashion of Hindemith and Beck's master, Honegger, but remained a futile and sterile business, even when played with the virtuosity of this performance. The audience had also for its delectation a Kousevitskyan "reading" of the Brahms Third Symphony and a sonorous projection of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Ravel. The ensemble was in fine fettle and was vigilantly led.

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 4 - 1933

RADIO REFINES MUSICAL TASTE, SAYS NBC HEAD

Creates Appreciation of Classical Numbers Among All People, Declares Aylesworth

The widespread influence of the radio in creating appreciation of classical music among school children and all classes of grown-ups was described last night by M. H. Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Company.

He also declared the day is coming when engineers will make it possible for a man's voice to be heard on every receiving set in the world, spread over four continents.

WIDESPREAD RESPONSE.

Aylesworth addressed a meeting of the National Institute of Social Sciences in the Waldorf-Astoria on the social effects of radio. Aylesworth pointed out that hundreds of letters are received from rural communities and the far reaches of the North, showing appreciation for classical music.

Aylesworth pointed out that while the Metropolitan Opera and Boston Symphony broadcasts are given chiefly for their entertainment value, they are also educational. Radio listeners, he said, learn to appreciate the better music.

SCHOOL USES.

Formal recognition by educators of radio as a means of educating children will mean that millions of children will get a certain amount of culture from radio sets in class rooms, he declared, adding that today 6,000,000 school children in America get the benefit of radio programs.

The meeting also heard an address by Lee Simonson, a scenic designer and a member of the Theatre Guild, who spoke on "The Movies and the Outlook for the Legitimate Stage."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

NBC PRESENTS AIR CARNIVAL

Feature Replaces Boston Symphony Program For Tonight.

By LYNDEN MORROW.
Radio Editor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight will not be broadcast. The orchestra will play in New York's Carnegie Hall, but because tonight's program is virtually the same as that given over the air last Saturday night the broadcast has been cancelled.

In its place will be an elaborate two-hour production from the NBC studios in New York. It will start at 8:15 and will bring to the microphone 18 radio stars and acts, a playlet on mountain life; Frank Black's 35-piece symphonic ensemble and Harriet Lee's dance band. Ray Perkins and Irving Kaufman will be masters of ceremonies.

The program will be put on the air under the title of "Carnival," and will be carried locally by KDKA. Some of radio's big shots included in the cast are James Melton, Aileen Clark, Phil Cook, Borrah Minevitch and his harmonica gang and Ohman and Arden, piano duo.

* * *

New York Herald-Tribune

FEB 4 1933

Boston Symphony Plays 'Innominata,' by Beck

Swiss Composer's Work Offered Here for the 1st Time

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing on a Friday instead of its usual Thursday, gave its third New York evening concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. As a preface to Brahms's third symphony, Serge Koussevitzky began his program with a work new here, "Innominata," by the thirty-one-year-old Swiss composer, Conrad Beck.

"Innominata" was first played in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music last June, with Ernest Ansermet conducting. Its name has no programmatic significance, nor did Mr. Hale's notes reveal any other meaning than what the individual listener could deduce from what proved to be an interesting study in dissonant, polytonal sonorities.

Like many other works of the last fifteen years, Beck's composition suggested experimenting with contemporary harmonic and instrumental mediums and hues rather than the musical expression of any obvious emotions. Skillfully constructed, often acrid even in the ears of those well used to latter-day music of the more radical type, it was often striking and arresting in its varied and aggressive dissonances, its vividly clashing colors, although, what with harmonies which have not yet won the affection of a majority of concert-goers, its reception by its hearers was hardly enthusiastic.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is not, as a rule, the most conservative of interpreters, gave the Brahms symphony a thoroughly orthodox, straightforward interpretation, usually sensitive and expressive, although, at times, slightly lacking in momentum in the first movement. The notable conductor and orchestra completed the program with Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has had several previous performances here by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians.

F. D. P.

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 4 1933

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Gives a Novelty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. As is the custom of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston, they came bearing a gift of a new work, Conrad Beck's "Innominata," a gift neither to be feared nor revered. The program also included Brahms's Third Symphony and Ravel's arrangement for orchestra of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Conrad Beck is a Swiss composer, about thirty-two years old. He has written much for orchestra, chamber ensemble, solo instruments and voice. But even the exhaustive program notes of Philip Hale remark merely that " it is said that Beck studied with Arthur Honegger; that his home is in Zurich but he spends much time in Paris."

'Innominata," which had its first New York performance last night, was first played at the tenth International Music Festival held in Vienna last June. It is a work that reevals skilled craftsmanship; the use of the orchestra is economical and incisive. There are effects in the work that are reminiscent of contemporary European modernists. But like the texture of its tonal pattern, the ideas of the composition are bleak and arid.

Unfortunately for Beck, his composition was followed, with only a slight pause, by the Brahms symphony, with its radiant opening phrases. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave the Brahms an exquisitely sensitive performance. The first and last movements, built on big lines, were opulent and full-blooded, and the second and third were delicate, lyrical and crystal clear. This interpretation was an excellent example of the tone of burnished gold that this orchestra can produce and the absolute and precise coherence of its ensemble playing.

Nor were these qualities less to be noted in the Moussorgsky-Ravel music. Here was a brilliant interpretation of music in another vein, music that is piquant, laughing and penetratingly observant. It would have delighted Ravel to hear how the woodwinds and brasses gave the exact tang to his ideas, how the strings sang the broad, flowing melodies, and how climaxes were established unerringly and with striking culminating effect. But more than mere technical virtuosity, Mr. Koussevitzky and his players brought to life the tonal pictures that Moussorgsky envisaged.

If there were any faults to find in an evening of fine orchestral playing it was perhaps in the slightly overdeliberate playing of the slow movement of the Brahms symphony, causing it to appear more thoughtful than poetic.

H. T.

New York Enquirer

FEB 4 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY'S BATON GIVES MAGIC EFFECT TO AUDIENCE

United Press By Larry Humphrey

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—Serge Koussevitzky's baton is a wand which creates magic effects in the imagination of those who hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not magic, of course. Koussevitzky is a technician. In rehearsal no conductor can be more relentlessly exacting than he, down to the smallest detail of rhythm, or nuance, whether of a single instrument or the 110-piece ensemble. For the sake of the development of a single interpretative effect, he will break his own back or anyone's, until endless repetition, halts, explanations, and exhortations have been made.

But the technique of Koussevitzky is formed from the emotions as well as from skill and musical learning. He has sometimes halted in rehearsal to lay down his stick and expostulate, "Please! We must be correct, yes. But also we must play with the heart, with the soul, always."

To those out front in Symphony Hall, the gestures and bodily attitudes by which Koussevitzky signals his orchestra constitute something close to musical art—compositions in line and motion. Expressive though his back be, listeners miss the wonderful play of dramatic expression which his face presents to his musicians. His features are comparable to those of a sensitive actor-stage director, whose expression instinctively varies with the sentiments registered by each played before him.

If in performance something is not quite as intended, Koussevitzky is philosophic rather than fretful. He may, very likely, make a sour face at the offending individual or group. But it is in a spirit of "Well, I never expected anything so funny from you." And if the composition has been unfamiliar, or especially difficult, he will follow at the end by pantomiming with his face some such expression as, "Good work."

N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 4 - 1933

Music

Philharmonic and Bostonians Heard at Carnegie Hall

By Irving Weil

Carnegie Hall yesterday had one of those busy orchestral Fridays that occasionally absorb its activities and its seating capacity during the Winter. The Boston Orchestra, in the evening, paid its third visit to town under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, while the Philharmonic made an afternoon of it with Bruno Walter on the podium and Walter Gieseking captivating the subscribers with his remarkable piano skill.

Mr. Koussevitzky, as he pretty generally does, brought some new music with him from Symphony Hall. This was a piece for orchestra bearing the designation "Innominata" which, of course, means that it might just as well have borne none. It was written by Conrad Beck, a young Swiss who lives in Zurich but, we suspect, writes his music in Paris. The work was played by the Vienna Symphony under Ernest Ansermet last June at the International Festival held there.

Mr. Beck, who has just popped over into his 30s, is a remarkably prolific composer, his symphonies being already numbered as high as five whilst there is a great deal of other orchestral work to his credit. It may be that these represent much profound thought, but after listening to last night's "Innominata," we have our doubts.

The work presented by Mr. Koussevitzky displays the usual mastery of modernist form, as laid down ten years ago and more by Mr. Beck's elders. It is obviously imitative of these men, some of them French and one or two German, and it reveals a slight talent of its own, with ideas just as slight. But it is really modern music to be swept out of the memory almost over night.

After this introductory piece of dissonance Mr. Koussevitzky turned to Brahms and to ground that is not experimental, although there was a day in Boston when Brahms, too, was not only an experiment but a disastrous one. The symphony last night was the third, in F major, and the audience settled down to enjoy itself. Later Moussorgsky's suite of piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the superlative orchestration of Maurice Ravel, brought the evening to a close.

NEW YORK MIRROR

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

"For Old Things Are Best."

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THE PROGRAM.

"Innominata" .... Conrad Beck
Symphony No. 3 in F (Opus 90) Johannes Brahms
"Pictures at an Exhibition" Modest Moussorgsky
(Orchestrated by Maurice Ravel.)

The flame of "new music" flickered eerily in the staid corners of Carnegie Hall last night. But it required the virile glow of a great masterpiece to light the audience homeward rejoicing. And Mr. Koussevitzky, having done his bit at the outset to satisfy the clamor of musical progress, turned to Brahms the immortal.

A brief acquaintance with Mr. Conrad Beck, in the name of his "Innominata," impels a compliment to his cleverness, and a remark upon the taut strength and imposing glitter of this creation. I should like nothing better than to ripen this acquaintance by further experiment. It is unfortunate that the meagre data supplied by Mr. Philip Hale gives us no accepted estimate of the quality of his work. it is considerable, including five symphonies, choruses, chamber and other music.

The Brahms of the third, as I have remarked before, is austere, heroic, fiercely passionate, sublimely tender. Between the second in D and the third in F, six years had elapsed. The symphony in F is less genial and serene than the second, more coherent, if not so rugged as the first. Dr. Percy Goetschius remarks in his "Masters of the Symphony:" "The subordinate theme of the first movement is one of the most exquisite musical sentences ever conceived, and many episodes in the second and third movements are of rare artistic grace." The symphony was first performed at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna, Dec. 2, 1883, conducted by Hans Richter. "Brahms feared for the performance," says Mr. Hale, "although Richter had conducted four rehearsals."

Holding ecstatic memories of Mr. Toscanini's conception of this noble work, I lingered with Mr. Koussevitzky upon every bar, seeking differences of opinion, I must confess. I found them, of course, and was, therefore, disappointed. Mr. Koussevitzky gave us an orthodox and entirely satisfactory reading, but never did he approach that supreme lyricism, that matchless perfection of detail, whereby Mr. Toscanini achieved an imperishable song.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 3 - 1933

BEETHOVEN-WAGNER PROGRAM HEARD HERE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky gave another of his interesting programs, last evening, in the opera house of the Academy of Music. The concert, the third in a series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pleased a large and enthusiastic audience.

In the first part, Koussevitzky gave a remarkably shaded, deft and graceful performance, marked by his usual definite and explicit relation of thematic material set off against exquisite tonal background of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, op. 92. The four movements, replete with charm and grace, varied in character, were done with the Koussevitzky magic which imparts an especial interest to each and every passage. All was set forth gem-like, with lightness of touch, delicacy and beauty.

It was in the second part that Koussevitzky unleashed his big guns. This portion of the program consisted of all Wagner compositions, and included the Prelude to "Lohengrin;" the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure;" Death Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

FEB 4 - 1933

Music

A Sixth and Last 'Elektra' —The Boston Symphony Plays

Mr. Koussevitsky opened the program of last night's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall with a novelty: an orchestral piece entitled "Innominata," by Conrad Back, a Swiss composer, a pupil of Honegger's, whose music had not previously been heard in this country. An intricate but arid contrapuntal essay, it exercised the virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra while it bored the audience. It was followed by performance of Brahm's F major symphony directed along orthodox lines. The second half of the program, after the intermission, was devoted to Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition in the orchestral arrangement made by Ravel.

N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 4 - 1933

Other Music

A New Elektra at the Metropolitan —Boston Symphony Orchestra

By OSCAR THOMPSON

TIME was when music most needed a traffic policeman with "stop" and "go" signs to regulate an excess of concerts. The present lull in debut recitals might be made the occasion for directing the attention of the technocrats to the quantities of new music being produced without relation to world needs or possibilities of assimilation. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony raised the issue in Carnegie Hall last night by a profitless performance of a work called "Innominata," by a contemporaneous young Swiss, Conrad Beck, which had figured on the programs of the International Music Festival held in Vienna last June. "The new counterpoint" of a few years back was put through its paces industriously after the fashion of Hindemith and Beck's master, Honegger, but remained a futile and sterile business, even when played with the virtuosity of this performance. The audience had also for its delectation a Koussevitskyan "reading" of the Brahms Third Symphony and a sonorous projection of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Ravel. The ensemble was in fine fettle and was vigilantly led.

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 4 - 1933

RADIO REFINES MUSICAL TASTE, SAYS NBC HEAD

Creates Appreciation of Classical Numbers Among All People, Declares Aylesworth

The widespread influence of the radio in creating appreciation of classical music among school children and all classes of grown-ups was described last night by M. H. Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Company.

He also declared the day is coming when engineers will make it possible for a man's voice to be heard on every receiving set in the world, spread over four continents.

WIDESPREAD RESPONSE.

Aylesworth addressed a meeting of the National Institute of Social Sciences in the Waldorf-Astoria on the social effects of radio. Aylesworth pointed out that hundreds of letters are received from rural communities and the far reaches of the North, showing appreciation for classical music.

Aylesworth pointed out that while the Metropolitan Opera and Boston Symphony broadcasts are given chiefly for their entertainment value, they are also educational. Radio listeners, he said, learn to appreciate the better music.

SCHOOL USES.

Formal recognition by educators of radio as a means of educating children will mean that millions of children will get a certain amount of culture from radio sets in class rooms, he declared, adding that today 6,000,000 school children in America get the benefit of radio programs.

The meeting also heard an address by Lee Simonson, a scenic designer and a member of the Theatre Guild, who spoke on "The Movies and the Outlook for the Legitimate Stage."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

FEB 4 - 1933

NBC PRESENTS AIR CARNIVAL

Feature Replaces Boston Symphony Program For Tonight.

By LYNDEN MORROW.
Radio Editor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight will not be broadcast. The orchestra will play in New York's Carnegie Hall, but because tonight's program is virtually the same as that given over the air last Saturday night the broadcast has been cancelled.

In its place will be an elaborate two-hour production from the NBC studios in New York. It will start at 8:15 and will bring to the microphone 18 radio stars and acts, a playlet on mountain life; Frank Black's 35-piece symphonic ensemble and Harriet Lee's dance band. Ray Perkins and Irving Kaufman will be masters of ceremonies.

The program will be put on the air under the title of "Carnival," and will be carried locally by KDKA. Some of radio's big shots included in the cast are James Melton, Aileen Clark, Phil Cook, Borrah Minevitch and his harmonica gang and Ohman and Arden, piano duo.

* * *

New York Herald-Tribune

FEB 4 1933

Boston Symphony Plays 'Innominata,' by Beck

Swiss Composer's Work Offered Here for the 1st Time

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, appearing on a Friday instead of its usual Thursday, gave its third New York evening concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. As a preface to Brahms's third symphony, Serge Koussevitzky began his program with a work new here, "Innominata," by the thirty-one-year-old Swiss composer, Conrad Beck.

"Innominata" was first played in the Vienna festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music last June, with Ernest Ansermet conducting. Its name has no programmatic significance, nor did Mr. Hale's notes reveal any other meaning than what the individual listener could deduce from what proved to be an interesting study in dissonant, polytonal sonorities.

Like many other works of the last fifteen years, Beck's composition suggested experimenting with contemporary harmonic and instrumental mediums and hues rather than the musical expression of any obvious emotions. Skillfully constructed, often acrid even in the ears of those well used to latter-day music of the more radical type, it was often striking and arresting in its varied and aggressive dissonances, its vividly clashing colors, although, what with harmonies which have not yet won the affection of a majority of concert-goers, its reception by its hearers was hardly enthusiastic.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is not, as a rule, the most conservative of interpreters, gave the Brahms symphony a thoroughly orthodox, straightforward interpretation, usually sensitive and expressive, although, at times, slightly lacking in momentum in the first movement. The notable conductor and orchestra completed the program with Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which has had several previous performances here by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians.

F. D. P.

NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 4 1933

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Gives a Novelty.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, headed by Serge Koussevitzky, gave its third evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night. As is the custom of Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston, they came bearing a gift of a new work, Conrad Beck's "Innominata," a gift neither to be feared nor revered. The program also included Brahms's Third Symphony and Ravel's arrangement for orchestra of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Conrad Beck is a Swiss composer, about thirty-two years old. He has written much for orchestra, chamber ensemble, solo instruments and voice. But even the exhaustive program notes of Philip Hale remark merely that "it is said that Beck studied with Arthur Honegger; that his home is in Zurich but he spends much time in Paris."

"Innominata," which had its first New York performance last night, was first played at the tenth International Music Festival held in Vienna last June. It is a work that reevals skilled craftsmanship; the use of the orchestra is economical and incisive. There are effects in the work that are reminiscent of contemporary European modernists. But like the texture of its tonal pattern, the ideas of the composition are bleak and arid.

Unfortunately for Beck, his composition was followed, with only a slight pause, by the Brahms symphony, with its radiant opening phrases. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave the Brahms an exquisitely sensitive performance. The first and last movements, built on big lines, were opulent and full-blooded, and the second and third were delicate, lyrical and crystal clear. This interpretation was an excellent example of the tone of burnished gold that this orchestra can produce and the absolute and precise coherence of its ensemble playing.

Nor were these qualities less to be noted in the Moussorgsky-Ravel music. Here was a brilliant interpretation of music in another vein, music that is piquant, laughing and penetratingly observant. It would have delighted Ravel to hear how the woodwinds and brasses gave the exact tang to his ideas, how the strings sang the broad, flowing melodies, and how climaxes were established unerringly and with striking culminating effect. But more than mere technical virtuosity, Mr. Koussevitzky and his players brought to life the tonal pictures that Moussorgsky envisaged.

If there were any faults to find in an evening of fine orchestral playing it was perhaps in the slightly overdeliberate playing of the slow movement of the Brahms symphony, causing it to appear more thoughtful than poetic.

H. T.

New York Enquirer

FEB 4 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY'S BATON GIVES MAGIC EFFECT TO AUDIENCE

United Press. By Larry Humphrey

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—Serge Koussevitzky's baton is a wand which creates magic effects in the imagination of those who hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not magic, of course. Koussevitzky is a technician. In rehearsal no conductor can be more relentlessly exacting than he, down to the smallest detail of rhythm, or nuance, whether of a single instrument or the 110-piece ensemble. For the sake of the development of a single interpretative effect, he will break his own back or anyone's, until endless repetition, halts, explanations, and exhortations have been made.

But the technique of Koussevitzky is formed from the emotions as well as from skill and musical learning. He has sometimes halted in rehearsal to lay down his stick and expostulate, "Please! We must be correct, yes. But also we must play with the heart, with the soul, always."

To those out front in Symphony Hall, the gestures and bodily attitudes by which Koussevitzky signals his orchestra constitute something close to musical art—compositions in line and motion. Expressive though his back be, listeners miss the wonderful play of dramatic expression which his face presents to his musicians. His features are comparable to those of a sensitive actor-stage director, whose expression instinctively varies with the sentiments registered by each played before him.

If in performance something is not quite as intended, Koussevitzky is philosophic rather than fretful. He may, very likely, make a sour face at the offending individual or group. But it is in a spirit of "Well, I never expected anything so funny from you." And if the composition has been unfamiliar, or especially difficult, he will follow at the end by pantomiming with his face some such expression as, "Good work."

N. Y. JOURNAL

FEB 4 - 1933

Music

Philharmonic and Bostonians Heard at Carnegie Hall

By Irving Weil

Carnegie Hall yesterday had one of those busy orchestral Fridays that occasionally absorb its activities and its seating capacity during the Winter. The Boston Orchestra, in the evening, paid its third visit to town under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, while the Philharmonic made an afternoon of it with Bruno Walter on the podium and Walter Gieseking captivating the subscribers with his remarkable piano skill.

Mr. Koussevitzky, as he pretty generally does, brought some new music with him from Symphony Hall. This was a piece for orchestra bearing the designation "Innominata" which, of course, means that it might just as well have borne none. It was written by Conrad Beck, a young Swiss who lives in Zurich but, we suspect, writes his music in Paris. The work was played by the Vienna Symphony under Ernest Ansermet last June at the International Festival held there.

Mr. Beck, who has just popped over into his 30s, is a remarkably prolific composer, his symphonies being already numbered as high as five whilst there is a great deal of other orchestral work to his credit. It may be that these represent much profound thought, but after listening to last night's "Innominata," we have our doubts.

The work presented by Mr. Koussevitzky displays the usual mastery of modernist form, as laid down ten years ago and more by Mr. Beck's elders. It is obviously imitative of these men, some of them French and one or two German, and it reveals a slight talent of its own, with ideas just as slight. But it is really modern music to be swept out of the memory almost over night.

After this introductory piece of dissonance Mr. Koussevitzky turned to Brahms and to ground that is not experimental, although there was a day in Boston when Brahms, too, was not only an experiment but a disastrous one. The symphony last night was the third, in F major, and the audience settled down to enjoy itself. Later Moussorgsky's suite of piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the superlative orchestration of Maurice Ravel, brought the evening to a close.

NEW YORK MIRROR

4/

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

"For Old Things Are Best."

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m.

THE PROGRAM.

"Innominata" .... Conrad Beck
Symphony No. 3 in F (Opus 90)
Johannes Brahms
"Pictures at an Exhibition"
Modest Moussorgsky
(Orchestrated by Maurice Ravel.)

The flame of "new music" flickered eerily in the staid corners of Carnegie Hall last night. But it required the virile glow of a great masterpiece to light the audience homeward rejoicing. And Mr. Koussevitzky, having done his bit at the outset to satisfy the clamor of musical progress, turned to Brahms the immortal.

A brief acquaintance with Mr. Conrad Beck, in the name of his "Innominata," impels a compliment to his cleverness, and a remark upon the taut strength and imposing glitter of this creation. I should like nothing better than to ripen this acquaintance by further experiment. It is unfortunate that the meagre data supplied by Mr. Philip Hale gives us no accepted estimate of the quality of his work. it is considerable, including five symphonies, choruses, chamber and other music.

The Brahms of the third, as I have remarked before, is austere, heroic, fiercely passionate, sublimely tender. Between the second in D and the third in F, six years had elapsed. The symphony in F is less genial and serene than the second, more coherent, if not so rugged as the first. Dr. Percy Goetschius remarks in his "Masters of the Symphony:" "The subordinate theme of the first movement is one of the most exquisite musical sentences ever conceived, and many episodes in the second and third movements are of rare artistic grace." The symphony was first performed at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna, Dec. 2, 1883, conducted by Hans Richter. "Brahms feared for the performance," says Mr. Hale, "although Richter had conducted four rehearsals."

Holding ecstatic memories of Mr. Toscanini's conception of this noble work, I lingered with Mr. Koussevitzky upon every bar, seeking differences of opinion, I must confess. I found them, of course, and was, therefore, disappointed. Mr. Koussevitzky gave us an orthodox and entirely satisfactory reading, but never did he approach that supreme lyricism, that matchless perfection of detail, whereby Mr. Toscanini achieved an imperishable song.

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 4 - 1933

Boston Symphony Offers Beck Composition

The Philharmonic having possession of Carnegie Hall night before last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to wait till last evening to perform its customary Thursday rites. Sergei Koussevitzky began with a novelty from one of the composers who cultivates the latest methods. His name is Conrad Beck, he is a Swiss and is 31 years old. The composition heard last evening is entitled "Innominata" and was produced at the International Music Festival in Vienna on June 16 of last year. Mr. Philip Hale, the unequaled program annotator of the Boston Symphony concerts, had no information to impart about this work. We do not know even why it was called "Nameless."

However, by the simple act of listening, one learned that it was written in the polytonal manner and in long parallels of counterpoint with occasional excursions into vertical harmonies. The contrapuntal portions were made by a good craftsman and were clear in line and interesting in their interweavings. There was a middle section for strings, which rose to real beauty of melodic speech and opulence of polyphonic treatment. There was also a quasi-chorale part, which had sonority and musical quality. To be sure, one heard Mime, Alberich and Fafner momentarily, but the composition, nevertheless, had individuality and value. It did not proclaim itself the utterance of a genius, but of a young musician, who could handle the materials and methods of the contemporaneous progressives with confidence and certainty, and who had a good grip on form. The orchestra performed wonders of intonation. The conflicting keys preserved their independence, and the contrapuntal lines were firm and just.

Mr. Beck's music was succeeded by the F major symphony of Brahms, who was a progressive of half a century ago and is now a classic safely enshrined in the temple of ancient tonalities. There is nothing to be said about the third symphony that has not been said a hundred times before. Mr. Koussevitzky earned the gratitude of some music lovers by declining to adopt the soporific tempo frequently imposed upon the vital first movement. He read the entire symphony with regard for its lyric character, but without emasculating any part of it. The concluding number was Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a piece which brilliantly tells us what a musician conceived when he looked at some paintings. Now if some one would only paint a picture created in his mind by a prelude and fugue of Bach! Even Boecklin never did that. Thus far the composers are ahead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 4 - 1933

At Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an evening concert at which the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a particularly well-proportioned and keenly felt interpretation of the third symphony by Brahms; and an animated and colorful setting forth of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

A "first time in America" was Conrad Beck's (modern Swiss composer) orchestral piece, "Innominata." He is said to be a pupil of Honegger, and to write in the "linear contrapuntal style." That is exactly how his pallid music sounded last evening as it flitted into nothingness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

Cambridge, Mass.

JAN 20 1933

ures for the family.

Fourth Symphony Concert

In Dr. Koussevitsky's absence, Concertmaster Richard Burgin made his annual appearance as conductor at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theater on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Walton, overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Vaughan Williams, "Pastoral Symphony"; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain"; Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

Walton's piece is one of those modern things, noisy, a sort of piece that you cannot remember more than ten minutes after hearing it. It is good specimen of the kind of music written nowadays. Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral Symphony" was heard here for the first time. His musical meditations were, to say the least, monotonous; he uses several keys at once. He tries English folk dances, for instance in the Scherzo, which, however, gives sufficient interruption to the composer's meditation. There is a trumpet solo in the second movement and in the finale is a wordless singer, who has a sort of melody that is characteristic without its words. This melody makes a fitting ending. Adelle Alberts was the soprano.

One's impressions of such a work heard here for the first time, are necessarily vague, but Vaughan Williams, an English composer, has thrown all the strictness and academics of the English school to the four winds, and does things in this piece that all the classic purists would not have tried to do. They couldn't do it and get away with it. The piece was effectively and beautifully played as might have been expected.

Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," finished up by Rimsky-Korsakoff, not a most interesting composition, came before the Stravinsky suite. This suite sounded noisy, heavy. It is not a concert excerpt and wants to be heard under surroundings of the ballet and the stage. It was suggested that it had been heard too often and bare thin spots were noticed in the instrumentation. Mr. Burgin conducted most acceptably.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 9.

—H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 25 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY

As a symphony orchestra can in the last analysis be no better than the musicians which comprise it, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go far to explain the eminent qualities of this famous organization, which will be heard at the last of the Haage concerts at Rajah Theatre on Monday evening, Jan. 30. From all parts of the world have been drawn the 110 musicians which comprise the ranks of this orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. They are the finest that Europe and America have been able to provide. The concertmaster is Richard Burgin, the noted violinist and founder of the Burgin String Quartet. The leader of the cello section is Jean Bedetti, and that of the first viola Jean LeFranc. The leaders of the brass and woodwinds are Georg Boettcher, first horn; Georges Mager, first trumpet; Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Victor Polatschek, first clarinet; Georges Lauret, first flute; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Bernard Zighera, first harp. Making only a minimum of change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony from season to season, Koussevitzky is able to shape to his will an ensemble which is perfection itself, minutely responsive to his slightest indication.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 30 1933

weeks.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT AT RAJAH

A rare event in the musical history of Reading will be the appearance of the world's famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its eminent conductor. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in Rajah Theatre tonight, at 8:15, this being the last of the Haage series of concerts for the season. The orchestra, with its full personnel of 110 musicians, arrived by special train this morning from Boston. Owing to the many concerts given at Symphony Hall during the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra can give but few performances in other cities, outside of its regular five visits to Carnegie Hall, New York. The coming of the orchestra to Reading, therefore, is one of those events which may be counted upon to occur only at long intervals. Desirable seats are still available and selling at Rajah box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

JAN 26 1933

NO MORE ORCHESTRAL VISITORS

Regrettable is the announcement that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra no longer will give an annual series of concerts in Philadelphia.

Economic conditions, of course, are re-responsible.

Thus, for the first time in many years, Philadelphia will be a one-orchestra city.

It has been only a few years since Philadelphia was visited not only by the New York Philharmonic but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, five times annually, with four or five more concerts yearly by Dr. Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra, now merged with the New York Philharmonic.

Then there were occasional visits by the Cincinnati Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony, under Stock.

But now all that is over. The high cost of orchestral traveling, which includes not only the fares of 110 men but the cost of carrying all their instruments, fees of soloists, etc., gradually mounted to the point where the gracious custom of orchestral visiting had become a costly luxury.

The radio, of course, is another factor, since most of these orchestras play regularly before the microphone.

Anyway, Philadelphia will have to be content with her own orchestra. And seeing that it's rated as probably the finest anywhere, that ought not to be difficult.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
(2) READING, PA.
EAGLE

JAN 30 1933

Boston Symphony Leader Here for Concert Says Music Is Like Food to Some

To some people music is a necessity like food or clothing. Thus declared Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which arrived in Reading this morning for the Haage concert at the Rajah theatre tonight.

"To those people who love music, a depression makes no difference," explained Director Koussevitsky, "The real lover of music will spend his last money to hear good music. The love for the arts shows how high the culture of a country is, and music is the greatest art."

Rectnly Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra appeared on the radio for the first time. He admitted that while the radio has some value in popularizing music, he would much rather direct a concert in a hall or auditorium for an audience than present it over the radio.

"To play over the radio is much more difficult than to play for an audience in a ball," he said. "The personal contact is lost. A radio audience after all is passive. Your hearers might be smoking, eating or reading a newspaper for all you know. Then, too, the audience does not have the benefit of that personal contact with the artists. After all, when you are playing over the radio, you are playing to a machine and not to people. That makes it difficult.

"I think the radio is very good, however, to make music popular. It is good for those people who cannot come to the city to attend concert. It is good for the people who live far away from the city, like farmers, and they can get an idea what is good music. The trouble with the radio is that there is too much different music. It makes it difficult for those people who have never heard good music for then they will not know what is bad music."

Dr. Koussevitsky believes that the day of jazz, that wild syncopation with its barbaric beat, is passing.

"Jazz is finished," he declared, "it remains because it cannot go immediately. For eight years jazz was with us but the mood is changing. In 10 years jazz will have been forgotten."

Dr. Koussevitsky does not mean that dance music will pass, but rather that the style of dancing will change. Each generation has its style of dancing, he explained, and he likened it to an overcoat.

"One time long overcoats are in style," he added. "Next season short overcoats are the style. There are styles in dancing, too."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
READING, PA.
TIMES

JAN 31 1933

SYMPHONY GIVES READING THRILL

Boston Orchestra Under Kousevitzky Heard in Haage Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony orchestra to Reading last night and gave music-lovers of Berks and half a dozen neighboring counties a thrill they'll not soon forget.

The concert was the last of the season's series under the imprimateur of George D. Haage. It marked the close of the twenty-fifth Haage season. That the impresario should choose the Boston symphony, that the symphony should choose to come to Reading, that Dr. Koussevitzky should choose an all-German program—these all were right and proper for the series' silver anniversary.

Honors Three Composers

Bach, Brahms, Wagner—these three and no more was L. J. Rogers, the Boston's librarian, required to browse through to find the scores for the concert. Because this year is the hundredth anniversary of Brahms birth, there was the lovely, lively "Eroica" or Third symphony. Because this year also is the fiftieth anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, there were selections from three Wagner operas: "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried;" Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde;" and the mighty and mellifluous overture to Tannhauser. Two Bach string orchestra preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli opened the program.

The program, of course, was anything but "light." With three tolerably lengthy Wagner items, it could not possibly be so. But under the cunning of Koussevitzky's baton and restless hands, what might ordinarily be a weighty and somniferous program never came within a mile of letting down the large audience for a split second.

Glorious Golden Music

There was the music, of course—glorious, golden music dripping from the strings, flowing from the woodwinds, rushing pell-mell from basses and tympani. And there was Koussevitzky the inimitable—alive as electricity, dynamic as dynamite, always and ever moving, moving, moving. Here's a man, indeed, who, when he leads an orchestra, leads an orchestra, if you get the idea. His slender baton plays the least important part in his direction. His left hand does as much as his right, his shoulders and head almost as much as his hands and arms, and his continuous moving about the podium to "contact" the various sections of the orchestra gives his feet and legs a share of the conductor's job.

And there are moments when hands, arms, legs, shoulders and baton are too inorticulate, so Dr. Koussevitzky "speaks" to his men. Not aloud, of course. But he mouths his directions and with the formation of his lips, the lift of brows, indicates and transfers to the orchestra his feeling for the music's interpretation.

Gets Splendid Response

And what music this gyrating, graceful maestro elicits from his men. The audience seemed especially to like the symphony and the "Tristan and Isolde" and "Tannhauser" numbers, to which Koussevitzky seemed most devotedly attentive. His mastery over the brass section was particularly noticeable in the overture which closed the program, lifting his musicians to their very highest pitch.

A nearly-capacity house heard the program. There were no encores. Dr. Koussevitzky was called back for many bows, which he shared with his men. In the crowd were some scores from towns and cities within a 100-mile radius of Reading.

On Lengthy Tour

The orchestra's present tour, which opened in Reading, will take it to Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and, on Friday night and Saturday afternoon to Carnegie Hall, New York, where it will play, for the first time in the metropolis, "Prophecy," by Frederick Converse. It is arranged for soprano and orchestra. Beata Malkin, Russian soprano who sang it at its first performance in Boston last December, will sing the same part in New York, Saturday afternoon.

The first concert of the newly-organized Reading Madrigal society will be sung at the Rajah theatre, February 23. Willy Richter is conductor of the society, which will devote itself to the works of such composers as Palestriana, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Bateson and Dowland.

E. M. S.

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 4 - 1933

Boston Symphony Offers Beck Composition

The Philharmonic having possession of Carnegie Hall night before last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to wait till last evening to perform its customary Thursday rites. Sergei Koussevitzky began with a novelty from one of the composers who cultivates the latest methods. His name is Conrad Beck, he is a Swiss and is 31 years old. The composition heard last evening is entitled "Innominata" and was produced at the International Music Festival in Vienna on June 16 of last year. Mr. Philip Hale, the unequaled program annotator of the Boston Symphony concerts, had no information to impart about this work. We do not know even why it was called "Nameless."

However, by the simple act of listening, one learned that it was written in the polytonal manner and in long parallels of counterpoint with occasional excursions into vertical harmonies. The contrapuntal portions were made by a good craftsman and were clear in line and interesting in their interweavings. There was a middle section for strings, which rose to real beauty of melodic speech and opulence of polyphonic treatment. There was also a quasi-chorale part, which had sonority and musical quality. To be sure, one heard Mime, Alberich and Fafner momentarily, but the composition, nevertheless, had individuality and value. It did not proclaim itself the utterance of a genius, but of a young musician, who could handle the materials and methods of the contemporaneous progressives with confidence and certainty, and who had a good grip on form. The orchestra performed wonders of intonation. The conflicting keys preserved their independence, and the contrapuntal lines were firm and just.

Mr. Beck's music was succeeded by the F major symphony of Brahms, who was a progressive of half a century ago and is now a classic safely enshrined in the temple of ancient tonalities. There is nothing to be said about the third symphony that has not been said a hundred times before. Mr. Koussevitzky earned the gratitude of some music lovers by declining to adopt the soporific tempo frequently imposed upon the vital first movement. He read the entire symphony with regard for its lyric character, but without emasculating any part of it. The concluding number was Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," a piece which brilliantly tells us what a musician conceived when he looked at some paintings. Now if some one would only paint a picture created in his mind by a prelude and fugue of Bach! Even Boecklin never did that. Thus far the composers are ahead.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 4 - 1933

At Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an evening concert at which the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a particularly well-proportioned and keenly felt interpretation of the third symphony by Brahms; and an animated and colorful setting forth of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

A "first time in America" was Conrad Beck's (modern Swiss composer) orchestral piece, "Innominata." He is said to be a pupil of Honegger, and to write in the "linear contrapuntal style." That is exactly how his pallid music sounded last evening as it flitted into nothingness.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

CHRONICLE

Cambridge, Mass.

JAN 26 1933

ures for the family.

Fourth Symphony Concert

In Dr. Koussevitsky's absence, Concertmaster Richard Burgin made his annual appearance as conductor at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders theater on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Walton, overture, "Portsmouth Point"; Vaughan Williams, "Pastoral Symphony"; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain"; Stravinsky, Suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka."

Walton's piece is one of those modern things, noisy, a sort of piece that you cannot remember more than ten minutes after hearing it. It is good specimen of the kind of music written nowadays. Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral Symphony" was heard here for the first time. His musical meditations were, to say the least, monotonous; he uses several keys at once. He tries English folk dances, for instance in the Scherzo, which, however, gives sufficient interruption to the composer's meditation. There is a trumpet solo in the second movement and in the finale is a wordless singer, who has a sort of melody that is characteristic without its words. This melody makes a fitting ending. Adelle Alberts was the soprano.

One's impressions of such a work heard here for the first time, are necessarily vague, but Vaughan Williams, an English composer, has thrown all the strictness and academics of the English school to the four winds, and does things in this piece that all the classic purists would not have tried to do. They couldn't do it and get away with it. The piece was effectively and beautifully played as might have been expected.

Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," finished up by Rimsky-Korsakoff, not a most interesting composition, came before the Stravinsky suite. This suite sounded noisy, heavy. It is not a concert excerpt and wants to be heard under surroundings of the ballet and the stage. It was suggested that it had been heard too often and bare thin spots were noticed in the instrumentation. Mr. Burgin conducted most acceptably.

The fifth concert in the series will be given on Thursday evening, Feb. 9.

—H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

READING, PA.

EAGLE

JAN 25 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY

As a symphony orchestra can in the last analysis be no better than the musicians which comprise it, the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go far to explain the eminent qualities of this famous organization, which will be heard at the last of the Haage concerts at Rajah Theatre on Monday evening, Jan. 30. From all parts of the world have been drawn the 110 musicians which comprise the ranks of this orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. They are the finest that Europe and America have been able to provide. The concertmaster is Richard Burgin, the noted violinist and founder of the Burgin String Quartet. The leader of the cello section is Jean Bedetti, and that of the first viola Jean LeFranc. The leaders of the brass and woodwinds are Georg Boettcher, first horn; Georges Mager, first trumpet; Fernand Gillet, first oboe; Victor Polatschek, first clarinet; Georges Lauret, first flute; Abdon Laus, first bassoon, and Bernard Zighera, first harp. Making only a minimum of change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony from season to season, Koussevitzky is able to shape to his will an ensemble which is perfection itself, minutely responsive to his slightest indication.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

READING, PA.

EAGLE

JAN 30 1933

weeks.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT AT RAJAH

A rare event in the musical history of Reading will be the appearance of the world's famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its eminent conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in Rajah Theatre tonight, at 8:15, this being the last of the Haage series of concerts for the season. The orchestra, with its full personnel of 110 musicians, arrived by special train this morning from Boston. Owing to the many concerts given at Symphony Hall during the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra can give but few performances in other cities, outside of its regular five visits to Carnegie Hall, New York. The coming of the orchestra to Reading, therefore, is one of those events which may be counted upon to occur only at long intervals. Desirable seats are still available and selling at Rajah box office.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

CAMDEN, N. J.

POST

JAN 26 1933

NO MORE ORCHESTRAL VISITORS

Regrettable is the announcement that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra no longer will give an annual series of concerts in Philadelphia.

Economic conditions, of course, are responsible.

Thus, for the first time in many years, Philadelphia will be a one-orchestra city.

It has been only a few years since Philadelphia was visited not only by the New York Philharmonic but by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, five times annually, with four or five more concerts yearly by Dr. Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra, now merged with the New York Philharmonic.

Then there were occasional visits by the Cincinnati Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony, under Stock.

But now all that is over. The high cost of orchestral traveling, which includes not only the fares of 110 men but the cost of carrying all their instruments, fees of soloists, etc., gradually mounted to the point where the gracious custom of orchestral visiting had become a costly luxury.

The radio, of course, is another factor, since most of these orchestras play regularly before the microphone.

Anyway, Philadelphia will have to be content with her own orchestra. And seeing that it's rated as probably the finest anywhere, that ought not to be difficult.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

READING, PA.

EAGLE

(2)

JAN 30 1933

Boston Symphony Leader Here for Concert Says Music Is Like Food to Some

To some people music is a necessity like food or clothing. Thus declared Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which arrived in Reading this morning for the Haage concert at the Rajah theatre tonight.

"To those people who love music, a depression makes no difference," explained Director Koussevitsky. "The real lover of music will spend his last money to hear good music. The love for the arts shows how high the culture of a country is, and music is the greatest art."

Rectnly Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra appeared on the radio for the first time. He admitted that while the radio has some value in popularizing music, he would much rather direct a concert in a hall or auditorium for an audience than present it over the radio.

"To play over the radio is much more difficult than to play for an audience in a hall," he said. "The personal contact is lost. A radio audience after all is passive. Your hearers might be smoking, eating or reading a newspaper for all you know. Then, too, the audience does not have the benefit of that personal contact with the artists. After all, when you are playing over the radio, you are playing to a machine and not to people. That makes it difficult.

"I think the radio is very good, however, to make music popular. It is good for those people who cannot come to the city to attend concert. It is good for the people who live far away from the city, like farmers, and they can get an idea what is good music. The trouble with the radio is that there is too much different music. It makes it difficult for those people who have never heard good music for then they will not know what is bad music."

Dr. Koussevitsky believes that the day of jazz, that wild syncopation with its barbaric beat, is passing.

"Jazz is finished," he declared, "it remains because it cannot go immediately. For eight years jazz was with us but the mood is changing. In 15 years jazz will have been forgotten."

Dr. Koussevitsky does not mean that dance music will pass, but rather that the style of dancing will change. Each generation has its style of dancing, he explained, and he likened it to an overcoat.

"One time long overcoats are in style," he added. "Next season short overcoats are the style. There are styles in dancing, too."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

READING, PA.

TIMES

JAN 31 1933

SYMPHONY GIVES READING THRILL

Boston Orchestra Under Kousevitzky Heard in Haage Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony orchestra to Reading last night and gave music-lovers of Berks and half a dozen neighboring counties a thrill they'll not soon forget.

The concert was the last of the season's series under the imprimateur of George D. Haage. It marked the close of the twenty-fifth Haage season. That the impresario should choose the Boston symphony, that the symphony should choose to come to Reading, that Dr. Koussevitzky should choose an all-German program—these all were right and proper for the series' silver anniversary.

Honors Three Composers

Bach, Brahms, Wagner—these three and no more was L. J. Rogers, the Boston's librarian, required to browse through to find the scores for the concert. Because this year is the hundredth anniversary of Brahms birth, there was the lovely, lively "Eroica" or Third symphony. Because this year also is the fiftieth anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, there were selections from three Wagner operas: "Forest Murmurs," from "Siegfried;" Prelude and Love-Death, from "Tristan and Isolde;" and the mighty and mellifluous overture to Tannhauser. Two Bach string orchestra preludes arranged by Pick-Mangiagalli opened the program.

The program, of course, was anything but "light." With three tolerably lengthy Wagner items, it could not possibly be so. But under the cunning of Koussevitzky's baton and restless hands, what might ordinarily be a weighty and somniferous program never came within a mile of letting down the large audience for a split second.

Glorious Golden Music

There was the music, of course—glorious, golden music dripping from the strings, flowing from the woodwinds, rushing pell-mell from basses and tympani. And there was Koussevitzky the inimitable—alive as electricity, dynamic as dynamite, always and ever moving, moving, moving. Here's a man, indeed, who, when he leads an orchestra, leads an orchestra, if you get the idea. His slender baton plays the least important part in his direction. His left hand does as much as his right, his shoulders and head almost as much as his hands and arms, and his continuous moving about the podium to "contact" the various sections of the orchestra gives his feet and legs a share of the conductor's job.

And there are moments when hands, arms, legs, shoulders and baton are too inorticulate, so Dr. Koussevitzky "speaks" to his men. Not aloud, of course. But he mouths his directions and with the formation of his lips, the lift of brows, indicates and transfers to the orchestra his feeling for the music's interpretation.

Gets Splendid Response

And what music this gyrating, graceful maestro elicits from his men. The audience seemed especially to like the symphony and the "Tristan and Isolde" and "Tannhauser" numbers, to which Koussevitzky seemed most devotedly attentive. His mastery over the brass section was particularly noticeable in the overture which closed the program, lifting his musicians to their very highest pitch.

A nearly-capacity house heard the program. There were no encores. Dr. Koussevitzky was called back for many bows, which he shared with his men. In the crowd were some scores from towns and cities within a 100-mile radius of Reading.

On Lengthy Tour

The orchestra's present tour, which opened in Reading, will take it to Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and, on Friday night and Saturday afternoon to Carnegie Hall, New York, where it will play, for the first time in the metropolis, "Prophecy," by Frederick Converse. It is arranged for soprano and orchestra. Beata Malkin, Russian soprano who sang it at its first performance in Boston last December, will sing the same part in New York, Saturday afternoon.

The first concert of the newly-organized Reading Madrigal society will be sung at the Rajah theatre, February 23. Willy Richter is conductor of the society, which will devote itself to the works of such composers as Palestriana, Mozart, Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff, Bateson and Dowland.

E. M. S.

1120

Tel. Chelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

FEB 2 - 1933

Enthusiastic Audience Here Applauds Boston Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Score in Only Appearance Scheduled for Baltimore This Season; Program Wins Admiration of Large Attendance

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Had there been any doubt that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was entrenched among the outstanding musical organizations of the time it would have been dispelled by the concert Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directed at the Lyric last night. The occasion had so many points of beauty that I find contemplation of it impossible without a sigh of regret for the days when its annual series of concerts were the glory of Baltimore's season.

So spontaneous and hearty was the applause of the large audience that, I believe, if a vote had been taken on the spot, there would have been a large majority in favor of a regime assuring it at least four concerts here a winter instead of merely one.

Dr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of eminence; others, because of this or that individualistic trait or trick, may sweep an audience off its feet more quickly than he, but when it comes to artistic integrity and a style that is as much the result of sharply controlled emotional and imaginative powers as it is of technical finish, he is, I think, second to none. The selection and arrangement of numbers for his Lyric concert also increased admiration for him as a program maker.

It opened with an exquisite performance of the Overture to Weber's "Oberon" and closed with an equally illuminative reading of the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser"; between came Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Strauss' Tod und Verklarung." Here was a group of works, each recording in terms of undying beauty a master's inspiration, that compressed within two hours aeons of human experience and emotion. As I watched Dr. Koussevitzky and noted his unerring grasp of their content and his comprehension of their more elusive elements, I felt again how true it is that it takes a master to interpret a master.

The Strauss tone poem rose gradually and inevitably, as it should, from an abyss of gloom, through terror, despair, remorse, wild spiritual clamor and panic to the heights of exaltation; the Symphony was played in a way that recalled the remark of an understanding French critic (Romain Rolland, wasn't it?), when he called Beethoven "le grand consolateur."

The conception of the second movement, one of the most beautiful things in all music, was ineffably moving. It profited, I thought, by being taken at a tempo more closely allied to andante con moto than to the allegretto indicated by the score.

STRAUSS WALTZ BY SYMPHONY

POST — FEB 11

First Public Performance of Gruenberg's Symphony Given

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In length the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was exceptional. In interest it was variable. In several respects it was eventful; in one it was notable.

WALTZ FOR WINDUP

Not before, though the fact is of no great moment, had Dr. Koussevitzky conducted here Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave." The Symphony of Louis Gruenberg, not exactly a new work, since it was composed in 1919 and revised 10 years later, received yesterday its first public performance. After the Symphony came Walter Gieseking, playing with a transporting artistry, mated and matched by that of conductor and orchestra, the piano concerto of Mozart in C major, with which he made so lasting an impression at a pair of Symphony concerts seven years ago.

For the first time at these concerts there was performed, at the conclusion of the afternoon, the waltz of Johann Strauss, "Voices of Spring," while that composer's "Perpetuum Mobile," which last appeared on a programme of this orchestra in 1895, companioned it.

Symphony Fails to Impress

Dr. Koussevitzky had taken great pains with Mr. Gruenberg's Symphony conducting the work, as is ever his custom with a new piece, as though he were fully convinced of its worth and significance. Now a Symphony is a big undertaking, and having composed the one in question, Mr. Gruenberg was minded first to overhaul it and then to seek a performance. Yet since the piece had not been played when it was reasonably new, it would have been better for the composer to have put it out of his mind, so far as any advantage to his steadily growing reputation was concerned.

Music of no great import, but written in an idiom which is timely, may please, and even impress, if it comes quickly enough to performance; but bring out such a work belatedly and it is likely to fall as flat as fell upon some ears, Mr. Gruenberg's too long, too rambling, too diffuse, too derivative symphony of yesterday. The only convincing movement was the third, in which Mr. Gruenberg, who has a recurring Ethiopian obsession, makes use of native African thematic material. And this movement, to point the moral, was made when the symphony was revised. A whole symphony from the maturer, riper Gruenberg, recently so successful with his opera, "The Emperor Jones," might have been worth hearing—though it would seem that Mr. Gruenberg is not at his happiest in the writing of "absolute" music.

Applaud Mr. Gieseking

From first to last there was superlative playing yesterday, and skillful imaginative, sympathetic conducting. The audience received the new symphony with a cordiality that some found surprising.

The reception accorded the deserving Gieseking and with him the no less deserving Koussevitzky, may be described as rapturous; and though the hour was late, the audience, almost to a man and woman, remained to hear and applaud the charming music of Strauss.

15th Concert Fri. Sat

CONCERT NOTES

HER FEB 16

The concert announced for tonight by Beata Malkin, dramatic soprano, has been postponed on account of her illness.

The Chardon string quartet will give a concert of music by Austro-Hungaria composers in Brattle hall, Cambridge, tonight at 8:15 o'clock. Mozart, quintet in B flat minor (two violas); Bartock, string quartet op. 7 (composed in 1908), and Schubert's quartet in A minor. Georges Fourel, viola, will assist the quartet (Messrs. Langa, Knudson, Cauhape and Chardon) in Mozart's work.

Avis Charbonnel, pianist, will give a recital in Jordan hall next Saturday afternoon. Her program will include a sonata by George F. Boyle, Paderewski's Varied Theme, and pieces by Mariou Beuar, Ganz and De Falla.

The program of the symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will consist of the Prelude in "Parsifal" and the Good Friday Spell from the same work, and Beethoven's ninth symphony. The chorus, trained by T. Wallace Woodworth, will be the Bach Cantata Club. The solo singers will be Olga Averino, Nevada Van Der Vere, Robert Steele and Frederic Baer. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

The program of the symphony concerts for Feb. 24-25 will be as folows: Gluck-Mottl, Ballet-Suite; Schumann symphony No. 1, Stravinsky, "Sacre du Printemps."

Dr. Koussevitzy has arranged the following program for the Boston symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Wednesday, Feb. 22 at 8 P. M.: Haydn, the "Surprise" symphony (B. & H. No. 6); Liszt, piano concerto No. 1 E flat major (Gladys Heathcock); Franck symphony in D minor.

The Boston Flute Players Club will give a concert next Sunday afternoon at the Boston Art Club. The Burgin string quartet and Mr. Sanroma, pianist, will take part. The program: Hindemith, string quartet No. 4 (first time in Boston); Turina, Oracion del Torero; Prokofieff, sonata for two violins (first public performance in America); Brahms, quartet in A major op. 26.

GLOBE MUSIC FEB 11

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony concerts this week are distinguished by the presence of Walter Gieseking as soloist in Mozart's familiar C major piano concerto (K 467), and inclusion upon the program of some music by Johann Strauss. The remaining numbers are Mendelssohn's entertaining "Hebrides" overture and Louis Gruenberg's First Symphony.

The concerto that Mr Gieseking played yesterday is heard frequently, although not so often as to lie in danger of becoming hackneyed. Yet many pianists play it perfunctorily, seemingly blind to the endless beauties beneath the surface awaiting sympathetic hands and mind to bring them to light. Rarely a sensitive musician appears who recreates these beauties of instrumental song. Mr Gieseking did this in a performance that was one of the most remarkable for clairvoyance of interpretation that one has ever been privileged to hear. We have all learned to expect from Mr Gieseking—one of the most distinguished pianists of the time—performances consistently fine in taste and felicity of style. But yesterday he surpassed himself.

The rippling delicacy of his scales, the evenness of his arpeggios, his deeply expressive, unforced "singing" of the slow movement will be remembered. There was a time when the melodic simplicity and occasional naivete of some of Mozart's music were mistakenly accepted as triviality. This opinion, fortunately, is discredited today, and the majority realize the greatness, in its own way, of Mozart's music. We are made to realize this all the more keenly when an artist such as Mr Gieseking comes to lend his interpretive genius to the printed score.

Dr Koussevitzky's orchestral accompaniment seemed to be one of the best he has furnished for a Mozart concerto in recent seasons. It was light and sensitive, in perfect balance with the piano. No more enthusiastic applause than that which greeted Mr Gieseking has been forthcoming from the Friday audience this season.

It was a happy thought on Dr Koussevitzky's part to place Johann Strauss' "Perpetual Motion" and "Spring Voices" waltzes in a regular Symphony program. It has become the custom—no doubt properly, all things considered—to devote programs by great orchestras to music of serious character. But there is no reason why light music of value should not be heard now and then. And Strauss played by a first-rate orchestra is a rare pleasure. These pieces were thoroughly enjoyable yesterday, although they might have been accorded more of the proverbial Viennese clarity and grace. The "Perpetual Motion" served to display the orchestra's virtuosity in leggiero music.

Gruenberg's Symphony was played for the first time yesterday, but it it is not new, having been composed in 1919. The original third movement was discarded in 1929 and a substitute written. A large orchestra is required. The texture of the Symphony is complex and the general structure pretentious. Individuality of style is lacking. Ideas are present in disconcerting profusion and the result is a rathe turgid music. The second and thi movements, by far the best of t four, are notable for rhythmic vivaci and agreeable melodic and harmor effects. Perhaps Mr Gruenberg f that this symphony is a work of pro ise rather than achievement when wrote for the program book: "It with mingled feelings that I now lo back upon a composition about to ceive its first performance, which w written so many years ago, and whi is so different in feeling, techni and subject matter to what I do day."

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a the Prelude and "Good Friday Spe from Wagner's "Parsifal" will occu the Symphony concerts next wee The orchestra will be assisted by t Bach Cantata Club and the followin soloists: Olga Averino, soprano; Nevada Vanderveer, contralto; Rober Steel, tenor, and Frederic Baer, baritone.

C. W. D.

HER MUSIC FEB 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave its 15th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, overture, "The Hebrides." Gruenberg, Symphony No. 1, op. 17. Mozart. Concerto, C major, for piano (K. 467). Johann Strauss, Perpetuum Mobile and Fruehlingstimmen ("Voices of Spring"). Waltzes—first performances of the Waltzes at these concerts. Walter Gieseking was the pianist.

The symphony by Gruenberg was composed in 1919 and revised in 1929. Would that there had been still later revisions. The performance yesterday was the first anywhere. In spite of Dr. Koussevitsky's interest and the admirable performance by the orchestra of the difficult music, the symphony disappointed those who remembered other works by Mr. Gruenberg heard at these concerts; it is fatiguingly long when its contents are taken into consideration. The first movement is vague, thematically uninspired, and it wanders at will. The movement that hints at jazz has more character. The composer says that he has attempted to mould the whole work into homogeneous whole by utilizing themes from the first movement in the second; themes from the first and second in the third, and finally combining them all in the fourth. This "moving up" reminds one of a progressive euchre party, although the interest is more maintained in the game of cards, and the finale. The discussion after the players—52 of the visitors at the supper table—while the smell of coffee arises from the region below—is usually more joyous and exciting. Mr. Gruenberg also says, "Form can ever be only a frame for a work of art, material matter alone being of enduring value." True. In this instance, the question is, whether Mr. Gruenberg's material is here of even temporary value. To some hearers the symphony seemed interminable and, with the exception of what might be described as the invoking the spirit of jazz, uninteresting. Others in the audience pronounced the work "splendid"; were "thrilled" and so were happy. Nor did they apparently decide whether the symphony were "homogeneous," nor did they care whether the material matter would be of "enduring value." It was enough "that they liked it." And thus are hearers divided on all questions of art. Unless there are these warring opinions, any art is stagnant.

The once too familiar overture of Mendelssohn proves the justness of Debussy's remark that Gounod owed to the amiable—amiable in his music—German composer "that method of developing the melody in sequences which is so convenient when one is not in the mood." But it is rather surprising to find Villiers Stanford pointing out this trick as one of Mendelssohn's faults, for there was a time, a period of long duration, when Mendelssohn in England was held to be as blameless in his music as in his morals. Yet there are some pretty pages in this overture and Mendelssohn, like Hannibal in the play, was "a very pretty fellow in his day."

Mr. Gieseking by his exquisite playing of Mozart's beautiful concerto and Dr. Koussevitzy by his tasteful, equally beautiful accompaniment—Par nobile fratrum—gave unalloyed pleasure, though some might have preferred the concerto without Busoni's cadenzas which are hardly in the spirit of Mozart. The audience was quick to appreciate the super-excellence of the performance.

Let no one sniff because a waltz by Johann Strauss was played at a symphony concert. There are waltzes by Strauss that contain more pure music than is to be found in certain symphonies and symphonic poems. Was it Felix Weingartner who gave it as his opinion that the final number of a symphony concert should always be a Strauss waltz? The one chosen yesterday was often sung by Marcella Sembrich with peculiar brilliance and gusto. As for the "Perpetuum Mobile," it does not show Johann as a mad wag but it will serve for mild entertainment.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and the Good Friday Spell from the same opera; also Beethoven's 9th symphony: the chorus, Bach, The Cantata Club (Mr. Woodworth, conductor); the soloists, Mmes. Averino and Van Der Veer; Messrs. Steel and Baer. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the united forces.

Boston Concerts
Feb. 1933

3rd Tuesday Concert

Dr. Koussevitzky And the Classics

Trans Feb 8

THE historical series of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra advanced to its third stage yesterday afternoon. Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert had previously been heard. Yesterday the course jumped from the early to the late Romanticists—to Berlioz and Wagner—Berlioz with his huge, program symphony called the "Fantastic"; Wagner with the predude and concluding scene (called the "Love-Death") from "Tristan und Isolde" and with the overture to the early opera, "The Flying Dutchman." The world will hear much of the music of Wagner in the next few weeks in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of his death, Feb. 13, 1883. Yesterday's concert brought the first of it in Boston.

The performance of Berlioz's symphony was sheer magic. How often one has been told that of course the Fantastic Symphony is an important historic document, but that as music, apart from historic considerations, it is mostly pretty dull stuff. The answer to such an argument would have been found in yesterday's performance. And that performance was due entirely to the abilities of Dr. Koussevitzky to penetrate to the very roots of the score, to the core of the composer's intention, then to transmit what he finds to his men, to fire them with enthusiasms which have become his own.

This applies to the whole symphony: the dreaminess of the dream music, the recklessness of the "Passions," the swirling rhythms of the ball. But it applies most particularly to the March to the Scaffold, to the Scene in the Fields, to the Walpurgisnight's Dream. On paper the March to the Scaffold is only a march. Yesterday it was something uncanny, sinister, an atmosphere of sultry foreboding. From the handling of the rhythms, the blending of the tonal colors, came something that was more than an admixture of rhythm and color, a prophetic approach to a catastrophic end. This portrayal of an execution was such as to make the hanging of an Eulenspiegel, three-quarters of a century later, with greatly increased musical paraphernalia, not much more than child's play.

Against this realism one must balance the fineness of the Scene in the Fields. Never was pastoral music more gentle nor subtle. Once more magic was to be found in the singing of pastoral airs, the distant answering from the voices of the wood winds. The Saturnalia at the end, with its caricature of the essential melody, its broad and coarse intoning of the Dies Irae, managed to attain yet a step beyond all that had gone before.

If Berlioz at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands reached heights, the music of Wagner fared no less well. The passion of Tristan and Isolde, each for other, so perfectly described by Wagner in the words "Langsam und Schmachtend," was as perfectly set forth by conductor and orchestra. And so with the music of the Flying Dutchman. The overture is epitome of, rather than prelude to, the play. The sea music, the charactering melodies of the various personages it contains, woven into a web more closely knit, is in some ways better able to tell the musical story than the play itself. As such one heard it at Symphony Hall yesterday. . . . For the audience, suffice it to say that for all three pieces it was almost wildly appreciative.

A. H. M.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

HER By PHILIP HALE Feb 8

The third Tuesday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program comprised the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz; Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The work of Hector Berlioz has long been a stumbling block to the ultra-conservatives. If he has staunch admirers in England, as Newman and Harty, the Oxford school is inclined to sniff and have none of him. Pedagogues look at his harmonies on paper and are deaf to their wondrous sound. In New York some dismiss him as a sensationalist; others speak of him in a condescending, patronizing manner. "Yes, he knew a good deal about orchestration, and for his day was something of a fellow; but he lives chiefly by his Memoirs." Debussy in one breath admires him, calls him a genius; then found that his music was injuriously affected by his reading; that his music is too "literary"—he found the same fault with Beethoven. To him the chief merit of Berlioz lay in the "freedom of his creative genius; he was incapable of accepting "the wretched task of pandering to the public and encouraging its deliberate carelessness." He was not French, as were Couperin and Lully and Rameau. Yet it was Debussy who described the "Fantastic" symphony as "even that feverish masterpiece of romantic ardor which leaves one amazed that the music can interpret such extravagant situations without losing breath. Moreover, it affects one as would a battle of the elements."

How could Berlioz in the 30's escape the influence of the romantic movement to which French dramatists, poets, painters contributed in large measure? The movement that affected German writers and musicians—we have for example.

Boston has recognized the genius of Berlioz since 1851, when his overture to "Waverley" was performed here. Some of his more important works have been dropped from the concert repertoire; but the "Fantastic" symphony has been performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra alone at 15 concerts. The work is now over 100 years old. It wears well. The "March to the Scaffold" is still a thrilling, night-marish masterpiece; the first movement by its structure should satisfy the pedants; the finale, by its ingenuity, is eclipsed only by Liszt's ironical travesty of preceding themes in his "Faust" symphony, but what would Liszt and Wagner have done without Berlioz, master of orchestration.

It was natural, perhaps inevitable, that Wagner should follow Berlioz yesterday. The overture to the "Flying Dutchman" contains nearly everything that is essential in the opera. Only in the music from "Tristan" is the Wagner the Great, individual Wagner fully revealed. The brilliancy of the performance was fully appreciated. Seldom, if ever, in Boston has the "Fantastic" symphony been performed with such understanding, appreciation of its dramatic intensity, of the many beauties in the "Scene in the Meadows." For once this movement was not a bore. Yesterday there was a realization of the importance, the strength, the force and beauty of this great work.

Globe MUSIC Feb 8

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky turned his attention to "romantic" music of the 19th century at the third Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert yesterday. The program, illustrating a certain phase in the development of Symphonic music, was given over to Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and two Wagnerian excerpts, the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Berlioz' Symphony and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture are creations of youth. Berlioz was 27 when he composed his Symphony, Wagner 28 when he worked on his overture near Paris. Each put into his music the ardor, the naivete, and vivid power of imagination that are the proverbial attributes of young men. And chiefly by these qualities have the compositions survived. The styles of Symphony and overture today seem quaint and archaic, the technique insecure. Because the emotional feeling of each is feverish rather than profound, many pages are now more entertaining than moving. But the freshness that is synonymous with youth has remained, and doubtless will remain far into the future.

When fragments from "Tristan" and "The Flying Dutchman" are placed together on a program, it seems incredible that Wagner could have written both. Save for a few mannerisms of style which clung to Wagner through life, these two works are far apart in material and method. In "Tristan" Wagner had become a supreme master of instrumentation and dramatic composition. The sheer energy and turgid musical speech of youth had been refined into the profound, direct, and powerful utterance of a mature artist. Successive hearings of the "Tristan" music thrill and move some of us more deeply than ever. As Lawrence Gilman said, Wagner was in many respects an "Incomparable Master."

Dr Koussevitzky's superbly dramatic reading of the "Fantastic" Symphony is a masterpiece of interpretation. But to one listener, he plays the fragments from "Tristan" too slowly.

The next concert of this series will take place March 7.

C. W. D.

HONOR WAGNER AT SYMPHONY

Two Pieces Played at Tuesday Concert

Post Feb 8

As though in anticipation of the flood of Wagner programmes that will soon descend upon us in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of that composer's death, Dr. Koussevitzky offered two Wagerian excerpts at the supplementary Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. They were the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." The performance of the earlier work had the appropriate sweep, the proper suggestion of elemental force; that of the maturer Wagner's music disclosed the conductor's new sensitiveness towards and eloquence with these glowing pages, already made manifest at a recent pension fund concert.

The work of a contemporary of Wagner to whom this same "Tristan" Prelude was admittedly an enigma, the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, made the first part of the programme. The "Fantastique" is fast becoming a musical musuem piece and curiosity, something to excite amazement because of the time and circumstances of its composition rather than a work to be relished for its intrinsic interest and appeal. Dr. Koussevitzky's version of this extraordinary creation, already heard this season is one that glosses over the bare spots in the music and that makes the most of those portions that are still valid and persuasive.

The audience received this surprisingly excellent concert with due enthusiasm.

Music

Monitor Feb 8

Tuesday Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the third of its Tuesday concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was made up of the "Symphonie Fantastique" of Berlioz, and, presumbaly in observance of the Wagner anniversary, the "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod and the Overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer."

The symphony was poetically read and brilliantly performed. Dr. Koussevitzky does much to discomfort those who would dismiss Berlioz as "historically interesting." He gives full value to the composer's moments of tenderness and contemplation, and imparts to his more violent scenes a dramatic quality which discounts their romantic extravagance. His imaginative insight sustains interest in even the Scene in the Meadows, which without such aid tends to monotony. The audience rewarded conductor and players with prolonged applause.

L. A. S.

Music

Mon Feb 11

Boston Symphony

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK—Whoever or whatever the undesignated person or object or fancy may be that the piece of music, "Innominata," by the Swiss composer, Mr. Conrad Beck, celebrates, a New York audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, had the honor of being the first to hear about her, or it, at Carnegie Hall, on the evening of Feb. 3. Can the Nameless be a figure of legend, as viewed by a neo-classic eye—Medusa, for a guess, her head mirrored in the shield of a modern Theseus? Plentifully terrible, then, her visage, as represented by the dissonances of the strings at this concert. Nor are such expensive instruments as the B. S. O. violins needed for the picturing. Perhaps instead of a portrait, some unascended Alp, if there be such a thing, is meant; or possibly an abstraction of one sort or another is hinted at.

Take, however, the question of what you hear; especially noting a short passage in the middle of the work for the deep winds. Now when we roll a long triangle of sheet brass into a conical tube and let an artist of the proper fitness blow into the little end of it, we get an impressive tone, do we not? We obtain that low note, in the use of which Wagner was such a master. Beck, we can scarcely deny, is capable of echoing Wagner rather grandly in this regard, at least for a moment.

Change to Brahms, and the case is different. Let us not have things too vociferous in his Symphony No. 3 in F major; for Brahms composes in ideas, we may be sure, more than in sounds. Pass, though, to Moussorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition," and you have a composer going right in for sound for the sound's sake; or at least you have in Ravel an arranger doing so. Richly and magnificently sang B. S. O. trumpets, horns, trombones and tuba in the "Pictures."

W. P. T.

In and Around Concert-Halls In This Town

TRANS — FEB 7

New York Anticipates Boston, More Anniversary Wagner, The Present Monteux

IN the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last Friday at New York, Dr. Koussevitzky included a piece announced last autumn for production in the course of the season but as yet unheard in Symphony Hall—"Innominata," work of Conrad Beck, the Swiss modernist who dwells for the most part at Paris in Honegger's circle. One of his brief Symphonies for String Orchestra was played here five years ago and received coldly. Last winter, his Concerto for String Quartet and Chamber Orchestra was heard in Sanders Theater at Harvard, when and where a younger audience deservedly and warmly applauded it. Commenting on "Innominata," the reviewers in New York, with a single exception, merely re-stated for the twentieth time their prejudices against "neo-classic" music. The exception was the valiant Henderson of The Sun who heard Monsieur Beck's piece objectively and open-mindedly; then wrote of it informingly:

"We do not know why the work was called 'Nameless'; but by the simple act of listening, one learned that it was written in the polytonal manner and in long parallels of counterpoint with occasional excursions into vertical harmonies. The contrapuntal portions were made by a good craftsman and were clear in line and interesting in their interweavings. There was a middle section for strings, which rose to real beauty of melodic speech and opulence of polyphonic treatment. There was also a quasi-chorale part, which had sonority and musical quality. To be sure, one heard Mime, Alberich and Fafner momentarily, but the composition, nevertheless, had individuality and value. It did not proclaim itself the utterance of a genius, but of a young musician, who could handle the materials and methods of the contemporaneous progressives with confidence and certainty, and who had a good grip on form. The orchestra performed wonders of intonation. The conflicting keys preserved their independence, and the contrapuntal lines were firm and just."

Koussevitzkian Brahms

About Brahms's Third Symphony as played by Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Henderson had also a timely word: "Beck's music was succeeded by the symphony in F major of Brahms, who was a progressive of half a century ago and is now a classic safely enshrined in the temple of ancient tonalities. There is nothing to be said about the third symphony that has not been said a hundred times before. Mr. Koussevitzky earned the gratitude of some music-lovers by declining to adopt the soporific tempo frequently imposed upon the vital first movement. He read the entire symphony with regard for its lyric character, but without emasculating any part of it."

In The Times as well, "H. T." wrote warmly of this Koussevitzkian Brahms: "The conductor and his men gave Brahms's Symphony an exquisitely sensitive performance. The first and last movements, built on big lines, were opulent and full-blooded, while the second and third were delicate, lyrical and crystal-clear. This interpretation was an excellent example of the tone of burnished gold that this orchestra can produce and the absolute and precise coherence of its ensemble playing.

And Ravel

"Nor were these qualities less to be noted," continues "H. T." in the Musorgsky-Ravel music. "Pictures at an Exhibition." Here was a brilliant interpretation of music in another vein, music that is piquant, laughing and penetratingly observant. It would have delighted Ravel to hear how the woodwinds and brasses gave the exact tang to his ideas; how the strings sang the broad, flowing melodies; and how climaxes were established unerringly and with striking culminating effect. By more than mere technical virtuosity, Mr. Koussevitzky and his players brought to life the tonal pictures that Musorgsky envisaged."

114

4th Monday Concert

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO WAGNER

Entire List Played Last Night From His Pen

Post Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since the Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the Monday series, fell upon the 50th anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, it was but natural that Dr. Koussevitzky should mark the occasion with a memorial programme. Not long ago a Pension Fund concert had been devoted to Wagnerian excerpts; the programme of last Tuesday's concert contained two more, as will that of the concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

ALL WAGNER LIST

There has been some doubling up in all this, but four of the pieces played last evening were, so far as the concerts under discussion are concerned, peculiar to this particular one. They were the Overture to "Rienzi," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the Overture to "Tannhauser." The Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Death Music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods" completed the list.

There was, then, the youthful, sometimes vulgar Wagner of his first operatic success, the fast ripening Wagner of second and third operas after this "Rienzi" and, finally, in the Idyl that was birthday gift to Cosima, and in the fragments from "Tristan" and "Gotterdammerung," examples of the fully matured composer and music dramatist. So wide was Wagner's range that we may have one opera for a favorite one year and another the next. If we tire of the transcendant yearning and passion of "Tristan," there is the mellow humanity of "Die Meistersinger" or the pagan freshness, the elemental strength of the operas of "The Ring." If we are mystically minded there is "Parsifal."

If last evening's programme did not offer all of these things it offered some of them. And the "Idyl," exquisitely played, has a flavor all its own, a tenderness that not even "Die Meistersinger" can match.

This rare performance of the Idyl, the somberly magnificent presentation of the funeral music and the stirring performance of the "Tannhauser" Overture were the summit of the concert. Despite the never-failing, ever-changing beauty of the orchestral tone in the other excerpts, each of them was marred, as a whole or in part, by the slowness of pace that caused the music to lose in point what it gained in impressiveness.

There was much enthusiasm throughout the concert, but it is pity that the funeral music was not received in silence as mark of reverence to a composer, the equal of whom will probably not be seen again.

Wagner Music for His Anniversary

[illegible] Feb 14

ON the thirteenth day of February, 1883, Richard Wagner departed this life. This was exactly fifty years ago yesterday. To mark the occasion, Dr. Koussevitzky, alive as always to anniversaries, prepared for last evening's concert a complete program of excerpts from Wagner's operas. On Tuesday and Thursday of last week, on Friday and Saturday of this week the rites of remembrance have extended or will extend themselves by the inclusion of more of Wagner's music. Last evening the operas represented were "Rienzi" by its overture, "Lohengrin" by its prelude, "Tristan und Isolde" by its prelude and its concluding scene, called the "Love-Death"; "Götterdämmerung" by the death music of Siegfried, "Tannhäuser" by its overture.

The program also included the exquisite "Siegfried Idyll" whichi Rchard wrote as a birthday present for Cosima. Add to these "The Flying Dutchman" which was represented last week by its overture, "Siegfried" by the music of the murmuring forest, and "Parsifal," which is to be represented on Friday and Saturday by its prelude and the so-called "Good Friday Music," and the conductor's list of anniversary compositions is complete. A comprehensive list it is, including early as well as late works, omitting only "The Mastersingers," but including two selections from the "Nibelungen Ring" though "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," a double selection from "Tristan" and two selections from "Parsifal."

Here then, at last evening's concert, Wagner was heard from many angles and in a wide range of moods: he was heard in the fervors of the religious exaltation which could be his when it proved also to be "good theater," as in "Lohengrin" and parts of "Tannhäuser"; in the release of high and consuming passion, as in "Tristan" and in another sense, again "Tannhäuser"; in the pomp and glitter of his early experimental days when he was still a writer of "romantic opera" rather than of studied "music drama," as in the later years—"Rienzi" He was heard in solemnities not matched anywhere save in some portions of "Parsifal," in the music for his beloved hero, Siegfried, in "Götterdämmerung"; in the charm with which he clothed the domestic piece of compliment to Cosima and delight in his young son—the "Siegfried Idyll."

To each Dr. Koussevitzky lent a charactering hand, brought its own mood and feeling. Nevertheless, it cannot successfully be denied that the unbidden influence of one Louis Gruenberg still cast a lengthening shadow over much of the performance. An overtaxing week of rehearsals and extra rehearsals left effects that could hardly be shaken off in two days. The tension of Saturday's concert over, relaxation was bound to set in. Many a tempo came more slowly than it would probably have otherwise. And the flame of that invigorating vitality which is the distinguishing earmark of so much of Dr. Koussevitzky's work, whether the rate of speed of the work n hand be fast or slow, burned somewhat more dimly than usual.

Considering the strenuous trip of two weeks ago, the exactions of last week, we were undoubtedly fortunate in finding the effects of the inevitable reaction not greater than they actually proved to be. For the public probably no music could have been better chosen to minimize, by its intrinsic merits, this natural reaction. The music and its performance gave evident pleasure. Lusty applause in sufficient amounts was never lacking.

A. H. M.

Herald MUSIC Feb 14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The fourth of the regular Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night at Symphony hall. Music by Richard Wagner was played; Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting. This was the program:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."
Death music of Siegfried, from "Dusk of the Gods."
Siegfried Idyll.
Overture to "Tannhauser."

It was a program of favorite excerpts from Wagner. There was Wagner when he first began to find his own language of expression in music—the Wagner in whom hero-worship had just begun to ferment, later to turn into that madding liquor which he poured into the operas of the hero gods. There was Wagner at his most etheral, most remotely devotional, in the mounting prayer which is the prelude to "Lohengrin." Wagner as the greatest writer of love music—the Wagner of "Tristan und Isolde," in the brooding, half magical prelude, and the sobbing love-death. The tender German dreaminess of the Siegfried Idyll. In the magnificently triumphal death music of Siegfried there was Wagner at his most restrained and most powerful. There was the inventive tunefulness and dexterity of the Wagner who lavishec melodies on "Tannhauser," and crowded more than three complete ones into the prelude.

But the program was not balanced well, either chronologically or emotionally. The Siegfried Idyll lost much because of its position and the Tannhauser prelude had people reaching for their rubbers as it rushed toward the anticipated brilliant finish. Not a rubber would have been prematurely lifted had the bitter passion of the Liebestod closed the concert.

The orchestra, not playing with its customary perfection of detail, or sharp, machine-clean attacks, took on, through those very lapses of the moment, a sort of inner life, which flowed through the music and filled it with that sense of infinite movement and development which seems most characteristic of Wagner.

Many a young experimenter in orchestration might well cease trying to improve upon the shimmering backgrounds of sound Wagner could set so easily with a few violins; many another could stop wondering how to give dignity and sombreness to death music without sacrificing rhythmic variety, by studying the score of the Siegfried Death Music.

hTe use of cymbals though, seems increasingly unnecessary, except muted. Solemnly clashed, they distract from rather than add to orchestral expressiveness. Are they not perhaps an outgrown convention, no longer necessary for effect since the resources of orchestration have been so enriched since Rimsky-Korsakoff, Wagner, Strauss and Ravel?

There was a large audience, which applauded the conductor and orchestra warmly.

E. B.

Wagner Classics on Symphony Program

By MOSES SMITH

The fourth concert of the Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played exactly 50 years after the death of Richard Wagner. Therefore, it was inevitable that Serge Koussevtizky should set a program composed entirely of the works of that master magician in the art of tone.

AMER

The program was what might be called "representative" of the achievements of Wagner, beginning with the early overture to "Rienzi" (sound and fury a la Meyerbeer), including the sonorous and sensuous overture to "Tannhauser" and the prelude to "Lohengrin," a perfect tone-poem; the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," the heaven-rending death music of Siegfried from "Gotterdaemmerung," and the exquisite Siegfried Idyll.

FEB 14

In this familiar music, which is for the most part as fresh today as ever, the conductor and orchestra exercised familiar virtues. The orchestra attained extraordinary sonority and beauty of tone and plasticity of phrase, though here and there an attack may not have been as precise as customarily. On the whole, however, a brilliant concert, which was heard with admiration approaching awe by the large audience, and which was enthusiastically applauded.

Music

Mon. Feb 14

Wagner Program

In observance of the Wagner anniversary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth program of the Monday series, presented last night in Symphony Hall, was made up of the Overture to "Rienzi," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," the "Siegfried Idyll" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

The "Rienzi" Overture received an even more dramatized performance than usual, with the early measures taken at an excessively slow tempo in order to make the conclusion overwhelming. The effect was achieved. The "Lohengrin" Prelude had an ethereal utterance, slightly marred at the close by uncertain intonation in the first violin section. The "Tristan" music, somewhat ragged in parts because of over-meticulousness, came to a thrilling climax. The Siegfried Funeral Music was impressively played, and the "Siegfried Idyll," one of the most consistently lovely of Wagner's scores, was interpreted with a rare subtlety of expressive beauty. The audience, which was large, was warmly applausive.

L. A. S.

GLOBE MUSIC FEB 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At about 2 o'clock on Tuesday, Feb 13, 1883, Cosima Wagner and a guest sat at luncheon in the Palazzo Vendramin, in Venice, where the Wagner family was spending the Winter. The day was dismal and rainy. Absent from the table was Richard Wagner, who had remained in his own apartment. He had been suffering from heart attacks. Presently his bell was heard to ring, and a frightened servant summoned Cosima to his side. Frau Wagner found the master gripped in the anguishing pain of an extremely severe seizure. In a short time Wagner had sunk down upon a sofa in his dressing room, his head cushioned against his wife's shoulder. And there his heart stopped beating.

Thus left a frail body, a steadfast soul and mighty mind which had opened up new and glorious paths in the realm of music, a soul and mind which disrupted the musical theories of the 19th century, and which have ever since had powerful influence upon the art and science of composition.

Since yesterday marked the 50th year since Wagner's passing, the Monday evening Symphony concert was devoted to his memory. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the Overture to "Rienzi," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Siegfried's Death Music from "The Dusk of the Gods," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

The performance of these excerpts was in keeping with the general style of Dr Koussevitzky's personal and glowing interpretations. The Death music took on greater splendor and force than ever. To one listener, however, the tempi of the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Rienzi" overture, and the fragments from "Tristan" were too slow. Strangely enough—for the Boston Symphony almost never makes perceptible errors—there were a few slips from pitch and at least one technical mistake at the beginning of the Death music.

This program was representative of early and mature Wagner, although it followed conventional lines. One would have preferred, say, the Introduction to the third act of "Meistersinger" to the "Rienzi" overture. Nevertheless, the evening was one of unceasing pleasure.

The next Monday evening concert comes on March 13.

C. W. D.

Wagner Music Hardily Resists Time's Ravages

Adv

By Moses Smith
Music Editor

Feb 6

ONE WEEK from tomorrow marks the semi-centennial of Richard Wagner's death. The master-necromancer of tone had heard his swan song, "Parsifal," performed for the first time at Bayreuth in the summer of 1882. The preparations for the production had been long and arduous, and Wagner went for rest and convalescence to Venice for the winter. But his full life had spun itself out. At the palazzo Vendramin, facing the Grand Canal, Wagner died on February 13, 1883.

In retrospect the elapsed time seems both more and less than half a century. On the one hand, it is almost incredible that many now alive remember clearly the master's possing, that they remember before that the actual performance of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, and even were interested protagonists in the vital controversy that raged over Wagner's music. Is it really less than a lifetime since Wagner was followed by the bold and brilliant Strauss, the sensitive and Gallic Debussy, the rise of 'travinsky and of Schonberg, the eat War, and the whole post-war school of ultra-modern com posers?

* * *

THESE are but a few of the names and tendencies that have so crowded the period after Wagner's death as to make it seem much longer than it has been. Viewed in another light, however, the event appears nearer, almost of our time. He is still the most alive in spirit of all the composers who have died in the flesh—with the possible exception of Brahms. I mean that his music still lives—healthy and showing no appreciable signs of wearing out.

The point is brought out with dazzling clearness by comparing Wagner's music to Debussy's. It is one of the commonplaces of musical criticism that composers tend to "date." A good second-rater like, let us say, Delibas, entertained his contemporary audience, who may even have fancied that here was the stuff of greatness. As the years pass, however, and as the music becomes thrice familiar, the dross that is mixed with the gold becomes more and more apparent. The music begins to lose its vitality; it is "dated." of another time. One may still take pleasure, but the thrill of discovery is gone.

The same process goes on in the case of a first-class talent, except that the process is slower. Many passages in the music of Beethoven are now dead for our purposes. The fact that so much of his work still lives is a measure of his titanic stature. Now Debussy died only 15 years ago. During his life-time he wrought a miniature revolution in the art of tone. Yet even much of his music has begun to "date."

The astonishing thing about Wagner is that, in this sense, his music is still contemporary. Of course you will find here and there pages, and even whole scores, which are worn and scarred with the passage of time. But these are the exceptions. Most of "Tristan," the "Ring," "Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," even "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser," continue to cast their spell.

* * *

DURING the present season the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an all-Wagner program. I remember approaching the concert hall with something of a sigh, anticipating boredom on hearing Wagner again. Yet the orchestra had no sooner begun to sound the familiar tones than I was as alert, as intense a listener as on first hearing. And so with audiences. Not all the sneering of the modernists has diminished the hold of Wagner on the ear and hearts of listeners.

Wagner's music goes on, impervious apparently to the assaults of time. Nothing is so indicative of his continuing popularity as the comparatively meager plans for celebrating the approaching anniversary. A lesser light would have been "revived"; special programs and festivals of his works would have been arranged. The fact that, in this country at least, but few commemorative programs will be given shows the his name still lives in the daily round of music. There is indeed no need to "revive" him.

In Boston, indeed, we haven't heard his music enough,

15th

114

4th Monday Concert

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO WAGNER

Entire List Played Last Night From His Pen

Post Feb 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since the Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the Monday series, fell upon the 50th anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, it was but natural that Dr. Koussevitzky should mark the occasion with a memorial programme. Not long ago a Pension Fund concert had been devoted to Wagnerian excerpts; the programme of last Tuesday's concert contained two more, as will that of the concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

ALL WAGNER LIST

There has been some doubling up in all this, but four of the pieces played last evening were, so far as the concerts under discussion are concerned, peculiar to this particular one. They were the Overture to "Rienzi," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the Overture to "Tannhauser." The Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Death Music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods" completed the list.

There was, then, the youthful, sometimes vulgar Wagner of his first operatic success, the fast ripening Wagner of second and third operas after this "Rienzi" and, finally, in the Idyl that was birthday gift to Cosima, and in the fragments from "Tristan" and "Gotterdammerung," examples of the fully matured composer and music dramatist. So wide was Wagner's range that we may have one opera for a favorite one year and another the next. If we tire of the transcendant yearning and passion of "Tristan," there is the mellow humanity of "Die Meistersinger" or the pagan freshness, the elemental strength of the operas of "The Ring." If we are mystically minded there is "Parsifal."

If last evening's programme did not offer all of these things it offered some of them. And the "Idyl," exquisitely played, has a flavor all its own, a tenderness that not even "Die Meistersinger" can match.

This rare performance of the Idyl, the somberly magnificent presentation of the funeral music and the stirring performance of the "Tannhauser" Overture were the summit of the concert. Despite the never-failing, ever-changing beauty of the orchestral tone in the other excerpts, each of them was marred, as a whole or in part, by the slowness of pace that caused the music to lose in point what it gained in impressiveness.

There was much enthusiasm throughout the concert, but it is pity that the funeral music was not received in silence as mark of reverence to a composer, the equal of whom will probably not be seen again.

Wagner Music for His Anniversary

Trans. Feb 14

ON the thirteenth day of February, 1883, Richard Wagner departed this life. This was exactly fifty years ago yesterday. To mark the occasion, Dr. Koussevitzky, alive as always to anniversaries, prepared for last evening's concert a complete program of excerpts from Wagner's operas. On Tuesday and Thursday of last week, on Friday and Saturday of this week the rites of remembrance have extended or will extend themselves by the inclusion of more of Wagner's music. Last evening the operas represented were "Rienzi" by its overture, "Lohengrin" by its prelude, "Tristan und Isolde" by its prelude and its concluding scene, called the "Love-Death"; "Götterdämmerung" by the death music of Siegfried, "Tannhäuser" by its overture.

The program also included the exquisite "Siegfried Idyll" whichi Rchard wrote as a birthday present for Cosima. Add to these "The Flying Dutchman" which was represented last week by its overture, "Siegfried" by the music of the murmuring forest, and "Parsifal," which is to be represented on Friday and Saturday by its prelude and the so-called "Good Friday Music," and the conductor's list of anniversary compositions is complete. A comprehensive list it is, including early as well as late works, omitting only "The Mastersingers," but including two selections from the "Nibelungen Ring" though "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," a double selection from "Tristan" and two selections from "Parsifal."

Here then, at last evening's concert, Wagner was heard from many angles and in a wide range of moods: he was heard in the fervors of the religious exaltation which could be his when it proved also to be "good theater." as in "Lohengrin" and parts of "Tannhäuser"; in the release of high and consuming passion, as in "Tristan" and in another sense, again "Tannhäuser"; in the pomp and glitter of his early experimental days when he was still a writer of "romantic opera" rather than of studied "music drama," as in the later years—"Rienzi" He was heard in solemnities not matched anywhere save in some portions of "Parsifal," in the music for his beloved hero, Siegfried, in "Götterdämmerung"; in the charm with which he clothed the domestic piece of compliment to Cosima and delight in his young son—the "Siegfried Idyll."

To each Dr. Koussevitzky lent a charactering hand, brought its own mood and feeling. Nevertheless, it cannot successfully be denied that the unbidden influence of one Louis Gruenberg still cast a lengthening shadow over much of the performance. An overtaxing week of rehearsals and extra rehearsals left effects that could hardly be shaken off in two days. The tension of Saturday's concert over, relaxation was bound to set in. Many a tempo came more slowly than it would probably have otherwise. And the flame of that invigorating vitality which is the distinguishing earmark of so much of Dr. Koussevitzky's work, whether the rate of speed of the work n hand be fast or slow, burned somewhat more dimly than usual.

Considering the strenuous trip of two weeks ago, the exactions of last week, we were undoubtedly fortunate in finding the effects of the inevitable reaction not greater than they actually proved to be. For the public probably no music could have been better chosen to minimize, by its intrinsic merits, this natural reaction. The music and its performance gave evident pleasure. Lusty applause in sufficient amounts was never lacking.

A. H. M.

MUSIC

Herald Feb 14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The fourth of the regular Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night at Symphony hall. Music by Richard Wagner was played; Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting. This was the program:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde."
Death music of Siegfried, from "Dusk of the Gods."
Siegfried Idyll.
Overture to "Tannhauser."

It was a program of favorite excerpts from Wagner. There was Wagner when he first began to find his own language of expression in music—the Wagner in whom hero-worship had just begun to ferment, later to turn into that madding liquor which he poured into the operas of the hero gods. There was Wagner at his most etheral, most remotely devotional, in the mounting prayer which is the prelude to "Lohengrin." Wagner as the greatest writer of love music—the Wagner of "Tristan und Isolde," in the brooding, half magical prelude, and the sobbing love-death. The tender German dreaminess of the Siegfried Idyll. In the magnificently triumphal death music of Siegfried there was Wagner at his most restrained and most powerful. There was the inventive tunefulness and dexterity of the Wagner who lavished melodies on "Tannhauser," and crowded more than three complete ones into the prelude.

But the program was not balanced well, either chronologically or emotionally. The Siegfried Idyll lost much because of its position and the Tannhauser prelude had people reaching for their rubbers as it rushed toward the anticipated brilliant finish. Not a rubber would have been prematurely lifted had the bitter passion of the Liebestod closed the concert.

The orchestra, not playing with its customary perfection of detail, or sharp, machine-clean attacks, took on, through those very lapses of the moment, a sort of inner life, which flowed through the music and filled it with that sense of infinite movement and development which seems most characteristic of Wagner.

Many a young experimenter in orchestration might well cease trying to improve upon the shimmering backgrounds of sound Wagner could set so easily with a few violins; many another could stop wondering how to give dignity and sombreness to death music without sacrificing rhythmic variety, by studying the score of the Siegfried Death Music.

hTe use of cymbals though, seems increasingly unnecessary, except muted. Solemnly clashed, they distract from rather than add to orchestral expressiveness. Are they not perhaps an outgrown convention, no longer necessary for effect since the resources of orchestration have been so enriched since Rimsky-Korsakoff, Wagner, Strauss and Ravel?

There was a large audience, which applauded the conductor and orchestra warmly.

E. B.

Wagner Classics on Symphony Program

By MOSES SMITH

AMER

The fourth concert of the Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played exactly 50 years after the death of Richard Wagner. Therefore, it was inevitable that Serge Koussevtizky should set a program composed entirely of the works of that master magician in the art of tone.

The program was what might be called "representative" of the achievements of Wagner, beginning with the early overture to "Rienzi" (sound and fury a la Meyerbeer), including the sonorous and sensuous overture to "Tannhauser" and the prelude to "Lohengrin," a perfect tone-poem; the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde," the heaven-rending death music of Siegfried from "Gotterdaemmerung," and the exquisite Siegfried Idyll.

FEB 14

In this familiar music, which is for the most part as fresh today as ever, the conductor and orchestra exercised familiar virtues. The orchestra attained extraordinary sonority and beauty of tone and plasticity of phrase, though here and there an attack may not have been as precise as customarily. On the whole, however, a brilliant concert, which was heard with admiration approaching awe by the large audience, and which was enthusiastically applauded.

Music

Mon. Feb 14

Wagner Program

In observance of the Wagner anniversary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth program of the Monday series, presented last night in Symphony Hall, was made up of the Overture to "Rienzi," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung," the "Siegfried Idyll" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

The "Rienzi" Overture received an even more dramatized performance than usual, with the early measures taken at an excessively slow tempo in order to make the conclusion overwhelming. The effect was achieved. The "Lohengrin" Prelude had an ethereal utterance, slightly marred at the close by uncertain intonation in the first violin section. The "Tristan" music, somewhat ragged in parts because of over-meticulousness, came to a thrilling climax. The Siegfried Funeral Music was impressively played, and the "Siegfried Idyll," one of the most consistently lovely of Wagner's scores, was interpreted with a rare subtlety of expressive beauty. The audience, which was large, was warmly applausive.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

GLOBE FEB 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At about 2 o'clock on Tuesday, Feb 13, 1883, Cosima Wagner and a guest sat at luncheon in the Palazzo Vendramin, in Venice, where the Wagner family was spending the Winter. The day was dismal and rainy. Absent from the table was Richard Wagner, who had remained in his own apartment. He had been suffering from heart attacks. Presently his bell was heard to ring, and a frightened servant summoned Cosima to his side. Frau Wagner found the master gripped in the anguishing pain of an extremely severe seizure. In a short time Wagner had sunk down upon a sofa in his dressing room, his head cushioned against his wife's shoulder. And there his heart stopped beating.

Thus left a frail body, a steadfast soul and mighty mind which had opened up new and glorious paths in the realm of music, a soul and mind which disrupted the musical theories of the 19th century, and which have ever since had powerful influence upon the art and science of composition.

Since yesterday marked the 50th year since Wagner's passing, the Monday evening Symphony concert was devoted to his memory. Dr Koussevitzky conducted the Overture to "Rienzi," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Siegfried's Death Music from "The Dusk of the Gods," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

The performance of these excerpts was in keeping with the general style of Dr Koussevitzky's personal and glowing interpretations. The Death music took on greater splendor and force than ever. To one listener, however, the tempi of the "Lohengrin" prelude, the "Rienzi" overture, and the fragments from "Tristan" were too slow. Strangely enough—for the Boston Symphony almost never makes perceptible errors—there were a few slips from pitch and at least one technical mistake at the beginning of the Death music.

This program was representative of early and mature Wagner, although it followed conventional lines. One would have preferred, say, the Introduction to the third act of "Meistersinger" to the "Rienzi" overture. Nevertheless, the evening was one of unceasing pleasure.

The next Monday evening concert comes on March 13.

C. W. D.

Wagner Music Hardily Resists Time's Ravages

Adv

By Moses Smith
Music Editor

Feb 6

ONE WEEK from tomorrow marks the semi-centennial of Richard Wagner's death. The master-necromancer of tone had heard his swan song, "Parsifal," performed for the first time at Bayreuth in the summer of 1882. The preparations for the production had been long and arduous, and Wagner went for rest and convalescence to Venice for the winter. But his full life had spun itself out. At the palazzo Vendramin, facing the Grand Canal, Wagner died on February 13, 1883.

In retrospect the elapsed time seems both more and less than half a century. On the one hand, it is almost incredible that many now alive remember clearly the master's possing, that they remember before that the actual performance of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, and even were interested protagonists in the vital controversy that raged over Wagner's music. Is it really less than a lifetime since Wagner was followed by the bold and brilliant Strauss, the sensitive and Gallic Debussy, the rise of 'travinsky and of Schonberg, the eat War, and the whole post-war school of ultra-modern com posers?

* * *

THESE are but a few of the names and tendencies that have so crowded the period after Wagner's death as to make it seem much longer than it has been. Viewed in another light, however, the event appears nearer, almost of our time. He is still the most alive in spirit of all the composers who have died in the flesh—with the possible exception of Brahms. I mean that his music still lives—healthy and showing no appreciable signs of wearing out.

The point is brought out with dazzling clearness by comparing Wagner's music to Debussy's. It is one of the commonplaces of musical criticism that composers tend to "date." A good second-rater like, let us say, Delibas, entertained his contemporary audience, who may even have fancied that here was the stuff of greatness. As the years pass, however, and as the music becomes thrice familiar, the dross that is mixed with the gold becomes more and more apparent. The music begins to lose its vitality; it is "dated." of another time. One may still take pleasure, but the thrill of discovery is gone.

The same process goes on in the case of a first-class talent, except that the process is slower. Many passages in the music of Beethoven are now dead for our purposes. The fact that so much of his work still lives is a measure of his titanic stature. Now Debussy died only 15 years ago. During his life-time he wrought a miniature revolution in the art of tone. Yet even much of his music has begun to "date."

The astonishing thing about Wagner is that, in this sense, his music is still contemporary. Of course you will find here and there pages, and even whole scores, which are worn and scarred with the passage of time. But these are the exceptions. Most of "Tristan," the "Ring," "Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," even "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser," continue to cast their spell.

* * *

DURING the present season the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave an all-Wagner program. I remember approaching the concert hall with something of a sigh, anticipating boredom on hearing Wagner again. Yet the orchestra had no sooner begun to sound the familiar tones than I was as alert, as intense a listener as on first hearing. And so with audiences. Not all the sneering of the modernists has diminished the hold of Wagner on the ear and hearts of listeners.

Wagner's music goes on, impervious apparently to the assaults of time. Nothing is so indicative of his continuing popularity as the comparatively meager plans for celebrating the approaching anniversary. A lesser light would have been "revived"; special programs and festivals of his works would have been arranged. The fact that, in this country at least, but few commemorative programs will be given shows tha his name still lives in the daily round of music. There is no need to "revive" him.

In Boston, indeed, we haven't heard his music enough, t

Gruenberg in Prospect for Symphony Hall

TRANS — FEB 9

Bringing His First Symphony To Be Heard from Dr. Koussevitzky

At this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky is playing for the first time anywhere the First Symphony by Mr. Louis Gruenberg of 'Emperor Jones" fame. The symphony was written as long ago as 1919. The composer gives information that it was revised in 1929. At this time the original Third movement, a Passacaglia, was replaced by an entirely new movement, of which more later. The symphony is in process of publication by the Universal Edition of Vienna, under copyright date of 1931.

Of Mr. Gruenberg, John Tasker Howard has appropriately written in his book, "Our American Music": "He has written colorful music, representative of modern times and recent musical developments, but always built on a basis of organized and often pleasurable sound. His specialty has been symphonic treatment of jazz; seeking to develop its medium so that its rigidity will be overcome, and that it may become something more than mere entertainment." Mr. Howard also quotes Mr. Lawrence Gilman, writing about a New York performance of Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930: "Perhaps Mr. Gruenberg is, after all, an incurable romanticist, for one caught him in the act of glancing a bit longingly over his shoulder at the love-making of Pelleas and Melisande and the gallantries of the Rosenkavalier as he went through the motions of his Boston Waltz and his Slow Drag and One Step."

In addition to the Jazz Suite, Mr. Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "Enchanted Isle," has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His "Daniel Jazz" has also been heard here to good effect. In 1930, a symphonic work of his received a prize of $5000 from the Victor Company. Mr. Gruenberg has been and is very active in furthering the cause of modernist music, especially that of American composers.

The first symphony of Mr. Gruenberg runs in four movements, all of which stand in the key of E-flat: 1, Allegro maestoso; 2, Allegro vivace e molto leggiero; 3, Lento sostenuto e molto maestoso; 4, Allegro resoluto marcato. The third and fourth movements are joined and are thus played without intervening pause. Mr. Gruenberg writes that he has used the classical forms in the four movements of his symphony. In his use of themes, however, he has attempted to secure strong cumulative effect in this way: Thematic matter from the first movement has been used in the second, from the first and second in the third, from the first. second and third in the last movement.

It would be boring to attempt to detail in cold print the peregrinations of these themes through the four movements. In any case the first and principal movement of the symphony is of such melodic character, so full of contrapuntal interweavings of melodic lines that one is somewhat at a loss to know which of them to give precedence over the others. Suffice it to call attention to this rich texture. Straussian in its opulence, perhaps also in degree Straussian in the contours of its material. In its rhythmic content this music must be called largely American. In many of its harmonic inflections not less so. These rhythms are already far removed from jazz, yet do not fail to show their origin. The harmonic inflections, too, may have been borrowed originally from Debussy or Strauss. Nevertheless, when taken over by Amerrican composers of popular music, combined with American ways of handling rhythm, these things become something new under the sun—proclaim their Americanism to all those who have ears to hear. Of such is much of the matter of this symphony.

The second movement goes farther than the others in this respect. The rhythmic fox-trot base of duple meter underlies its principal divisions. The melodies are less suggestive of European backgrounds, smack more of our own shores. The middle section, with its clever manipulation of trumpet figures, comes straight out of the jazziest of jazz.

The third is the slow movement of the symphony. A trombone at once intones its principal theme, a melody taken from Natalie Curtis Burlin's "Songs and Tales from the Dark Continent," and known as "Mate'ka, Song of the Rain Ceremony." These songs are known as Chindau' songs and hail from Portuguese East Africa. They are sung by a leader who is joined by the higher voices, by a group of lower voices, and are accompanied by a varying number of drums. The present song, as noted by Mrs. Burlin, is accompanied by two drums pitched at E flat and B flat. The interludes contain four drums, the two additional ones pitched an octave higher.

Mrs. Burlin publishes this metrical and literal translation of the words of this song:

No child may journey with me, ne'er a one.
we yo we—
Distress, Mother, woe!
The Big Drum waiteth for we as a grave,
we yo we—
Distress, Mother, woe!
And dying, I shall be buried therein, we yo we—
Distress, Mother, woe!
The Upland manner of drumming, know ye?
we yo we—
Distress, Mother, woe!
No Coastland people can drum in this way!
we yo we—
Distress, Mother, woe!

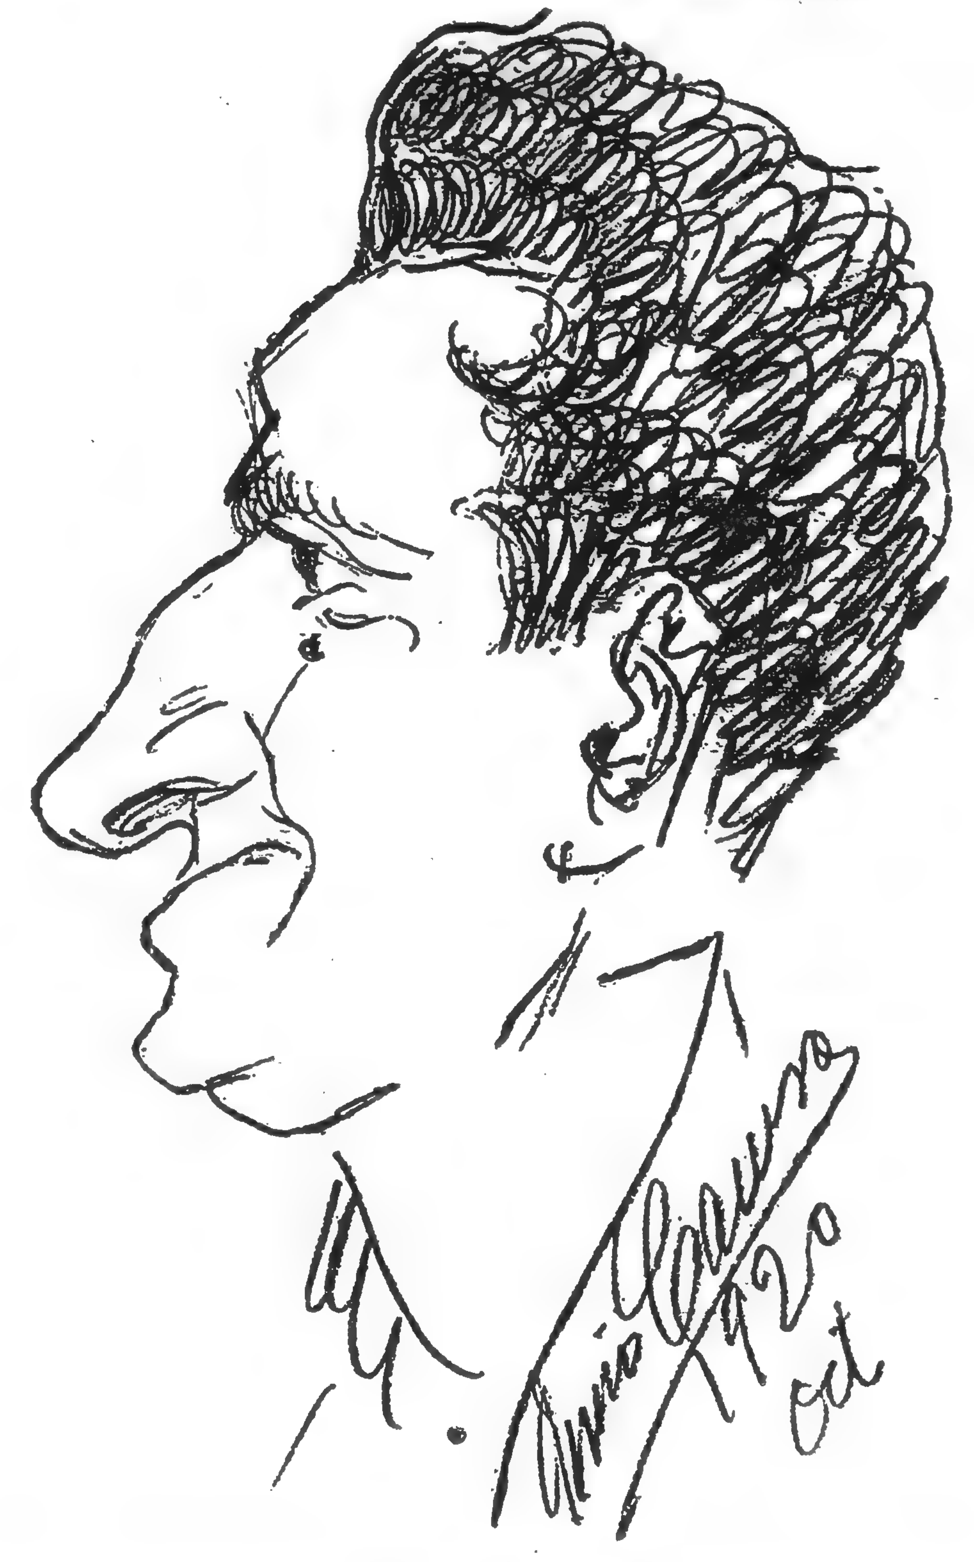
Mrs. Burlin also states that beer-making (a seven-day process) is an integral part of the Rain Ceremony. "On the last day, when the beer is finished, they dance from sunset to sunset."

Of the song Mrs. Burlin writes: "This song is a cry of distress The rain has failed, the crops will fail and the people will perish . . . while performing this ceremony, all the minds of the people are concentrated upon it. Even as when a country is fighting, the people put all their faith in their army, so now when their country is starving, they depend on the Rain Ceremony of which the drumming is the life-pulse."

This theme, developments of various motives from it, a huge climax upon it, forms the first part of this movement. Playful passage work, already prefigured in the two previous movements, and a powerful four-note motif taken at various speeds are the principal contrasting matter.

An active, even-rhythmed figure in eighth notes for strings is the basic theme of the last movement. A more delicate theme of catchy rhythm is the chief contrast. Against these two are the themes from previous movements presented. Again the full waisted texture of the first movement. A. H. M.

The Compliment of Caricature



Louis Gruenberg

Whose First Symphony Will be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

(From a Sketch by Caruso)

15th Concert Fri-Sat

An Over-Full Symphony By Mr. Gruenberg

TRANS — FEB 11

After Fifty-One Years Room For a Strauss Waltz in A Symphony Concert

When Dr. Koussevitzky undertakes a new piece from a composer in whom he believes, he spares not in preparation for performance. Last autumn he gave hours and days to exacting rehearsal of Monsieur Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante." This week he has done as much for Mr. Louis Gruenberg's First Symphony conceived and put to paper in 1919, revised in 1929, played at the Symphony Concert of Friday for the first time anywhere. Neither of the conductor's audiences answered ardently to Monsieur Schmitt's music. Nor did reviewers rend the air with praises. So far, moreover, it has not been exposed to New York with the able Sanromá as more efficient and sympathetic pianist than the composer. By current signs Mr. Gruenberg's symphony will similarly pass, though with more likelihood of performance in Manhattan where, since the production of his opera, "Emperor Jones," he is figure of the musical hour. With both composers the conductor proved once more his integrity —his devotion to his calling and to the art of music as it ceaselessly unfolds, his zeal for the faith within him, his disposition to exact more from himself than he does, even, from the orchestra. The French have a just phrase for such a state of soul: honneur d' artiste. It seems rather worth the cultivating.

At last Dr. Koussevitzky is ready to fulfill his announced purpose of a revival of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." As present plans stand, he will include it in th Symphony Concerts of Feb. 24 and 25. It is six or seven years since it was last heard at Symphony Hall. Then it still passed for epoch-making music. Now we shall hear what time and change have done to it.

In both instances the besetting difficulty was thickness of tonal texture and intricacy of harmonic and instrumental color. Throughout his symphony Mr. Gruenberg abounds in a fertility more plentiful than distinguished in invention. A principal theme well found gives easy birth to subsidiary themes. Minor, if ingeniously related, motivs spring into tonal being. Phrase expands too readily into phrase; both are soon enlarged into period. Major themes pass cumulatively from movement into movement, adding new strands to the tonal web. Mr Gruenberg writes an ever-exfoliating, ever-thickening music, save only when, for the effect of the moment, he wills a slenderer substance, an opener texture. Page after page, his flow of abundance is more to be noted than his practice of selection, one idea ever thrusting in upon another. To modernistic economies and clarities he is impervious. He seems to choose only when the calculation of an end checks an instinctive plenteousness of means.

The outcome is a music uncommonly difficult to keep clear and in motion as it traverses the hearer's, the orchestra's, the conductor's, ear and mind. Except at the moments aforesaid, it tends to clog its own course and unfolding, to dull the immediate sensation that is half the commerce of the concert-hall. Wilfully also it tends to repetition. Having made a good point once, Mr. Gruenberg also makes it twice or thrice, so wearying listeners and overtaxing performers. The wonder was less that the labors of the week had been superhuman than that they finally set out the symphony understandably. Dr. Koussevitzky had reason to shake the hand of Mr. Burgin as tribute to the orchestra. The absent composer owed as much to the conductor.

The saving grace of the music, the source of whatever vitality it may keep in the concert-hall, are its jazz-born rhythms, its variety and vivacity of harmonic and instrumental color, derivative as this surfacing may sometimes seem. "Symphonic jazz" may or may not be outmoded and sterile. Certainly Mr. Gruenberg writes it more boldly than any other American composer; adapts it more expertly and sympathetically to new usage and environment. Beside him, Mr. Carpenter, as in "Skyscrapers," is over-tentative and over-refining; while Mr. Gershwin, as in the two rhapsodies, tends to be merely blatant. Mr. Gruenberg not only answers to jazz-rhythms, he transfuses them into his symphony as underlying and propulsive force. He can be as frank with them as he is in his fox-trot-like Scherzo; as manipulative as he chooses to be elsewhere, say in the figures of the finale. In either process they give to his music distinctively American march and tang. This listener felt as much from the Jazz Suite of 1930; renewed the sensation from "Emperor Jones" a month ago; experienced it again from the symphony of yesterday.

To jazz Mr. Gruenberg also owes not a few strokes in his instrumental color Here again he is at once sympathetic, courageous, skilfully adaptive. If American jazz is to be wrought into the texture of American symphonies and so nationalize them, Mr. Gruenberg seems the man to turn the trick. (Or, as some will say, is belated follower of a declining fashion that he helped to set.) His harmonic coloring has also derivative suggestion, but from other sources. No doubt there are well-stored minds that could spread out the score of his symphony under the study-lamp and trace back harmony after harmony, now to Strauss, again to Debussy, yet again to lesser composers. In the quick traffic of the concert-hall the ear catches whiffs of this derivation.

Mr. Gruenberg adapts his jazz-born rhythms to himself; so puts them to new usage. He is as fortunate with some of his instrumental color of various nativities. With his harmonies he is less adaptive and resourceful. Such procedure, such mixtures, give an artificial air to the surfacing of the symphony. They produce also parts for the players that seem in casual hearing of needless and contrived difficulty, less expressing Mr. Gruenberg than indicating a certain confusion within him. Even on a first trombone, through a slow movement, he can be merciless. He can also be as repetitious in his surfacing as in his substance.

In the symphony, finally, as in the "Jazz Suite" and the opera of Jones, the attentive listener still hunts for a self-contained Gruenberg. Before the stage it was easy to say that here at last was an American composer with keen sense of operatic theater. In cooler reflection to differentiate that quality in Mr. Gruenberg's music from the dramatic power of Mr. O'Neill's play was difficult. The "Jazz Suite" seems in recollection to have gone four ways from the ace. In it was Gruenberg, the skillful and sympathetic adapter of jazz; Gruenberg who had Debussy and other composers of the turn of the century still in his ears; Gruenberg with a romantic streak, however much the realism of the hour might tempt him; Gruenberg with his moments of clear American tang. So again with the symphony of yesterday. The Gruenberg of symphonic jazz, the Gruenberg who can make a whole slow movement out of an East-African native tune; the Gruenberg who has too much at the back of his head and will seldom stop to check plenty with choice, the Gruenberg who sounds at least eighty per cent American—all these Gruenbergs were there. But where and what is the essential, the self-contained, Gruenberg? Or is he only an intensively absorbent, a skilfully manipulative temperament?

Mendelssohn's journeyings, which were persistent, begat music. That music now perpetuates them. Dr. Koussevitzky began the concert with the overture generated by a visit to the southern Hebrides; but much worked over, or as we should say fussed up, in cities remote from these northern islands. It is point of honor in reviewing nowadays to descant upon the transparency of Mendelssohn's music, the nice adaptation of means to ends; the pervading sensibility of invention, procedure, impression. These qualities are present and pleasurable in this "Hebrides" overture—the more clearly when, as yesterday, performance gives them out gracefully.

There is atmospheric suggestion besides. The bleaker northern Hebrides were not within Mendelssohn's journey or his musical imagination. Those sullen skies and black waters, the flat, windswept wastes, the reefs and cliffs solitary and menacing, were not for his tone-picturing. The sky was only overcast on the day on which he went to Fingal's cave; the waters merely undulated; the sea-gulls' dipping and screaming were novel to this gentleman of cities. There was an agreeable sense of solitude. No wonder he resolved upon a tonal seascape; while he made it so neatly that it has lasted a hundred years.

In the final numbers, for the first time in nearly forty years the name of Johann Strauss stood on the program of a "regular" Symphony Concert; while for the first time in the whole fifty-two seasons one of the chosen pieces was a set of waltzes. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky had some subtle idea of hanging light waltzes by Strauss of Vienna (1881) as pendant to a light piano-concerto by Mozart, also of Vienna (1785). Either way it did not much matter. It is the purpose of the Symphony Concerts to give the finer pleasures. The "Voices of Spring," as music, contributed to them. The Symphony Concerts should represent the diversities of life. The "Voices of Spring," in mood, suggested one of them. They may not be your or my or our next friend's favorite waltzes among Strauss's legion. They might have been played more sensuously, with more rubato, at lower pace. But by all odds—to say nothing of the eager response of the audience—they deserved place in the concerts. More perhaps than the "Perpetual Motion" of Johann that preceded them —a perpetual motion, in galop time that finally stopped, "one foot in the air." Which was Johann's little joke, little thinned by half a century.

In the concerto the piano-part Gieseking was linked to the orc accompaniment of Dr. Koussevitz a fractional orchestra. In bala euphony, in interplay, in mutual of Mozartean style, the mating close to perfection. The studious king turned back in imagination complishment to the pianistic ma
Mozart's eighteenth-century Vien aster or the slower pace than t vogue today for an Allegro or dante; the light percussive strok every note in fine and instant su upon the keyboard. Meanwhile the t Gieseking attained pellucid to rarefied clarity. Simultaneously terpretative—or in this instar non-interpretative—Gieseking m sonorities, outlined design, twin ment, touched in fancy and se until the whole impression wa beauty as lightly achieved as lightly invented—a music from into the air, so again vanishin only did Mr. Gieseking and Dr. vitzky pursue perfection. For minutes they held it, unevasive hands. H.

116

16th Concert Fri. Sat

The High Mark Of Composers And Conductor

TRANS — FEB 18

Numbers Out of "Parsifal" And the Choral Symphony In Signal Performance

HOW MUCH or how little of the Symphony Concert, Friday afternoon, was memorial tribute to Wagner at the fiftieth anniversary of his death was not clear. By oversight or intention, the program-notes gave no hint of such occasion. No more did the actual program-leaf drafted at Symphony Hall. Fortunately, perhaps, an inserted slip suggested no applause after the numbers from "Parsifal"—Prelude and "Good-Friday Spell." For these, it explained, were played in mourning, as well as in memory, for Wagner half a century dead. (Scrupulously the audience followed the suggestion. A pause of silence followed either piece; then, and not till then, the usual quick buzz of talk).

The remaining hour fell to Beethoven's Choral Symphony, repeated after four years' interval at these concerts. Wagner admired it intensely; penetrated it deeply; wrote about it occasionally; brought it, in his Dresden days, to revealing and stirring performance. By so much, though it ends with an "Ode to Joy," it might also be counted memorial piece. No doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky associating in a program with a purpose Wagner and Beethoven, "Parsifal" and the Ninth Symphony, had reason and instinct for his course.

None the less, the observance by the Symphony Orchestra of the current anniversary has fallen short of the conductor's usual felicity in such rites. They have been, in fact, a distinction of his nine years at the Symphony Concerts, a just extension of range and remembrance. How fitting and how admirable—to take the readiest example—was his revival, last spring, of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" to mark the centenary of Goethe's death! With the Wagnerian half-century he has been less discerning imaginative, fortunate. At the actual anniversary last Monday he filled one of the supplementary concerts with a conventional "Wagner Program"—the overtures to "Rienzi" and to "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Tristan"; the music that mourns and proclaims the slain Siegfried; by exception the finely wrought and too seldom played "Siegfried Idyl," which was keepsake between Wagner and Cosima. By agreeing report lassitude dimmed the performance of some of these numbers. Yesterday the conductor mated the final and, as most will say, the culminating orchestral works of Wagner and Beethoven.

The essential Wagner was, and is, composer for the theater. However symphonic the cast of his music, it was, and is, the expression of drama or of what he imagined such. In that expression the singing voices play no small part. Since Boston with an opera house prefers to be operaless, we cannot hear him in true sound and shape, except as visiting companies condescend to us. By present signs these visits, for a period, will be fewer and fewer. The next best thing is "concert-room Wagner"—that is to say significant, self-contained and transferable scenes from his operas with singing voices and playing orchestra. One or two such excerpts might desirably have had place in the first or the second anniversary program—the farewell of Wotan in "Die Walküre," the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung" for convenient examples; possibly the ascent of Siegfried to Brünnhilde's rock, so onward to the end of his opera.

By such adventure our memorial rites would have been truer and richer. It may be objected that the singers would have been hard to find; but not all the available and desirable Wagnerian voices are employed at the Metropolitan Opera House. Economy, it will be added, forbade. But is it so unescapable and peremptory that it must narrow an occasion that will not recur until 1983, dim also, by a little and for the moment, the cherishable prestige of the orchestra in these ceremonies? The pleasure of the public may also be considered. On the altar of economy, it, like Dr. Koussevitzky, has already laid the anticipated revival of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." . . . If we are to lose for long Wagner in the theater, we may plausibly ask Symphony Hall to be occasionally our ersatz opera house. In early decades it was now and then such.

Certainly, there could be no demur to either the choice or the performance on Friday of the two pieces from "Parsifal." There are no more plangent pages in Wagner than the Prelude. They sound suffering and ecstasy; out of both they distill the essence; poignancy intensifies the one; solemnity informs the other. They become high and deep memorial rite, especially when an audience listens as tense as did the hearers of Friday. After the Prelude, as fittingly, the peace and the illumination of the "Good-Friday Spell." The miracle of the blossoming earth suffuses the spirits of contemplating man. Into tones Wagner infuses the sweetness and the light, the wonder and the beauty. . . .

Baireuth itself would have approved the long-drawn pace at which Dr. Koussevitzky took the Prelude. It recalled the legend of Wagner himself, conducting for the last time in the last act of his final opera, lingering until from every measure he had drawn the ultimate drop. So Dr. Koussevitzky and many another, on and off conductors' stands, "feel" this Prelude, and there is no debating such an act of emotion and devotion. Its complement was the beauty of tone, the poignancy of accent, with which the orchestra played. Wagner scored the whole music with divining insight and imagination, with unfailing certainty of means to ends. As he heard so the orchestra wrought. . . . In human nature the performance of the Good Friday Spell might not repeat this marvel. Yet out of pure and measured tone rose as pure and just a beauty. Memorial rites cease to be forms and ceremonies when celebrants are so possessed.

The performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the fifth—if concerts are counted by pairs—in Dr. Koussevitzky's term at Symphony Hall, will renew the debate over one and another of his procedures. It revives as regularly as discussion of the qualities of the Symphony itself. (The number increases of those that decline to believe it the be-all and the end-all of symphonic form and expression.) Once more we shall be told that the conductor might unfold the first movement more ruggedly and turbulently; that he takes the Adagio, in the third, at too slow a pace, contrasts it too little with the ensuing Andante; that here, there and elsewhere he does what the dissenting hearer believes to be wrong. Which affirmation in most instances merely signifies that the conductor "feels" the questioned measures in one way, the listener in another. There are ready retorts as well—that the conductor's pacing, phrasing, accenting and coloring of the first movement give it exaltation and mystery, impose from the outset these pervading attributes in much to follow; that in the slow movement he strives for a sort of contemplative unity between the two melodies that Beethoven sets in seeming contrast.

Controversy of this sort has no end; whereas from first hearing Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the whole Symphony disclosed, and yesterday maintained, qualities that distinguish his "reading" above most others. In no other symphony has Beethoven sought and gained such diversity and significance of harmonic and instrumental color. If the listener has orchestral imagination and follows with a score he will discover that the conductor misses no salient stroke, overlooks hardly a detail; is unflaggingly projecting, shading, proportioning. . . . The choral finale is the century-old stumbling block in the performance of the Ninth Symphony. Though it is a succession of variations upon the principal theme, set to the successive moods of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," it may readily seem a disjointed, disordered progress. By the blending of art and authority, understanding and feeling, devotion and imagination, which is the secret of conducting, Dr. Koussevitzky pulls it together, gives it at least a quasi-unified course.

Again it is no blasphemy to say that this and that variation, like the march movement and the final prestissimo orgy are anything but exalted stuff. By his handling—pace, rhythm, period—the conductor makes them sound above themselves. The listener hears and does not shake his head. This, too, is the moment to confess that in the tumults of the finale one reviewer could distinguish only imperfectly the individual quality of the solo-singers, though Mr. Steel and Mr. Baer seemed to have the advantage in breadth and eloquence over Mmes. Averino and Van Der Veer. No more could he sort out the accomplishments and shortcomings of Mr. Woodworth's Bach Cantata Club as chorus. He might have wished them ampler numbers and more penetrating and carrying voice. But upon them as upon the solo-singers was Dr. Koussevitzky's energizing and flexing power.

In larger attributes of performance the conductor excels in the vitalizing of the whole music. For him, for us that hear, it ceases to be a classic symphony, established, traditionalized, into everlasting place. Rather, it comes warm from the composer's hand to impress itself upon us who have yet to know it to the full. A modicum of imagination and we can believe ourselves that first audience in Vienna—awed and exalted in the first movement though we may wish it more tossing and tumultuous; caught into the fantasy, the wildness, of the scherzo; hushed into the transport and the rapture of the slow movement; swept through the shouts and frenzies of the finale. Along the way Dr. Koussevitzky vitalizes and sublimates Beethoven; is of the earth and of the stars; enforces himself upon orchestra and singers; so proclaims this Ninth Symphony. It stood, it still stands, among the conductor's master-performances. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY IN HONOR OF WAGNER

Beethoven's Ninth With Chorus of Bach Cantata Club

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although the 50th anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner had already been marked at Symphony Hall—in an all-Wagner programme last Monday evening—there is further and final commemoration at the Symphony concerts of this week-end. On the programme of those of yesterday afternoon and of this evening stand two excerpts from Wagner's swan song, "Parsifal."

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH

Dr. Koussevitzky had thought of Wagner, too, when he placed upon this programme the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. For it was this symphony that fired the youthful Wagner's enthusiasm for music and that set the seal upon his determination to be a composer. His affection for the piece was, indeed, life-long and he tried to persuade himself and the rest of the world that Beethoven, by adding a chorus in the finale, was admitting that "absolute" music had gone as far as it could.

It had been Dr. Koussevitzky's intention to use the chorus of the Bach Cantata Club, which assisted in the symphony yesterday, in a performance of the Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal," but he finally contented himself with the playing of the prelude and the so-called "Good Friday Spell." A slip inserted in the programme book asked that there be no applause after this music and, happily, that request was respected by all.

Holds Its Fragrance

It is easy to say that the "Parsifal" prelude, together with other pages in the score, is a static music and a music in which Wagner poses, a complaint that is not to be made in the case of any of the preceding music dramas. But this prelude, even if it is more contrived than inspired, has a peculiar solemnity. It served yesterday to turn the listener's thoughts reverently toward the composer.

And the "Good Friday Spell,' written, or at least sketched, many years before the rest of the opera was set on paper, has a fragrance that defies the years. Here is yet another mood that Wagner has uniquely captured in tone. The performance of this fragment yesterday, and that of the prelude as well, was one that brought out the full significance of the text and that as sheer sound caressed the ear

Chorus Lacks Power

With Beethoven's Symphony the conductor strove mightily. Into the conducting of this epochal work he put the best that was in him, and his forces responded in kind. Yet the performance of the finale failed to be as uplifting and impressive as others that have been given under his direction in Symphony Hall. For one thing, the chorus, though it sang with good tone and with fervor and enthusiasm, was too small.

In the final climax a greater weight of tone is needed than was possible yesterday. Nor, with the exception of the bass, Frederic Baer, was the solo quartet all that it should have been.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 16th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, which was "sold out" and many were turned away. The program comprised the Prelude to "Parsifal" and the "Good Friday Spell" from the same opera; also Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The solo singers for the symphony were Olga Averino, Nevada Van der Veer, Robert Steel and Frederic Baer. The chorus was the Bach Cantata Club, which had been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

There is much more true music in the Good Friday Spell than in the Prelude to the opera. There is a good reason for this. The Good Friday Spell was composed in 1857; "Parsifal" was not composed until 1879; and the score was not ready until 1882. Even devoted friends of Wagner found that "Parsifal" showed his failing power. Pamphlets for and against the work were published. Some found fault with the libretto as emphasizing a peculiarly feminine side of Wagner's character. Others objected to the introduction of the Holy Communion on the stage. Few expressed an opinion so concise as that of George Moore, who, talking with James Huneker at Bayreuth, said that "Parsifal" was hold water in a beer barrel.

The performance of the excerpts yesterday was heard in a quasi-reverential spirit after the audience had read this notice: "Because of the nature of the music, and to commemorate the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, it is suggested that there be no applause after the excerpts from 'Parsifal'."

The performance of the prelude was at an appropriately funereal pace according to the Bayreuth tradition in Cosima's reign. We heard a performance at Bayreuth in 1882 when Wagner was master, and while the pace was not gay, it was not dragged. And yesterday the entrance of the wind-choir was not always precise; that is with the exception of the trombones, which were magnificent in tonal quality.

The performance of the "Good Friday Spell" was wholly worthy of the orchestra. Probably the players were cheered by the escape from the funereal atmosphere.

Whenever the Ninth Symphony is performed, the question comes up: Can singers triumph over Beethoven's criminal disregard of the range of human voices and his apparent wish to render them inhuman by compelling them to scream. No matter how fast the tempo taken, the speed only accentuates the wild shouting. Yet to give only the orchestral numbers makes the symphony amorphous, and one would not miss the few sublime pages for the chorus. So some have wished that Beethoven had written a purely orchestral finale. The experiment of lowering the pitch has never been attended with a good result.

Chorus and quartet struggled bravely with the task. Mr. Baer declaimed with dignity and power the appeal to his brethren to raise a joyful song. There were impressive choral moments. The orchestral sections were performed in a manner to cause the hearers to realize the greatness of the symphony in spite of the vocal difficulties.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Gluck-Mottl, Ballet Suite No. 2; Schumann, Symphony, B flat, No. 1; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps."

GLOBE MUSIC FEB 18

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's share in the rites commemorating the death of Richard Wagner, 50 years ago, is brought to completion at the Symphony concerts this week with performances of two fragments—the Prelude and the "Good Friday Spell" —from the master's last work, "Parsifal." The second half of the program is devoted to Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony, a work that Wagner loved.

The choral portions of Beethoven's setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," that occurs at the end of the Symphony, are sung by the Bach Cantata Club. G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists are Olga Averino, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Robert Steel, tenor, and Frederick Baer, baritone.

A curious parallel exists between these creations of Wagner and Beethoven. Wagner had wished to write text and music around the Parsifal legend when he was a man in his 40s. As early as 22, Beethoven had considered a musical setting for Schiller's verses. Yet both these ambitions came to fruition when the composers were approaching the end of their days.

In "Parsifal" Wagner created an old man's music. A score not without profundity and power, but essentially a music of contemplation, a music that, figuratively speaking, looks back over a lifetime of struggle. Wagner may have been tired, certainly he was reflective. The music of "Parsifal" is lovely in its invention and, as in the case of all the master's mature compositions, arresting for its variety. Yet it lacks the temperamental restlessness, the sensuous fire of previous scores.

Dr Koussevitzky's performance of these excerpts, taken at very slow pace, was one to heighten their inherent character. Save for some broken notes from the brasses, the orchestral playing was impeccable.

What composer, save one of Beethoven's caliber, would have dared begin a work in the hesitant manner of the opening allegro of this Ninth Symphony, and then recall the mood and manner in the following movement? In both these places Beethoven seems strangely troubled, but presently emerges as the gay singer of rhythmic melodies, as in the final part of the Seventh Symphony.

The slow movement, which suggests to one listener the thoughtful serenity of Milton's "Il Penseroso," is one of the most truly profound in all 19th century symphonic music. Then comes the feverishly joyful Presto, where the voice parts are so exacting that to judge a singer's ability by these measures alone would be unfair.

The choristers gave evidence of conscientious training. Their work was of high quality, although here and there a phrase became ragged and the tone brittle. Of the soloists, only Mr Baer proved thoroughly equal to Beethoven's demands. Miss Averino has a clear, agreeable voice, which she is occasionally inclined to force. But here agin the composer may be held partly responsible. Miss Van Der Veer's work was of customary quality. Mr Steel, appearing in Boston for the first time, according to record, displayed a good voice. He was not able to cope successfully with certain measures of his part.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading was in characteristically intense vein. The rhythms were crisp and incisive, the melodies sung with the personal fervor that has contributed to his reputation as one of the most individual interpreters of the day. Above all, the slow movement will linger in memory.

Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" will be played at the Symphony concerts next week, together with Schumann's "Spring" Symphony and Felix Mottl's second suite of dances arranged from operas by Gluck.

C. W. D.

Beethoven's 9th Symphony to Honor Wagner

By MOSES SMITH

Amer

The Boston Symphony Orchestra program of this week is in the nature of a memorial to Richard Wagner, who died 50 years ago last Monday. The orchestra had already paid its respects in an all-Wagner program for the Monday evening concert, but it was only fitting that the longer series of subscription concerts should be represented in these rites.

The program begins with the prelude to "Parsifal" and the Good Friday Spell from that same "stage-consecration festival play," as Wagner insisted on calling his swan-song. The printed program requests the audience to abstain from applause, and this request was honored yesterday.

The audience, however, was able to satisfy its desire to applaud at the end of the Beethoven ninth symphony, which filled the latter part of the concert, and which has not been heard here in several years. Its place on this week's program is fully justified by Wagner's great admiration for it. In fact, it was a performance of this work, which Wagner heard early in his career, that settled him in his subsequent course as composer of music dramas.

Wagner's reverential enthusiasm for the Beethoven symphony is shared by some today, but not by all. There are many for whom the choral finals is out of harmony with the three purely instrumental movements. They are supported in their prejudice by the vocal difficulties besetting a performance. The traditionalists, however, whom I follow in this matter, look upon the finale as the natural culmination of what precedes. Good or bad chorus, competent or incompetent soloists—there is a supreme thrill as the voices are added to the instrumental texture.

It is scarcely necessary to say that all of the works were imaginatively performed yesterday under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. The chorus was the Bach Cantata Club, trained by C. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Olga Averino, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Robert Steel, tenor, and Frederic Baer, bass.

Looking Ahead

MARCH 2—
"The Front Page," at the Peabody Playhouse.
MARCH 6—
"When Ladies Meet," at the Plymouth.

16th Concert Fri. Sat

The High Mark Of Composers And Conductor

TRANS — FEB 18

Numbers Out of "Parsifal" And the Choral Symphony In Signal Performance

HOW MUCH or how little of the Symphony Concert, Friday afternoon, was memorial tribute to Wagner at the fiftieth anniversary of his death was not clear. By oversight or intention, the program-notes gave no hint of such occasion. No more did the actual program-leaf drafted at Symphony Hall. Fortunately, perhaps, an inserted slip suggested no applause after the numbers from "Parsifal"—Prelude and "Good-Friday Spell." For these, it explained, were played in mourning, as well as in memory, for Wagner half a century dead. (Scrupulously the audience followed the suggestion. A pause of silence followed either piece; then, and not till then, the usual quick buzz of talk).

The remaining hour fell to Beethoven's Choral Symphony, repeated after four years' interval at these concerts. Wagner admired it intensely; penetrated it deeply; wrote about it occasionally; brought it, in his Dresden days, to revealing and stirring performance. By so much, though it ends with an "Ode to Joy," it might also be counted memorial piece. No doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky associating in a program with a purpose Wagner and Beethoven, "Parsifal" and the Ninth Symphony, had reason and instinct for his course.

None the less, the observance by the Symphony Orchestra of the current anniversary has fallen short of the conductor's usual felicity in such rites. They have been, in fact, a distinction of his nine years at the Symphony Concerts, a just extension of range and remembrance. How fitting and how admirable—to take the readiest example—was his revival, last spring, of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" to mark the centenary of Goethe's death! With the Wagnerian half-century he has been less discerning imaginative, fortunate. At the actual anniversary last Monday he filled one of the supplementary concerts with a conventional "Wagner Program"—the overtures to "Rienzi" and to "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin" and to "Tristan"; the music that mourns and proclaims the slain Siegfried; by exception the finely wrought and too seldom played "Siegfried Idyl," which was keepsake between Wagner and Cosima. By agreeing report lassitude dimmed the performance of some of these numbers. Yesterday the conductor mated the final and, as most will say, the culminating orchestral works of Wagner and Beethoven.

The essential Wagner was, and is, composer for the theater. However symphonic the cast of his music, it was, and is, the expression of drama or of what he imagined such. In that expression the singing voices play no small part. Since Boston with an opera house prefers to be operaless, we cannot hear him in true sound and shape, except as visiting companies condescend to us. By present signs these visits, for a period, will be fewer and fewer. The next best thing is "concert-room Wagner"—that is to say significant, self-contained and transferable scenes from his operas with singing voices and playing orchestra. One or two such excerpts might desirably have had place in the first or the second anniversary program—the farewell of Wotan in "Die Walküre," the closing scene of "Götterdämmerung" for convenient examples; possibly the ascent of Siegfried to Brünnhilde's rock, so onward to the end of his opera.

By such adventure our memorial rites would have been truer and richer. It may be objected that the singers would have been hard to find; but not all the available and desirable Wagnerian voices are employed at the Metropolitan Opera House. Economy, it will be added, forbade. But is it so unescapable and peremptory that it must narrow an occasion that will not recur until 1983, dim also, by a little and for the moment, the cherishable prestige of the orchestra in these ceremonies? The pleasure of the public may also be considered. On the altar of economy, it, like Dr. Koussevitzky, has already laid the anticipated revival of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." . . . If we are to lose for long Wagner in the theater, we may plausibly ask Symphony Hall to be occasionally our ersatz opera house. In early decades it was now and then such.

Certainly, there could be no demur to either the choice or the performance on Friday of the two pieces from "Parsifal." There are no more plangent pages in Wagner than the Prelude. They sound suffering and ecstasy; out of both they distill the essence; poignancy intensifies the one; solemnity informs the other. They become high and deep memorial rite, especially when an audience listens as tense as did the hearers of Friday. After the Prelude, as fittingly, the peace and the illumination of the "Good-Friday Spell." The miracle of the blossoming earth suffuses the spirits of contemplating man. Into tones Wagner infuses the sweetness and the light, the wonder and the beauty.

Baireuth itself would have approved the long-drawn pace at which Dr. Koussevitzky took the Prelude. It recalled the legend of Wagner himself, conducting for the last time in the last act of his final opera, lingering until from every measure he had drawn the ultimate drop. So Dr. Koussevitzky and many another, on and off conductors' stands, "feel" this Prelude, and there is no debating such an act of emotion and devotion. Its complement was the beauty of tone, the poignancy of accent, with which the orchestra played. Wagner scored the whole music with divining insight and imagination, with unfailing certainty of means to ends. As he heard so the orchestra wrought. . . . In human nature the performance of the Good Friday Spell might not repeat this marvel. Yet out of pure and measured tone rose as pure and just a beauty. Memorial rites cease to be forms and ceremonies when celebrants are so possessed.

The performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the fifth—if concerts are counted by pairs—in Dr. Koussevitzky's term at Symphony Hall, will renew the debate over one and another of his procedures. It revives as regularly as discussion of the qualities of the Symphony itself. (The number increases of those that decline to believe it the be-all and the end-all of symphonic form and expression.) Once more we shall be told that the conductor might unfold the first movement more ruggedly and turbulently; that he takes the Adagio, in the third, at too slow a pace, contrasts it too little with the ensuing Andante; that here, there and elsewhere he does what the dissenting hearer believes to be wrong. Which affirmation in most instances merely signifies that the conductor "feels" the questioned measures in one way, the listener in another. There are ready retorts as well—that the conductor's pacing, phrasing, accenting and coloring of the first movement give it exaltation and mystery, impose from the outset these pervading attributes in much to follow; that in the slow movement he strives for a sort of contemplative unity between the two melodies that Beethoven sets in seeming contrast.

Controversy of this sort has no end; whereas from first hearing Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the whole Symphony disclosed, and yesterday maintained, qualities that distinguish his "reading" above most others. In no other symphony has Beethoven sought and gained such diversity and significance of harmonic and instrumental color. If the listener has orchestral imagination and follows with a score he will discover that the conductor misses no salient stroke, overlooks hardly a detail; is unflaggingly projecting, shading, proportioning. . . . The choral finale is the century-old stumbling block in the performance of the Ninth Symphony. Though it is a succession of variations upon the principal theme, set to the successive moods of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," it may readily seem a disjointed, disordered progress. By the blending of art and authority, understanding and feeling, devotion and imagination, which is the secret of conducting, Dr. Koussevitzky pulls it together, gives it at least a quasi-unified course.

Again it is no blasphemy to say that this and that variation, like the march movement and the final prestissimo orgy are anything but exalted stuff. By his handling—pace, rhythm, period—the conductor makes them sound above themselves. The listener hears and does not shake his head. This, too, is the moment to confess that in the tumults of the finale one reviewer could distinguish only imperfectly the individual quality of the solo-singers, though Mr. Steel and Mr. Baer seemed to have the advantage in breadth and eloquence over Mmes. Averino and Van Der Veer. No more could he sort out the accomplishments and shortcomings of Mr. Woodworth's Bach Cantata Club as chorus. He might have wished them ampler numbers and more penetrating and carrying voice. But upon them as upon the solo-singers was Dr. Koussevitzky's energizing and flexing power.

In larger attributes of performance the conductor excels in the vitalizing of the whole music. For him, for us that hear, it ceases to be a classic symphony, established, traditionalized, into everlasting place. Rather, it comes warm from the composer's hand to impress itself upon us who have yet to know it to the full. A modicum of imagination and we can believe ourselves that first audience in Vienna—awed and exalted in the first movement though we may wish it more tossing and tumultuous; caught into the fantasy, the wildness, of the scherzo; hushed into the transport and the rapture of the slow movement; swept through the shouts and frenzies of the finale. Along the way Dr. Koussevitzky vitalizes and sublimates Beethoven; is of the earth and of the stars; enforces himself upon orchestra and singers; so proclaims this Ninth Symphony. It stood, it still stands, among the conductor's master-performances. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY IN HONOR OF WAGNER

Beethoven's Ninth With Chorus of Bach Cantata Club

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although the 50th anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner had already been marked at Symphony Hall—in an all-Wagner programme last Monday evening—there is further and final commemoration at the Symphony concerts of this week-end. On the programme of those of yesterday afternoon and of this evening stand two excerpts from Wagner's swan song, "Parsifal."

BEETHOVEN'S NINTH

Dr. Koussevitzky had thought of Wagner, too, when he placed upon this programme the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. For it was this symphony that fired the youthful Wagner's enthusiasm for music and that set the seal upon his determination to be a composer. His affection for the piece was, indeed, life-long and he tried to persuade himself and the rest of the world that Beethoven, by adding a chorus in the finale, was admitting that "absolute" music had gone as far as it could.

It had been Dr. Koussevitzky's intention to use the chorus of the Bach Cantata Club, which assisted in the symphony yesterday, in a performance of the Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal," but he finally contented himself with the playing of the prelude and the so-called "Good Friday Spell." A slip inserted in the programme book asked that there be no applause after this music and, happily, that request was respected by all.

Holds Its Fragrance

It is easy to say that the "Parsifal" prelude, together with other pages in the score, is a static music and a music in which Wagner poses, a complaint that is not to be made in the case of any of the preceding music dramas. But this prelude, even if it is more contrived than inspired, has a peculiar solemnity. It served yesterday to turn the listener's thoughts reverently toward the composer.

And the "Good Friday Spell,' written, or at least sketched, many years before the rest of the opera was set on paper, has a fragrance that defies the years. Here is yet another mood that Wagner has uniquely captured in tone. The performance of this fragment yesterday, and that of the prelude as well, was one that brought out the full significance of the text and that as sheer sound caressed the ear

Chorus Lacks Power

With Beethoven's Symphony the conductor strove mightily. Into the conducting of this epochal work he put the best that was in him, and his forces responded in kind. Yet the performance of the finale failed to be as uplifting and impressive as others that have been given under his direction in Symphony Hall. For one thing, the chorus, though it sang with good tone and with fervor and enthusiasm, was too small.

In the final climax a greater weight of tone is needed than was possible yesterday. Nor, with the exception of the bass, Frederic Baer, was the solo quartet all that it should have been.

H. Feb 18 MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 16th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, which was "sold out" and many were turned away. The program comprised the Prelude to "Parsifal" and the "Good Friday Spell" from the same opera; also Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The solo singers for the symphony were Olga Averino, Nevada Van der Veer, Robert Steel and Frederic Baer. The chorus was the Bach Cantata Club, which had been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

There is much more true music in the Good Friday Spell than in the Prelude to the opera. There is a good reason for this. The Good Friday Spell was composed in 1857; "Parsifal" was not composed until 1879; and the score was not ready until 1882. Even devoted friends of Wagner found that "Parsifal" showed his failing power. Pamphlets for and against the work were published. Some found fault with the libretto as emphasizing a peculiarly feminine side of Wagner's character. Others objected to the introduction of the Holy Communion on the stage. Few expressed an opinion so concise as that of George Moore, who, talking with James Huneker at Bayreuth, said that "Parsifal" was hold water in a beer barrel.

The performance of the excerpts yesterday was heard in a quasi-reverential spirit after the audience had read this notice: "Because of the nature of the music, and to commemorate the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, it is suggested that there be no applause after the excerpts from 'Parsifal'."

The performance of the prelude was at an appropriately funereal pace according to the Bayreuth tradition in Cosima's reign. We heard a performance at Bayreuth in 1882 when Wagner was master, and while the pace was not gay, it was not dragged. And yesterday the entrance of the wind-choir was not always precise; that is with the exception of the trombones, which were magnificent in tonal quality.

The performance of the "Good Friday Spell" was wholly worthy of the orchestra. Probably the players were cheered by the escape from the funereal atmosphere.

Whenever the Ninth Symphony is performed, the question comes up: Can singers triumph over Beethoven's criminal disregard of the range of human voices and his apparent wish to render them inhuman by compelling them to scream. No matter how fast the tempo taken, the speed only accentuates the wild shouting. Yet to give only the orchestral numbers makes the symphony amorphous, and one would not miss the few sublime pages for the chorus. So some have wished that Beethoven had written a purely orchestral finale. The experiment of lowering the pitch has never been attended with a good result.

Chorus and quartet struggled bravely with the task. Mr. Baer declaimed with dignity and power the appeal to his brethren to raise a joyful song. There were impressive choral moments. The orchestral sections were performed in a manner to cause the hearers to realize the greatness of the symphony in spite of the vocal difficulties.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Gluck-Mottl, Ballet Suite No. 2; Schumann, Symphony, B flat, No. 1; Stravinsky, "Le Sacre du Printemps."

GLOBE MUSIC FEB 18

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's share in the rites commemorating the death of Richard Wagner, 50 years ago, is brought to completion at the Symphony concerts this week with performances of two fragments—the Prelude and the "Good Friday Spell"—from the master's last work, "Parsifal." The second half of the program is devoted to Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony, a work that Wagner loved.

The choral portions of Beethoven's setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," that occurs at the end of the Symphony, are sung by the Bach Cantata Club. G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists are Olga Averino, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Robert Steel, tenor, and Frederick Baer, baritone.

A curious parallel exists between these creations of Wagner and Beethoven. Wagner had wished to write text and music around the Parsifal legend when he was a man in his 40s. As early as 22, Beethoven had considered a musical setting for Schiller's verses. Yet both these ambitions came to fruition when the composers were approaching the end of their days.

In "Parsifal" Wagner created an old man's music. A score not without profundity and power, but essentially a music of contemplation, a music that, figuratively speaking, looks back over a lifetime of struggle. Wagner may have been tired, certainly he was reflective. The music of "Parsifal" is lovely in its invention and, as in the case of all the master's mature compositions, arresting for its variety. Yet it lacks the temperamental restlessness, the sensuous fire of previous scores.

Dr Koussevitzky's performance of these excerpts, taken at very slow pace, was one to heighten their inherent character. Save for some broken notes from the brasses, the orchestral playing was impeccable.

What composer, save one of Beethoven's caliber, would have dared begin a work in the hesitant manner of the opening allegro of this Ninth Symphony, and then recall the mood and manner in the following movement? In both these places Beethoven seems strangely troubled, but presently emerges as the gay singer of rhythmic melodies, as in the final part of the Seventh Symphony.

The slow movement, which suggests to one listener the thoughtful serenity of Milton's "Il Penseroso," is one of the most truly profound in all 19th century symphonic music. Then comes the feverishly joyful Presto, where the voice parts are so exacting that to judge a singer's ability by these measures alone would be unfair.

The choristers gave evidence of conscientious training. Their work was of high quality, although here and there a phrase became ragged and the tone brittle. Of the soloists, only Mr Baer proved thoroughly equal to Beethoven's demands. Miss Averino has a clear, agreeable voice, which she is occasionally inclined to force. But here agin the composer may be held partly responsible. Miss Van Der Veer's work was of customary quality. Mr Steel, appearing in Boston for the first time, according to record, displayed a good voice. He was not able to cope successfully with certain measures of his part.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading was in characteristically intense vein. The rhythms were crisp and incisive, the melodies sung with the personal fervor that has contributed to his reputation as one of the most individual interpreters of the day. Above all, the slow movement will linger in memory.

Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" will be played at the Symphony concerts next week, together with Schumann's "Spring" Symphony and Felix Mottl's second suite of dances arranged from operas by Gluck.

C. W. D.

Beethoven's 9th Symphony to Honor Wagner

By MOSES SMITH

Amer. Feb 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra program of this week is in the nature of a memorial to Richard Wagner, who died 50 years ago last Monday. The orchestra had already paid its respects in an all-Wagner program for the Monday evening concert, but it was only fitting that the longer series of subscription concerts should be represented in these rites.

The program begins with the prelude to "Parsifal" and the Good Friday Spell from that same "stage-consecration festival play," as Wagner insisted on calling his swan-song. The printed program requests the audience to abstain from applause, and this request was honored yesterday.

The audience, however, was able to satisfy its desire to applaud at the end of the Beethoven ninth symphony, which filled the latter part of the concert, and which has not been heard here in several years. Its place on this week's program is fully justified by Wagner's great admiration for it. In fact, it was a performance of this work, which Wagner heard early in his career, that settled him in his subsequent course as composer of music dramas.

Wagner's reverential enthusiasm for the Beethoven symphony is shared by some today, but not by all. There are many for whom the choral finals is out of harmony with the three purely instrumental movements. They are supported in their prejudice by the vocal difficulties besetting a performance. The traditionalists, however, whom I follow in this matter, look upon the finale as the natural culmination of what precedes. Good or bad chorus, competent or incompetent soloists—there is a supreme thrill as the voices are added to the instrumental texture.

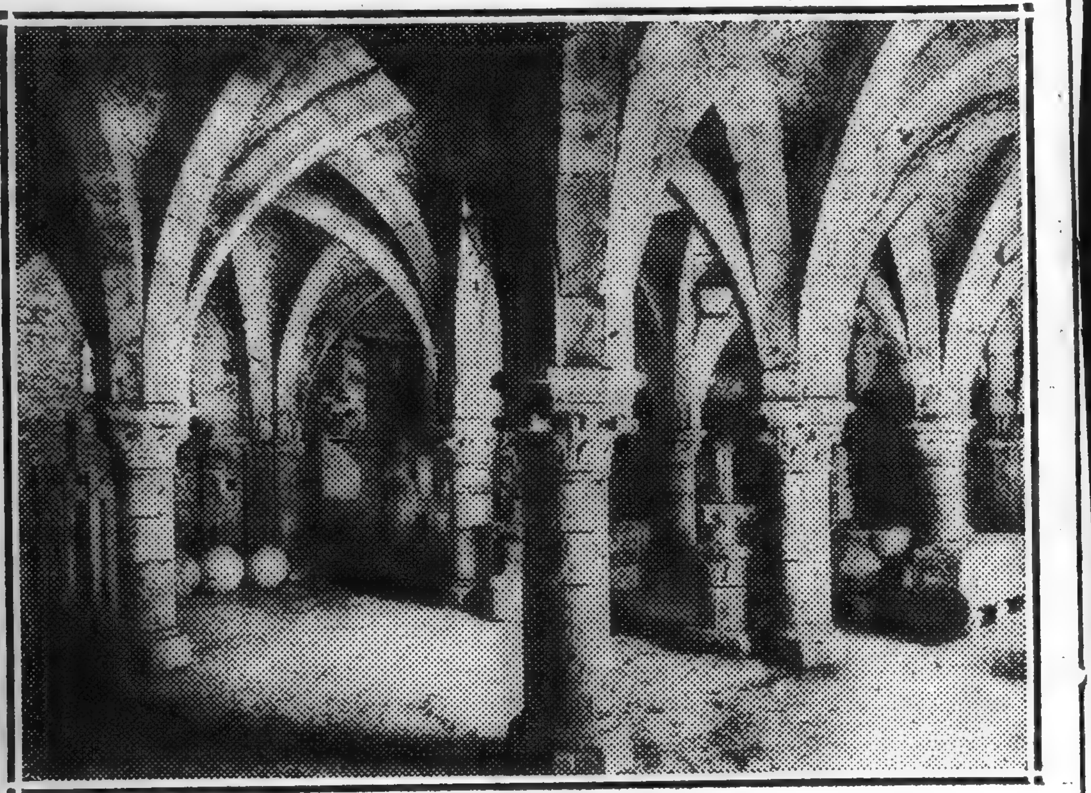
It is scarcely necessary to say that all of the works were imaginatively performed yesterday under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. The chorus was the Bach Cantata Club, trained by C. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Olga Averino, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Robert Steel, tenor, and Frederic Baer, bass.

Looking Ahead

MARCH 2—
"The Front Page," at the Peabody Playhouse.
MARCH 6—
"When Ladies Meet," at the Plymouth.

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

The Cathedral Crypt



MASSIVE PIERS AND HUGE ARCHES

A SURGEON who performs marvelously delicate excisions was asked to operate in a remote city. He replied, "I never do barnstorming operations." His remark, however it may have sounded, was the reverse of hard-hearted. What it meant was that a successful operation of the type he would have had to perform was almost as dependent on the staff work of his highly-skilled corps of assistants as it was on his own dexterity.

Any highly-developed art-form is similarly dependent on the social structure of the age in which it is practiced. Let that be destroyed and the art goes with it.

This was what happened to music after the fall of Rome. The early church became its custodian. One cannot say that the church kept it alive, for man sings as the bird sings; but for a thousand years—from 450 to 1450 A. D.—the church provided the molds into which this molten gold of song was poured.

The early Christians sang psalms and hymns, although little is known about them as music. Gradually song was transferred from the laity to a clerical choir, the idea being that it was considered an act of prayer and therefore a clerical office, and the part of the people was confined to brief responses. When, in the fourth century, the Emperor Constantine made Christianity the State religion, the music of the Italian church became liturgical. There is good reason to suppose that the way the music follows the rhythm, sense and cadence of the words in liturgical chant is a derivation from the music of ancient Greece, which went in much the same way.

The establishment of the Papal Choir occurred in the fifth century, and the first singing schools were founded in that period. By the year 600 A. D. the Catholic liturgy was essentially completed. Thus the art was not only in continued existence, but it was slowly growing, like Winter wheat, under the earth of the Dark Ages. But although secular music must have existed also, the art was primarily a religious one, associated with the forms of worship.

Two names disengage themselves, though not the names of musicians: Ambrosius, Bishop of Milan, toward the end of the fourth century, and Pope Gregory the Great, who lived about 200 years later. The systematic introduction of congregational singing in the form of hymns for double chorus dates from him. The Gregorian reforms, while opposing these, were not hostile to music as such. Gathering the entire treasure of ecclesiastical music into a liturgical system, Gregory legitimatized music as an independent part of worship. Gregorian plain-song, an achievement of the first rank, not only in music, but in general culture, is the great contribution of the first 10 centuries of Christendom.

What was happening to the art of music in those 10 centuries can be seen by going down into the crypt of a cathedral. It is dim down there and dark, but by the beams of a taper can be seen massive piers and huge arches. They are not ornamental like those of the nave which the crypt supports. They do not shine in the sun like the spires. The laying of these heavy stones, where the eye of daylight rarely comes, was a tedious and painful task. It had to be done on faith by workers who mostly had no assurance that they would ever behold the cathedral completed, and mostly they never did. But those heavy stones had to be laid and laid well if the airy traceries of pier and groin vaulting, of choir and rose window were to rise above them.

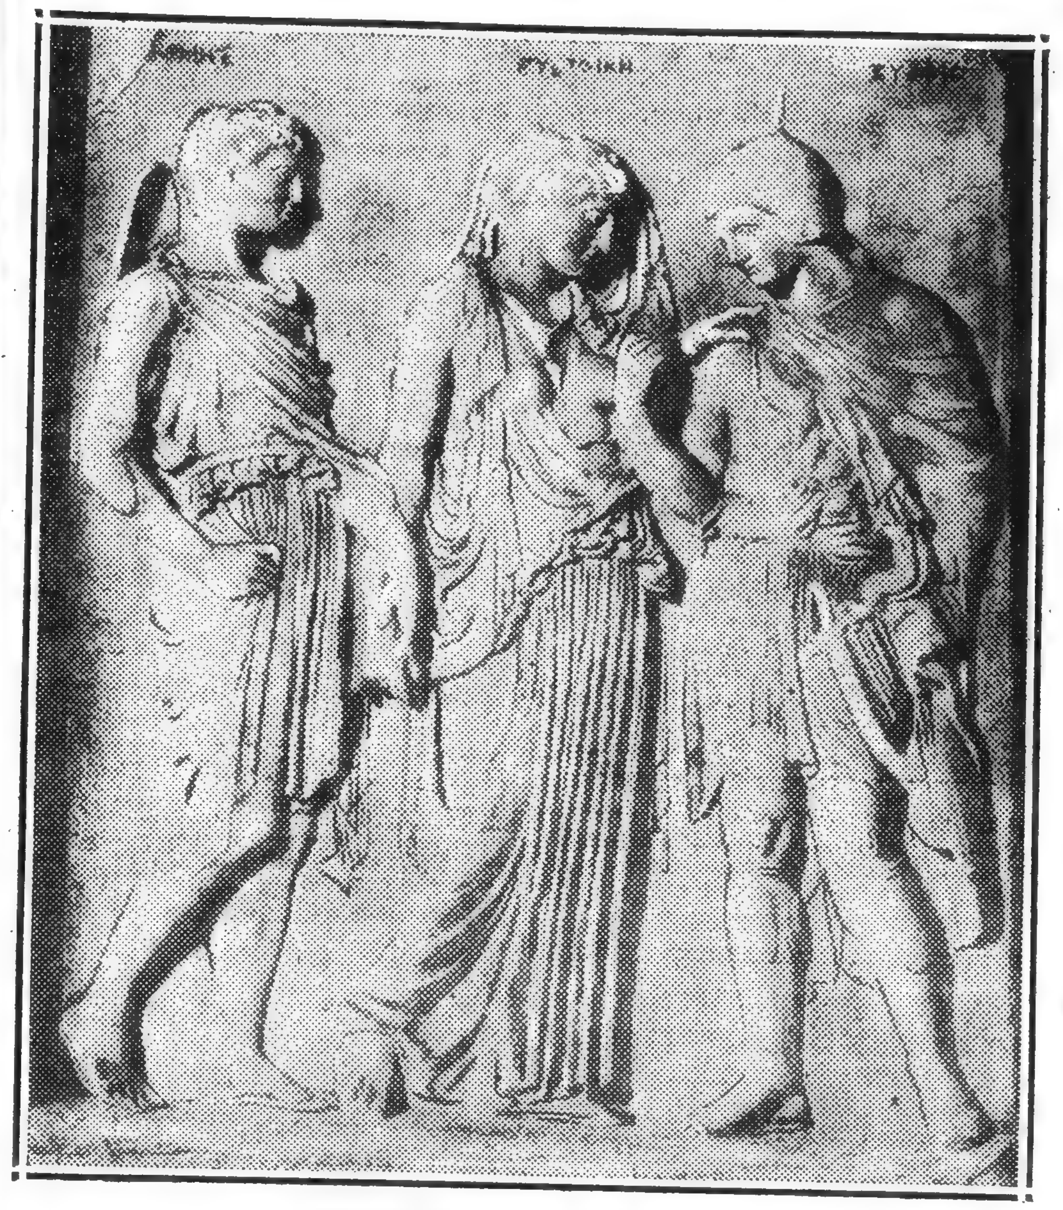
The stupendous fabric of fantasy in stone which we call a cathedral is the art of classical music as it flourished in the 18th and 19th centuries. But the massive foundation stones in the crypt on which it rests were laid by the first 10 centuries of the Christian Church.

L. P.

Tomorrow: The Golden Thread

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

The Golden Thread



HERMES, EURIDICE AND ORPHEUS
From the Marble Bas-Relief in the Naples Museum

MUSIC in the 16th and 17th centuries was a swarm of golden bees uncertain of its direction. More than one fine artist caught a few of them in his hive and we are still eating the honey; but no one hived the whole swarm until Johann Sebastian Bach.

But two of those minor hives whose honey is still edible bear, one, the name of Palestrina, the other, that of Monteverde.

Palestrina is now much more than a mere name hereabouts, thanks in part to the efforts of the Harvard Glee Club under Dr Davison; for two decades ago, when he first awoke that organization from its long slumber, audiences were startled by the beauty of Palestrina's music, until then long unheard in concert. But a master at Milton Academy tells me he now hears the music of Palestrina coming up out of the gymnasium shower baths after football practice along with steam and the smell of fresh soap.

The true name of that "Prince of Music" was Giovanni Pierluigi; he was called Palestrina from his birthplace near Rome where he spent nearly the whole of his life in the service of the Popes. That life spanned the years from 1526 to 1594. His art was the most profound type of revolutionism, for he was the revolutionist who, without breaking with the existing order, changes it from within and does so by purifying old forms, using only their noblest elements. Thus Palestrina continued to write church music medieval in form and spirit, combining the elder art of plain-song with sacred texts, so as to produce a purity of sound, a grace of movement and a calm, ethereal quality of expression which have made his works to many minds the most perfect ideal of devotional music that has ever been achieved. He enriched every portion of the church ritual by his works, and how copious was their extent can be judged from the number of his masses alone which reached ninety-five.

How this historic thread of music interweaves itself throughout our modern life may appear from an adventure with that of Monteverde. Ten years ago a young professor of music in Amherst College played a passage from Monteverde's opera "Orfeo," remarking, "That harmony [illegible] ing written today!" It was the passage in which the death of Eurydice is announced to Orpheus, with his pathetic exclamation. Monteverde, it is true, was considered ultra-modern when he wrote (he was born in 1567 and died in 1643), and it is also true that he sounds modern today. Italy was then boiling with that spiritual ferment known as the Renaissance. In Florence a group of amateur musicians who met in the palace of Count Bardi was striving to create a modern dramatic form in the image of Greek tragedy. Unwittingly they were begetting modern opera. Into this endeavor stepped Monteverde, and he has left a name which towers in the history of music between those of Palestrina and Handel. He found opera a hot-house orchid blooming in a ducal conservatory, and left it the rugged plant of a popular art which, in Europe at least, it still is. Yet how slowly the finest talents often ripen. Gifted and accomplished musician though he had been since his sixteenth year, it was not until he was forty that he essayed opera, the form in which his most enduring work was to be done. His contribution to the art was to bring it close to average human life, to free the voice as it had seldom before been liberated, and to use instruments in a small orchestra with some approach to what we now know as "instrumental color." Trumpets, trombones and drums he noticed were effective for battle pieces, flutes for pastoral scenes and stringed instruments for love-making. In his work the forms and colors of modern opera begin to grow from vagueness to precision.

To resume the Amherst story: half a dozen years later, this time in Switzerland on the shores of Lake Geneva, Romain Rolland, the French author, said, in words almost identical, "Listen, and I will play you some truly modern music." He played that same lament for Euridice from Monteverde's "Orfeo." (The sound of the music brought back the rose sunset of a May evening seen from windows overlooking the Connecticut Valley and the Holyoke Range.) Then turning from his pianoforte he indicated a plaque hanging on the wall, a reproduction of the ancient marble bas-relief of the parting between Orpheus and Euridice, which is in the museum at Naples. "This music of Monteverde," said Rolland, "is that marble translated into sound. That is why I keep the plaque where it is."

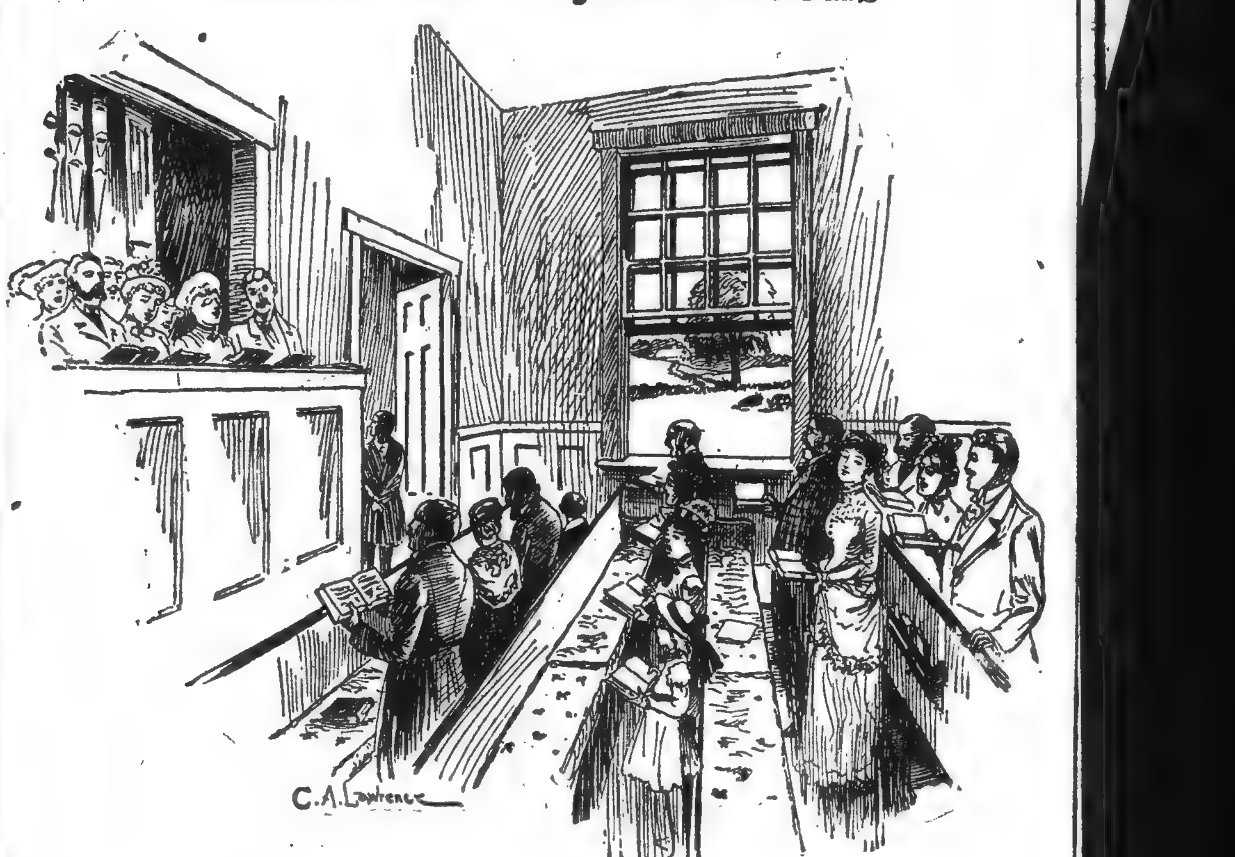
A month later in the Naples Museum, almost by accident, I stumbled upon the marble original. Seventeenth century music, still modern, from an ancient Greek legend; heard first in Amherst, Mass, then in Switzerland, with a reminder in Naples: thus does the golden [illegible] inweave.

L. P.

[illegible] Hymn Books

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Hearts and Hymn Books



ON a Sunday morning of Summer in childhood at the village church the congregation was singing a hymn. It was late June, and in through the open windows from the nearby meadows floated the odor of new-mown hay. During pauses of the hymn the chirr of the insect choir and the songs of birds sounded in antiphonal chant from outside, and from the pew one could look away over sun-drenched fields to the woods aslumber in June sunshine. The music and poetry of the hymn went to the heart with a pang of pleasure so intense that it was akin to pain. What did these words mean? They seemed to speak of tremendous things, but then one was too young to understand. But the music: that was easy to understand. It spoke directly to the heart.

At the Bach festivals in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, the audience in the church rises to join in singing with the choir, organ and orchestra those noble hymns (called "Chorales") which Johann Sebastian Bach interspersed among the solos and choruses of his oratorios. If anything, these are more moving than the great choruses themselves, for in these ancient hymns from an age of living faith the heart of a folk goes up in worship. It is small wonder that audiences when singing them find themselves moved to a degree which they are often at a loss to understand. In those hymns still sounds the cry of a people's faith.

Hymns are a form of folk song. Some of them are centuries old, and they spring from the deeps of our historical consciousness. How slowly, and with what pains, even the comparatively simple art of hymn-writing had to grow. What we now read on the page of a hymn book was ages in fashioning; first merely black dots at varying levels to guide the voice up or down; then the five lines of the staff to fix their position, the clef to fix their pitch, and the vertical lines to measure them into bars for duration of sound: a shorthand without words. How surprising that such a sign-language ever got itself invented at all.

The history of hymns is a history of Christendom. Some of the grandest are the Latin hymns of the Middle Ages. The words of the "Stabat Mater" are so beautiful that, as a little boy, I learned them before I understood a word of Latin. Even when translated into the English of the hymnal they glow and burn so that a youth, though he may still be ignorant of their history, can be sure that there is fire in them. And where could there be a line more touching than that last one of the "Recordare Jesu Pie" in the Requiem, which concludes, "Tantus labor non sit cassus" ("Let not all this toil be wasted")? It is a noble prayer in seven words.

The Protestant hymns which came from 16th and 17th century Germany ring with the fervour of German folk songs, which gives them a flavor peculiarly rich and strong. German Protestantism made a happy decision about music. Realizing that religion must have beauty and joy, they decreed that theirs be uttered through music. English Puritanism was not so wise. The Puritans killed English music in its infancy, and both England and America are only just beginning to recover from the blight. Tardily the Puritans permitted first the singing of metrical paraphrases of the psalms, and finally, for the past century, a worthy literature of hymns has been created, though often at the expense of filching and vulgarizing fine melodies from the classic composers. After having heard one of these themes garbled and sentimentalized in a hymn-book from childhood, it is quite a surprise to hear it come sounding out of a symphony orchestra (like the melody which begins the Overture of von Weber's "Freischutz") in all the splendour of its original form.

Yet the hymnologists should be forgiven their thefts, their trespasses and their errors. For their tunes go manly. Words and verses speak straight to the deeps within, and stead the heart in many a Valley of the Shadow. It is worth while keeping an old hymnal handy if only now and then of a Sunday afternoon to play the familiar tune; to see again the placid faces and silvery hair of old neighbors in the village congregation, to smell the scent of hay and old-fashioned garden flowers floating in from the June sunshine; and above all, to hear once more the golden tones of one's mother's voice lifted up in joy and worship. L. P.

(Tomorrow—Bach the Prodigious)

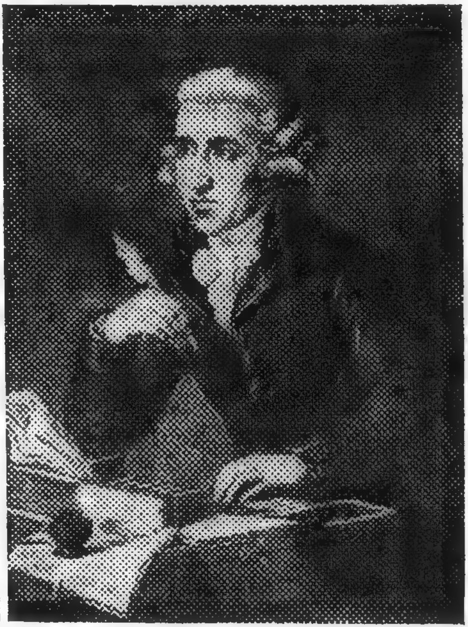
OSTO GLOBE—T

TH HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Haydn Fathers the Symphony

CONTRARY to supposition, few inventions are the work of one man. But one inventor, more gifted than his fellows, stamps his name on the invention which was the work of many hands. Steam engine, Darwinian theory of evolution, the symphony, all have long family histories. But the title "father of the symphony" was captured by Joseph Haydn.

His own history is as significant as that of the symphony. On the eve of a revolutionary age, he sprang from peasant stock, learned his art in choir loft and garret, practised it 30 years in aristocratic drawing rooms, and finally, in the form of symphony and oratorio, carried it out to a great popular audience.



A PORTRAIT OF 18TH CENTURY MUSIC

Like the rest of them he was rather badly kicked around at the start. A choir boy in his 'teens whose voice has began to crack, he is turned out for having cut off the wig-tail of a fellow chorister, and, being without funds or food, is befriended by another poor musician who shares his own attic with him. Ten precarious years, his twenties,—from 1751 to 1761,—he picked up a livlihood by teaching, playing accompaniments, and composing at a worn-eaten clavier in an attic of his own. This phase ended with his appointment as court composer to Count Morzin, followed two years later by a post as chapelmaster to Prince Esterhazy which he holds for nearly 30 years.

Before public concerts and music publishing could support musicians they worked for churches, schools, theatres, or princely houses. Bach wrote for choirs, Handel for theatres, and Haydn for a court orchestra.

Prince Esterhazy spent most of his year at his country estate, where Haydn had eventually an orchestra of thirty players together with singers. "I was cut off from the world," he says of his life at that time, "there was no one to confuse or torment me, and I was forced to become original." The Prince encouraged him to experiment boldly, and he, in turn, educated the taste of his employer.

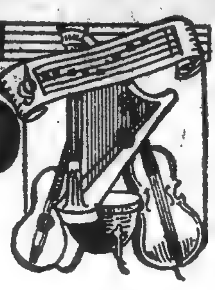
In those quiet years a great deal quietly happened. The ex-peasant, remembering his folk tunes of dance and song, and having mastered the aristocratic art-forms of Italian overture and drawing-room music, combined the two in that form of orchestral piece which we know as the symphony. Its father is a dance tune (the series of pieces called a "suite") and its mother a piece for harpsichord (elaborated by Bach's son, Karl Philipp Emanuel) known as the "sonata." Haydn wrote suite-sonatas for orchestra and called them symphonies. Although he composed 104 of these which have been authenticated, they were merely a part of his artistic output.

The Esterhazys deserve well of our gratitude, for in 1790 Haydn, with an assured income and the title of Chapelmaster, was set free by Prince Anton for his two journeys and sojourns in London for which he composed the two oratorios whereby he is more popularly known, "The Creation," to a text from Milton's "Paradise Lost" and "The Seasons," to words from James Thompson's poem. Half a century after Handel's death another German composer was writing oratorios to be performed by English people, stunted as they had been in their own musical development by the 17th century Puritan veto, and the English people sang (and sing) him gladly.

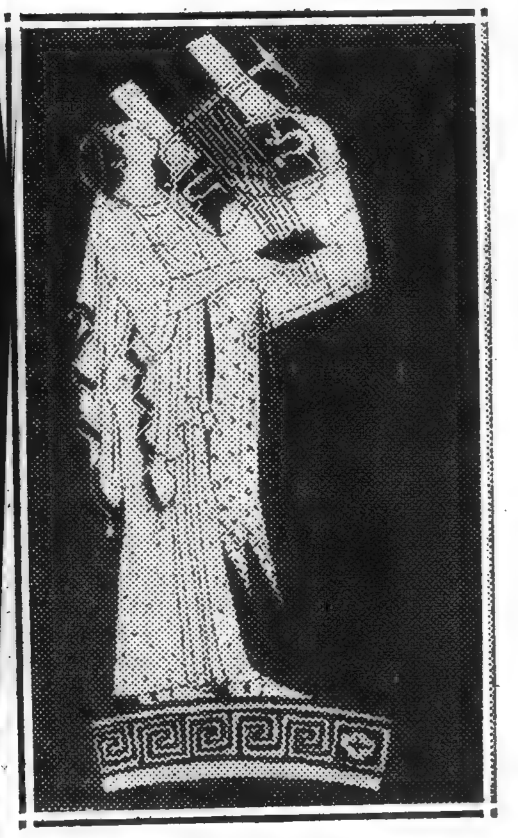
Meanwhile, this befrilled and bewigged 18th century Emperor of Music was helping rear two young Crown Princes. Mozart and Beethoven were his pupils. He learned from Mozart as well as having taught him; Beethoven, though he revered his old master, was savagely independent and went more his own way. But the Empire of the symphony passed in succession to these two heirs and both of them enlarged the realm — the second ruler so prodigiously that it was a question between his two co-successors Wagner and Brahms, whether he had not exhausted the possibilities of the symphonic form. Wagner said yes and turned to opera: Brahms said no and continued with the symphony. Both were right. Wagner added the symphony to opera and Brahms added opulence to the symphony.

L. P.

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC



The Greeks Had a Word For It



LYRE PLAYER
(Courtesy, Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

MUSIC

Servant and master am I: servant of those dead, and master of those living. Through my spirits immortals speak the message that makes the world weep and laugh, and wonder and worship.

I tell the story of love, the story of hate, the story that saves, and the story that damns. I am the incense upon which prayers float to Heaven. I am the smoke which palls over the field of battle, where men lie dying with me on their lips.

I am close to the marriage altar, and when the graves open I stand near by; I call the wanderer home, I rescue the soul from the depths, I open the lips of lovers, and through me the dead whisper to the living.

One I serve as I serve all; and the king I make my slave as easily as I subject his slave. I speak through the birds of the air, the insects of the field, the crash of waters on rock-ribbed shores, the sighing of the wind in the trees, and I am even heard by the soul that knows me in the clatter of wheels on city streets.

I know no brother, yet all men are my brothers; I am father of the best that is in them, and they are fathers of the best that is in me; I am of them, and they are of me. For I am the instrument of God. I am Music.

—(From International Musician, Newark, N J, July, 1928.)

THE night before Socrates was to drink the hemlock he was visited, as he lay in prison, by a prophetic dream. His "daimon," that mysterious familiar, which he took to be his inner guide, spoke and said:

"Mousiken poiei kai ergazou."

Those words still go on ringing in the ears of the world. Exactly what do they mean? In their larger sense they translate into, "Follow the gleam and keep going." They have also been, beautifully, it is true, if but not quite accurately, taken to mean, "Labor and make music." For although the Greeks had a word for it, that word was "harmony"; by "music" they meant all those human strivings which are inspired by the Muses; the cultivation of the mind.

In that cultivation music held a prominent place. Much of their poetry was sung or chanted, and even their athletes practiced to the sound of it for the sake of form and rhythm. Yet modern music derives only indirectly from the Greeks. Their music perished with them, and although a good deal is known about it, the one thing needful is not known and that is how it actually sounded. For one may write about music with the tongues of men and of angels, but music is not music until it sounds.

Song and dance must be as old as man; they may be older than speech. Primitive religion is aquiver with rhythm and melody, for man can dance and sing emotions which he cannot speak. But harmony, the sounding of more than one note at once, is a later development. Your ancient Greek strummed his lyre—a crude harp—and blew into pipes, something between flute and oboe. His lyre became our grand pianoforte (which is — look at one — a harp laid on its side and struck with padded hammers instead of being plucked by fingers); and his flute-oboe became our pipe organ. But he himself sang a simple melody accompanied by an instrument, played above the vocal part. Probably his singing sounded somewhat like the liturgical chants intoned by a priest of today. The song followed the words instead of the words of the song, as with us. Thus it was that the Attic dramatists were often not only poets, but musicians, composing the melodies to which the actors sang those choric odes which divided the acts in their dramas. Our chorus, both musical and human, is lineally descended from the Greek. Crude as their music may seem to have been, it could evidently be very moving, and it was skillfully contrived within laws of harmony and a system of notation which have come down to us in an ancient treatise, in early manuscripts, and in the fortunate discovery by French archaeologists of an inscription among the ruins at the shrine of Delphi. For music was everywhere in Greek life; in their worship, their athletic festivals, their revelry, feasting, dancing and drama.

Strange is the spell which Greek drama casts on the imaginations of men. Once it has been fully exerted on a mind it never quite relaxes its fascination. For here is an art so austere and noble, so subtle and yet so simple, that it stands as an eternal challenge to the intellects of artists in succeeding ages. The Florentines in the Italian Renaissance heard with the ears of their imaginations that ancient music ringing in the choric odes of the newly rediscovered Greek dramas and set themselves to create it anew. They failed, but never was failure more magnificent. For in failing they created a new art-form, the opera. Opera, and its greater offspring, the music drama of Richard Wagner, is an avowed and lineal descendant from the Greeks.

Those ancient manuscripts were the dried rose petals of Greek music entombed in the blue Canton porcelain jar of Greek drama. Reopened 2000 years later their delicate perfume, rising to the nostrils of musicians and poets, had a potency to inspire the proudest artistic achievement of modern times.

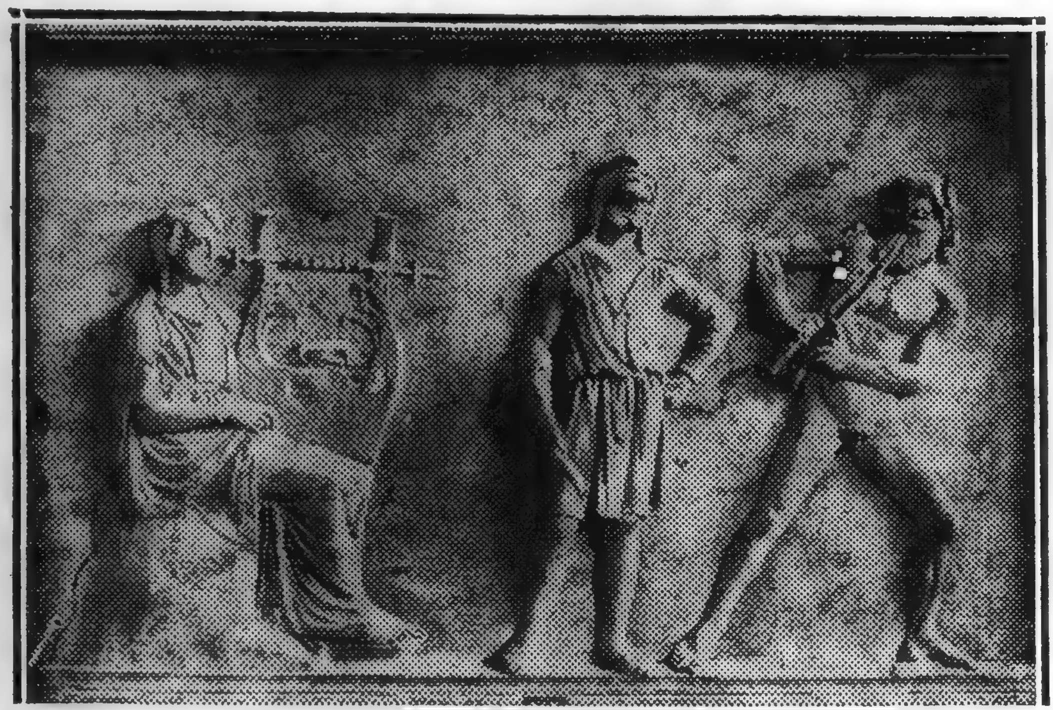
L. P.

Tomorrow: The Cathedral Crypt

BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1933

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Fortunes Free



THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OF 450 B. C.

TWO things in the world are still free: air and music. Food for the ear comes quivering along with food for the lungs. The situation is astounding. No way has yet been found to corner either of them. Meanwhile, hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of the most valuable music ever composed comes squirting out of the radio box, often against the eardrums of persons totally unaware of its worth. This situation is as pitiable as the other is amazing. It is as if, having been taken to a 10-dollar show free, we sighed for the 15-cent circus.

Music is the one art in which our age surpasses all others. Queen Elizabeth's England could beat us at literature; Renaissance Italy could beat us at painting; Mediaeval Europe could beat us at architecture, and ancient Hellas could beat us at sculpture. But not one of them, poor wights! ever heard a symphony orchestra.

Here, then, in our midst, is this great art, full grown, and speaking daily out of the radio box free, or it may be out of a phonograph shutter. Not to understand what it is saying would be like having walked past the Cathedral of Chartres with no more eye for its splendor than if it had been a cow shed, or to have sauntered past the Globe Theatre in the London of 1604 with a free pass to one of Master Shakespeare's comedies then being enacted for the first time without so much as bothering to go in; or in Athens when Phidias was chiseling the sculptures of the Parthenon but to have been too engrossed in the fig market to give them a look.

Now music is no occult realm. To enter it requires no mystic password. What it does require is attentive listening with some knowledge of how it is constructed. For music is a mathematics of the emotions, as precise and logical as the celebrated Greek verb, and, once mastered, as easy to understand.

For the space of three or more centuries the classic literature of music has been accumulating like a savings-bank account at accrued interest. Until within our own lifetimes most of it was inaccessible to nearly everybody excepting musicians, and much of it was closed even to them. They counted themselves lucky, (especially in case they lived away from cities), if they heard a few of these classics properly performed once in their lifetimes—to say nothing of once a year. Such events were memories to live on ever afterwards.

Then, of a sudden, the miracle happened. Two inventions, phonograph and radio, deluged a world of listeners with the hoarded gold of this savings-bank account of music. Coming so suddenly it has precipitated a crisis. The danger is lest that which was once too scarce be now too common. No doubt when the printing press was a new invention optimists thought everybody would read good books and that the world's troubles were over. But bad books are read quite as eagerly as good. Education is the ability to identify the good from the bad.

So radio becomes the newspaper and phonograph records the printed books of this newly opened literature of musical sound. Each has its function, and the two need not clash. Discriminating listeners will want both.

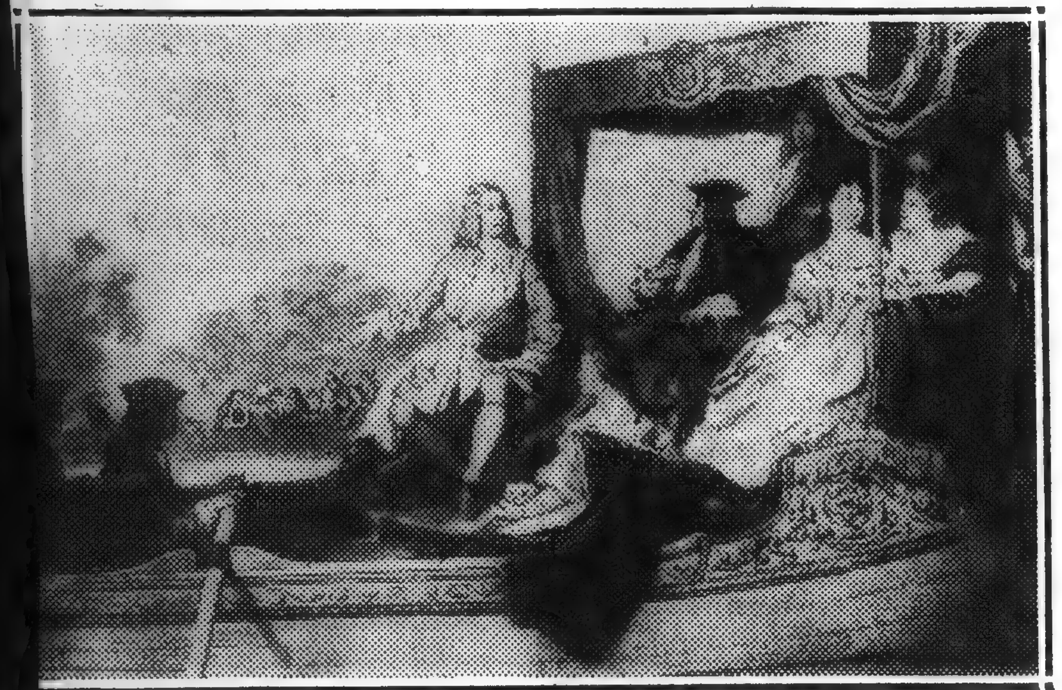
Nothing quite like this release of musical literature seems to have occurred hitherto in human annals. We have fallen heirs to a huge fortune, and it is not yet certain that we know how to husband it. The first requisite is to understand its true value. How ghastly it would be if tone-poetry—works which have cost their creators infinite sweat, tears, back-break, heartache, and heartbreak, along with some of the highest pleasure knowable by man—should go pealing out unheeded amid the chatter and clatter of a dinner table. In this space for the next few days, therefore, will be an effort to put into the possession of such as care for the enjoyment of music a few clues to its comprehension as an art-form. L. P.

Tomorrow: The Greeks Had a Word for It

BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1933

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Handel's Testament of Faith



HANDEL AND GEORGE II
Urbane Termination of an Embarrassing Incident

A MAN who writes for the theatre bids goodby to a quiet life. Sebastian Bach, composing for church choirs, might lead a retired existence, but Handel, writing opera, lived in the public glare.

Their two lives run queerly parallel. Both are born in 1685 in the same region of Germany within a month of each other; both compose oratorios which remain summits of religious music; both are virtuoso organists without a peer save each other; both go blind in old age and submit to unsuccessful operations by the same surgeon. Yet these co-reigning sovereigns never meet.

Handel's struggles with his father are an act in the eternal comedy of parenthood versus genius. The old gentleman, a surgeon, disdaining art and worshiping social rank, was so alarmed at symptoms of talent in the boy that he even kept him from school lest he learn notes. A clavichord was smuggled into the garret, and the lad taught himself. Hearing him play at the age of 7, a Duke persuaded the father. If a Duke said music was respectable, it must be so.

Next, a strict cathedral organist taught him composition, organ, harpsichord, violin, and hautboy, until, after three years, the lad knew more than his teacher. His father's death, in the next year, 1697, obliged him to support his mother and himself, which he did ably, first as organist in his natal Halle, then as violinist and orchestral conductor in Hamburg. Here he produced his first operas; but a sojourn in Italy, especially at Naples, in 1706, revolutionized his style. Henceforward he was to write with the depth of a German but with the melodious grace of an Italian.

London became his field of battle. To remain there he played truant from his post as chapelmaster to the Elector at Hanover. It was just his luck that the English should make the Elector King George I of England, and Handel had to keep out of sight. Finally it was arranged that he compose a series of pieces to be played by orchestra aboard a Thames barge trailing astern of the King's boat. Last season when some of this "Water Music" was played here in Boston at Symphony Hall, it was not hard to believe that the King pardoned him and granted him an annual stipend of $1000. After such music His Majesty just could not stay mad.

On this London battlefield, as composer and theatre manager, Handel and his rivals staged an operatic warfare which rent the playgoing public. John Byron's epigram is still quoted:

"Some say, compar'd to Bononcini,
"That Mynheer Handel's but a Ninny;
"Others aver, that he to Handel
"Is scarcely fit to hold a Candle:
"Strange all this Difference should be,
" 'Twixt Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee!"

In truth Handel was a turbulent spirit. At Hamburg a brass button on his coat caught the point of a duellist's rapier and saved his life. He was twice bankrupt in London; like Dr Samuel Johnson he offended the nobility by his sturdy independence, and the only combat he seems ever to have flinched was that he abstained from marriage.

His genuine life work began at the age of 53, when, already famous, he turned from opera to the composiition of oratorios. The colossal choruses of "Israel in Egypt" were too overwhelming to be understood: the work was ill-received (he was obliged to interlard it with operatic songs!), and after three performances it was withdrawn. "The Messiah," by which he remains best known, although it is not his finest work, was composed in 24 days and first performed in Dublin for a charity in 1742. Ten years more these choral masterpieces welled from his pen until, in 1751, while writing "Jephtha," his sight began to fail.

He begins it in perfect health at the age of 65, writing the first act in 12 days. Then his vision clouds, and the music, as he writes, turns mournful. Its words are, "How mysterious, O Lord, are Thy ways!" He is forced to stop 10 days. On Feb 23 he notes on his manuscript, "Am a little better." He resumes, composing music to the words, "Our joy is lost in grief . . . as day is lost in night." Five days he struggles to end this sombre chorus,—he who could once in that space have written an entire act. The music hesitates, to the words, "All that is . . ." then, summoning his forces in a triumphant burst of affirmation, it ends in a jubilant shout, "All that is . . . is good!"

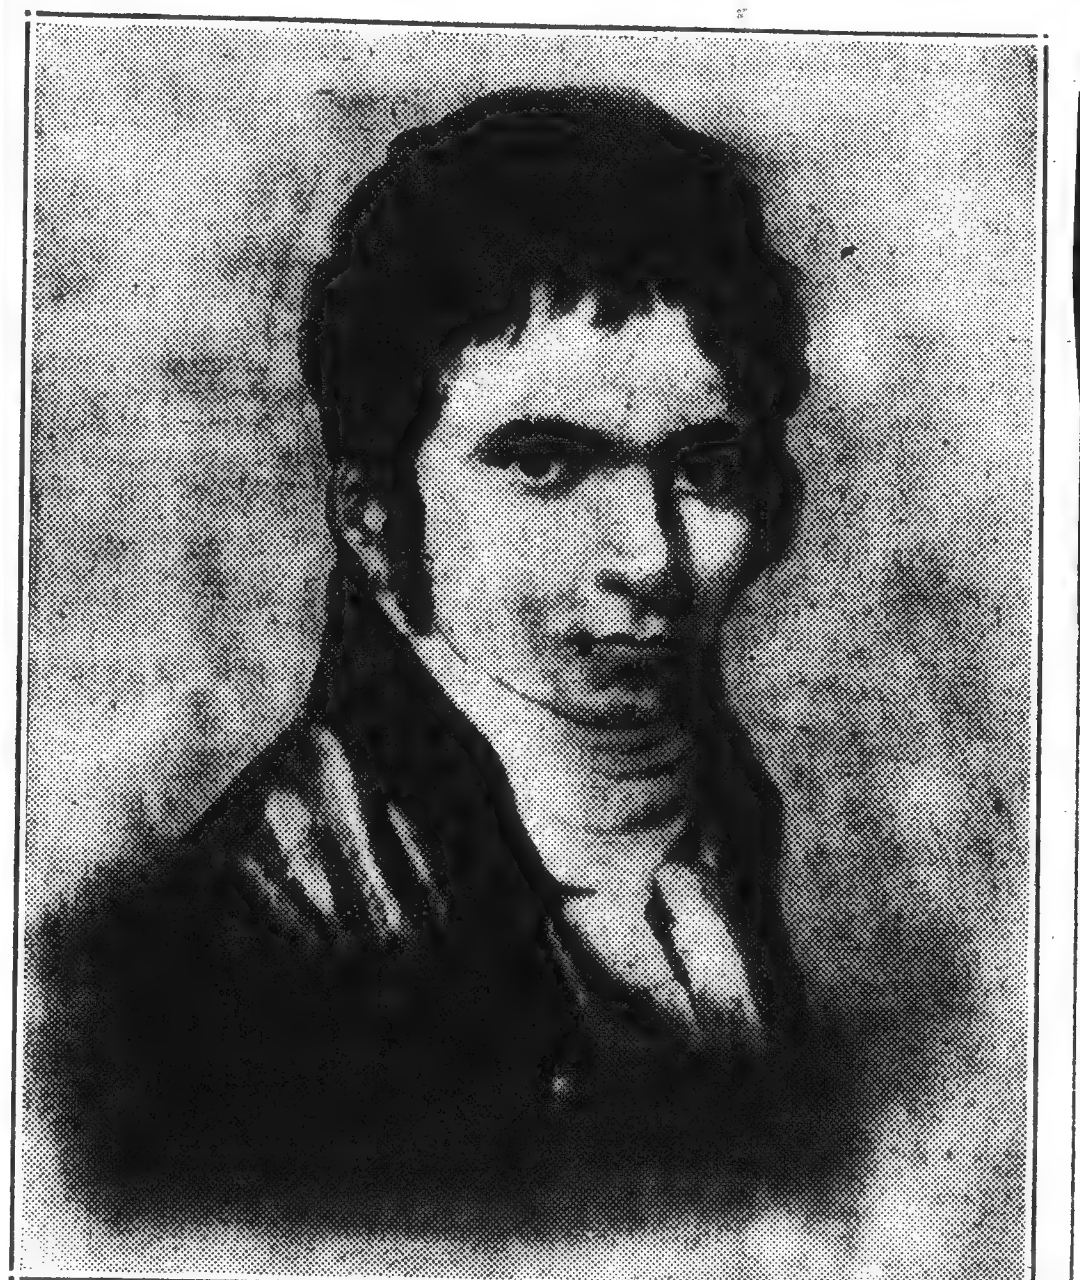
This is Handel's testament of faith. He died blind.

L. P.

BOSTON GLOBE—FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1933

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Beethoven as Careerist



HE IS THIRTY-TWO YEARS OLD AND HAS WRITTEN HIS "SYMPHONY EROICA," A DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE IN MUSIC.

(The Horneman portrait from Rolland's "Beethoven the Creator," courtesy of Harper & Brothers)

SURPRISE was expressed to Archbishop Temple at the success in after-life of a man who, as a boy at Rugby, had been undistinguished.

"It is not what they are at 18," replied the Archbishop, "it is what they become afterward that matters."

The valuable intellectual development is self-development, and that mostly takes place between the ages of 16 and 30. When Beethoven arrived in Vienna to seek a musical career he was 22 and his compositions, compared to those of Mozart before him and of Schubert after him at the same age, were few and unimportant. His talent and repute, though excellent, were promissory notes not yet paid.

Lodged in the time-honored garret (the attempts of artists to live cheaply thus end in their living high) he studied with Papa Haydn. His exercises in composition, 245 of them, 42 of which are corrected by Haydn's pen, are still extant—as though we possessed dramatic sketches by William Shakespeare criticized in the handwriting of Christopher Marlowe.

Before he had been gone from his native Bonn two months, the death of his father cuts off the income from the Court. Hardly has he obtained a renewal when a French Revolutionary army, in October, 1794, invests Bonn, the Elector takes to his heels, and the money stops. But artists are usually obliged to create their works with what serenity they can muster whilst the din of war and social upheaval rings in their ears. How was Beethoven to live now? Musical public in the modern sense there was none. He could give lessons and play in the salons of the Viennese aristocracy by whom, in spite of, or perhaps because of, his brusque manners he was well liked. One of these, Prince Lichnowsky, came to the rescue with a small, eke-out, annual stipend. For the rest he must write for music publishers. He was, in fact, the first composer ever to earn the major portion of his livelihood by so writing. Of course he was poorly paid. Works now priceless went for the price of a week's board. He refers amiably to his publishers as "the hell-hounds that gnaw my brain." Hard experience finally taught him to bargain, but he never does so without a grimace. What had money to do with music? "I live only in my music, and no sooner is one thing done than the next is begun. As I am now writing, I often work at three or four things at once." Publishers' proofs peppered with errors were the bane of his existence. Being composers themselves, the publishers often presumed to correct his daring heterodoxies, as though a typesetter amended the grammar of the poet Keats. Beethoven felt strongly on this subject: "I have passed the whole forenoon today and yesterday afternoon in correcting these two pieces, and am quite hoarse with stamping and swearing."

In the Autumn of 1800, when he is thirty, he begins his custom of spending long seasons in country villages, composing his music in field or grove and only going indoors to write it out in score. Daybreak may find him walking in the woods while they are still dim with the night mists.

His star is rising. No doubt of that now. There is no reason why he should not reach the summit of his profession. Then a grisly shadow starts creeping across his heavens. He knows it, but pretends not to know. Finally one day while walking in the country a companion bids him listen to a distant shepherd's tune. Beethoven turns deathly pale. Not a note of it has been audible to him. There is no further disguising it from himself. He is losing his hearing. A blind painter? A deaf musician!

L. P.

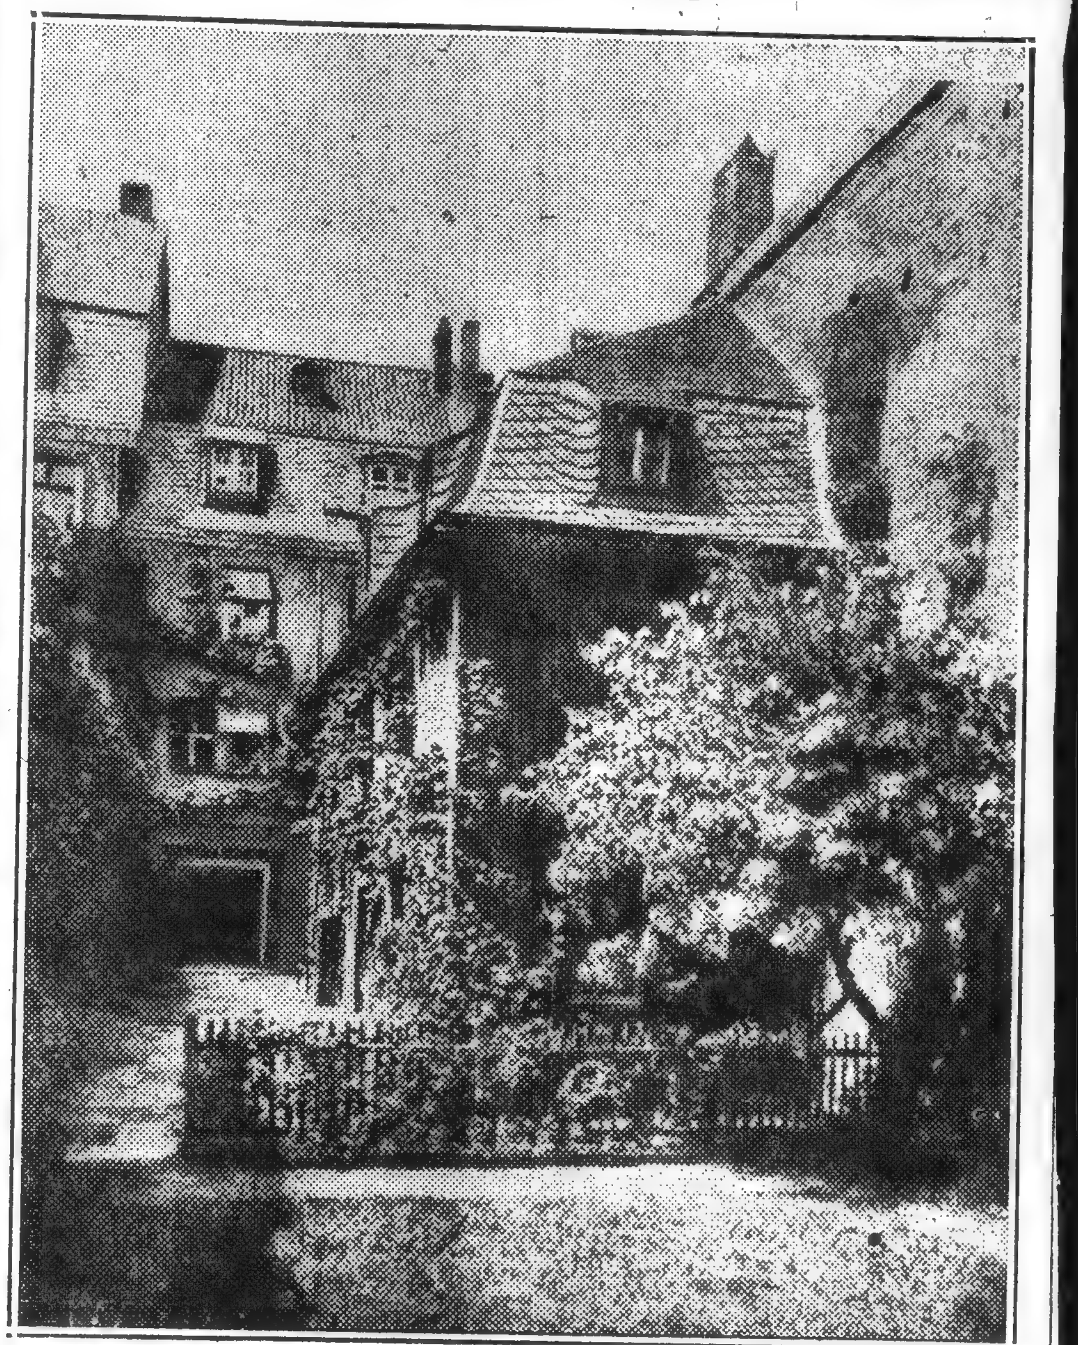
away from "sin." I was money order and | ber of money orders and

---

OSTON GLOBE—THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1933

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Beethoven: The Eagle's Youth



THE CREATIVE SPIRIT IS NOT FASTIDIOUS
Beethoven Was Born in the Attic of This House

THE flowers of art have their botany. Given fertile soil in similar climates, much the same varieties blossom. Ancient Greek drama and modern German music contain parallels. Bach, like Aeschylus, is the Grand Old Man; Mozart, like Sophocles, is the perfect artist; Beethoven, like Euripides, is the passionate rebel.

He had plenty to make him so. Born to poverty in a third-floor garret, which can still be seen in Bonn, Germany, the son of a dissipated bass singer in the Court choir, he began learning music at the ripe age of four, not without tears. His father taught him violin, clavier, the three r's, and a little Latin, until, at the age of nine, he had exhausted the knowledge of this tutor. The intent was to show him off as another little Mozart, but although he did appear in concert playing compositions of his own at the age of eight, he was not precocious in the sense that Mozart was. However, he cared nothing for the games of ordinary boys, and was by no means "a regular fellow." More Latin, plus French and Italian, he picked up from stray tutors, but his formal schooling ceased when he was thirteen, and that stern old schoolmaster, Life, took charge of his education. It was done thoroughly, but perhaps a trifle overdone.

This eleven-year-old boy acted as assistant Court organist; next year he was conductor of the small opera house orchestra (without pay) and had begun in earnest composing music of his own; at fourteen he was second organist at the munificent stipend of 150 florins a year. His mother died when he was seventeen, his father became a sot; and, having three younger brothers, at the age of nineteen he was obliged to assume the headship of the family.

Whoever wishes to know what his life was like can read it in the first volume of Romain Rolland's "Jean-Christophe," one of the two indisputably great novels published thus far in our century. It will probably send the reader to the biographies with a ravenous appetite. "The Beethoven literature is very large," remarks Sir George Grove, the musical encyclopedist. It may well be, for we have here one of the supreme creators.

Nature and circumstance had conspired to disguise him. But his plucky fight did not go unnoticed. People admired and respected this uncouth and manly boy. The von Breuing family made him an intimate. Frau von Breuning, a widow with children about his own age (he was then twelve) and a woman of cultivated mind, mothered him, sharpened his taste for good literature, German, English, and the ancient classics, and did her best to teach him manners, though not too successfully. She was the one person who could ever manage him.

Another friend whom he attracted was Count Waldstein, eight years older than he, and an excellent musician. The Count was a visitor at young Beethoven's alley-cat, one-room abode; gave him a piano, and obtained money for him under the guise of an official stipend. Eighteen years later Beethoven dedicated to him the sonata which still bears and perpetuates the name of Waldstein.

A feeling crept abroad in this Rhine town that Ludwig Beethoven was a youth with a destiny. Haydn, who saw him there, had praised his music; and Mozart, who heard him play at Vienna, had predicted that he would be heard from. He was now 22 years old and the town of Bonn began to feel like an outgrown coat. Among his projects was a musical setting for Schiller's "Ode to Joy." Thirty years later, this became the Choral Finale of his Ninth Symphony; thus slowly do masterpieces mature.

At 22 he set out for Vienna again, this time never to return to Bonn. His destination was the musical capital of Europe, then the Vienna of Haydn and Mozart; later to become the Vienna of Beethoven, and after that the Vienna of Schubert and Brahms. The album in which his friends inscribed their farewells still exists, and contains these words, penned on October 29, 1792:

"Labour assiduously and receive Mozart's spirit from the hands of Haydn. Your true friend, Waldstein."

Beethoven bettered the prophecy.

L. P.

By Gluyas Williams

Wagner Honored by Symphony

Trav Feb 18

In a happy uniting of Beethoven and Wagner, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon played the choral symphony of Beethoven for the first time in four years as part of a program commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death. Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and his Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," act three, rounded out this, the 16th program of the season.

The Beethoven symphony in D minor with final chorus on Schiller's Ode to Joy was augmented in the impressive finale by the Bach Cantata Club and four soloists. Under the skilled direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, the large chorus of human voices became integrated with the orchestra and produced a symphony of deep spiritual and poetic unity, much in keeping with Beethoven's final conception of his work.

Each of the four movements presented a phase of life ranging from tragedy to humor, love and the almost incoherent joy of the ending. The whole portrayal of the search for a mental theme as solution for human problems was rendered with a keenness of appreciation that could not be duplicated by any other orchestra or conductor. In the third movement, that which contains two distinct themes, the strings played the melodies with a soft, sad tenderness that was a perfection of love personified in music.

As much cannot be said of the chorus in the finale. The many voices were well trained and tone-true, but to one who had recently heard the Vienna boys' choir there was a lack of clear-cut phrasing, a mumbling of voices. It is to be regretted the soloists were not more worthy of the orchestra.

The prelude to "Parsifal" by Wagner began the concert and was followed by the Good Friday Spell from the third act of the opera. The selection of these two was fitting, as the prelude supplication was answered by the motives of baptism and faith in the third act. In memory of Wagner's death the audience was asked not to applaud. The complete silence that followed the polished playing of the "Parsifal" excerpts paid great tribute to the musician.

W. T. C., JR.

Music

~~Monitor~~ Feb 18

Boston Symphony

For his Wagner memorial program, at the sixteenth pair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concerts (Feb. 17-18), Dr. Serge Koussevitzky chose the Prelude and the Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The chorus was that of the Bach Cantata Club, Mr. G. W. Woodworth, conductor, and the soloists were Mmes. Olga Averino, soprano, and Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto, and Messrs. Robert Steel, tenor, and Frederic Baer, bass.

Why Beethoven for a Wagner memorial program? some had asked. For excellent reasons, which must have become apparent to anybody listening to the concert. "Parsifal," formerly attacked as sacrilegious, now is regarded with reverence by devout Wagnerites. Into it the master poured full measure of that sensuous mysticism which to him represented religious emotion. In deference to this devotional attribution, the Friday afternoon audience accepted a "suggestion" inserted in the program book that there be no applause after the excerpts from "Parsifal."

No doubt this factitious aura has promoted the longevity of "Parsifal." For many of us, its musical content hardly justifies its lingering so long. Compared with the "Ring," "Tristan" and above all "Meistersinger," it seems today pretty poor stuff. The wizard of harmony and of orchestration had retained his magic touch, but the substance is shoddy. The fact is that Wagner, though one of the greatest geniuses of music, lacked the spiritual penetration which distinguishes the supreme artist. Mythological grandeurs, yes; personal love, yes; even (in "Meistersinger") broad human understanding and tenderness. But insight into things unseen—no.

FEBRUARY 18, 1933

And that, we suppose, is why Dr. Koussevitzky turned to a greater artist—and one who was admired and appreciated by Wagner—for the suitable expression of a memorial tribute. In the Ninth Symphony, and particularly in its first three movements, we have not only a profound human sympathy but a profoundly spiritual vision. To some of us, it is not clear that the choral movement comports with its predecessors; indeed we feel, we intransigeants, that Beethoven would have done better to rely upon music alone to convey his message. Nevertheless, the symphony remains on a peak.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who had struggled valiantly but vainly to make the "Parsifal" music sound impressive, obtained—save for some minor vocal shortcomings—a noble performance of the symphony.

L. A. S.

Koussevitzky Joins Wagner And Beethoven

TRANS — FEB 16

Note on the Choral Symphony To Be Chief Item in the Memorial Concerts

On Friday and Saturday, as item in a memorial program for the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will repeat, for the first times in four years, the Choral Symphony of Beethoven. (The Bach Cantata Club and sundry solo-singers will provide the human voices in the Finale.) In the winter of 1929 they played it not only in Boston, but also in New York. The occasion prompted Mr. Lawrence Gilman of The Herald Tribune to an article about the whole symphony on the imaginative side, considerable parts of which follow hereunder.

The stubborn question [Mr. Gilman begins] that troubles the minds of the thoughtful in contemplating the symphony is this: Was there a poetic scheme in Beethoven's mind, involving the symphony as a whole, which persuaded him to the logic and propriety of attaching to the three instrumental movements a choral setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy"? We know that Wagner, who entered more profoundly into this music than anyone who has written of it, found the poetical, or spiritual, contents of the symphony "in various phases of man's pursuit of joy' (as Mr. Krehbiel once approvingly summarized Wagner's interpretation). Wagner discerned in the opening movement, in Mr. Krehbiel's words, "a conflict of the soul striving after joy with the inimical power that places itself between it and happiness; in the second, a plunge into the delirious vortex of sensual pleasure; in the third, an echo of purest happiness and innocence once enjoyed; finally, achievement and celebration, with the aid of Schiller's words, in the Choral Finale."

Yet Sir George Grove and other analysts (including Mr. Krehbiel himself in his later years) took the disconcerting view that no poetic interrelation need be sought between the first three movements of the Choral Symphony and the Ode to Joy which inspired the Finale. They ask us to believe that the symphony as a whole has no meaning other than a musical one that the Choral Finale, with its setting of Schiller's ode, is merely a sort of musico-poetic accident, without reference to the significance of the work as a unit.

Some of these commentators have told us that the symphony is integrated, and its unity of design established by the intervallic similarity of certain of the themes. But this does not dispose of the deeper question of spiritual and poetical unity. Beethoven himself, by his resort to words and to definite poetic concepts in his choral finale, has compelled us to ask it, and to remain unsatisfied until we find an answer. We are obliged to seek extra-musical meanings in the symphony as a whole because Beethoven has plainly invited us to do so; unless we are willing to admit that the work is a gigantic hybrid, a mixture of species—three-fourths absolute music and one-fourth cantata, with no unifying spiritual characteristic to give meaning and integrity to the whole.

We doubt if it is that, Mr. Gilman continues. As a matter of fact, there are indications that Beethoven himself regarded the symphony as a unified poetic, or let us say spiritual, whole: that he looked both backward and forward during his last year of work upon the score (1823) seeing the beginning in the end and the end in the beginning. . . . It is in his sketchbooks that we shall find what some regard as confirmation for the reassuring belief that the Ninth Symphony is not a tonal hybrid, but a spiritually and poetically integrated whole. By grouping certain of the sketches over which Beethoven agonized while trying to establish a verbal link between the instrumental movements and the Choral Finale, the conviction emerges that the symphony is, after all, a continuous imaginative texture. As Professor Donald F. Tovey, one of the most scholarly and searching of Beethoven's students, has put it in his admirable brochure on the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven himself in these sketches gives us clews from which we can evolve "an account of the first three movements of the symphony."

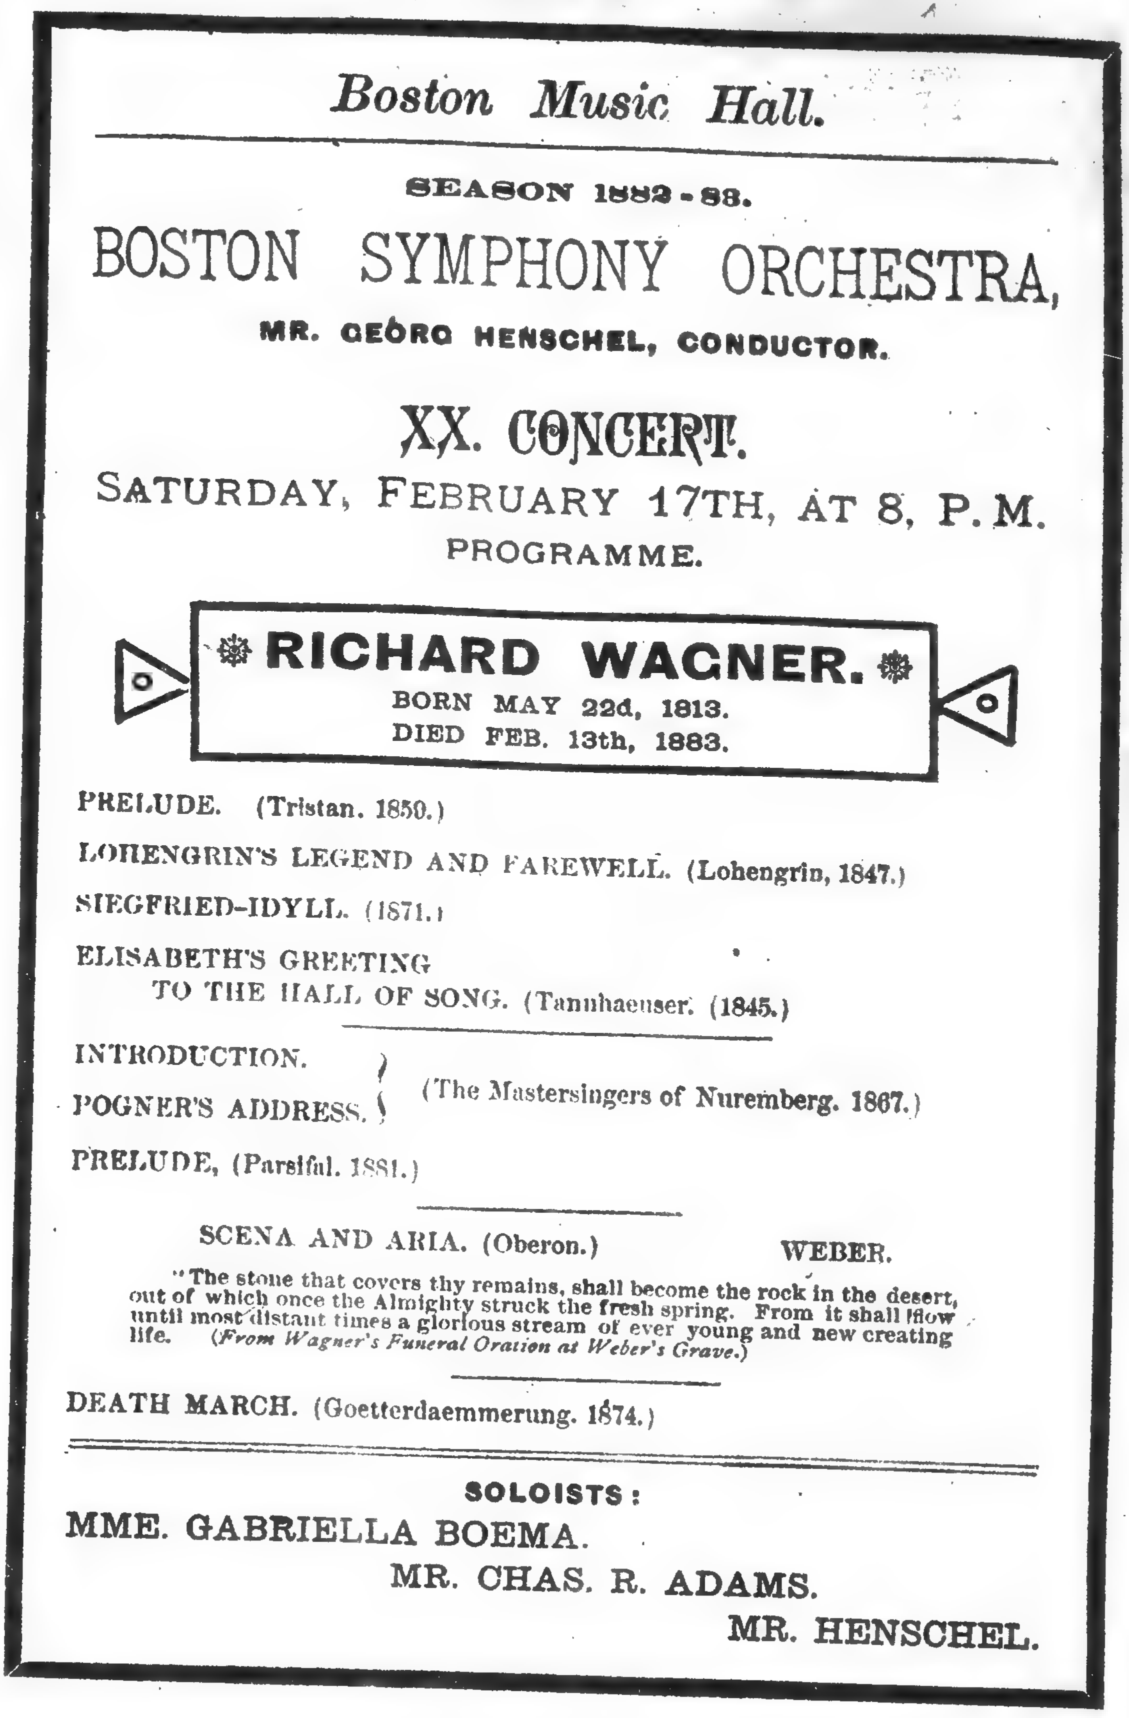
The first movement, says Professor Tovey in his interpretation of Beethoven's hints, "gives us the tragedy of life. The second gives us the reaction from tragedy to a humor never purely joyful except in a childhood which is itself pathetic when contemplated from that distance of time at which alone it can be appreciated. The slow movement is beauty of an order too sublime for a world of action. It has no action, and its motion is that of the stars in their courses—concerning which, however, Beethoven has surprising things to tell us later on. But it is a fundamental principle in Beethoven's art that triumph is to be won in the light of common day. Only twice in all his works (Sonatas Op. 109 and 111) has Beethoven allowed the conclusion of the whole matter to rest in a slow movement of this type—a paradise like that of Dante, in which the only action and the only movement is the ascent from Heaven to higher Heaven as measured by the enhanced glory in Beatrice's eyes.

"Now we shall find that this account of the first three movements of the Ninth Symphony is Beethoven's own; and the Ninth Symphony is not the first work in which he had attempted something of the kind, viz., a search for a theme on which the mind could rest as a final solution of typical human doubts and difficulties. . . .

"In the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven's plan is to remind us of the first three movements as they have been described above; and to reject them one by one as failing to attain the joy in which he believes. After all three have been rejected, a new theme is to appear, and that theme shall be hailed and sung as the Hymn of Joy. Beethoven's first idea was that a baritone should should express all this process in words, from the outset, in an impassioned recitative. The orchestra was to start with a confused din expressing terror and violence; the singer was to rebuke it, whereupon the orchestra was to give out the openings of the first three movements, after each of which the singer was to point out that it was not to the purpose; until, on the appearance of the new theme, the singer accepted it with triumph and set it to Schiller's ode. Beethoven sketched all the recitative with the necessary words." . . . .

The skeptical [Mr. Gilman concludes] may wonder if Beethoven's imaginative conception of his symphony was one that could be put into words; they may hold that Professor Tovey's interpretation of the comments in the Sketch-Books is too schematic. It is quite possible that some integrating spiritual principle grew into the work without Beethoven's being consciously aware of it. The processes of musical creation are among the deeper mysteries of the human will. No musical artist knows quite what he is saying, or why he is saying it, or from what unfathomable spring his thoughts have issued. And it is easy to believe that what Wagner's sympathetic penetration discovered in the work as a whole is merely the projection in words of a mystical conception unrealized by Beethoven himself. If we chose to feel that in this Symphony as a whole, Beethoven, as Mr. Noel Sullivan has finely said, "is not describing to us a spiritual history—he is presenting to us a vision of life," we are endowing it with a significance which the music itself profoundly justifies.

Four Days Afterward



Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, AT 8, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

RICHARD WAGNER.
BORN MAY 22d, 1813.
DIED FEB. 13th, 1883.

PRELUDE. (Tristan. 1850.)

LOHENGRIN'S LEGEND AND FAREWELL. (Lohengrin, 1847.)

SIEGFRIED-IDYLL. (1871.)

ELISABETH'S GREETING
TO THE HALL OF SONG. (Tannhaeuser. (1845.)

INTRODUCTION. }
POGNER'S ADDRESS. } (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg. 1867.)

PRELUDE, (Parsifal. 1881.)

SCENA AND ARIA. (Oberon.) WEBER.

"The stone that covers thy remains, shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever young and new creating life. (From Wagner's Funeral Oration at Weber's Grave.)

DEATH MARCH. (Goetterdaemmerung. 1874.)

SOLOISTS:

MME. GABRIELLA BOEMA.
MR. CHAS. R. ADAMS.
MR. HENSCHEL.

First Marking in Boston of Wagner's Death

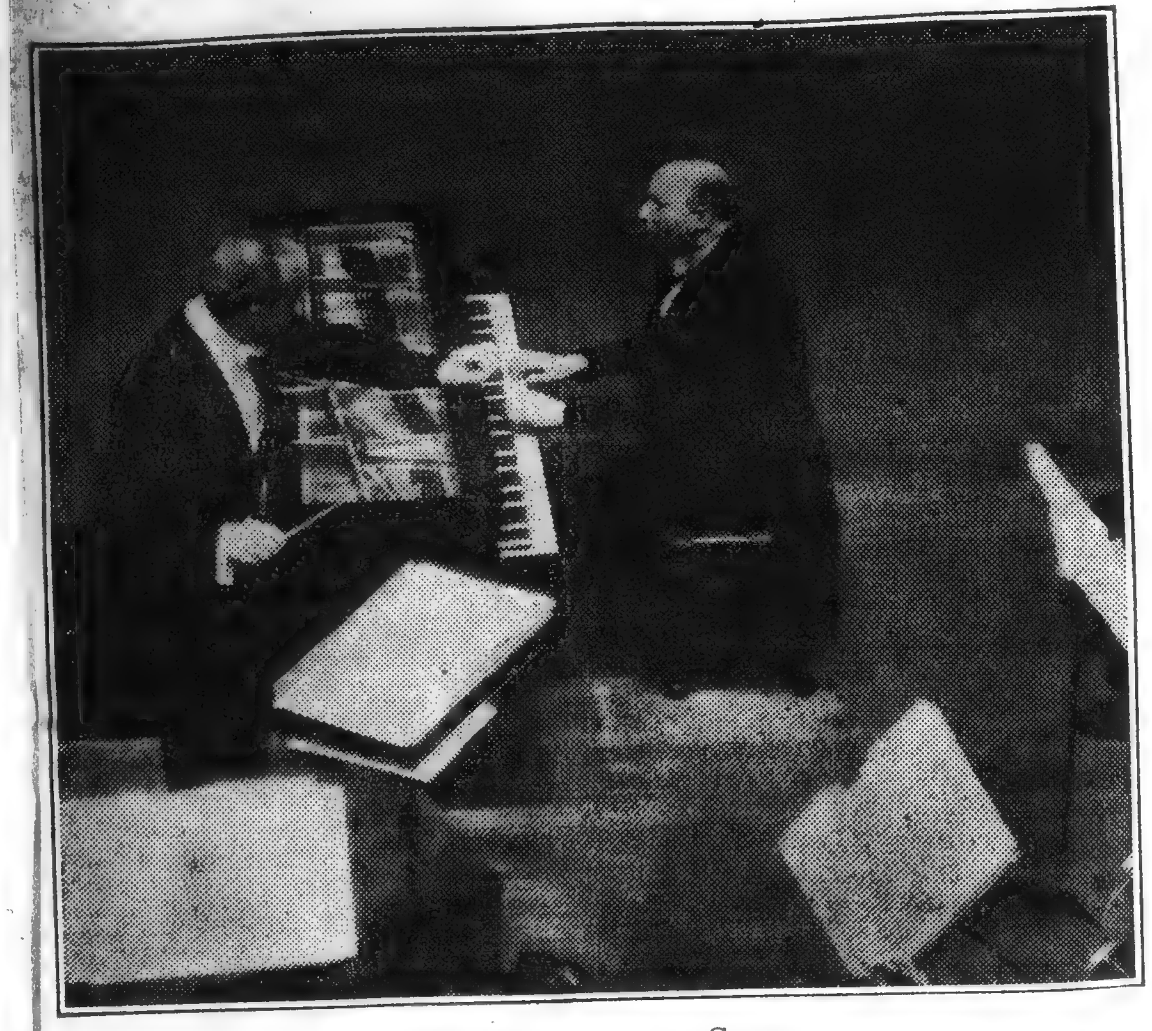
Program-Sheet of the Symphony Orchestra for Its Concert of Feb. 17, 1883

A Tribute of Respect to the Dead Composer Crowded the Front of the First Gallery, and Consisted of Some Mourning Drapery Decorated with Laurel, and a Portrait of Wagner. The Orchestra Wore Black Instead of the Customary White Ties. The Program Was Gloomy Enough in All Conscience, and the Necessity for Its Performance Gave One More Cause for Regret at the Composer's Death. The Whole Concert Was an Elegiac Nightmare. We Doubt If Ever Music Hall Echoed to a Longer Stretch of Cacophonous Dreariness Within the Same Length of Time. [Saturday Evening Gazette Feb. 18, 1883.

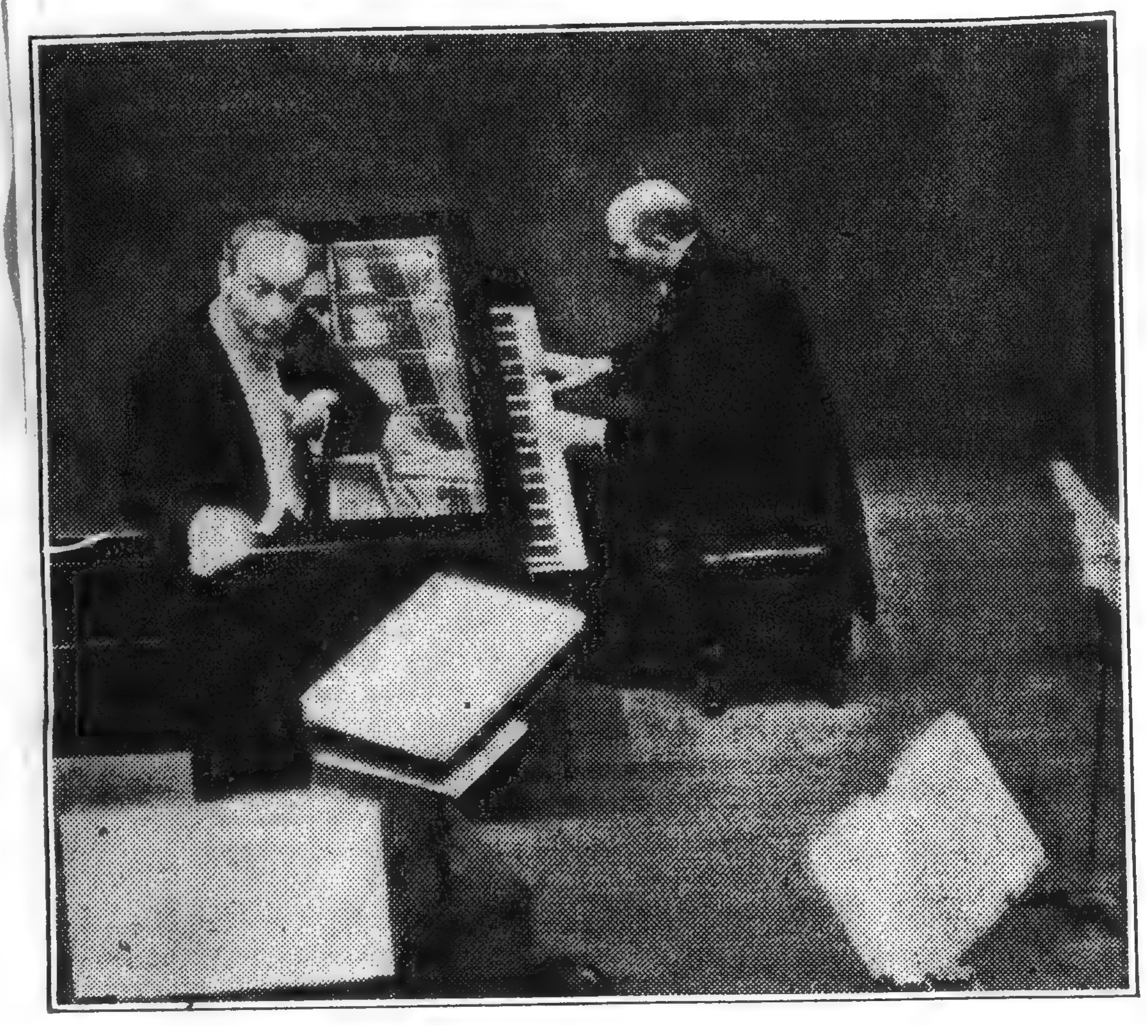
118
17th Concert Inv. Set

TRANS Feb 28

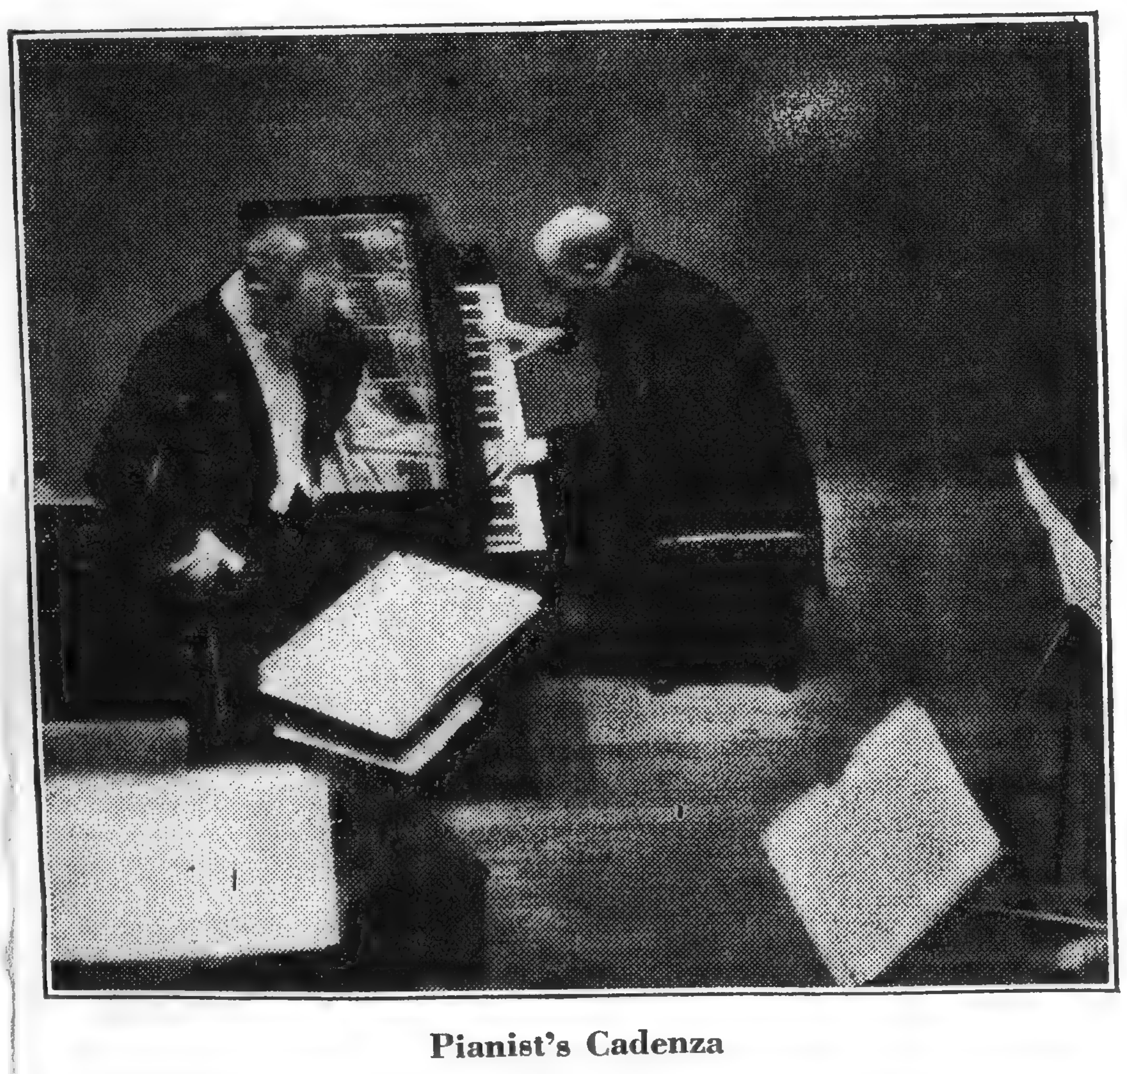
Mozartean Twosome



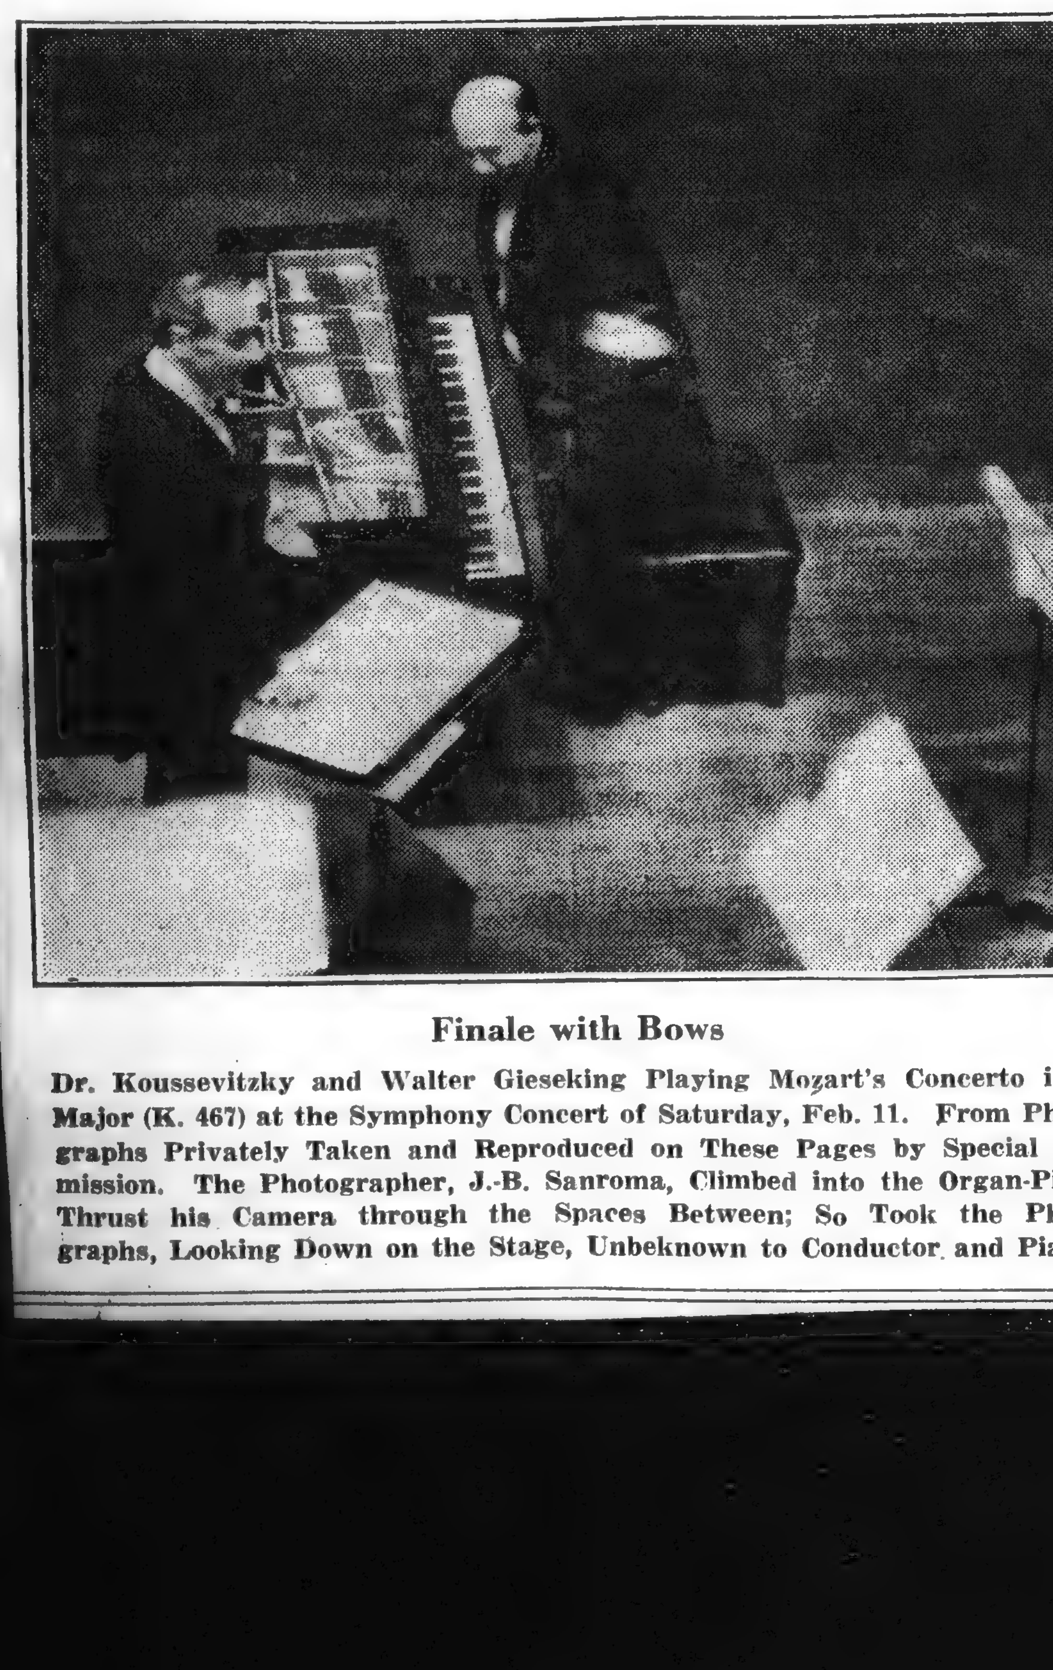
Piano-Concerto: Start



Full Tide



Pianist's Cadenza



Finale with Bows

Dr. Koussevitzky and Walter Gieseking Playing Mozart's Concerto in C Major (K. 467) at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, Feb. 11. From Photographs Privately Taken and Reproduced on These Pages by Special Permission. The Photographer, J.-B. Sanroma, Climbed into the Organ-Pipes; Thrust his Camera through the Spaces Between; So Took the Photographs, Looking Down on the Stage, Unbeknown to Conductor and Pianist

---

Afternoon of Stravinsky's Pagan Spring

His "Sacre du Printemps" As Solitary and Lasting Masterpiece

DATES are stubborn things. At the end of next May it will be twenty years since Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" first came to the stage as ballet. Next April it will be nineteen since the music was first played as concert-piece. It is already nine since it was first heard in Boston; between Mr. Monteux and Dr. Koussevitzky repeated five times through a twelfthmonth. Within those two decades "Le Sacre du Printemps," as stage-piece or as concert-piece, has traversed and retraversed Europe and America. If it has gradually slipped from the theater-repertory where production is difficult and the composer himself has discouraged it, in the symphonic repertory it still persists, actively. (Obviously its dimensions, exaction and impression make it no piece to be repeated every season or every other. No more, for convenient example, may Strauss's "Don Quixote").

Well-stocked music-shops still sell the score. Three times at least "Le Sacre" has been recorded upon the discs; probably more. It has generated numberless columns of newspaper print; nearly countless pages between covers. Those that first acclaimed it have kept the faith by less excited hearings and scrutinies renewed. Those that discovered it in cooler blood have often outdone the pioneers in considered praises. A changeless few have questioned and decried "Le Sacre," as similar minorities haunt "Pelléas," or "Tristan," or even the Ninth Symphony. Others still have hated it—and often Stravinsky himself—with an unappeasable hatred in which there is neither rhyme nor reason. By all these tokens "The Rite of Spring" has become an acknowledged masterpiece, a classic of modern music, a solitary, rather than a generative, monument of our tonal time; the proof that for a while there abode in Igor Stravinsky "a sovereign genius."

Yet when Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra repeated "Le Sacre" on Friday afternoon, for the first time in six years. there were those who stalked from Symphony Hall, between Part One and Part Two, not only as indignant souls but as those who would exhibit far and wide their indignation. Hapless spirits! perhaps accustomed to dominate elsewhere, they were as impotent as we others who would gladly see Franck's Symphony or Chaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" tossed into the tonal discard. Yet must we endure much more frequent repetitions than will ever be their lot with "Le Sacre." . . . Others still, in trembling voices, in angry or scornful accents, spoke bitterly to neighbors who admired Stavinsky's music, who by it had been engrossed and moved. As though it were not for each of us to receive from a given piece of music whatever sensations it may bring to our several selves, sympathetic or unsympathetic, neither hating nor loving, letting it go at that. . . .

On the other side of the account there was an audience that filled every chair; listened in grim earnest; lingered to reward remarkable performance with widespread, honest, hearty applause in which excitement, uncommon on a symphonic Friday, composer as well as conductor was surely included. In a word in February of 1933 the remembered phenomena, when "Le Sacre" is in question, of January or April, 1924. The darkey preacher who reminded his congregation that "the world do move," could hardly have been Bostonian. Meanwhile the untender youth of Smith College are all agog for "The Rite of Spring," which they are to receive next Tuesday; while Dr. Koussevitzky may well proceed in another season with the revival he projects of another Stravinskian masterpiece, "Œdipus Rex."

Repetition and familiarity, such as records give, confirm the impression that "Le Sacre" loses nothing essential in performance as concert-piece. Rather, the following mind and imagination escape the diversions of settings and costumes, the divided interest between music sounded and dance-movement visualized. Besides, concert-performance by such an orchestra as Dr. Koussevitzky's or Mr. Stokowski's far transcends any that might be possible to a theater-band assembled by a ballet-company. As with "concert" Wagner here in America, so also with "concert" Stravinsky. . . . Clearer stands the abstract quality of "Le Sacre" upon which, from the outset, the composer prided himself. Here is music of the generating spring, of the life-force that conquers wintry death; that pierces through to the earth and, struggling, revives it; that refills and revitalizes the bodies and the souls of the folk. Yet not unresisted. There are opposing forces of nature, to be propitiated by sacrifice, to be beaten down under spring's triumphant feet, before life and creation shall again possess the spirits of men. Clearly a conception for music, inviting far-spreading design and manifold expression.

"Le Sacre du Printemps: Tableaux de la Russie paienne"—tone-pictures of pagan Russia. For Stravinsky saw the need of more definition. He would have his spring primordial; his forces of nature as gods with rites; his folk as primitive tribesmen, rude, savage, in the mists of old night. Not our spring which ages counted or uncounted have glossed and sentimentalized, but a primal spring, bare and real. Naturally the return to a primeval, pagan Russia which music, characterizing, should make universal. ("Le Sacre" has swayed audiences from Copenhagen to Chicago.) Hence also the division of the "picture" into two panels—evening of adoration, night of sacrifice; the division of each panel by sub-titles into a succession of rites. Dance of the Adolescents, Spring Rounds, Worship and Dance of the Earth, as in Part One. Mystic Circles, Evocation of Ancestors, Sacrificial Dance of the Virgin Chosen to Die, as in Part Two; so onward with the familiar designations in score and program-books. By all odds a design worked out with clarifying, diversified and potent imagination.

So to a music that should develop and express itself by rhythms, meters, sonorities; that should proceed in rough-hewn phrases and hard-edged progressions; that should be clothed in granitic harmonies—or set even them at naught; in metallic timbres, in darkling shadows or limpid lights. Yet given the moment should not be altogether untender or without grace. The means—whatever at need that Musorgsky or Strauss or Debussy had brought into music; the modernist mechanisms of polyrhythms, polytonality and chord-successions; instinctive and practised mastery of orchestral resource; above all the inventive, accomplishing, puissant genius—for in "Le Sacre" it is nothing less—of Stravinsky himself.

The outcome, yesterday, spoke large and true, manifold and deep; the more for masterful performance. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, man for man, unfolded a complex pattern clearly; sustained the intricacy and the force of the rhythms; reared the tonal structure plane upon plane; vitalized phrases and progressions; turned timbres incandescent; achieved tirelessly the elemental might of the whole. "Le Sacre" is throw-back into the ancestral savagery and night, the nature-dread and the nature-worship, behind each one of us. A sovereign and despotic power in the composer is upon us irresistible. What Stravinsky accomplished Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra conveyed. Nor did they overlook the softening, gracile implications.

Specifications from music and performance might be endless: the soft, introductory airs out of folk-music that are as the breath of spring stealing into the luminous evening; the celebrated chord in "Harbingers of Spring" that is the first fierce sounding of the note of power; the pounding rhythms, the tumultuous sonorities, of the games of the tribal youth; the grinding of tonality against tonality as the drum-beat lashes at the "Spring Rounds"; the suggestion of primitive ritual in the procession of the elders; the rhythmic frenzy of the worship of the earth.

Then to the night and the sacrifice—in the darksome, dreadsome introduction, man quailing before a world gone black, and holding evil; the lifting of the fear as the adolescents describe their reiterated magic circles in the pale colors of the wood-winds; the sudden up-leap of rhythmic fury in the glorification of the elect virgin; the return to heavy-footed, angular, ominous ritual; from portents into paroxysms, from hysteria into dementia, through the final sacrificial dance, scarcely two successive measures in the same beat; the swift, cataleptic close. Never before did music seek such ends. Only once—at the hands of Stravinsky—has it gained them. For him who made it, for us who receive it, "Le Sacre du Printemps" remains solitary and insurmountable. Take it or leave it. While it lasts, it is obsession.

Of the numbers that filled the earlier part of the concert, little need be said. From the outset the Stravinskian spell was upon it. For "The Rite" the audience waited in anticipatory dread or welcome. For "The Rite" conductor and orchestra reserved themselves. A march from Gluck's opera of "Alceste" went neatly rhythmed; a minuet from his "Iphigenia in Aulis," a "Grazioso" from his "Paris and Helen,' renewed the charm of the woodwinds when his melody flows through them, the melancholy that was sentiment to these eighteenth-century dances. In a "Slave Dance," likewise from "Iphigenia," the orchestra cavorted not too rudely, amusing the nobility, the gentry and their ladies no doubt as did the ballet at Paris in 1774. Once more Gluck remained a composer best heard in a theater that neglects him.

Then followed, as though two spring pieces were better than one, however wide the gulf between, Schumann's symphony in B-flat, the so-called symphony of the Rhenish April. Within short memory, it has been played with both more flourish and more finesse at these concerts. Within long memory it has also been played far too often at them. (Two others by Schumann—in C major and D minor—better deserve return.) As it is, the patientest listener hears every fault; repines under every virtue. Like Franck's Symphony, immediate and long retirement is the only salvation.

H. T. P.

Koussevitzky Wins Praise in "Le Sacre"

By MOSES SMITH

Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," which caused a battle that stopped just short of bloodshed when it was first produced in Paris 20 years ago, is the principal item on this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Played twice in the closing years of Pierre Monteux' regime, and shortly after under Dr. Koussevitzky, it has not since been presented here—more than eight years.

It might have been expected that the score would show signs of wear after 20 years—the passage of time brings lines even to the maiden unaccustomed to work. Not so with this daughter of Stravinsky's Muse. The composition is as fresh as original-sounding, and as exciting as it was on the day it evoked frenzied applause and rasping hisses from the Parisian first-nighters.

Having caused a musical revolution, and having influenced, directly or indirectly, every modernist composer, the "Sacre" remains singularly alone. The savagery of its rhythms, its writhing disonnances and its furious climaxes have an elemental power which make pale by comparison works of other composers which are superficially even wilder. For the latter have nothing but their wildness to recommend them; while Stravinsky's masterpiece comes to the hearer directly from his head and heart. There is here no pose, as in later works by the same composer; there is sincerity matched with vigor and imagination.

The work was stunning, yesterday, performed by the orchestra under Koussevitzky. The music is of the utmost difficulty and complexity, which explains why it is played so rarely. But these had been overcome in arduous rehearsal during the week, so that the music sounded like a spontaneous recreation under Koussevitzky's untiring arm. The audience, swept by emotion, applauded enthusiastically. And the men of the orchestra paid the conductor the rare compliment by themselves applauding.

The program began with a ballet suite from Gluk's operas, arranged by Mottl, and the familiar symphony by Schumann in B-flat major.

GLOBE MUSIC FEB 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It is disconcerting to realize that "The Rite of Spring" is 20 years old. Disconcerting because this master score of Stravinsky seems so close to the present that it might have been written yesterday; disconcerting because so much of the music written in the last two decades loudly acknowledges its debt to the plangencies and boisterous rhythms of this score.

Dr Koussevitzky revived it at the Symphony concert yesterday, after a rest of six years. Listening to the masterly interplay of rhythms, the superb instrumentation, sensing the indefinable power of the music and the uncanny depth of the composer's imagination, one could not help feeling that but little genuine progress has been made since 1913. In countless places a melodic progression, a harmonic or rhythmic effect recalled similar procedures in many pieces conceived after "The Rite of Spring."

Just as composers like Beethoven, Wagner and Debussy influenced minor composers for years afterward, so this work of Stravinsky has had its effect on music of the last 20 years. In the future, indeed, "The Rite of Spring" may be as much a musical landmark as the "Eroica" Symphony, "Tristan," and "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Stravinsky's obstreperous piece is still too much for some listeners. Several persons in yesterday's audience left during intermission; more departed while the music was in progress. That, in its way, is flattery to the stark force of the score, which remains as fresh as ever. One would like to be on earth 50 years hence and hear it played. Would people then acclaim it as a masterpiece as we do today, and as did a militant few on that May day in 1913 when most of the audience hissed and yelled? One venture to prophesy, yes.

In spite of the prevailing barbaric force a discerning ear can detect a logical, ordered harmonic scheme in the tonal conflicts. There is a distinctive flavor to Stravinsky's dissonance—at least in this work—just as there is in music by Prokofieff. This, indeed, is one thing that distinguishes the innovating genius from the noisily revolting dilletante. More than a few modernists wallow in superficial chaos.

Some consider this to have been Stravinsky's greatest masterpiece; a few go so far as to say that his powers have since diminished. In the past few years we have heard to advantage "King Oedipus," the Concerto for wind instruments, especially the "Symphony of Psalms." It is just as well, however, to mention and pass hurriedly over such scores as "Apollon Musagete," the "Capriccio" and the Violin Concerto that Mr Dushkin played last year. These are devoid of enduring substance and lack individual style.

There was another work concerned with Spring on the program yesterday. This was Schumann's febrile B-flat Symphony, an ingratiating work that suggests warm weather and soft vernal sunshine. It loses effect, however, when placed next to Stravinsky's piece on a warm, lethargic February afternoon.

Schumann, like Brahms and Chopin, is considered by some to have been at best a faulty orchestrator. Such is the fashion nowadays. In much of his instrumental music the coarseness of the scoring sustains this opinion. Taking a heterodox view one listener believes that the B-flat Symphony was aptly scored in relation to the general tenor of the work. The ideas are effusive, even swollen, as if an uncontrollably romantic young man were indulging in the wildest day dreams about the coming of Spring. The equally turgid instrumentation constitutes an excellent medium for the expression of the ideas. An accidental stroke of genius, as it might be said.

The remaining number was the delightful second suite of dances that Felix Mottl arranged for concert use from operas by Gluck.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. At the next regular concerts, on March 10 and 11, Dr Koussevitzky will play Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Arthur Foote's "Night Piece" for flute and string orchestra and Edward Burlingame Hill's new Third Symphony.

C. W. D.

SYMPHONY IS CORDIAL TO SPRING

Post — Feb 25

Schumann's First and Stravinsky's Rite Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As though in celebration of a season that seemed to have put in its appearance prematurely, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra offered yesterday both the First, so-called "Spring," Symphony of Schumann and the "Rite of Spring" of Stravinsky.

STARTING WITH GLUCK

As preface to these timely items came the second suite that Felix Mottl arranged from the ballet-music of Gluck, including a march from "Alceste" and dances from "Iphigenia in Aulis" and "Paris and Helen." "Alceste," the preface to which sets forth Gluck's then revolutionary theories of opera, saw the light in 1767. In the three-quarters of a century that separated this opera from the symphony of Schumann music travelled far, and technically at least it was to travel as far again between 1841 and 1913, the year of "Le Sacre."

Gluck and Schumann were both bold fellows in their day, as was Stravinsky in his; today the music of "Le Sacre," that provoked a near-riot at its first hearing in Paris and that baffled many and outraged not a few when Mr. Monteux presented it in Symphony Hall 11 years later, sounds almost restrained in the matter of dissonance and of rhythmic freedom. Nevertheless this music preserves its essential character and remains its composer's most striking and most impressive work.

History Made in "Sacre"

The earlier Stravinsky already pales and palls; most of the later Stravinsky was still-born. But with the "Sacre" he made history, and in degree this score towers over the hundreds of compositions that have been inspired by it as Wagner's "Tristan" overtops the swarm of pieces in which certain of its glories were reflected.

With all shock and surprise gone from Stravinsky's picture of pagan Russia, one can now coolly appraise the second half as inferior to the first in both sustained and cumulative interest. Clearly the final dance of the victim chosen for sacrifice does lack both rhythmic motion and rhythmic progress, as Cecil Gray pointed out. But, short as they are, Stravinsky's themes are pungent, and his treatment of the orchestra is as individual as that of Wagner or of Strauss. His many imitators have not his gift for the definition of instrumental timbres; where they produce orchestral chaos and confusion Stravinsky is all clarity. And finally it may be said that "Le Sacre" has that fusion of means and matter that characterizes all outstanding achievements.

Inspire Enthusiasm

No longer may we feel that "Le Sacre" makes inhuman demands upon an orchestra, but the piece is not child's play yet. The performance yesterday was both discerning and brilliant.

Dr. Koussevitzky's felicitous treatment of the most enduring of Schumann's symphonies has long been admired here. The music of Gluck, stately, graceful or fiery, was beautifully played, and for this music there was cordial applause. The performances of the symphony and of "Le Sacre" inspired enthusiasm.

Herald Feb 25

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 17th concert of its 52d season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Gluck, Ballet Suite No. 2, arranged by Felix Mottl. Schumann, Symphony in B flat No. 1. Stravinsky, "La Sacre du Printemps."

Schumann's symphony was performed in a spirited manner that gave pleasure, especially to thousands who think that no music has been written since the death of Schumann and Mendelssohn and even entertain doubts about Johannes Brahms. Cecil Gray, putting Sibelius by the side of Beethoven, if not above him, says of Mendelssohn and Schumann, "There are few critics today who would be prepared to maintain that either of them was a symphonist of the first rank." Probably this symphony in B flat would be more welcome if it were not performed so often at these concerts. "When in doubt, play Schumann's first symphony" seems to have guided conductors here and in other cities. Is it not possible that this composer in the years to come will be remembered by his D minor symphony, a romantic work, with its tinge of pleasing melancholy, and by some of his songs? This symphony in B flat is aggressively cheerful, boisterously so, as if the composer shouted, "Come my friends, let's be gay, spring is here." He wrote it in the winter; it was first performed in a March month, but conductors bring it out at any time. If it were to be put on the shelf for several seasons its freshness might be restored for an occasional performance.

This symphony is of the early 40s. Gluck's Minuet and Grazioso are of the 18th century.

Delightfully played, this dance music from operas is much fresher and far more beautiful than any page of Schumann's symphony. If one not knowing the character of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and venturing into Symphony hall, had glanced at the program and seen the word "Printemps" he might reasonably have expected to hear music of mating birds; joyous country folk; Damoetas and Menalcas singing in Amoebaean verses, the praise of Amaryllis and Galatea. He might have had Thomson's line in mind:

"Come, gentle spring! Ethereal mildness! Come."

But he would have found Stravinsky's spring anything but gentle or ethereal; he would have discovered that while there was dancing, it was sacrificial and for the most part singularly heavy-footed. Nor would his disappointment have been relieved when he was told that the music is a picture of pagan Russia. He would have said, "There were other pagans who danced in welcome of the spring, but they had ideas of beauty." He might express a desire to see the ballet, for then Stravinsky might have a reasonable excuse for violence, the noise of his music. When the "Sacre du Printemps" was first performed here, the first part by its very brutality seemed more important than the second. Yesterday this second part seemed to have more true character—i.e. in Stravinsky's way.

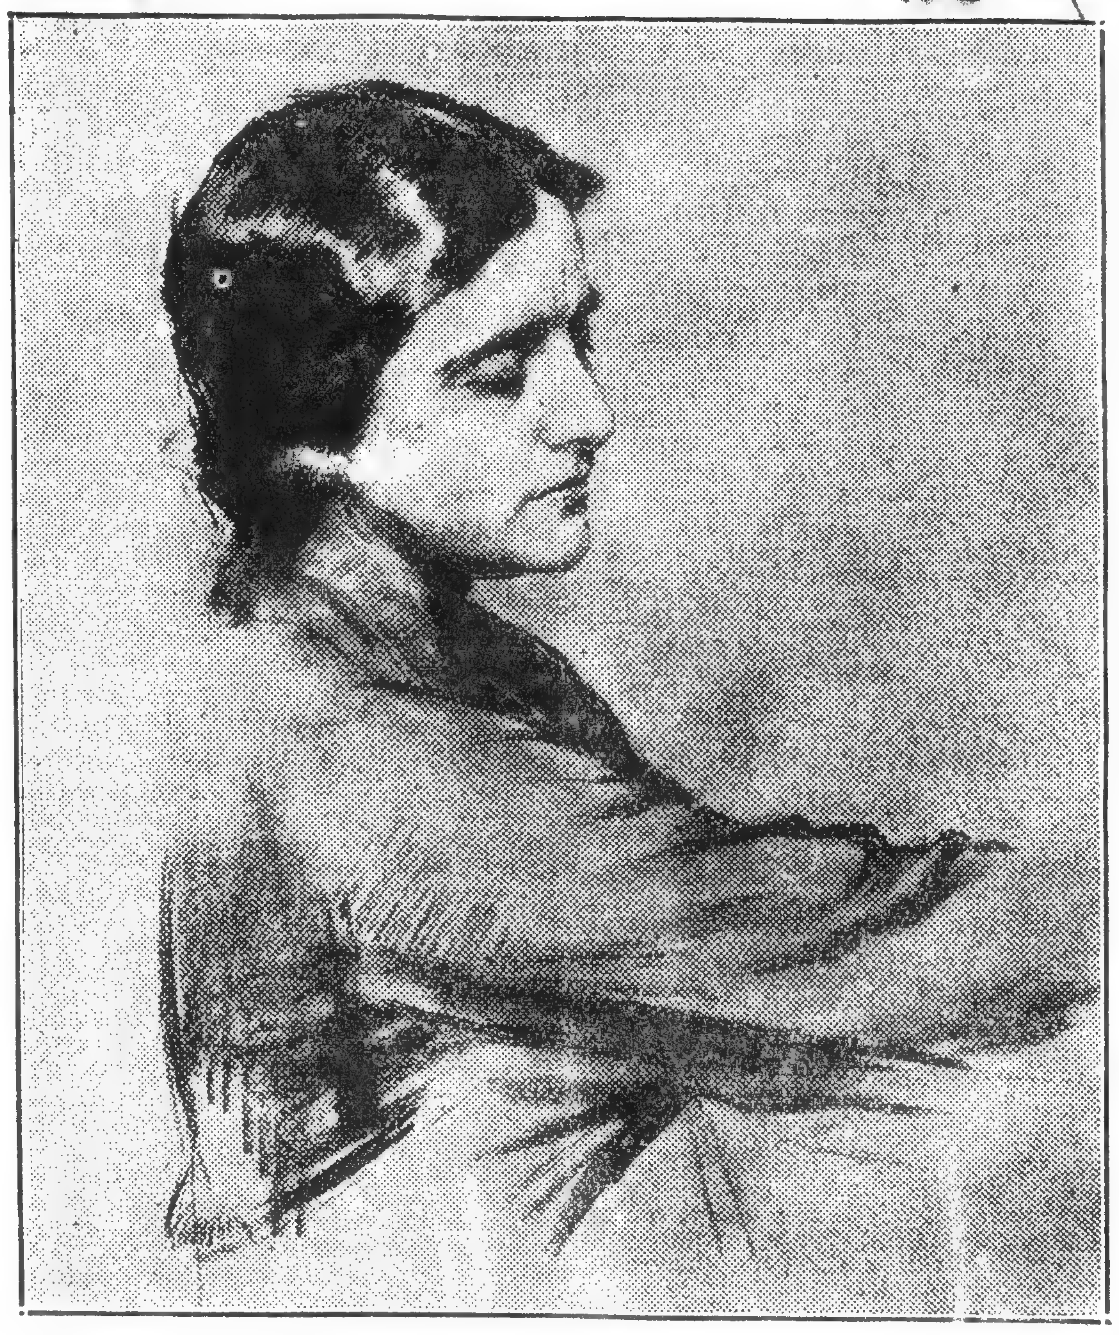
The behavior of the audience during the performance of this "Picture of Pagan Russia" was highly commendable. There was no hostile demonstration; comparatively few left the hall during the performance. English critics, hearthe Schumann's symphony in B flat for the first time, described him as belonging to the "Broken crockery school." How would they have classed the Stravinsky of the "Sacre du Printemps"?

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next Friday and Saturday. The program for the concerts of March 10, 11 will be as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 6. Foote, A Night Piece for flute and string orchestra. Hill, Sinfonietta (first performance). Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Trans

No Softening Here

Feb 24



Myra Hess

Pianist in a Concert of Her Own in Jordan Hall Tomorrow Afternoon and in a Concert with the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday Afternoon

(From a Drawing in Chalk by A. M. Burton)

Concert-Chronicle

Ourselves and Others

FOR the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzky assembles this program:

Suite of Dances from the Operas, "Alceste," "Iphigenia in Aulis," "Paris and Helen," Gluck
(Edited by Mottl)
Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major....Schumann
Le Sacre du Printemps, Tone-Picture of Pagan Russia ....Stravinsky

In New York, Mr. Walter, taking leave for the season of the Philharmonic Concerts, fills his program with two numbers:

Rhapsody from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter" for Alto, Men's Chorus and Orchestra ....Brahms
Symphony, No. 2, in C minor ....Mahler
(Assisting: Sigrid Onegin, Jeannette Vreeland, Chorus of the Schola Cantorum)

In Philadelphia, Mr. Dobrowen, about to depart as guest-conductor, proposes these pieces:

Overture to the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz
Passacaglia for Orchestra..............Jensen
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor......Chaikovsky

In Chicago, Mr. Stock returns from a winter holiday to lead the orchestra through these numbers:

Tone-Poem, "In the Faery Hills".........Bax
A London Symphony...... Vaughan Williams
Concerto, No. 1, in D minor for Piano and Orchestra ....Brahms
(Pianist: Mr. Gieseking)

Haydn, Franck and Liszt at Cambridge

THE symphony concert at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening assembled just three numbers: Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony; Franck's Symphony; Liszt's Piano Concerto in E-flat. Which means that the "right wing" among music-lovers had its innings, that the musically venturesome were, to use a phrase of the day, "just simply out of luck." In Liszt's concerto the soloist was Miss Gladys Heathcock, last year's winner of the Mason & Hamlin prize at the New England Conservatory.

Through four movements Dr. Koussevitzky and his men revealed the essential Haydn—in the slow, songful introduction, in the happy, care-free Allegro; in the variations which are the Andante, with their naive theme and their even more naive "surprise" chord; in the peasant-shod minuet; in the nimbly bustling finale. Seldom have the pianissimos which the conductor summons for the Andante sounded more effective than last evening; while from the wooden walls of Sanders Theater the "Surprise" chord came with an impact that caused more than one person to jump in his seat. Probably the effect was more that to which Haydn himself was accustomed than that which we hear in Symphony Hall. And the tempo which Dr. Koussevitzky found for the minuet seemed the happiest one had ever heard. In the last movement it was dazzling virtuosity that one heard from the orchestra.

The drama which Dr. Koussevitzky finds in Franck's symphony he unfolded with persuasive eloquence. With the first and last movements he scales the heavens. Between the two—the Allegretto which is both "slow movement" and scherzo, which is a miracle of adjustment between two opposing forces on the part of the composer, and in the Koussevitzkian interpretation, on the part of conductor as well.

The performance of Liszt's concerto at the hands of Miss Heathcock deserves only praise. If the brilliant passage work of the concerto came with less hard surfaces than it sometimes has had from the hands of some Lisztian Valkyr, the concerto was probably the gainer thereby. And its melodies were played with due expressiveness which avoided the beckoning pitfall of undue sentimentality. Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was entirely at one with the soloist. Not the least of its qualities is to be found in the fact that he did not allow the orchestral part of the concerto to overshadow the soloist.

A. H. M.

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Rushing the season a little perhaps, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky ordained a vernal program for the seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Feb. 24-25. It consisted of the Gluck-Mottl Ballet Suite No. 2, Schumann's Symphony in B flat and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

It was a clever thought, comparing and contrasting these two musical celebrations of the season, bringing out their similarities as well as their differences. The similarities are very marked. Despite surface differences, the compositions are both definitely of the Romantic school, however Stravinsky may talk of objectivity, may protest that the music came before the story. Dr. Koussevitzky is quite right to regard and treat them so.

But a part of the public has not yet seen this. It was really amazing, at the Friday afternoon concert, to note the number of persons who, during the playing of the "Rite," left the hall with every indication of virtuous indignation. This work is now 20 years old. It has been played over and over, and its methods have been copied and imitated by countless minor composers. It is a classic, a landmark, established more firmly than Schumann's "Spring" Symphony. And yet there are still people who refuse to listen to its nostalgic melodies, its evocative harmonies, its thrilling rhythmic patterns. Whereas, to many of us, the "Rite," like the

CIENCE MONITOR,

Schumann Symphony in B flat, is now an oft-told tale, charming, well-beloved, which threatens to become a little boring.

The performance of the "Sacre" was eloquent; that of the symphony finicking, with the Larghetto dragging and ragged; that of the ballet suite delightful.

L. A. S.

120

With Twenty Years On Its Much-Enduring Head

Return to Symphony Hall, After Six Seasons, of Stravinsky's Epoch-Making "Le Sacre du Printemps"—Footnotes That Time Has Added to It—The Stage-Piece Originally Planned

TRANSCRIPT FEB. 23

IT IS six years since "The Rite of Spring" was last heard in Boston. It is twenty years, lacking only a few months, since the "débâcle" of the first performance in Paris on May 29, 1913, in the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, by Diaghilev's Russian ballet, with Monteux conducting and Nijinsky and Mlle. Piltz as chief dancers. Through the two decades intervening it has been the most discussed, the oftenest cited, the most imitated piece of music of its age. One who undertakes an article upon it in 1933, must ask himself, with fear and trembling, "What that is new about it can still be written?" And an honest answer is bound to be, "Probably nothing." In an article prefatory to performance, fresh impressions (if any) must await that performance. But the many judgments of a score of years may well be synthesized, with emphasis upon the newer writings. And in anticipation of performance, the unfolding idea behind the whole may well be retold, especially if it can be more particularized than was usually possible in the past. For, probably, no music of the present century depends so much for full understanding upon the background and the germ within the composer's mind.

Time—and Paradoxes

With that statement one comes upon the first fact that emerges from the accumulated years: "The Rite" is a work of unparalleled paradoxes. For one, no other ballet makes as complete and definitive an impression in the concert-hall, without the accompanying dance. Rudhyar D. Chennevière's words are to the point: "One knows what an impression of intoxicating stupor it produced in Paris when given by Pierre Monteux at his concerts, separated from plastic presentation." André Levinson goes farther when he writes: ["In 'Petrushka,'] the balance between eye and ear is perfect. While 'Petrushka' can hold its own triumphantly in the concert-hall, it is, nevertheless, incomplete outside the theater, where the action arises directly out of the music and completes it. This is not the case with 'Le Sacre du Printemps.' Its musical scheme is limitless and self-sufficient, and baffles every attempt at scenic portrayal. In it Stravinsky has actually gone beyond the theater, although he clings to it obstinately. . . . ["From the conflict with the public] Stravinsky emerged a more illustrious man. The choreography of Nijinsky, however, was unable to stand up under the attack, and was replaced by a different version. . . . [But the new choreography of Massine] denied the magnificently human motivating basis of the work to conform to a purely abstract conception, which was consciously emptied of all significance. He simplified the actions by eliminating all historical reminiscence, all archæological association. . . . Mere plastic exercises, denuded of all expression. Nijinsky's dancers were driven by the rhythm. Massine's simply make awkward play with it." But the paradox consists also in the fact that the very strength of this impression from the music of "Le Sacre" is matched by the conviction that the whole has some tremendous and overpowering significance; that there must be a key to unlock torrents of meaning. (Of which meaning, more later.)

The second paradox consists in the fact that "Le Sacre" is both the beginning and the end of a style. Perhaps no musical work has ever been written which at first performance brought more startling newness of effect. (To be sure, it is not difficult to trace the technical antecedents, but despite all that, the newness of the effect is indisputable.) The known music of Debussy prepared the way for "Pelléas." Wagner's mature style was the result of evolution; likewise Beethoven's and Bach's. But "Le Sacre" in its impression upon earlier listeners, was revolution. It was thus hailed in many quarters as the beginning of a musical era unprecedented in the advances to be made. Actually, this beginning was also the end. True, no work or style has been as much imitated since Wagner. But these imitations have gone, long since, the way of imitations generally; while Stravinsky himself has been shrewd enough to see that the tool of "Le Sacre" was a tool too keen-edged to be used more than once.

The third paradox may be briefly stated. "The Rite of Spring" is harsh enough to have been considered by many who had a right to speak, as lying entirely outside the pale of music. Yet, it fulfills with a completeness rarely to be found, the most fundamental requirement of music—the expression of that which transcends the scope and power of words.

The Idea Behind

André Schaeffner, in his "Stravinsky" (Editions Rieder, Paris, 1931) presents a version of the origin of "The Rite" which is the diametric opposite of Stravinsky's often quoted words that the "idea came from the music; the music did not come from the idea. My work is architectonic, not anecdotal: objective, not descriptive, construction." Schaeffner writes:

"It was while completing the instrumentation of 'The Firebird,' at Petersburg, toward the end of April or the beginning of May, 1910, that the idea of 'Le Sacre du Printemps' came to Stravinsky. Contrary to what has been pretended, this first idea was not musical, but entirely plastic. It came to him in a dream. A ballet unfolded before him, which was made of the single dance of a young girl before a group of emaciated, almost ossified old dotards of fabulous age. She danced to the very point of exhaustion. Actually the suggestion of this dream became the matter not of the entire ballet, but of the final scene of 'Le Sacre,' in which the Chosen One, until then immobile and rigid, looses herself for a Sacrificial Dance before the stupid group of Ancestors. Later Stravinsky merely blended the solitary dance of the young girl before the old relics of manhood, with the mechanism of spring. The simple coincidence of the dream with the spring led Stravinsky to see in this savage dance of the young girl the very image of the troublesome problem the awakening season had set astir in his mind. This problem was the phenomenon of the tender bud piercing each year the hard substance which is the wood of the tree. The young girl—pretty, fresh, tender—symbolized for Stravinsky the forces which were destined to perpetuate life, in the face of the forces of death which the old wrecks of men so strongly suggested."

Schaeffner also discusses the title of the work, which he believes might better have been "Printemps Sacré"; or in German. "Frühling, der heilige," or as we might render it in English: "Spring, Sacred Spring." But he says in the next sentence that two ideas are superimposed in the work: That of the holy, hallowed Spring and that of the necessity for the consecration and the sacrifice of a human being to the Forces of Spring. To make this idea compelling, Stravinsky cast it in the milieu in which it would naturally find most elemental, most unmixed manifestation—in the prehistoric time when the existence of whole tribes might be conditioned upon Spring doing its work; when the failure of the fertilizing and generating activities of nature might well mean entire extinction.

Because he was a Russian, Stravinsky laid the scene in prehistoric Russia rather than elsewhere. Because the scene might just as well have been laid in any other prehistoric land, "Le Sacre" has become universal. To work out his idea, Stravinsky then collaborated with the painter, traveller and archæologist, Nicholas Roerich. Roerich drew upon his archæological and ethnological knowledge to suggest a sequence of scenes and ceremonies and rituals among pagan Russians, such as might give complete expression to this motif of the propitiation of the germinating, holy Spring. Roerich also sketched the stage-pictures for the projected ballet. But he left the whole indefinite enough not to hamper the future choreographer, Vaslav Nijinsky. Following this, in 1911 (still according to Schaeffner) Stravinsky conceived the first musical germ of the whole work—the polyharmonic chord which begins the number immediately following the introduction to the first part, the number entitled "Harbingers of Spring." Composition followed, with a view to initial performance in 1912. "Le Sacre" was actually finished toward the end of March, 1913.

Ineffable Igor

Stravinsky in the Year of "Le Sacre"

From a Photograph Taken by Gerschel at Paris in 1913 and Here Reproduced by Permission of "Les Editions Rieder"

Tribes and Rites

If it be true that a hearing of "Le Sacre" in concert performance fairly cries for an explanation of these soul shaking rhythms and these harmonies of granitic hardness, it is also true that the best preparation for such a hearing is to be found in the scenario of Roerich and the abandoned choreography of Nijinsky. The purport of "The Rite" was then disclosed in the actions of the figures on the stage, which corresponded gesture by gesture, inflection by inflection, with the rhythm of the music; which seemed to give meaning to the most outré effects in the score. The main sources of the following description are an article by Levinson in Theater Arts Monthly for November, 1924 and an account of Nijinsky's choreography in Geoffrey Whitworth's "The Art of Nijinsky" (McBride, Nast & Co., New York, 1914).

"The Rite of Spring" falls into two parts: "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice." Mr. E. V. White, in his "Stravinsky's Sacrifice to Apollo" describes the introduction to the first part as "an excellent piece of impressionistic writing, though hardly in the style of Debussy. It consists of a number of simple little folktunes [Schaeffner finds the opening bassoon-solo derived from a Lithuanian folk-song], some of which break into trills and arpeggios. These enter singly, but are soon gathered together in an astonishing piece of writing, where thirteen separate parts, excluding the ostinato accompaniment move quite independently and etch an acid and disquieting impression of all the pubescent and most secret business of spring: sap rising in trees, flowers preparing to put forth their buds, birds trying out their songs."

Let Mr. Whitworth continue: "With the simple directness of great art, 'Le Sacre du Printemps' points the imagination not away to an imaginary world of sentiment or ideal emotion, but back to a time when man was still at hostile grips with nature, when the struggle between rich and poor had not begun, but when rich and poor alike were ranged together in a common strife with the winds and the waters. It was the life of the herd, and if we have ever glibly used the phrase 'herd-instinct' without realizing what it meant, here it is realized before our very eyes.

"Primarily, we have said, this early life of man was a life of fear; but also it was a life of ecstasy and, now and then, of a strange communion with nature such as we of today can never know. For not always was nature unkind. At certain times and seasons, how, why, man knew not, she would take to herself the aspect of a most kindly goddess, and then would man feel himself to be so near to her and so grateful that nothing, it seemed, could be too great or too fearful a sacrifice if only he might attain again to that delight. And it was found that the favor of the goddess could indeed be gained, were she propitiated with fitting rites, so that after cruellest winter, from every shoot and tendril the sap would rise, and the brown earth bring forth its secrets, and man once more be warm, and children play in the sun. This is the holy rite of prayer and sacrifice which is celebrated in 'Le Sacre du Printemps.' There is no other plot, and we need only sit and watch, with a kind of grim but simple wonder, the gradual completion of the ceremony.

"On a luminous spring evening the young men of the tribe are being instructed in the appointed incantations" (Dance of the Adolescents). "Soon a bevy of girls approach" and we come to the Jeux du Rapt (Games of Abduction), the "ritual act which is the symbol of the clan's desire for fruitfulness, for sturdy sons and daughters to assure the safety in old age of those now at their prime. Then, huddled together in little fumbling groups, these strange worshippers begin to pay their homage to the powers of the earth and of the stars. To a weird music they perform what is due, to a rhythm of unwearying persistence that throbs through all the festival, so that at last the whole broad earth seems to be throbbing, throbbing to the beats of it." The elements of this ritual are the dancing of the Games of Spring; the simulated conflict with "rival" tribes; the pompous Entrance of the Sage; the ceremony of the Adoration of the Earth by the Sage, who pronounces his blessing by spreading himself face downward upon the earth. But in the Dance of the Earth, which immediately follows, all now face the sun, fearing its jealousy of the earth. A sacrifice is necessary to appease this jealousy. It forms the subject matter of the Second Part.

Sacrifice and Conclusion

Again there is impressionist introduction, which Stravinsky is reported to call "Pagan Night." Between sunset and sunrise must the sacrifice be made. Let Mr. White again describe the introduction: "The details of nature are forgotten. All that remains is the faint outline of the hills. The air is still shiveringly cold; for the ice has not yet broken in the river; but now and then harmonics in the violins bring a hint of something carried by a quiet breeze from over the hills. A hint of what? Before the answer is given, there is silence, and a new, unsuspected activity is heard in the earth. It becomes clearer and clearer. Everything in the earth is pushing. The seeds are pushing through the soil; the sap is pushing out the hidden buds in the trees; the water deep in the river is pushing at the ice. There is a sudden break, and the theme that was blown over the land on the harmonics of the violins is heard played by muted horns—the horns of spring."

Mr. Levinson's description of the Second Part may best be used: "Young girls, shoulder to shoulder, dance an old round with the angelic affectation of Byzantine saints. (Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents.) They single out [by the evolutions of their dance] and greet the Virgin, the Chosen One, to be the victim of the holy rite." They dance round her glorifying her, then depart. The Ancients surround her and invest her with sacrificial robes. Then, in this magic circle, the victim, until that moment motionless, wan under her white fillet, begins the Death Dance. And I recall Marie Piltz. . . . She seemed to dream her knees turned inward, the heels pointing out, inert. A sudden spasm shook her body out of its corpse-like rigor. At the fierce onward thrust of the rhythm, she trembled in ecstatic, irregular jerks. This primitive hysteria . . . completely seized and overwhelmed the spectator." To the final exhaustion it went. The sacrifice to Iarbe, the sun-god, was complete.

Above All, Rhythm

Mr. Levinson may also describe the one underlying force of "The Rite," which more than anything else is cause for the effect the music produces: "As though hypnotized by some hidden force, the dancers repeated over and over the same movements—rough-hewn, stumbling, sinister—until suddenly a shudder ran through them and changed this fixed, monotonous unity of motion. Bereft of all personality and of all individual desire, these groups of liturgic dancers, pressing close upon each other, changed places, turning and winding, dominated by an overwhelming compulsion that seemed almost to disjoint their limbs and to weigh heavily upon their bent necks. One positively had the feeling that more harmonious, freer motions would be blasphemous.

"Whence comes the cruel magic of this piece that forces the Russian dancers, the most sensitive of modern artists, to obey its imperious commands, that grafts upon their Slavic sensibilities the pathetic and enthralled souls of primitive man? It is the demon of the music; the piercing quality different from any other sound; the heavy, implacable rhythm that shakes this bewildered, terrorized, subjugated multitude into motion. The re-creation of this barbaric world is a tremendous feat of the will. . . .

"It is interesting to see what Nijinsky made of this music, defying as it does, all attempts at plastic transcription. The sole aim of the dance movements he originated for the production was the realization of the rhythm. He thought of this rhythm as a gigantic force, the only thing capable of dominating the primitive soul of man. The dancers, by very simple means, became an incarnation of the various elements of the music, the respective duration and force of the sound, its quality and quantity, the speeding-up and slowing-down of the pace." Which is to pay homage to the dominance of rhythm in "The Rite of Spring." . . . But the reader who has patiently read this far may nevertheless prefer the verse of Siegfried Sassoon which Mr. White prints in his book:

"I am frantic
With corybantic rupturing of laws.
Lynch the conductor! Jugulate the drums!
Butcher the brass! Ensanguinate the strings!
Throttle the flutes! . . . Stravinsky's
April comes
With pitiless pomp and pain of sacred springs."

A. H. M.

The new Sinfonietta of Professor Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard is announced for production at the Symphony Concerts of March 10 and 11. It is modernistically concise, running no more than eleven minutes.

Pension Fund Concert
Feb 26 - 1933

Music and Musicians

The Stirring Week-End At Symphony Hall

TRANS FEB 27

Miss Hess and Koussevitzky In Schumann's Concerto, "Le Sacre" Repeated

IN the forefront of pianists in these days, Miss Hess excels in particular with the music of the nineteenth-century romantics, Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann. Many times Dr. Koussevitzky has proved his sympathetic flair for Schumann's pages; while as sensitive, reciprocating conductor in concertos no predecessor at Symphony Hall, even Dr. Muck, has surpassed him. The care that he bestows upon a symphony or a tone-poem, he does not spare when a concerto is in hand. For one reason or another, at concerts for its Pension Fund the Symphony Orchestra often plays above its best and familiar self. The triple outcome on Sunday afternoon was a performance of Schumann's Piano-Concerto that missed nothing in content; to substance added mood, atmosphere, style; animated and enhanced whatever it touched; held hearers rapt; finally filled stage and auditorium with an excitement comparable to that generated the evening before by Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in no less vivid performance. (Our right wing of conservatives will growl at this association of a piece they cherish with a piece they dislike.) For a master-work of the romantic period, played to the full, may make not a whit less effect in this February of 1933 than a modernistic masterpiece recalled after six years on the library shelves. (Our left wing of radicals may now resent this mating.) The truth is, though extremists will never believe it, that the intelligent listener is usually catholic listener as well.

Less one respect, the occasion could hardly have been more auspicious. Through six years Schumann's Piano-Concerto has not been played at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra. To some it excels all his other music of symphonic dimensions. In it he rounds his musical design and fulfills his poetizing purpose. For once he handles the orchestra with both confidence and effect. A music largely scaled exhibits hardly a trace of a master of relative miniatures. Through the Concerto the creative impulse burns high; it is also an impulse mentally controlled.

As for Miss Hess, here she was in the place to which her abilities, her prime, her generally acknowledged rank as pianist and musician, richly entitle her. Before a musically minded audience she was playing a masterpiece of romantic music in the company of an eminent conductor and an orchestra of the first rank. She was as far as possible from the parlor-pianist, amusing an audience of "nice people," through a Saturday afternoon, to which unworthy lot a considerable portion of her Bostonian public would reduce her. Feeling the stimulus of an occasion to which she had given her services, she played at the top of her divining and communicating powers. The conductor answered to similar spur. The orchestra was at one with both. An audience, holden and translated through the course of the Concerto, burst at the close into floods of long-continued applause. The only flaw in the crystal was its numbers—to capacity in the upper balcony, nearly to capacity in the balcony below; leaving too many gaps in the costlier parts of the parquet. These hoarding and economizing times may be sufficient explanation.

Along the Course

Through the expansive first movement, from composer, pianist, conductor and orchestra, there was reason to praise the largeness of design, the propulsive ardor, the union of the utmost plasticity with unfailing continuity; within this frame the warmth and breadth of phrase and period; the vigor of rhythmic accent, the instant interplay of piano and orchestra; the imparted sense of a rich, full-flowing, full-freighted, music. These heroical moods, this bold proclamation, these graphic contrasts of tonal light and shadow, missed none of the intensity with which a romantic time conceived, uttered and heard them. The tone of Miss Hess, the orchestral voices as well, deepened it into beauty; enlarged it into power. What had long been familiar now sounded fresh and strange. In a just pride in the music of our own time, we talk of "the romantic twilight"; but here went the romantic splendor renewed. Through the slow movement the sensuous ear divided itself as best it might between the edgeless euphonies of the orchestra, the transparent loveliness of the pianist's tone. From both flowed, unflawed and truly measured, the simple poetry of Schumann's song. For these romantics could evoke touching simplicities as well as driving intensities.

So to the finale, with its bravura of imagination as well as of display, its syncopations that surprised the forties and that Miss Hess and Dr. Koussevitzky now took in their stride; the impetuous, outflinging improvisation (as it seems) of the whole. Once more a romantic of the romantics struck sparks into fire. Pianist, conductor and orchestra were not only recalling a concerto to intensive life. They were re-animating a composer and an epoch, a temperament and a style. There were kings, as our youngest know, before the best of our Agamemnons. The truest service to the classics is to recall them not "reverently"—which is merely the holy name for stale routine—but vividly to their first, puissant life. A week ago it was the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven; yesterday it was Schumann's Piano-Concerto. Time and again, in their several paths, Miss Hess and Dr. Koussevitzky have done "the masters" this saving service. For most that listen it is irresistible re-creation.

And Chaikovsky

Two other numbers filled out the concert—the familiar Serenade of Mozart, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik"; the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky—first return of the conductor, this season, to a composer with whom he can release himself at flood. For the little Serenade he reduced the string choir; playing, it deployed the usual finesse and felicity of tone; yet once and again the lightest hands seemed too heavy for a music so delicately traced and accented; the hall too large. For salon music as the age of patrons glorified it, the salon. But there the public, whom it now delights, would be excluded, upon which dilemma conductor, composer and our listening selves together stand. . . .

Through the Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky tempered power with measure in a fashion that lifted a personal and Slavic, into a universal, music. Seldom has the long-drawn melody of the slow movement, at entrance and in reiteration, been so free of drugging sentimentality. Not once did the scherzo-waltz languish. Passion, as well as tumult, infused the finale. Best of all, from beginning to end, whenever the measures of fate sounded, the conductor and the instrumental voices made them portentous. So doom strides out of the darkness that we are threading by the "brief candle" of our lives. All of which is to say that Dr. Koussevitzky, who seldom plays Chaikovsky twice alike, dramatized rather than sentimentalized the composer's best sustained sympathy; de-personalized and so enlarged it. No longer was Chaikovsky torturing and emptying himself before a public held spellbound by such an unwonted tonal exhibition. Instead, he was writing music of the breed of men who by this evasion and that fancy fondly that they can muffle the voice of destiny.

"Le Sacre" by Night

Trust the audience of Saturday evening at the Symphony Concerts, which is youngish, open-minded, high-spirited, and there because it likes to be, to give "Le Sacre" its due. Nobody departed observably in the preceding intermission. Nobody rose and went in displayful dudgeon at the pause between the two parts of "the picture." At the end came the hesitant moment when every stirred hearer, would throw off the possession that is upon him, wondering whether haste into the outer air or burst into applause is readier and surer release. The applausive impulse is usually the stronger; on Saturday, it prevailed until orchestra and conductor had been largely rewarded. Few that watched and remembered the reactions to Mr. Monteux's production of "Le Sacre" at Symphony Hall in 1924 could reasonably doubt the undiminished potency, the grip and spell upon the rising generation that holds in its hands the future of these concerts.

A few alleged on Saturday that in comparison with certain other conductors Dr. Koussevitzky softens the impact of Stravinsky's fiercest measures. Possibly they deceive themselves, since repetition and recollection have inevitably lessened the first overwhelming sensation of these pages. Moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky, like Stravinsky himself when he conducts in the piece, gives just place and true voice to the more sensitive and poetizing passages that now and again glide between ritual ceremony and tribal frenzy. After all, the sonorities of Stravinsky are seldom blatant; this side of epilepsy his rhythms stay their beat. Though he drives conductor and orchestra, he knows when to relax the nervous strain—upon hearers as well. . . . As it seems, finally, repetitions of "Le Sacre" are in the air. Next month Mr. Stowkowski will replay it in both Philadelphia and New York.

On Tour

On tour this week, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard at Northampton and Smith College tomorrow; at New Haven and Yale on Wednesday; in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon; in Brooklyn on Friday evening. In Northampton and New York, "Le Sacre" will be repeated. In a version shortened by the composer himself, Mr. Gruenberg's Symphony, heard here a fortnight ago, will be replayed in New York. In Brooklyn Mr. Burgin will take the solo-part in Glazunov's Violin-Concerto.

In Prospect

There is revived and welcome prospect that in the spring Mr. Fiedler and his Sinfonietta may give a concert of modernist music in the smaller forms. . . . Report also goes that Dr. Koussevitzky will add "Gigues" and "Rondes de Printemps" to the active Debussyan repertory at Symphony Hall. In neither has the conductor been heard there.

H. T. P.

Concert Is Given for Pension Fund

Trans Feb 27

A large audience paid tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its noted conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday afternoon by attending the 66th concert in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Wretched weather kept but few away, and these unfortunates missed a concert that drew prolonged applause and, at times, even the stamping of feet.

The program included the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade for string orchestra by Mozart; the concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra by Schumann, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony. The soloist was Myra Hess, well known English pianist, who generously gave her services.

The Mozart serenade, though played understandingly by the stringed section of the orchestra, failed to impress. The light, sometimes joyful music did not satisfy the people who apparently came to hear something more on the grand scale. Myra Hess and the orchestra, playing Schumann's concerto, were more to their liking.

In this concerto the pianist gave her all, striving ardently to achieve the touch, the technique demanded by Schumann's work. She was spectacular with her hands. Her interpretation was heavy and often forced. Yet there were moments when her determined playing had both charm and grace. These intervals were sufficient to please the audience, and the applause was long and loud.

Most fittingly the last was by far the best. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a sweeping grandness and feeling to the Tchaikovsky symphony. There was complete mastery from the beginning of the slow, almost solemn andante until the very last vibrant, pounding note of the allegro vivace. The playing was magnificent in its intensity and clearness of tonal quality.

W. T. C. JR.

SYMPHONY INSPIRED AT PENSION

Audience Aroused to Ovation by Superb Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The reviewer given to rhapsody would find ample opportunity for the display of his talents in discussing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of yesterday afternoon in aid of its Pension Fund, at which Myra Hess was the assisting pianist.

RECALLS FOR MISS HESS

For her piece Miss Hess had chosen the Concerto of Schumann, a work that has been peculiarly associated with her ever since her performance of it at a pair of subscription concerts some half-dozen years ago. In lieu of purple phrases let it be said that there is no conceivable respect in which the performance of this Concerto yesterday could have been surpassed, and this applies as much to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra as to the inspired playing of Miss Hess herself.

At the end came a demonstration of enthusiasm such as Symphony Hall has not often witnessed, with recalls uncounted for the soloist, with a final appearance of Dr. Koussevitzky and a bow from the whole orchestra.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth

As pleasant and altogether suitable curtain-raiser to the Concerto there came yesterday a finished and tasteful performance of Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." The remaining number on the programme was the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

The performance of the Symphony was of a nature to persuade doubters and scoffers, of whom this reviewer has on occasions been one, that this Symphony, for all its lush sentimentality, its occasional triteness and its blatantly vulgar close, is still music to be reckoned with.

Ovation for Conductor

Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky's ardor and the responding fervor of his players seemed to burn away the dross that is in the music, and what remained, if not pure gold, was for the time being an acceptable substitute.

At the end an audience that had been gripped and stirred and finally aroused gave vent to its emotions in an ovation for the conductor and the band that rivalled that previously accorded Miss Hess.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon its second concert this season for the benefit of its Pension Fund. This fund is used to provide financial assistance for retired members of the orchestra. All who appeared gave their services.

Dr Koussevitzky conducted three familiar numbers, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, in E minor; and Schumann's A minor Piano Concerto. Myra Hess was soloist. In spite of the bad weather the hall was virtually filled. Nothing short of catastrophe, apparently, can deter Symphony concert-goers from hearing the orchestra that is Boston's musical glory.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," especially the first and last movements, is one of the daintiest, most delightful miniatures that ever came from the master. When played lightly, gaily, as it was yesterday, the music sets feet to tapping, and for some time afterward one has an uncontrollable desire to whistle the leading themes. Present in this score is that mysterious underlying emotional seriousness that characterizes all of Mozart's greatest music and much of the lesser.

Miss Hess' playing of Schumann's substantial concerto was such as to bring fresh beauty out of familiar material. There were the mellow tone, the clean articulation, the irreproachable taste to be expected from this distinguished English musician, as well as her familiar ardor. But what gave freshness to pages that have seemed a trifle dull under less skillful hands. were a sense of reserve physical power and the impression that an unusual intellect was guiding the interpretation. When Miss Hess finished she was greeted with handclapping, stamping, and flowers. No less than seven times did she have to return to the stage.

It seems a pity that Tschaikowsky did not maintain throughout his Fifth Symphony the level of melodic inspiration and the variety of thematic alteration that set apart the first two movements. Thematic "alteration" is the word, by the way, not "development." He starts out well, with an impressive chief theme. There are refreshing rhythmic and harmonic alterations, and eventually he introduces one of those irresistible, passionate melodies that only he could write so well. In the slow movement he brings forth two more distinguished and very personal melodies; he achieves a certain complexity of texture. From that point on, the work lessens in merit. The waltz music is superficial—even that in Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony is superior—and the last movement, to one listener, is bombastic and monotonous.

Dr Koussevitzy's interpretations of Tschaikowsky's music are too familiar to need description. They are emotionally incandescent, tonally opulent. They are recreative of the composer's evident desires, in the literal sense of the term.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

Herald Feb 27

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A concert in aid of the pension fund was given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Myra Hess, English pianist, was the assisting soloist. This was the program:

Mozart...Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (K.525)
Schumann....Concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 54.
Tchaikovsky...Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64

The Mozart serenade opened the concert with grace and graciousness. The rich tone, expressiveness and unusual virtuosity of the string section of the Boston Symphony orchestra are worth exploiting and Dr. Koussevitzky does so with deftness and sympathy, to the good fortune of his audiences. The depth and sonority of the tone lavished on the Mozart may not be historically justified—Mozart wrote before the days of the modern symphony, with its hand-picked, highly-trained, numerous players—but Mozart the musician would not have objected to letting the music speak out as much augmented as it was yesterday. The transparency, the spare grace of the Mozartian style need not be slavishly adhered to as a rule. Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi and phrasing eminently suit the special combination of music and performers he has to work with, and as such could not be improved on.

Myra Hess, assisting soloist in the Schumann concerto, seemed to labor for the right mood at the beginning, for the right tempo and tone. But before the first movement had flowed away under her facile fingers she found herself, and from then on the concerto was unceasingly charming. After those first uncertainties she fused with the orchestra, followed the admirable conducting of Dr. Koussevitzky with understanding, gave the concerto a rushing rhythm, a delicate polish and a tenderness that roused the appreciation of the audience. She was accorded a remarkably warm demonstration of approval and recalled many times.

The concert closed with a securely built up and electrifying performance of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony. The stamp of race is always admirable on any article; this symphony is Russian in emotion, in that strange combination of a rebellious and a fatalistic spirit which is typically Slavic, in tunes, in contrasts.

E. B.

Music

Feb 27

Pension Fund Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in aid of its pension fund. The program consisted of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Schumann's Piano Concerto and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Miss Myra Hess, the soloist, gave her services.

The concert was a tremendous popular and artistic success. Mozart's Serenade served once more to display the unsurpassed tonal beauty and flexibility of the Boston string choirs; the performance was a delight. Miss Hess responded with the utmost sensitiveness to the Schumann's music, and the orchestra seconded her sympathetically. At the close there was an ovation such as one does not remember to have heard in Symphony Hall since Heifetz played the Brahms Violin Concerto several seasons ago. Again and again the soloist was recalled, and twice she brought back Dr. Koussevitzky, who invited the instrumentalists to share the tribute. Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony is dear to the conductor's heart, and its interpretation is one of his most successful achievements. Yesterday's thrilling performance was characteristic, and led to an ovation that rivaled that which the concerto had provoked. Altogether an exciting afternoon.

L. A. S.

Fiedler Prefers Popular Music of Today to the Old

HERALD FEB 26

Says Conducting Symphony Is Hard Work

By CARL WARTON

The answers made by Arthur Fiedler, symphony conductor, to some of the questions put to him during the Herald Headliner broadcast from station WBZ, last Tuesday night, must have come as something of a surprise to a large number of people. His reputation as a musician has long been firmly established even though he is only in his late 30's, but few apparently were aware of the great diversity of his interests. They will feel that they know him better now. The tremendous success he had with the popular concerts on the Esplanade last summer will be more readily understood.

Mr. Fiedler's fondness for sports and his aptitude for roughing it whenever the opportunity presents gave us a new and interesting slant on him. He is the artist first. That goes without saying. But, at the same time, there is about him the aura of modern enterprise. Perhaps you would boil it all down by calling him intensely human.

In the first place, he is quite a wrestling fan. Henri DeGlane, the former champion, he numbers among his most valued friends. He met him while attending a bout and found that he had a keen appreciation of good music. The wrestler acquired this in France, it seems. While doing his stint in military service he was assigned to the Paris Opera House night after night. In that way he came to know good music, and to love it. The two have been fast friends ever since.

As you watch Mr. Fiedler conduct, always meticulous as to attire, it is hard to picture him shoveling coal on a collier and scrubbing the decks. He didn't tell us about that on the air, but we drew the facts from him in a subsequent interview. He has been abroad every year since the war. He loves to travel, but he rarely follows the beaten path, and that is how he came to speak of the trip in a collier.

"A few years ago," he explained, "Waldo Mayo, my old friend and classmate at the Royal Academy, and I decided to take a trip together. Mayo's father had an interest in a freight line and so the thing was fixed up for us. I had traveled on about all lines, but this was something new.

"We were carrying coal from Norfolk to Rotterdam. We took a trunkful of books along, figuring on just lying around the decks and not doing much of anything but eat and sleep and read. We wore old clothes and didn't even bother to shave. It turned out that a day or two of that was enough. I have always been pretty active. I like to play tennis, ride horseback, hike—almost anything that's good exercise. So we 'n't been at sea long before I craved [illegible]. They gave us plenty. We [illegible] coal and scrubbed the decks along with the crew, and by the time we got across we felt like full-fledged sailors. That's the sort of trip I like. It keeps you in trim."

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Just why a symphony conductor should find it necessary to be in especially good physical condition, we didn't quite grasp at first. But according to Mr. Fiedler, there is considerable physical strain on the conductor.

"It is much greater that the public supposes," said he. "Of course, conductors vary, according to their temperaments. Some employ the large sweeping beat in which they give their physical all, while others appear to be taking it easier. But in either case it is a strain. That is why most conductors have to change their clothing during intermission. It is hard on the leg—standing on your feet two or three hours at a time—and you would be surprised to know how it develops the arms and shoulders. During the concert season I stop smoking. As a matter of fact I try to take a three or four-mile walk every morning, but it isn't always possible."

Mr. Fiedler explained that when vacationing abroad walking is one of his pet diversions. He has tramped all over the Black Forest, and at one time he hiked from Paris to Tour, about 175 miles, in a week with nothing but a toothbrush to keep him company. On those journeys he takes things as he finds them and enjoys it all. On one occasion he picked midsummer to go to North Africa. Temperatures seem to mean nothing to him. On this pilgrimage one of his incidental interests was to study the music there, and in the course of that his travels took him overy every inch of ground in Tunis and Algiers.

Discussing music in a broad and general way, Mr. Fiedler paid the American people quite a compliment when he said that he doubted if any city in Europe of the size of Boston would draw nearly as large an audience as did the popular concerts on the Esplanade last year, if the conditions were the same there as here—that is, no beer. There is none of the beer-garden complexion to the out-of-door concerts, but they were thronged just the same. Mr. Fiedler thinks it likely that the return of beer would make these concerts even more popular. As to the normal American appetite for good music, he feels that America is very musical; he even goes so far as to say the American people are actually hungry for good music.

Likes to Rough It on Trips Abroad

The manner in which Bostonians reacted to the Esplanade concerts has caused the conductor to decide on a further step by way of educating the public to good music. "Last year," he said, "we started with one or two movements of symphony, to give them something of the really classical. This year we will give an entire symphony each night."

Of course, we couldn't get through the interview without bringing up the subject of jazz music, because there seems to be an endless debate between the fox trotters of today and the two-steppers of yesterday as to the comparative merits of jazz today and the ragtime of 25 or 30 years ago.

"In my opinion," he replied, "the modern, popular music is an improvement over the old, at least from the artistic point of view, in the sense that we have got away from the simple harmonies and gone in for more instrumental coloring. The rhythms are more exciting, more subtle; they tickle the nerves. And, of course, they are in keeping with the times. As to jazz music itself, I enjoy it if it is artistic. You see, a serious-minded musician can enjoy jazz just as a painter can enjoy a clever caricature or cartoon.

"Even the modern classics have become mechanized," he pursued. "The Soviet Iron Foundry," which portrays the various rhythms in a factory running at full blast, and which I played many times last season, was one of the few ultra-modern compositions accepted by the Pops audience. They got it at once and liked it."

Mr. Fiedler, naturally, is intensely interested in improving the public appetite for good music. He believes the radio can be a very effective agency toward that end.

"I am very keen about the radio," he said. "You never know who may be listening in and you feel that the burden is on you to give the very best effort you can. I think that when people like a program they should express their approval to the station. If they like good music they should not hesitate to express themselves. It would go far to improve the standard of music."

Mr. Fiedler is making no European trip this year. He is being kept too busy in a variety of activities. He has now accepted the musical chairmanship of the city wide emergency committe on health and recreation. He has three orchestra groups and four choral groups to direct, and that is a job all in itself.

However, he has an abundance of energy. Any man whose ideas of a good time is to shovel coal and wash decks on a collier should find a task like that quite simple.

---

out of town concerts and notices
February 1933

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

FEB 5 - 1933

More Visits By Boston Symphony?

Famous Orchestra Is Now Considering Three Appearances In City Next Season

CURRENT reports from New York confirm the earlier forecasts that this will be the last Baltimore season for the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. The final performance for 1933 and probably for some years to come will be given next month.

Baltimore's loss of this distinguished organization, which for a number of years has been giving four concerts a year at the Lyric, of course, is a serious one. The other first-quality visting orchestras are the Philadelphia, which likewise has been giving four concerts a season, and the Boston Symphony, which latterly has given a single performance a year, its New England schedule barring it from more frequent distant road trips.

CHANCE TO IMPROVE

This situation now has a fair chance of betterment, for the Boston management is now considering more extensive journeys into the provinces. Specifically, there is a proposal for three Baltimore appearances next season and formal negotiations in that direction were started during the past week, when Dr. Koussevitzky was in town. Should that proposal work out and should the Philadelphia Orchestra continue its four-a-season plan as hoped, Baltimore will have a yearly total of seven performances by visiting orchestras, as contrasted with the nine of recent years.

BOSTON'S POPULARITY

Time was when the Boston Orchestra appeared here frequently before a clientele as loyal as that in Boston itself. The interruption in schedule due to the orchestra's war-time troubles and its subsequent deterioration broke up the old relations, but the eminence it has been regaining year by year under Koussevitzky has pulled in larger and larger crowds of late, here as elsewhere. With three appearances a year, instead of one, there is reason to believe it will fill completely the gap left by the Philharmonic's departure from the local scene.

There is indication that the Philharmonic (merged only a few years ago from the old New York Symphony of Damrosch and the Philharmonic Orchestra of honored memory) will be forced to make radical economies henceforth. The long road tours are to be dropped altogether and (as was done this year in the case of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra) the outlay on its own home programs must be sharply cut owing to the withdrawal of aid previously given on a lavish scale by some of the guarantors.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

FEB 5 1933

Boston Symphony Has Beata Malkin As Matinee Soloist

German Singer Makes Debut Here in Converse Work Written for Her

By Jerome D. Bohm

It was a somewhat meager musical repast that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided at Carneigie Hall yesterday afternoon. Delius's English rhapsody, "Brigg Fair," which topped the program, is typical of the composer's works. Its gently melancholy mood is that of the retrospective thinker, a Proustian delving into the past. But it is wanting in substance and not a little derivative in its thematic material and development.

Sibelius's fifth symphony, which followed, is one of the Finnish master's weaker efforts in this form and does little to substantiate the claims of those who would rank Sibelius with Beethovan. The subject matter of the three movements is trivial and that of the final allegro molto, heard first in the brasses, recalls the trite ballad "Oh, Dry Those Tears." Nor does the instrumentation of the work bear the imprint of the composer's individuality which, even in his less-inspired composition, is ordinarily evident.

New here was Frederick S. Converse's "Prophecy," as tone-poem for soprano and orchestra, written for Beata Malkin, who made her local debut in the solo part. The text, compiled from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of the Book of Isaiah, has been set by Mr. Converse to pretentious, empty epiginous music. Mme. Malkin, a familiar figure in the operatic life of Berlin, voiced the part with powerful, poorly focused and often strident tones and frequent deviations from the pitch. She was warmly received by the audience and numerous cries of "bravo" were heard.

The closest approximation to a musical masterpiece on the program was Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung."

Throughout the concert, the tone of the orchestra was an unfailing source of pleasure and Mr. Koussevitzky labored conscientiously to give correct readings of the works presented.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

FEB . 1933

Sibelius' Symphony Not Available Yet

Sibelius' eighth symphony with which the program makers of the Boston Symphony orchestra hoped to play soon, may not be available for performance this season. The Philharmonic society in London announced it for a spring concert but latterly has received this reply from Sibelius:

> I thank you for your kind letter. As I, unfortunately, cannot with certainty inform you about the time when I shall publish my eighth symphony, it will be best not to announce it definitely. At any rate the work will not be let for sale before the Royal Philharmonic society has performed it.

The London Daily Telegraph says:

> The advent of this new symphony has excited world-wide interest. Last summer Basil Cameron saw Sibelius when he was in Helsingfors, and the composer told him that the symphony was complete—in his head. He had not, however, at that time written any of it down, but he hoped that he would get it on paper after he returned from his summer holiday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 5 - 1933

3 CONCERTS DRAW CAPACITY CROWDS TO CARNEGIE HALL

By GRENA BENNETT.

Serge Koussevitzky ascended the podium in mid-afternoon when the Boston Symphony orchestra played for its enthusiastic and fashionable following.

The feature number was Converse's "Prophecy" tone poem containing a solo soprano part, introduced by Beata Malkin. Mr. Converse was responsible for "The Pipe of Desire" an opera produced at the Metropolitan early in this century.

The program had a cosmopolitan character, beginning with the Fritish Delius' "Brigg Fair" rhapsody which was followed by the Finnish Sibelius' Fifth symphony and after the American novelty already mentioned ended with the German Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung."

[illegible] was the baton-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 5 - 1933

MISS HEATHCOCK TO BE PIANO SOLOIST

Lowell Girl Invited To Assist in Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has invited Gladys F. Heathcock, 19-year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Victor Heathcock, of this city, to play as pianoforte soloist with the orchestra at its concert in Cambridge Thursday evening, Feb. 23. She will be heard in the Liszt Concerto in E flat.

Miss Heathcock who began playing in Lowell and the vicinity as a child was the winner on April 27 last of the 23rd annual competition at the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, for the Mason and Hamlin prize of a grand pianoforte, the judges being Dr. Koussevitzky, Lee Pattison and Richard Aldrich. She was graduated from the Conservatory a few weeks later, with honors and with a place on the program of the commencement concert at which she played two movements from the Beethoven concerto in C minor. During the present season Miss Heathcock is continuing her studies at the Conservatory as a candidate for graduation as a pianoforte soloist in 1933 and from the collegiate department with the degree of bachelor of music in 1934. She has been ever since she entered the Conservatory a pianoforte pupil of Louis Cornell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 5 - 1933

MISS HEATHCOCK TO BE PIANO SOLOIST

Lowell Girl Invited To Assist in Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has invited Gladys F. Heathcock, 19-year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Victor Heathcock, of this city, to play as pianoforte soloist with the orchestra at its concert in Cambridge Thursday evening, Feb. 23. She will be heard in the Liszt Concerto in E flat.

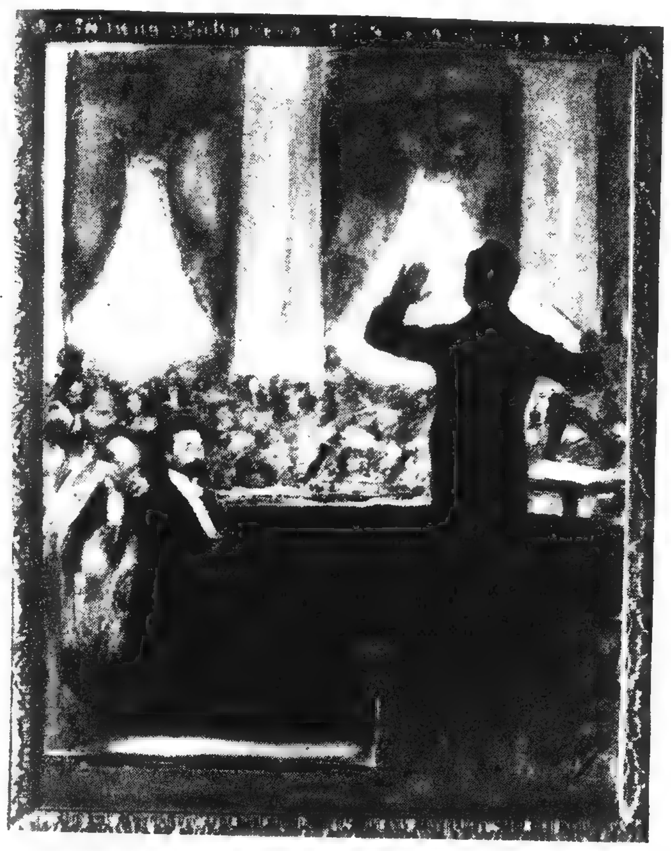
Miss Heathcock who began playing in Lowell and the vicinity as a child was the winner on April 27 last of the 23rd annual competition at the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, for the Mason and Hamlin prize of a grand pianoforte, the judges being Dr. Koussevitzky, Lee Pattison and Richard Aldrich. She was graduated from the Conservatory a few weeks later, with honors and with a place on the program of the commencement concert at which she played two movements from the Beethoven concerto in C minor. During the present season Miss Heathcock is continuing her studies at the Conservatory as a candidate for graduation as a pianoforte soloist in 1933 and from the collegiate department with the degree of bachelor of music in 1934. She has been ever since she entered the Conservatory a pianoforte pupil of Louis Cornell.

"It would have delighted Ravel to hear how the woodwinds and brasses gave the exact tang to his ideas, how the strings sang the broad, flowing melodies, and how climaxes were established unerringly and with striking culminating effect."—N.Y. Times.

TWO REMAINING PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS
BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FRIDAY EVENING MARCH 3
8:15



Photograph of a painting showing Koussevitzky during the early Russian days conducting his orchestra in Moscow in the first performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus." The composer himself is shown playing the piano part, and the Koussevitzky back and shoulders are easily recognized.

FRIDAY EVENING APRIL 7
8:15

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR

OPERA HOUSE

$1.25, $1.75, $2.25, $2.75

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Boxes, $2.50, $3.00. No Tax

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

FEB 5 - 1933

Given a Quiet Reception

Brahms' 3rd Symphony and Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures" Acclaimed.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, as is quite a ~~custom of~~ his, introduced another composition to New York Friday evening at Carnegie Hall, the third visit this season of the orchestra. The introduction was Beck's Innominata.

From the usually copiously detailed program notes of the venerable Philip Hale, there was little to be learned of the composer. Therefore, there is little known about him. He is a young Swiss, 32 years old, still living, of course, and believed to have been a student of Honegger. His composition to this mind indicates an absorption to a great degree of the Honegger style. Yet, in all truth, the Innominata shows a definite development of an individualism on the part of the composer. The work is less harshly defined than Honegger's compositions are. It has a definite touch of softness and it possesses a greater fluidity of line. Also it has virility and force to a marked degree, as Honegger's has, but Beck is more subtle in the telling and expansion of his theme, whereas Honegger has almost a brutal directness in his delineations. The Innominata's pattern is highly involved, intricate contrapuntal.

Somewhat of Shock

In that the work opened the program, its dissonances probably came as somewhat of a shock to the audience, still in the main accustomed to softer, melodic phrases, and it was not as well received as it could have been later in the program. But the program being what it was, it could not have been in any other position.

Brahms' Third Symphony was the second number of the program. Brahms flew into a bit of a huff when someone termed it his best, but in that it was only his third, and six years had elapsed since his second, there is every reason to believe that it was his best up to that time. There is no doubt that there is a vast improvement, a delightful progress in his artistry, over his second, and it is doubtful, from a judgment of his later works, that he ever rose beyond his third. There are many themes in it that possess the beauty, the richness he never again displayed as integral parts of a whole composition.

The thematic treatment of its melodies throughout is ingenious and infinitely more marked than in his first two symphonies. For instance, the finale is tremendous in its summation of the first three movements. All the varying warps and woofs are here interwoven, and yet their patterns are not destroyed, but contrasted to their greater delectation. And it is here that Brahms' weird moodiness, almost uncanny, darkly tragic and intensely dramatic, is felt keenly. Yet it has a loftiness of motive and, strangely enough, is lifting rather than depressing, as may be imagined.

Ravel Closes Evening

Selections from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, closed the evening. These are highly realistic and are actually musical delineations of forms and gestures. In a number Moussorgsky has shown a keen sense of humor. The absolute atmosphere of the pictures has been caught. It is hardly necessary to have the titles, so descriptive is the music. Of course, the pictures are those of Moussorgsky's beloved friend, Hartmann, and the exhibition was after Hartmann's death, and there is no doubt Moussorgsky felt them poignantly, more so than he would have were his friend alive and there with him, as is indicated in a letter after Hartmann's death, when Moussorgsky catechized himself for his careless attitude in his friend's illness.

Dr. Koussevitzy again was his inimitable sensitive self. It seemed in this opinion that he surpassed his extraordinary fineness of interpretation with the Brahms' Symphony, and his Moussorgsky pictures lived to a glorification of the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 6 - 1933

Music Notes

AT Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second Manhattan concert of its visiting week. The distinguished orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, offered the "Brigg Fair" of Delius, the fifth symphony of Sibelius, a novelty of the name of "Prophecy," by Frederick S. Converse, the Boston composer, and the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss.

"Prophecy" is a tone poem for soprano and orchestra, employing as text selections from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of Isaiah. The words were voiced by Mme. Beata Malkin, a singer who is well known in Berlin. Mr. Converse bowed his acknowledgments from a box.

* * *

David

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 6 - 1933

Mr. Converse was present at Carnegie Hall on Saturday and must have been gratified by the fairly tumultuous applause following his "Prophecy." It is a little unfair to attempt any estimate of such a piece after one hearing, unless one is profoundly impressed. Certainly the music is well suited to the spacious, full voice of Miss Malkin, although her top notes were not so pleasant.

The orchestra of Serge Koussevitzky was in the usual state of virtuosity, so that the entire program went with a tonal magnificence and precision which were highly enjoyable in themselves. The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius was especially well performed. Whereas Beethoven's symphonies suggest a mind strangely attuned to elemental forces in nature, the symphonies of Sibelius rather suggest a mind in contact with a state of nature, so that one has an impression of expansive landscapes, with bare cliffs and bleak, desolate plains. The music has an austere serenity, a great reserve power. HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 11 1933

THIRD CONCERT ANNOUNCED OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wagner Holds Major Place on Program Here Feb. 21.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the season in Providence in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner program for this occasion.

The coming week marks the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, an event which is being recognized all over the musical world by performances of Wagners' works. Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston is giving an all Wagner program on Monday, Feb. 13, which is the date of Wagner's death in 1883. On Friday and Saturday in Boston he is playing excerpts from "Parsifal."

The last half of the Providence program will be fittingly devoted to the music of Wagner. The Death Music of Sieffried from "Gotterdammerung" will be played; also the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser." The first part of the program will consist of Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major.

"It would have delighted Ravel to hear how the woodwinds and brasses gave the exact tang to his ideas, how the strings sang the broad, flowing melodies, and how climaxes were established unerringly and with striking culminating effect."—N.Y. Times.

TWO REMAINING PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS
BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FRIDAY EVENING
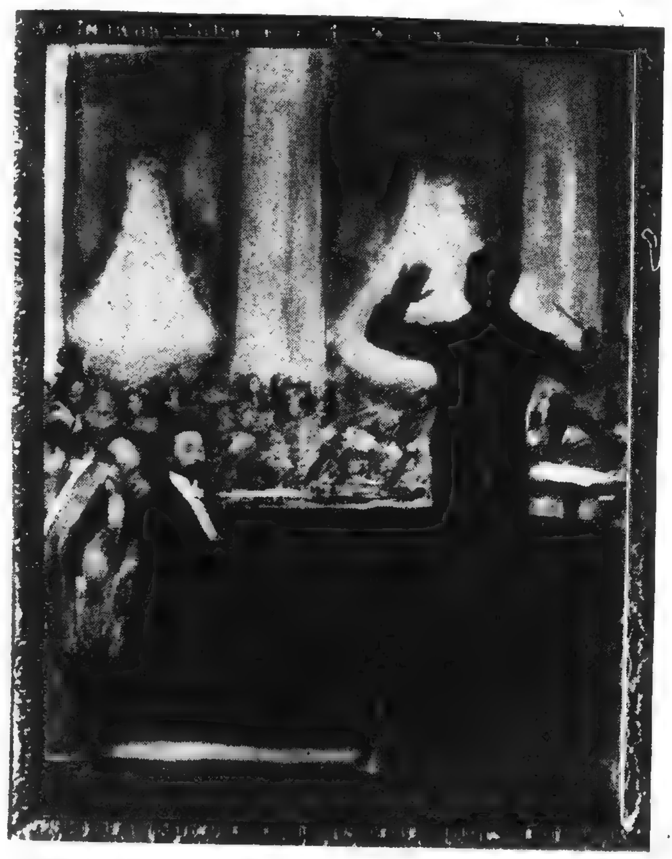
MARCH 3
8:15



Photograph of a painting showing Koussevitzky during the early Russian days conducting his orchestra in Moscow in the first performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus." The composer himself is shown playing the piano part, and the Koussevitzky back and shoulders are easily recognized.

FRIDAY EVENING
APRIL 7
8:15

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR

OPERA HOUSE — ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TICKETS NOW ON SALE

$1.25, $1.75, $2.25, $2.75

Boxes, $2.50, $3.00. No Tax

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

FEB 5 - 1933

Given a Quiet Reception

Brahms' 3rd Symphony and Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures" Acclaimed.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra, as is quite a ~~custom of~~ his, introduced another composition to New York Friday evening at Carnegie Hall, the third visit this season of the orchestra. The introduction was Beck's Innominata.

From the usually copiously detailed program notes of the venerable Philip Hale, there was little to be learned of the composer. Therefore, there is little known about him. He is a young Swiss, 32 years old, still living, of course, and believed to have been a student of Honegger. His composition to this mind indicates an absorption to a great degree of the Honegger style. Yet, in all truth, the Innominata shows a definite development of an individualism on the part of the composer. The work is less harshly defined than Honegger's compositions are. It has a definite touch of softness and it possesses a greater fluidity of line. Also it has virility and force to a marked degree, as Honegger's has, but Beck is more subtle in the telling and expansion of his theme, whereas Honegger has almost a brutal directness in his delineations. The Innominata's pattern is highly involved, intricate contrapuntal.

Somewhat of Shock

In that the work opened the program, its dissonances probably came as somewhat of a shock to the audience, still in the main accustomed to softer, melodic phrases, and it was not as well received as it could have been later in the program. But the program being what it was, it could not have been in any other position.

Brahms' Third Symphony was the second number of the program. Brahms flew into a bit of a huff when someone termed it his best, but in that it was only his third, and six years had elapsed since his second, there is every reason to believe that it was his best up to that time. There is no doubt that there is a vast improvement, a delightful progress in his artistry, over his second, and it is doubtful, from a judgment of his later works, that he ever rose beyond his third. There are many themes in it that possess the beauty, the richness he never again displayed as integral parts of a whole composition.

The thematic treatment of its melodies throughout is ingenious and infinitely more marked than in his first two symphonies. For instance, the finale is tremendous in its summation of the first three movements. All the varying warps and woofs are here interwoven, and yet their patterns are not destroyed, but contrasted to their greater delectation. And it is here that Brahms' weird moodiness, almost uncanny, darkly tragic and intensely dramatic, is felt keenly. Yet it has a loftiness of motive and, strangely enough, is lifting rather than depressing, as may be imagined.

Ravel Closes Evening

Selections from Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel, closed the evening. These are highly realistic and are actually musical delineations of forms and gestures. In a number Moussorgsky has shown a keen sense of humor. The absolute atmosphere of the pictures has been caught. It is hardly necessary to have the titles, so descriptive is the music. Of course, the pictures are those of Moussorgsky's beloved friend, Hartmann, and the exhibition was after Hartmann's death, and there is no doubt Moussorgsky felt them poignantly, more so than he would have were his friend alive and there with him, as is indicated in a letter after Hartmann's death, when Moussorgsky catechized himself for his careless attitude in his friend's illness.

Dr. Koussevitzy again was his inimitable sensitive self. It seemed in this opinion that he surpassed his extraordinary fineness of interpretation with the Brahms' Symphony, and his Moussorgsky pictures lived to a glorification of the composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

FEB 6 - 1933

Music Notes

AT Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second Manhattan concert of its visiting week. The distinguished orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, offered the "Brigg Fair" of Delius, the fifth symphony of Sibelius, a novelty of the name of "Prophecy," by Frederick S. Converse, the Boston composer, and the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss.

"Prophecy" is a tone poem for soprano and orchestra, employing as text selections from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of Isaiah. The words were voiced by Mme. Beata Malkin, a singer who is well known in Berlin. Mr. Converse bowed his acknowledgments from a box.

* * *

David

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

FEB 6 - 1933

Mr. Converse was present at Carnegie Hall on Saturday and must have been gratified by the fairly tumultuous applause following his "Prophecy." It is a little unfair to attempt any estimate of such a piece after one hearing, unless one is profoundly impressed. Certainly the music is well suited to the spacious, full voice of Miss Malkin, although her top notes were not so pleasant.

The orchestra of Serge Koussevitzky was in the usual state of virtuosity, so that the entire program went with a tonal magnificence and precision which were highly enjoyable in themselves. The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius was especially well performed. Whereas Beethoven's symphonies suggest a mind strangely attuned to elemental forces in nature, the symphonies of Sibelius rather suggest a mind in contact with a state of nature, so that one has an impression of expansive landscapes, with bare cliffs and bleak, desolate plains. The music has an austere serenity, a great reserve power. HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 11 1933

THIRD CONCERT ANNOUNCED OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wagner Holds Major Place on Program Here Feb. 21.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the season in Providence in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner program for this occasion.

The coming week marks the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, an event which is being recognized all over the musical world by performances of Wagners' works. Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston is giving an all Wagner program on Monday, Feb. 13, which is the date of Wagner's death in 1883. On Friday and Saturday in Boston he is playing excerpts from "Parsifal."

The last half of the Providence program will be fittingly devoted to the music of Wagner. The Death Music of Sieffried from "Gotterdammerung" will be played; also the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser." The first part of the program will consist of Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 5 1933

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky, Gives an Inspired Performance of Delius's "Brigg Fair."

By OLIN DOWNES.

The poetry of Frederick Delius's "Brigg Fair," and one of the greatest of the symphonies—the Fifth—of Jean Sibelius; a new work by Frederick S. Converse of Boston, "Prophecy," for soprano and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," made the engrossing program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The soloist was Beata Malkin, soprano of the Berlin Opera and previously of La Scala at Milan, who sang Mr. Converse's music, new to this city. Composition and performance were warmly received.

"Brigg Fair" is comparatively early Delius, but not so early as to represent Delius before he had found himself as a composer or gained coherent mastery of his ideas and medium. The melody upon which it is based is an old English folk-tune of a modal character. The tune was given Delius by Percy Grainger. The distinction of the composer's method of expression is his free use of the variation form and the manner in which the variations exfoliate from the principal idea.

The performance was an inspired on, sensitively in consonance with the poet's thought, and the distinctions of the performance were not only those of the beautiful flute playing of Mr. Laurent.

The first movement of Sibelius's symphony might have been inspired by Thomas Hardy's description of Egdon Heath. The theme of the slow movement at first seems unpromising, but once again we are ushered into a new world, in which man is small and nature all-compassing. The finale balances the first movement in its proportions and its strength, and the ending is as magnificent as the sunrise.

Mr. Kousevitzsky's reading of this symphony was a masterpiece of clarity, insight and imagination.

Mr. Converse's tone poem for soprano voice and orchestra employs a text which the composer himself compiled from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of the book of Isaiah. They are lines of prophecy and admonition, warning of the Lord's vengeance, hailing of the day when the eyes of men shall be opened. "They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

This setting of Mr. Converse is concert form but cast in dramatic terms. The music employs modern orchestral devices in a way that makes very heavy demands upon the solo singer.

Miss Malkin sang this music with breadth, with prophetic fervor. When her tones were not forced they had a warm and sensuous quality which served her well. But in passages of high tessitura, singnig against the heavy instrumentation, there was unsteadiness and a tendency to shrillness. In spirit and as a musician, she gave Mr. Converse's work eloquent interpretation. After the performance the singer was repeatedly called back to the stage, and, almost as often, Mr. Converse bowed from his box.

The performance of Strauss's flaming tone-poem by Mr. Koussevitzky was very dramatic and there was virtuoso playing on the part of the orchestra.

Milstein Plays for Students.

The Students' Concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall offered Mozart's "Heffner" symphony in D major; Debussy's beautiful and too infrequently played "Iberia," Carl Goldmark's A minor concerto for violin with Nathan Milstein as soloist, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Milstein gave the work an excellent reading. No violinist of the present season has surpassed him in brilliance of clean technique, but he adds to virtuosity a warm, finely shaded tone, and a temperament liberally endowed with passion. His singing is more eloquent in dramatic than in essentially lyric passages, which were sensitive rather than tender. His tone is rounder in lower than in upper middle registers. But his perfarmance in general would be difficult to excel.

Mr. Walter was at his finest vein in the Mozart, wherein crispness of pattern, virility and a delicate warmth were admirably blended, and in his evocation of the subtle strands of orchestral voices that weave such a lovely and haunting tonal web in the second movement of the Debussy "Odors of the Night." Not a shade of its miraculous transformation of thematic material escaped him. The first movement, however, was too slow, and hence too heavy—the last adjective to be associated with anything Debussy wrote. The last movement, while again finely articulated as to voices, was if anything too carefully treated; its climaxes had none of the delirious abandon that should attend this "Morning of a Fête Day."

One should especially commend, however, the treatment accorded the Goldmark, its robust breadth, its fine pianissimi and the excellent balance maintained between soloist and orchestra. Mr. Milstein and the conductor were vigorously applauded by a large audience.

H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 6 - 1933

Boston Symphony Plays Converse's 'Prophecy'

Four compositions from as many countries constituted the program of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, all of them works by contemporary musicians. For this occasion Serge Koussevitzky had saved the most recent work of the New Englander, Frederick Converse, a settling titled "Prophecy," of chapters 34 and 35 of the Book of Isaiah, which the composer has described as a "tone poem for soprano and orchestra." Written for Beata Malkin, who was the soloist in this performance, it did not seem anything more startling, formally, than a cantata in which the orchestration was rather elaborate; the voice is still the dominating element in the plan. Mr. Converse has here attempted a tonal evocation of the Day of Accounting; his treatment and illumination of the subject reflect the competence that is suggested from his position as dean of the New England Conservatory of Music, together with the lack of experimental tendencies that is also indicated. More cause for reflection could be found in the use of an English text for a singer who was plainly at a disadvantage in that tongue, and the numerous G sharps and A's in a score especially written for the vocalist, whose faulty production placed them beyond accuracy and ease. Mlle. Malkin possesses a vocal organ capable of much brilliant tone, but her use of it was forced and insecure, her intonations often at variance with that of the trustworthy Boston ensemble.

The symphony of the afternoon was the fifth of Sibelius (in E flat), for whom Mr. Koussevitzky has repeatedly testified his devotion this season. As the work of a man familiarly described as dour and remote, the qualities of this composition are light, almost transparent. The forbidding Finnish landscape is here touched with something approaching a Cote d'Azur sunniness. Through the four movements the scheme of development seems to be one of variation rather than expansion in the customary symphonic sense, imparting an effect curiously static and unprogressive. This is relieved somewhat in the simple charm of the andante's principal subject, though the treatment reappears in its subsequent elaboration. The orchestral features of the score are less striking than in other of his works.

A rare opportunity for hearing the fanciful and delicate "Briggs Fair" of Delius was enhanced considerably by the excellence of the orchestra's solo wood-wind performers, particularly Messrs. Laurent and Gillet, flautist and oboist respectively. Similar virtuosity of execution distinguished the concluding "Tod und Verkeaerung."

I. K.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD

FEB 7 - 1933

BATON GIVES MAGIC EFFECT TO AUDIENCE

But Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Technician, Not Magician

BOSTON — Serge Koussevitzky's baton is a wand which creates magic effects in the imagination of those who hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not magic, of course, Koussevitzky is a technician. In rehearsal no conductor can be more relentlessly exacting than he, down to the smallest detail of rhythm, or nuance, whether of a single instrument or the 110-piece ensemble. For the sake of the development of a single interpretative effect, he will break his own back or anyone's, until endless repetitions, halts, explanations, and exhortations have been made.

But the technique of Koussevitzky is formed from the emotions as well as from skill and musical learning. He has sometimes halted in rehearsal to lay down his stick and expostulate. "Please! We must be correct, yes. But also we must play with the heart, with the soul, always."

To those out in front in Symphony Hall, the gestures and bodily attitudes by which Koussevitzky signals his orchestra constitute something close to musical art — compositions in line and motion. Expressive though his back be, listeners miss the wonderful play of dramatic expression which his face presents to his musicians. His features are comparable to those of a sensitive actor-stage-director, whose expression instinctively varies with the sentiments registered by each player before him.

If in performance something is not quite as intended, Koussevitzky is philosophic rather than fretful. He may, very likely, make a sour face at the offending individual or group. But it is in a spirit of "Well, I never expected anything so funny from you." And if the composition has been unfamiliar, or especially difficult, he will follow at the end by pantomiming with his face some such expression as "Good work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
COLUMBIA, S. C.
RECORD

FEB 13 1933

The Columbia Day Book

Relapse

The music of the Boston Symphony orchestra might be the ultimate of perfection to many but to Roland Williamson, 1620 Green street, it's just a jumble of so many discordant notes...Mr. Williamson tells this on himself....Saturday night he arose from his bed, where he had been confined for several days suffering an attack of influenza, to tune in his radio....Having heard nothing to the contrary he supposed that Rudy Vallee might have agreed to broadcast his concert in the auditorium over WIS.... Luck was with him, he said, for as the radio gathered volume sure enough there was the orchestra tuning up....Mr. Williamson reports that he heard each instrument separately go through the ordeal of attaining the proper pitch then heard them all in unison making a test....Something was queer. ...Maybe it was the rarified southern atmosphere that confused Vallee and his Connecticut Yankees, for they labored full 20 minutes with unhappy results....Came a pause ... "Now," thought Mr. Williamson, elated that his martyrdom had not been in vain....Then this announcement:..."Ladies and gentlemen through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting company for the past 30 minutes you have been entertained by the music of the Boston Symphony orchestra" ... Mr. Williamson suffered a relapse.

* * * * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

18 1933

Boston Symphony To Give Concert Here on Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening in the RKO Albee Theatre the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit and last but one of the season to Providence.

The last part of the program Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will devote to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, the 50th anniversary of whose death has been observed in many parts of the world in the week past. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has given three Wagnerian concerts in Boston this week. For Providence, Dr. Koussevitzky will appropriately conduct the death music of Siegfried from the third act of "Gotterdammerung," the famous episode where in a sort of elegaic panorama Wagner reviews the life of the hero. Siegfried. This great music, so far as available records show, will then be heard in Providence for the first time.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a little serenade in four movements for a reduced string orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 1 1933

THIRD CONCERT ANNOUNCED OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wagner Holds Major Place on Program Here Feb. 21.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the season in Providence in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner program for this occasion.

The coming week marks the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, an event which is being recognized all over the musical world by performances of Wagners' works. Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston is giving an all Wagner program on Monday, Feb. 13, which is the date of Wagner's death in 1883. On Friday and Saturday in Boston he is playing excerpts from "Parsifal."

The last half of the Providence program will be fittingly devoted to the music of Wagner. The Death Music of Sieffried from "Gotterdammerung" will be played; also the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser." The first part of the program will consist of Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

FEB 12 1933

Sings in Boston

ROBERT STEEL

Operatic tenor, of Lansdowne, who has been engaged as a soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony next Friday and Saturday, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 11 1933

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the season in Providence in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21st. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky announces a Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner programme for this occasion.

The coming week marks the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, an event which is being recognized all over the musical world by performances of Wagner's works. Dr. Koussevitsky in Boston is giving an all-Wagner programme on Monday, Feb. 13, which is the date of Wagner's death in 1883. On Friday and Saturday in Boston he is playing excepts from "Parsifal."

The last half of the Providence programmes will be fittingly devcted to the music of Wagner. The death music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung" will be played; also the forest murmurs from "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser." The first part of the programme will consist of Mozart's little seranade, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and the seventh symphony of Beethoven in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 21 1933

THE LOU

By Lou

Of course, there were the concerts by the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonic, but even the presence of Efrem Zimbalist did not suffice in giving the brilliance to the latter orchestra's program that customarily marks it. The Boston band did better chiefly because it dispensed for once with its discordant modernists, selected instead Wagner and Beethoven. Musically, this program was the highlight of the week-end.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 19 1933

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which New York has not heard since Leopold Stokowski directed it here in the Spring of 1930, will be the principal work in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Other compositions on the program will be Gluck's Ballet Suite No. 2 and Schumann's First symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 5 1933

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky, Gives an Inspired Performance of Delius's "Brigg Fair."

By OLIN DOWNES.

The poetry of Frederick Delius's "Brigg Fair," and one of the greatest of the symphonies—the Fifth—of Jean Sibelius; a new work by Frederick S. Converse of Boston, "Prophecy," for soprano and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," made the engrossing program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The soloist was Beata Malkin, soprano of the Berlin Opera and previously of La Scala at Milan, who sang Mr. Converse's music, new to this city. Composition and performance were warmly received.

"Brigg Fair" is comparatively early Delius, but not so early as to represent Delius before he had found himself as a composer or gained coherent mastery of his ideas and medium. The melody upon which it is based is an old English folk-tune of a modal character. The tune was given Delius by Percy Grainger. The distinction of the composer's method of expression is his free use of the variation form and the manner in which the variations exfoliate from the principal idea.

The performance was an inspired on, sensitively in consonance with the poet's thought, and the distinctions of the performance were not only those of the beautiful flute playing of Mr. Laurent.

The first movement of Sibelius's symphony might have been inspired by Thomas Hardy's description of Egdon Heath. The theme of the slow movement at first seems unpromising, but once again we are ushered into a new world, in which man is small and nature all-compassing. The finale balances the first movement in its proportions and its strength, and the ending is as magnificent as the sunrise.

Mr. Kousevitzsky's reading of this symphony was a masterpiece of clarity, insight and imagination.

Mr. Converse's tone poem for soprano voice and orchestra employs a text which the composer himself compiled from the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of the book of Isaiah. They are lines of prophecy and admonition, warning of the Lord's vengeance, hailing of the day when the eyes of men shall be opened. "They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

This setting of Mr. Converse is concert form but cast in dramatic terms. The music employs modern orchestral devices in a way that makes very heavy demands upon the solo singer.

Miss Malkin sang this music with breadth, with prophetic fervor. When her tones were not forced they had a warm and sensuous quality which served her well. But in passages of high tessitura, singnig against the heavy instrumentation, there was unsteadiness and a tendency to shrillness. In spirit and as a musician, she gave Mr. Converse's work eloquent interpretation. After the performance the singer was repeatedly called back to the stage, and, almost as often, Mr. Converse bowed from his box.

The performance of Strauss's flaming tone-poem by Mr. Koussevitzky was very dramatic and there was virtuoso playing on the part of the orchestra.

Milstein Plays for Students.

The Students' Concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall offered Mozart's "Heffner" symphony in D major; Debussy's beautiful and too infrequently played "Iberia," Carl Goldmark's A minor concerto for violin with Nathan Milstein as soloist, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Milstein gave the work an excellent reading. No violinist of the present season has surpassed him in brilliance of clean technique, but he adds to virtuosity a warm, finely shaded tone, and a temperament liberally endowed with passion. His singing is more eloquent in dramatic than in essentially lyric passages, which were sensitive rather than tender. His tone is rounder in lower than in upper middle registers. But his perfarmance in general would be difficult to excel.

Mr. Walter was at his finest vein in the Mozart, wherein crispness of pattern, virility and a delicate warmth were admirably blended, and in his evocation of the subtle strands of orchestral voices that weave such a lovely and haunting tonal web in the second movement of the Debussy "Odors of the Night." Not a shade of its miraculous transformation of thematic material escaped him. The first movement, however, was too slow, and hence too heavy—the last adjective to be associated with anything Debussy wrote. The last movement, while again finely articulated as to voices, was if anything too carefully treated; its climaxes had none of the delirious abandon that should attend this "Morning of a Fête Day."

One should especially commend, however, the treatment accorded the Goldmark, its robust breadth, its fine pianissimi and the excellent balance maintained between soloist and orchestra. Mr. Milstein and the conductor were vigorously applauded by a large audience.

H. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

FEB 6 - 1933

Boston Symphony Plays Converse's 'Prophecy'

Four compositions from as many countries constituted the program of the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, all of them works by contemporary musicians. For this occasion Serge Koussevitzky had saved the most recent work of the New Englander, Frederick Converse, a settling titled "Prophecy," of chapters 34 and 35 of the Book of Isaiah, which the composer has described as a "tone poem for soprano and orchestra." Written for Beata Malkin, who was the soloist in this performance, it did not seem anything more startling, formally, than a cantata in which the orchestration was rather elaborate; the voice is still the dominating element in the plan. Mr. Converse has here attempted a tonal evocation of the Day of Accounting; his treatment and illumination of the subject reflect the competence that is suggested from his position as dean of the New England Conservatory of Music, together with the lack of experimental tendencies that is also indicated. More cause for reflection could be found in the use of an English text for a singer who was plainly at a disadvantage in that tongue, and the numerous G sharps and A's in a score especially written for the vocalist, whose faulty production placed them beyond accuracy and ease. Mlle. Malkin possesses a vocal organ capable of much brilliant tone, but her use of it was forced and insecure, her intonations often at variance with that of the trustworthy Boston ensemble.

The symphony of the afternoon was the fifth of Sibelius (in E flat), for whom Mr. Koussevitzky has repeatedly testified his devotion this season. As the work of a man familiarly described as dour and remote, the qualities of this composition are light, almost transparent. The forbidding Finnish landscape is here touched with something approaching a Cote d'Azur sunniness. Through the four movements the scheme of development seems to be one of variation rather than expansion in the customary symphonic sense, imparting an effect curiously static and unprogressive. This is relieved somewhat in the simple charm of the andante's principal subject, though the treatment reappears in its subsequent elaboration. The orchestral features of the score are less striking than in other of his works.

A rare opportunity for hearing the fanciful and delicate "Briggs Fair" of Delius was enhanced considerably by the excellence of the orchestra's solo wood-wind performers, particularly Messrs. Laurent and Gillet, flautist and oboist respectively. Similar virtuosity of execution distinguished the concluding "Tod und Verkeaerung."

I. K.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD

FEB 7 - 1933

BATON GIVES MAGIC EFFECT TO AUDIENCE

But Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Technician, Not Magician

BOSTON — Serge Koussevitzky's baton is a wand which creates magic effects in the imagination of those who hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is not magic, of course, Koussevitzky is a technician. In rehearsal no conductor can be more relentlessly exacting than he, down to the smallest detail of rhythm, or nuance, whether of a single instrument or the 110-piece ensemble. For the sake of the development of a single interpretative effect, he will break his own back or anyone's, until endless repetitions, halts, explanations, and exhortations have been made.

But the technique of Koussevitzky is formed from the emotions as well as from skill and musical learning. He has sometimes halted in rehearsal to lay down his stick and expostulate. "Please! We must be correct, yes. But also we must play with the heart, with the soul, always."

To those out in front in Symphony Hall, the gestures and bodily attitudes by which Koussevitzky signals his orchestra constitute something close to musical art — compositions in line and motion. Expressive though his back be, listeners miss the wonderful play of dramatic expression which his face presents to his musicians. His features are comparable to those of a sensitive actor-stage-director, whose expression instinctively varies with the sentiments registered by each player before him.

If in performance something is not quite as intended, Koussevitzky is philosophic rather than fretful. He may, very likely, make a sour face at the offending individual or group. But it is in a spirit of "Well, I never expected anything so funny from you." And if the composition has been unfamiliar, or especially difficult, he will follow at the end by pantomiming with his face some such expression as "Good work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TH
COLUMBIA, S. C.
RECORD

FEB 13 1933

The Columbia Day Book

Relapse

The music of the Boston Symphony orchestra might be the ultimate of perfection to many but to Roland Williamson, 1620 Green street, it's just a jumble of so many discordant notes...Mr. Williamson tells this on himself....Saturday night he arose from his bed, where he had been confined for several days suffering an attack of influenza, to tune in his radio....Having heard nothing to the contrary he supposed that Rudy Vallee might have agreed to broadcast his concert in the auditorium over WIS.... Luck was with him, he said, for as the radio gathered volume sure enough there was the orchestra tuning up....Mr. Williamson reports that he heard each instrument separately go through the ordeal of attaining the proper pitch then heard them all in unison making a test....Something was queer. ...Maybe it was the rarified southern atmosphere that confused Vallee and his Connecticut Yankees, for they labored full 20 minutes with unhappy results....Came a pause ... "Now," thought Mr. Williamson, elated that his martyrdom had not been in vain....Then this announcement:..."Ladies and gentlemen through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting company for the past 30 minutes you have been entertained by the music of the Boston Symphony orchestra" ... Mr. Williamson suffered a relapse.

* * * * * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

B 18 1933

Boston Symphony To Give Concert Here on Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening in the RKO Albee Theatre the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit and last but one of the season to Providence.

The last part of the program Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will devote to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, the 50th anniversary of whose death has been observed in many parts of the world in the week past. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has given three Wagnerian concerts in Boston this week. For Providence, Dr. Koussevitzky will appropriately conduct the death music of Siegfried from the third act of "Gotterdammerung," the famous episode where in a sort of elegaic panorama Wagner reviews the life of the hero, Siegfried. This great music, so far as available records show, will then be heard in Providence for the first time.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a little serenade in four movements for a reduced string orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 11 1933

THIRD CONCERT ANNOUNCED OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wagner Holds Major Place on Program Here Feb. 21.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the season in Providence in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announces a Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner program for this occasion.

The coming week marks the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, an event which is being recognized all over the musical world by performances of Wagners' works. Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston is giving an all Wagner program on Monday, Feb. 13, which is the date of Wagner's death in 1883. On Friday and Saturday in Boston he is playing excerpts from "Parsifal."

The last half of the Providence program will be fittingly devoted to the music of Wagner. The Death Music of Sieffried from "Gotterdammerung" will be played; also the Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried," and the Overture to "Tannhauser." The first part of the program will consist of Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 11 1933

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of the season in Providence in the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening, Feb. 21st. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky announces a Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner programme for this occasion.

The coming week marks the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, an event which is being recognized all over the musical world by performances of Wagner's works. Dr. Koussevitsky in Boston is giving an all-Wagner programme on Monday, Feb. 13, which is the date of Wagner's death in 1883. On Friday and Saturday in Boston he is playing excepts from "Parsifal."

The last half of the Providence programmes will be fittingly devcted to the music of Wagner. The death music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung" will be played; also the forest murmurs from "Siegfried," and the overture to "Tannhauser." The first part of the programme will consist of Mozart's little seranade, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and the seventh symphony of Beethoven in A major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

FEB 12 1933

Sings in Boston

ROBERT STEEL

Operatic tenor, of Lansdowne, who has been engaged as a soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony next Friday and Saturday, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 21 1933

THE LOU

By Lou

Of course, there were the concerts by the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonic, but even the presence of Efrem Zimbalist did not suffice in giving the brilliance to the latter orchestra's program that customarily marks it. The Boston band did better chiefly because it dispensed for once with its discordant modernists, selected instead Wagner and Beethoven. Musically, this program was the highlight of the week-end

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 19 1933

Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," which New York has not heard since Leopold Stokowski directed it here in the Spring of 1930, will be the principal work in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. Other compositions on the program will be Gluck's Ballet Suite No. 2 and Schumann's First symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 12 1933

PROGRAM MAKING

To the Music Editor:

A letter "On Making Programs" in the Sunday TIMES prompts me to add another voice asking for more original planning in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts which we hear over the radio Sunday afternoons.

I have long noticed that the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras almost always ~~have far~~ more interesting and generally worth-while programs than our New York orchestras.

Now that we have on the radio the incomparable Boston Symphony practically every Saturday night, things look a lot brighter; but why should we have had to wait years with hardly any Sibelius or Vaughan Williams (to name only two significant omissions from most of the Philharmonic seasons since 1924)? Why not an occasional Holst, such as "The Planets"? Why not a Sibelius cycle instead of yet another Beethoven cycle, as is now announced for five Sunday afternoons. Strauss's "Zarathustra" or "Domestic Symphony" could with profit, not to say variety, be sometimes played in place of another and yet another "Till" or "Don Juan." What a treat it was to hear Debussy's "Iberia" yesterday instead of the usual "Oberon" overture or Franck symphony!

How long shall we have to wait, I wonder, to hear "Le Sacre du Printemps," "Brigg Fair," Sibelius's Second and following symphonies; Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony, d'Indy's symphony, any Elgar save the "Enigma Variations," a little (if that is possible) Mahler, a "Poem of Ecstasy," "El Amor Brujo," a Bax symphony, played by our own orchestra?

I have only touched the surface here of the possibilities awaiting the attention of the Philharmonic, possibilities which have long been translated into facts, into lovely and stirring music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With all these complaints go my deep appreciation of the good things we do get, from time to time, in the way of original program planning, from the Philharmonic.

I do not want this to be interpreted as wishing to do away with Beethoven, Brahms and the familiar classics. They are our bread and butter. We need them. But not, in this writer's opinion, so many times every season, to the exclusion of important, and indeed great, modern music that Boston, London and Paris are familiar with.

JOHN C. W. BIRD.
Bloomfield, N. J., Feb. 6, 1933.

THE SIBELIUS SYMPHONIES.

To the Music Editor:

The recent performance of the powerful Fifth symphony of Sibelius by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves one speculating again about a curious mystery. Here is an engrossing score, certainly one of the most important composed in the past quarter-century. Yet our Philharmonic Orchestr once. That pe nearly twelve y

The only otl
New York that was by Mr.
Philadelphia Or
that time the
was so favoral repeated the w season. Since t in vain for a re
harmonic.
This is by n
Sibelius sympho
chestra has unre
Since the 1921
played only two
Mr. Toscanini
formance of the Stokowski (as played the First.
are at least fou nies that have
by the Philharm
Mr. Toscanini
ductor of the o not responsible who is? In his (during which h for but one Sibe has played great from men like nuovo-Tedesco, d
Wetzler, Kodály
He has even corpses by Saint tucci, Busoni, Ro
in vain for eith insight to justi making.
There is no do ought to be don
Philharmonic ré present wretche siderable doubt ever be done by RICHA
New York, Fel

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 16 1933

DR. CHAPMAN WILL GIVE SYMPHONY TALK

The third in the series of free lectures on the Boston Symphony programs by Dr. W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and the Evening Bulletin, will be given Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the children's room of the Providence Public Library.

Dr. Chapman will speak on the program for Tuesday evening's concert. He will discuss the lives and works of Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner, the composers represented on this program, taking on works by them which the orchestra will play.

Most of the program is devoted to Wagner, this week marking the 50th anniversary of his death. The lecture will be illustrated at the piano and on other instruments, and is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Ushers will be Miss Lydia Bell and Miss Louise Waterman. The public is invited.

The club's library committee in charge of arrangements comprises Miss Sarah E. Wheelwright, chairman; Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Mrs. Marguerite Watson Shaftoe and Mrs. Mary Colt Cross.

THIS CLI
COLU
STATE J

The Boston Sy was heard in C
this week. The u audience was out
Koussevitzky pr and interesting pr
"Brigg Fair," an
by Frederick De
English compose dedicated to Per found the folk so Delius. It is musi and the orchestra
cacy of tone.
Sibelius' Symph
major place on t interesting numbe was the first per Frederick Convers tone poem for so orchestra. For te drew upon the t
thirty-fifth chapte solo part was sun
Malkin, for whom composed.
Mr. Converse, w
the New England
Music, was in t bowed his acknowl first tier box. T brought to a close rendition of Richar tone poem, "Death ration." It seemed be just about the
of this music he virtuoso performan
by the Boston p
Koussevitzky's im ducting of it arous asm as to recall t
the stage many tim have the entire orc

NEW YORK SUN

FEB 18 1933

THIS CLIPPING FROM VIDENCE, R. I.
OURNAL

FEB 19 1933

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

As the date for the observance of the centenary of the birth of Brahms approaches the concert world grows active with performances of his music. Yet at no time in recent years have opportunities been wanting to those who wished to ponder the art of this musician. His symphonies are played frequently and at every repetition the commentators engage in controversy as to the correctness or incorrectness of readings. Probably no other composer in the history of music has been so mercilessly subjected to personal opinions as Brahms. Every wielder of the baton seems to have his own conceptions, which must never resemble those of any other conductor.

All of which should be regarded as a singular demonstration of the vanity of musicians. For surely a composer who died so recently as 1897 cannot have become a riddle of the ages. His scores were all published in the course of his lifetime. He probably read the proofs himself. The notes on the staves are without doubt those which Brahms wrote in his manuscripts. The tempo indications and marks of expression should be accepted as those placed on the pages by the hand of the composer. We have as yet no need of a Brahms Gesellschaft to collect, edit and generally misrepresent the master in imposing set volumes of Gesammelte Schriften.

Nevertheless when Toscanini conducts a Brahms symphony we are told by the authorities that it sounds entirely different from the same symphony when conducted by Koussevitzky, and that when the Philadelphia version is heard we are in the presence of a totally new and original interpretation of the gospel. Just how there can be such differences between performances of the same composition no one has adequately explained. Yet there they are. The C minor symphony alone stands unshaken on its well-planted feet. Through the storms of fifty-six winters it has remained strong and valiant. It has withstood all the blasts of fiery inspirations which have attacked it and has continued to be fresh and fragrant through icy indifference and dogged misunderstanding. The greatest conductors cannot make it greater than it is; the best do not try to do so. The incompetents cannot rob it of its divinity. It speaks always with the Jovian accent of Olympus.

It may therefore seem strange to the younger generation of music lovers that in the closing years of the nineteenth century the debate about Brahms was still in the heat of its agitation. Men were still demanding proof that he was a composer of significance.

* * *

Pleading for Brahms's Art.

In 1898 a local writer on music was impelled to make a plea for the recognition of Brahms. He begged music lovers not to set this man aside because, instead of composing in the free patterns of the admired romanticists, he had revived the vigor of the classic sonata form. "A man," said this writer, "is not necessarily a mere formalist because he clings to the old-fashioned sonata form. Brahms's compositions show a completeness of architectonic detail, superimposed upon a symmetrical and organic development, such as are to be found in those of no other symphonist except Beethoven. Why deny to the late Viennese master depth of feeling because he fashioned the expression of that feeling with all the force of a gigantic musical intellect? Brahms's music grows slowly in popular favor because it is not easy for the careless hearer to grasp its inner spirit. But it is not true that music to be real music demands a Swinburnian diction."

The writer then made a quotation from Swinburne and followed it with one from Milton, asserting that the lyricism of the first resembled that of Chopin and Schumann and the grand diapason of the second the music of Brahms. Then he continued: "Some day, I think, if not soon, the world will see how profoundly representative of his nation and his time Brahms was, and he will be hailed, as Milton was, an organ voice of his country. The irresistible seriousness of Germany has never spoken with more convincing accent than in the music of Brahms. There is a feeling in this music which is far removed from any possibility of a purely sensuous embodiment. It may take time for the entire musical world to come under the spell of this austere utterance, but Brahms had the happiness of knowing ere he died that wherever music was cultivated, his individuality had at least made itself known."

Those words read strangely in this day of the reign of Brahms. In so short a span of years the attitude of the musical world toward the composer has altered. Huneker believed he had to strive to persuade men that Brahms was not a "bonze." We all felt that way in 1897. In that era music lovers were likewise much in the dark about Bach. The Wagner question had ceased to vex a wearied community.

The famous vocalization of "Tristan und Isolde" by the de Reszkes and Nordica had converted the unbelievers. They confessed that Wagner could be sung and that his music was supreme art. But they realized that it flamed with passion. Brahms and Bach were still inaccessible intellectuals, phychologists, philosophers, even perhaps meta-physicians, recluses of the mind who dwelt in solitude, wrapped in speculations beyond the ken of common souls. Today Brahms sits in the circle of the gods and his music is accepted as the lyric medium for the publication of emotions quite worthy to throb beside those of the romanticists.

* * *

The Romantic Classicist.

Curiously enough this juggling of the terms "classic" and "romantic" cannot cease. It is an obstacle to the clarity of musical conceptions that the term "classic" was ever applied to works written in the sonata form. Beethoven, who perfected that form, was indisputably a romanticist, writing in the midst of the tremendous upheaval of human thought begun in the eighteenth century, reaching its climax in the French Revolution, continuing through the revolution of 1848 and forward to the dawn of the materialistic era, which we have dubbed the machine age, and to the advent of its pitifully soulless and mechanized music.

If any man can prove that there was ever a period in the history of music when there was no romantic impulse, he should hasten to do so. It would be interesting news. "Two special powers," said Henri Taine, "have moved mankind—impulse and idea." Those powers were active even when the infant church was utilizing music as the chosen medium for impersonal communication of the thought of a liturgy. They are active now, and all attempts to eliminate emotional quality from music have failed. It was the confusion of mind caused by the rigid application of the terms "classic" and "romantic" that obscured the true significance of Brahms. Hidebound theorists placed him in the classic list because he wrote great works in sonata form. To them he could not be also a romanticist and hence his music must be purely intellectual and devoid of that emotional power to be discovered only in products of the inspired imagination.

Fortunately, the dust raised by the conflict of the defunct wise men is no longer in the eyes of the world. Brahms wrote not only the four overworked symphonies, but also some of the deathless songs of humanity, piano music which brought new thought and new language to the keyboard, quartets, quintets and trios which added to the dignity of chamber music. He is no more a topic for debate. He is settled among the canonized of art.

* * *

Wanted, a Biography.

Writing about the position of Brahms cannot be anything but a gesture, made in deference to the custom of observing anniversaries. There is something much more desirable than the rhetoric of essayists, addressed to a public whose convictions were long ago formed. There is yet no definite life of Brahms. It is possible that none can be written until every possible source of new information is exhausted. To be sure, there are several useful works. Florence May's holds its place well in spite of later publications. Walter Niemann's is the best of the more recent works. There is also the authoritative biography of Kalbeck, but this is not accessible to students unacquainted with German. Among the convenient books for musical students are "Johannes Brahms, sa vie et son oeuvre," by H. Imbert, and "Brahms," by H. C. Colles, of the London Times. These furnish short studies of the compositions.

But it is certain that much material has been left untouched. For this reason the writer is glad to know that Robert Haven Schauffler has decided to devote the next few years of his life to the preparation of a Brahms biography, in which all the available material will be used. Mr. Schauffler has already proved himself well qualified for his self-appointed task by writing his "Beethoven, the Man Who Freed Music," a work of singular acumen and engaging interest. He intends to spend two years in Europe examining all the sources, letters and other records from which new light may be obtained. It is a matter for felicitation that such a labor is to be undertaken by a trained investigator and a competent literary craftsman.

It is well, too, that the work should be done while people who knew Brahms are still living. There are none too many of them, to be sure, but there are some. Even now legends are gathering around the life and work of the illustrious composer. It is easier to get rid of them now than it will be fifty years hence. No one but the historian and biographer can realize how persistent error is when once it has found its way into print under the name of some supposed authority. Every day, it seems, some one is exposing the historical blunders which have marched unmolested along the highways of time from the period of the Renaissance or even earlier. When one contemplates the mass of misinformation which was officially put forward about Wagner and which it has required herculean labor to untangle one can well hope that Mr. Schauffler will clear up all Brahms uncertainties.

Goes

apman

ry Hearers From Seventh to agner.

ontinues throughout the is is one of the great sim-music. That its scheme is d a spondee does not in-
, but we are profoundly e genius of composition very simple musical matentious beauty and ex-reat qualities of sincerity in such a way that it ention and admiration of n music as well as the nd learned.
ly grand music suddenly he "Presto" of the third the upbuilding of tonal the interpolation of a nn-like character. This es one think of the long-and overburdened spirit ch it is not allowed to
In this part of the sym-en paints with glowing with masterly play of ations. It is dramatic s in all grades of tonal d contrasts, compelling ssive harmonies.
ment is wildly Baccha-
ter. It is like a whirl-as Beethoven rarely terpolation of an Irish ora Creina." Without composer shapes his through many changes frequent abrupt and of rhythm and tonal ithout reason is this nd dear to those who hoven symphonies.

Works Immortal

now something of the ner's character feel sure shrink from following a program only from a thiness. But time has works of Richard Wagand imperishable, and y to be upon any pro-omposer. Although of s and highly exemplary annot be said that the hosen for this anniver-
e greatest musical and of his colossal powers.
our imaginations, add Liebestod" from "Triserture to "Die Meister-iven by this orchestra
n" from "Siegfried" is e" music. It was one ositions which led to having distinct and associated with the s of this feature of our have been already olumn. Siegfried has and a drop of blood urns like fire. In a he puts it to his lips him the power to eech of birds and the st.

land Murmurs

spering violin figures hs depicts "woodland are so real and truly
ey make a beautiful n without the rock-
shadowy scenery of
. No other composer
sful in pictorial illu-
ons as Wagner.
arch of Siegfried" is ny as the greatest e in all music. The nourning" is followed ate," the "sword mod's Horn Call" share life over death in a ping tone poem of s and tonal breadth.
"Tannhaeuser" is a concert piece. Its nt, its musical mate-
olved, and its variety its complexity that to reveal new beau-
Notwithstanding the of music and its Wagner's time, this s monumental and f musical material
rs have taken much ses, thereby increasssening its musical

Boston Symphony Music at Library

All of the selections on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday night are to be found in the music collection at the Providence Public Library and, as is customary, this music has been assembled with books that may aid in the appreciation of the concert. Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," is available in the following arrangements:

A conductor's score, parts for two violins, viola, violoncello and bass, and piano solo. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is as follows: Conductor's orchestral score, miniature orchestral score, piano solo, piano, four hands, and two pianos, eight hands. The Wagner selections, "Forest Murmurs," "Death Music of Siegfried" and the overture to "Tannhauser," are available in various arrangements for piano solos. There is also a four-hand arrangement of the Tannhauser overture.

As selections from Wagner's works are now being performed in observance of the 50th anniversary of his death, which occurred Feb. 13, 1883. It is an appropriate time to read about his life, as well as to become familiar with his music. The literature concerning Wagner has been generously added to during the past two or three years and a number of volumes will be found on the library's shelves from which to choose.

Some of the more recent biographies include such titles as "Richard Wagner, His Life and His Work," by Bekker; "Richard Wagner, a Critical Biography," by Hight; "The Women in Wagner's Life," by Kapp; "Letters of Richard Wagner to Anton Pusinelli," by Lenrow; "The Truth About Wagner," by Hurn and Root, and "Fact and Fiction About Wagner," by Newman.

Recent titles in connection with the Wagner music for this program are "The Musical Design of the Ring," by Dickinson; "Story of Siegfried," by Diller, and "Wagner's Music Drama of the Ring," by Leroy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

FEB 20 1933

MISS HEATHCOCK TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Lowell Pianist Appears With Boston Organization On Thursday.

The complete program has been announced of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Sergê Koussevitzky, conductor, next Thursday evening, Feb. 23, in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, Cambridge, at which Gladys Heathcock, of Lowell, will be the pianoforte soloist. As winner in April last of the Mason & Hamlin pianoforte prize at the New England Conservatory of Music Miss Heathcock's playing received special commendation from Dr. Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges and who in January last invited the young pianist to play at his February concert in Cambridge.

The program follows:

Symphony in G major, The Surprise (B. & H. No. 6) ....Haydn
I. Adagio; Allegro assai
II. Andante
III. Menuetto
IV. Allegro di molto
Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 1 ....Liszt
Soloist, Miss Heathcock
Symphony in D Minor ......Franck
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro non troppo

The soloist at this concert is the 19-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney T. Heathcock of 83 Hawthorne street. She has been throughout her musical study a pupil of Louis Cornell, of the New England Conservatory faculty. She was graduated as a pianist last June. She is now registered as a third-year pupil in the conservatory collegiate department as a candidate for the degree of bachelor of music, which she will normally be awarded in 1934.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 12 1933

PROGRAM MAKING AGAIN

To the Music Editor:

A letter "On Making Programs" in the Sunday TIMES prompts me to add another voice asking for more original planning in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts which we hear over the radio Sunday afternoons.

I have long noticed that the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras almost always have far more interesting and generally worth-while programs than our New York orchestras.

Now that we have on the radio the incomparable Boston Symphony practically every Saturday night, things look a lot brighter; but why should we have had to wait years with hardly any Sibelius or Vaughan Williams (to name only two significant omissions from most of the Philharmonic seasons since 1924)? Why not an occasional Holst, such as "The Planets"? Why not a Sibelius cycle instead of yet another Beethoven cycle, as is now announced for five Sunday afternoons. Strauss's "Zarathustra" or "Domestic Symphony" could with profit, not to say variety, be sometimes played in place of another and yet another "Till" or "Don Juan." What a treat it was to hear Debussy's "Iberia" yesterday instead of the usual "Oberon" overture or Franck symphony!

How long shall we have to wait, I wonder, to hear "Le Sacre du Printemps," "Brigg Fair," Sibelius's Second and following symphonies; Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony, d'Indy's symphony, any Elgar save the "Enigma Variations," a little (if that is possible) Mahler, a "Poem of Ecstasy," "El Amor Brujo," a Bax symphony, played by our own orchestra?

I have only touched the surface here of the possibilities awaiting the attention of the Philharmonic, possibilities which have long been translated into facts, into lovely and stirring music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With all these complaints go my deep appreciation of the good things we do get, from time to time, in the way of original program planning, from the Philharmonic.

I do not want this to be interpreted as wishing to do away with Beethoven, Brahms and the familiar classics. They are our bread and butter. We need them. But not, in this writer's opinion, so many times every season, to the exclusion of important, and indeed great, modern music that Boston, London and Paris are familiar with.

JOHN C. W. BIRD.
Bloomfield, N. J., Feb. 6, 1933.

THE SIBELIUS SYMPHONIES.

To the Music Editor:

The recent performance of the powerful Fifth symphony of Sibelius by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves one speculating again about a curious mystery. Here is an engrossing score, certainly one of the most important composed in the past quarter century. Yet our Philharmonic Orchestra has played it but once. That performance occurred nearly twelve years ago, in 1921.

The only other performance in New York that the writer knows of was by Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1925. At that time the impression created was so favorable that Stokowski repeated the work later the same season. Since then we have waited in vain for a repetition by the Philharmonic.

This is by no means the only Sibelius symphony which our orchestra has unreasonably neglected. Since the 1921 performance it has played only two of these fine works: Mr. Toscanini has given a performance of the Fourth, and Mr. Stokowski (as guest conductor) played the First. That is all. There are at least four Sibelius symphonies that have never been played by the Philharmonic!

Mr. Toscanini is the regular conductor of the orchestra. If he is not responsible for its répertoire, who is? In his past seven seasons (during which he has found room for but one Sibelius symphony) he has played great quantities of music from men like Respighi, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, de Sabata, Pizzetti, Wetzler, Kodály and Tommasini. He has even revived long-cold corpses by Saint-Saëns, Raff, Martucci, Busoni, Rossini. One searches in vain for either logic or artistic insight to justify such program making.

There is no doubt that something ought to be done soon to raise the Philharmonic répertoire from its present wretched state. But considerable doubt exists that this will ever be done by Mr. Toscanini.

RICHARD LEONARD.
New York, Feb. 7, 1933.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 16 1933

DR. CHAPMAN WILL GIVE SYMPHONY TALK

The third in the series of free lectures on the Boston Symphony programs by Dr W. Louis Chapman, music critic of the Providence Journal and the Evening Bulletin, will be given Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the children's room of the Providence Public Library.

Dr. Chapman will speak on the program for Tuesday evening's concert. He will discuss the lives and works of Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner, the composers represented on this program, taking on works by them which the orchestra will play.

Most of the program is devoted to Wagner, this week marking the 50th anniversary of his death. The lecture will be illustrated at the piano and on other instruments, and is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Ushers will be Miss Lydia Bell and Miss Louise Waterman. The public is invited.

The club's library committee in charge of arrangements comprises Miss Sarah E. Wheelwright, chairman; Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Mrs. Marguerite Watson Shaftoe and Mrs. Mary Colt Cross.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

FEB 18 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in Carnegie Hall here this week. The usual near capacity audience was out for this event. Mr. Koussevitzky provided a varied and interesting program. First came "Brigg Fair," an English Rhapsody by Frederick Delius, the talented English composer. The work is dedicated to Percy Grainger, who found the folk song and gave it to Delius. It is music of great charm and the orchestra played with delicacy of tone.

Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 held a major place on the program. An interesting number of the program was the first performance here of Frederick Converse's "Prophecy," a tone poem for soprano voice and orchestra. For text Mr. Converse drew upon the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth chapters of Isaiah. The solo part was sung by Mlle. Beata Malkin, for whom the work was composed.

Mr. Converse, who is the dean of the New England Conservatory of Music, was in the audience and bowed his acknowledgments from a first tier box. The concert was brought to a close with a colorful rendition of Richard Strauss's great tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." It seemed to the writer to be just about the finest exposition of this music he ever heard. The virtuoso performance of this music by the Boston players and Mr. Koussevitzky's impassioned conducting of it aroused such enthusiasm as to recall the conductor to the stage many times and finally to have the entire orchestra to its feet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

B 19 1933

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Symphony Program Tuesday to Carry Hearers From Sterling Merits of Beethoven's Seventh to Elegiac Appreciation of Wagner.

Next Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its series in the Albee Theatre. The program will contain two works from the "old masters" and in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death three selections from his works. It might seem that so important an event deserved a greater tribute,—that the program might have been composed entirely of Wagnerian numbers, so large is the public that worships at his shrine, so ample is the literature from which to select.

It must then be considered as two concerts separated by an intermission during which time the mind may turn from the sterling merits of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to elegiac appreciation of one who learned much from Beethoven and carried on the great work of musical evolution profoundly influenced by him. Wagner himself tells us that he delighted in conducting Beethoven's symphonies. Certain melodic figures of Beethoven evoked emotion in Wagner's mind and he made use of material which he found in Beethoven's trios, sonatas and symphonies.

It may be that this fondness of Wagner for Beethoven's works caused Dr. Koussevitzky to place the seventh symphony upon this program. This is one of the great symphonies of Beethoven, the third, fifth, seventh and ninth symphonies being considered of greater inspiration and merit than the other five. This symphony marks the end of the second period of Beethoven's creative work when his powers were at their inspirational heights but when his deafness was rapidly gaining mastery. Indeed, stories are current that he never really heard this symphony except when aided by his imagination.

Changes of Musical Mood

It also marks a period in his development when he more completely abandoned the hard and fast rules of harmony and counterpoint then prevailing, than at any time in his career. Odd changes of key, unusual and abrupt changes of musical mood and deliberate discords are still at variance with usual methods of musical expression. They were not prophetic of present day modernism, but were evidences of his mental restlessness and creative genius. With all these besetting obstacles the dominant thought of the symphony is one of cheerful freshness and exuberance of spirit.

The first movement begins with forte chords which punctuate a very deliberate measure by the oboe, then by the clarinet and horn. Sonorous scale passages lead again to the voice of the oboe, of which Beethoven was very fond, and the movement leads to the cheerful and rhythmic "Allegro" which is saturated with a stateliness and dignity which struggles for mastery with the less serious thoughts of the movement.

Genius of Composition

The celebrated "Allegrette" would be mournful were it not for the dynamic and pulsating urge of throbbing emotion which continues throughout the movement. This is one of the great simple pieces of all music. That its scheme is of a dactyl and a spondee does not interest us at all, but we are profoundly affected by the genius of composition which invests very simple musical material with portentious beauty and exemplifies the great qualities of sincerity and simplicity in such a way that it claims the attention and admiration of the beginner in music as well as the most erudite and learned.

This massively grand music suddenly gives way to the "Presto" of the third movement, to the upbuilding of tonal climaxes and the interpolation of a subject of hymn-like character. This movement makes one think of the longing of a restless and overburdened spirit for repose, which it is not allowed to find or enjoy. In this part of the symphony Beethoven paints with glowing animation and with masterly play of orchestral colorations. It is dramatic and vital, it plays in all grades of tonal powers with vivid contrasts, compelling rhythms and massive harmonies.

The last movement is wildly Bacchanalian in character. It is like a whirlwind employing, as Beethoven rarely does, a frank interpolation of an Irish folk song, the "Nora Creina." Without being erratic the composer shapes his melodic material through many changes of key and with frequent abrupt and energetic changes of rhythm and tonal vesture. Not without reason is this symphony near and dear to those who admire the Beethoven symphonies.

Wagner's Works Immortal

Those who know something of the nobilities of Wagner's character feel sure that he would shrink from following Beethoven upon a program only from a sense of unworthiness. But time has decreed that the works of Richard Wagner are immortal and imperishable, and that he is worthy to be upon any program with any composer. Although of intrinsic greatness and highly exemplary of his genius it cannot be said that the three numbers chosen for this anniversary represent the greatest musical and dramatic heights of his colossal powers. So we must, in our imaginations, add the "Vorspiel and Liebestod" from "Tristan" and the overture to "Die Meistersinger," already given by this orchestra here this season.

The "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" is highly "descriptive" music. It was one of the first compositions which led to "program music," having distinct and definite thoughts associated with the music. The merits of this feature of our musical evolution have been already discussed in this column. Siegfried has killed the Dragon and a drop of blood upon his hand burns like fire. In a most natural way he puts it to his lips which imparts to him the power to understand the speech of birds and the sounds of the forest.

The Woodland Murmurs

Wagner in whispering violin figures of thirds and sixths depicts "woodland murmurs" which are so real and truly imitative that they make a beautiful concert piece even without the rock-ridden forest and shadowy scenery of the operatic stage. No other composer has been so successful in pictorial illusions and suggestions as Wagner.

The "Funeral March of Siegfried" is considered by many as the greatest threnodic utterance in all music. The musical "figure of mourning" is followed by the "motive of fate," the "sword motive" and "Siegfried's Horn Call" share in the triumph of life over death in a tremendously gripping tone poem of immense proportions and tonal breadth.

The Overture to "Tannhaeuser" is a frequently heard concert piece. Its score is so magnificent, its musical material so rich and involved, and its variety so bewildering in its complexity that each hearing seems to reveal new beauties and interests. Notwithstanding the enormous progress of music and its composition since Wagner's time, this work still stands as monumental and serves as a fund of musical material from which composers have taken much for their own purposes, thereby increasing rather than lessening its musical value.

Boston Symphony Music at Library

All of the selections on the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday night are to be found in the music collection at the Providence Public Library and, as is customary, this music has been assembled with books that may aid in the appreciation of the concert. Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," is available in the following arrangements:

A conductor's score, parts for two violins, viola, violoncello and bass, and piano solo. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is as follows: Conductor's orchestral score, miniature orchestral score, piano solo, piano, four hands, and two pianos, eight hands. The Wagner selections, "Forest Murmurs," "Death Music of Siegfried" and the overture to "Tannhauser," are available in various arrangements for piano solos. There is also a four-hand arrangement of the Tannhauser overture.

As selections from Wagner's works are now being performed in observance of the 50th anniversary of his death, which occurred Feb. 13, 1883. It is an appropriate time to read about his life, as well as to become familiar with his music. The literature concerning Wagner has been generously added to during the past two or three years and a number of volumes will be found on the library's shelves from which to choose.

Some of the more recent biographies include such titles as "Richard Wagner, His Life and His Work," by Bekker; "Richard Wagner, a Critical Biography," by Hight; "The Women in Wagner's Life," by Kapp; "Letters of Richard Wagner to Anton Pusinelli," by Lenrow; "The Truth About Wagner," by Hurn and Root, and "Fact and Fiction About Wagner," by Newman.

Recent titles in connection with the Wagner music for this program are "The Musical Design of the Ring," by Dickinson; "Story of Siegfried," by Diller, and "Wagner's Music Drama of the Ring," by Leroy.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER

FEB 20 1933

MISS HEATHCOCK TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Lowell Pianist Appears With Boston Organization On Thursday.

The complete program has been announced of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, next Thursday evening, Feb. 23, in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, Cambridge, at which Gladys Heathcock, of Lowell, will be the pianoforte soloist. As winner in April last of the Mason & Hamlin pianoforte prize at the New England Conservatory of Music Miss Heathcock's playing received special commendation from Dr. Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges and who in January last invited the young pianist to play at his February concert in Cambridge.

The program follows:

Symphony in G major, The Surprise
(B. & H. No. 6) ....Haydn
I. Adagio; Allegro assai
II. Andante
III. Menuetto
IV. Allegro di molto
Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 1 ....Liszt
Soloist, Miss Heathcock
Symphony in D Minor ......Franck
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro non troppo

The soloist at this concert is the 19-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney T. Heathcock of 83 Hawthorne street. She has been throughout her musical study a pupil of Louis Cornell, of the New England Conservatory faculty. She was graduated as a pianist last June. She is now registered as a third-year pupil in the conservatory collegiate department as a candidate for the degree of bachelor of music, which she will normally be awarded in 1934.

12

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 20 1933

Pianoforte Soloist with the Boston Symphony

MISS GLADYS HEATHCOCK

The complete program has been announced of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, next Thursday evening, Feb. 23, in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, Cambridge, at which Gladys Heathcock, of Lowell, will be the pianoforte soloist. As winner in April last of the Mason & Hamlin pianoforte prize at the New England Conservatory of Music Miss Heathcock's playing received special commendation from Dr. Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges, and who in January last invited the young pianist to play at his February concert in Cambridge.

The program follows:

Symphony in G major, The Surprise (B. & H. No. 6) ....Haydn
- I. Adagio; Allegro assai
- II. Andante
- III. Menuetto
- IV. Allegro di molto

Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 1.
Soloist, Miss Heathcock

Symphony in D Minor ......Franck
- I. Lento; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegretto
- III. Allegro non troppo

The soloist at this concert is the 19-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney T. Heathcock of 83 Hawthorne street. She has been throughout her musical study a pupil of Louis Cornell, of the New England Conservatory faculty. She was graduated as a pianist last June. She is now registered as a third-year pupil in the conservatory collegiate department as a candidate for the degree of bachelor of music, which she will normally be awarded in 1934.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 25 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Fourth Concert Here

The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will present the fourth in a series of five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, on Friday evening, March 3, at 8:15, in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program will be as follows: Haydn, Symhpony in G Major ("Surprise"); Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung," tone poem, Opus 4; Mozart, Concerto for Violin in A Mapor, No. 5 (Richard Burgin, soloist); Johann Strauss, Fruhling Stimmen, waltzes.

Music

Feb 22.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the current Providence season in the Albee Theatre, Dr. Serge Kussevitsky conducting. A considerable part of the program was devoted to the music of Richard Wagner.

The program opened with the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart. Being scored for strings alone, they did their customarily capable best. It has always seemed to me that Koussevitsky attains a rare degree of intimacy in these small groups which I like to think is akin to the small orchestras formerly employed by the nobility of the 17th and 18th Centuries. This Mozart seems to me to be of a rather "nervous" nature, always hurrying along to its conclusion, almost before its time. The symphony of the evening was Beethoven's Seventh in A major, written by him in the year 1812 and played for the first time in 1813. The second well done, probably because of the fact that it gave opportunity for the movement of this seemed especially orchestra to demonstrate again its ability to play from the most delecate pianissimos to the robust fortes, with evenness of modulation.

First in the second half was heard the arrangement from the second act of "Seigfried" by Wagner which was to be played as a separate orchestral work, "Forest Murmurs". In this we find Siegfried playing on a pipe of reeds or straws in the forest while the birds twitter, the whole being finally distrupted by the appearance of the dragon. Following was the Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung" also by Wagner. The shades of Death were well portrayed by the low strings and woodwinds. It was followed by the piece for which Wagner is known to the majority of people, the Overture to "Tannhauser". Beginning with the Pilgrims' Song, being moved to Venusburg with all its pleasures and back again with the Song of the Faithful ever triumphant, we were captivated by the outstanding rendition which the Orchestra gave this masterpiece.

J. E. F., Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 26 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH TUESDAY

Koussevitzky Will Lead Orchestra in Sixth Concert at the College

Northampton, Feb. 25—The Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzky will appear at John M. Greene hall, Smith college, Tuesday night at 8. This concert will be the sixth in the Smith college concert course. The program follows:—

Handel—Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, opus 6, No 10 (Seiffert edition.)
1. Overture: Grave-Allegro
2. Air
3. Allegro moderato
4. Allegro

Stravinsky—"Le Sacre du Printemps ("The Rite of Spring.") A picture of pagan Russia.
1. The Adoration of the Earth
   Introduction, Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents, Abduction, Spring Rounds, Games of the Rival Cities, The Procession of the Wise Men, The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man), Dance of the Earth.
2. The Sacrifice
   Introduction, Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents, Glorification of the Chosen One, Evocation of the Ancestors, Ritual of the Ancestors, The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

Intermission

Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," "Siegfried Idyl," Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

---

10 Prov Journal (Feb 22

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Third of Season's Concerts Before Packed House at Albee.—Three Selections From Wagner Offered

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the third of its season's concerts before a packed house in the Albee Theatre. The program was composed of a little symphony by Mozart, a grander one by Beethoven and three selections from the works of Richard Wagner, played in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his death.

If mourning and anniversary celebrations are to be counted in decades, half and whole centuries, then a half-century memorial is of very great importance, for in that not inconsiderable span the world has time to evaluate the true worth of the composer whose thoughts come nearest and dearest to the heart. Interest in the concert therefore centred particularly around the memory of Richard Wagner.

One notes with curious interest the material that has been offered by various speakers and writers upon Wagner and the structure of this program. Wagner's worthip of Beethoven is well known. He tells many times in his own biography of his delight in conducting the Beethoven symphonies and his particular admiration of the Ninth. The offering of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is doubtless because of Wagner's fondness for Beethoven, and probably the use of "Einekleine Nachtsmusic" reflects Beethoven's admiration of Mozart.

The "Nachtmusik," although usually called a "serenade," is in reality a little symphony of classis form. It is ever popular and, as placed in this program, serves as a quiet and pleasing introduction or overture to more profound musical thoughts expressed in tonal grandeurs. Mozart wrote many pieces in light though not superficial mood, and this is one of the most charming of them all. The strings delighted with their crisp and agile fluency, tonal balance was maintained with most artistic perfection. The bowing was good to see. Mozart again left the impression of the airy lightheartedness that is so evident in many of his works.

Although preambled by firmness and austerity through which peer rays of melodic beauty, the first movement of the "Seventh Symphony"—there is no other name for it,—is of undisguised cheerfulness but remote from the prettiness of Mozart. This movement affords many opportunities for the woodwind which, as always, showed that beauty of orchestral speech which has contributed so largely to the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sonority of the basses, a quality which has served as an example to all the other orchestras, was highly in evidence and their message, far lower in the musical scale than most people think in, was given with the clarity of articulation often reserved for instruments of higher tessitura. The "Allegretto" is an exquisite threnody of great nobility of character. Its presentation was devout, its tempo slow, its religious nature most beautifully revealed.

That such simple music can be so great is no more remarkable than that conductor and orchestra so often in the heights of orchestral expression can become as little children and make such appealing poetry of the music. We know of no more poignant phrases in all Beethoven than this "little allegro." Then to the "Presto" with its tremendous brasses, its resounding chords and purposeful discords. The kaleidoscopic changes of musical mood in this symphony are as brilliant and as full of contrast as in any of the great master's nine.

If Beethoven warned us of approaching "program music" in his plea "Mehr Ausdruck der Empfindung als Malerei," this suggestion was not heeded by Wagner, who was most definite and descriptive in his "leit motiven" and in his "Waldweben," or relation of "forest sounds." As played by this orchestra it was a thing of rare beauty and a veritable triumph of orchestral expression over any other form of thought conveyance. Our recent hearing of "Tapiola" by Sibelius must be compared with this as far simpler though hardly less effective orchestration. The familiar "Bird Call" by flute and clarinet recalled the legendary gift of Siegfried of magic power to understand the speech of birds and the sounds of the forest.

In the dignified immensities of "Siegfried's Funeral March" Koussevitzsky gave a most exalted portrayal of what is considered by many as the greatest elegiac sentiment in all music. The association of conductor and performers in this threnody was most complete. Even without the association of the stage picture, lacking a knowledge of the story of Siegfried, the import of this soulful work is evident and its heroic proportions made apparent. Percussion lent assistance in the tremendous fortes with just and perfect intonation, the brass choir added its tonal richness to the ensemble and plant strings in perfect accord of intonation and unity gave massive richness of orchestral texture. A glorious bass clarinet was heard, such as would have delighted him whose memory was revered in this most solemn music.

The "Overture to Tannhauser" came as a fitting climax to these orchestral wonders. Its lessons of repentance and forgiveness are not surpassed in the entire literature of religious music, and this library is large. If instruments ever speak with lucid and prophetic voices it is in this superb overture which whets the appetite for more and leaves in the memory thoughts of the prayer of pilgrims, of the futility of a life of sin and glorious redemption through repentance.

Wagner wished us to associate his music with these thoughts. He has invoked his genius of orchestration that they might be so united. Until more fitting musical devices became available this method of expression must stand as exemplary and monumental. Wagner's dream of realism in music is fulfilled. His greatness is now acknowledged by the entire musical world and it is doubtful whether it will ever be surpassed. Yet it is only by a large orchestra of musicians equipped with able technique and above all with personal esthetic appreciation of the musical values of the composition that these grandeurs are made manifest to us. Such an assembly is this Boston orchestra, which has made a study of tone qualities and dynamic values, and through constant artistic association has been welded into a perfect tonal unit. Fortunately the "guest conductor" idea has not as yet taken firm hold of this band. But one conductor has made his imprint upon the band, and the divers interpretative idiosyncrasies of a variety of musical minds have not disturbed or interfered. Upon this, both public and orchestra are to be congratulated. Such unity of purpose and soundness of interpretation have a direct bearing upon the perfection of this great orchestra. Again it leaves with the impression of the artistic excellence of its personnel and the fine interpretative powers of its conductor.

The program:

Mozart .... "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
- I. Allegro.
- II. Romanza: Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.

Beethoven ... Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
- I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
- IV. Allegro con brio.

Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Wagner..Death Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"
Wagner..........Overture to "Tannhauser"

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

FEB 23 1933

It is a matter for local pride that a young Lowell musician, Miss Gladys F. Heathcock, should have been chosen to play as pianoforte soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this evening. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, has done much to encourage American composers and musicians. But properly he requires a high standard of ability for the inclusion of their works or for their participation in performance at the concerts of the orchestra. Of Miss Heathcock's talent he had opportunity to form an opinion as one of the judges in the Conservatory competition last year when the Lowell girl won the prize award. Hopefully before long there will be the opportunity to hear Miss Heathcock in her own city.

1 126

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 20 19

Pianoforte Soloist with the Boston Symphony

MISS GLADYS HEATHCOCK

The complete program has been announced of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, next Thursday evening, Feb. 23, in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, Cambridge, at which Gladys Heathcock, of Lowell, will be the pianoforte soloist. As winner in April last of the Mason & Hamlin pianoforte prize at the New England Conservatory of Music Miss Heathcock's playing received special commendation from Dr. Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges, and who in January last invited the young pianist to play at his February concert in Cambridge.

The program follows:

Symphony in G major, The Surprise (B. & H. No. 6) ....Haydn
- I. Adagio; Allegro assai
- II. Andante
- III. Menuetto
- IV. Allegro di molto

Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 1.
Soloist, Miss Heathcock

Symphony in D Minor ......Franck
- I. Lento; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegretto
- III. Allegro non troppo

The soloist at this concert is the 19-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney T. Heathcock of 83 Hawthorne street. She has been throughout her musical study a pupil of Louis Cornell, of the New England Conservatory faculty. She was graduated as a pianist last June. She is now registered as a third-year pupil in the conservatory collegiate department as a candidate for the degree of bachelor of music, which she will normally be awarded in 1934.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 25 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Fourth Concert Here

The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will present the fourth in a series of five Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, on Friday evening, March 3, at 8:15, in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program will be as follows: Haydn, Symhpony in G Major ("Surprise"); Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung," tone poem, Opus 4; Mozart, Concerto for Violin in A Mapor, No. 5 (Richard Burgin, soloist); Johann Strauss, Frubling Stimmen, waltzes.

Brown Herald

Music

Feb 22. Prov. Hu

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the current Providence season in the Albee Theatre, Dr. Serge Kussevitsky conducting. A considerable part of the program was devoted to the music of Richard Wagner.

The program opened with the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart. Being scored for strings alone, they did their customarily capable best. It has always seemed to me that Koussevitsky attains a rare degree of intimacy in these small groups which I like to think is akin to the small orchestras formerly employed by the nobility of the 17th and 18th Centuries. This Mozart seems to me to be of a rather "nervous" nature, always hurrying along to its conclusion, almost before its time. The symphony of the evening was Beethoven's Seventh in A major, written by him in the year 1812 and played for the first time in 1813. The second well done, probably because of the fact that it gave opportunity for the movement of this seemed especially orchestra to demonstrate again its ability to play from the most delecate pianissimos to the robust fortes, with evenness of modulation.

First in the second half was heard the arrangement from the second act of "Seigfried" by Wagner which was t o be played as a separate orchestral work, "Forest Murmurs". In this we find Siegfried playing on a pipe of reeds or straws in the forest while the birds twitter, the whole being finally distrupted by the appearance of the dragon. Following was the Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung" also by Wagner. The shades of Death were well portrayed by the low strings and woodwinds. It was followed by the piece for which Wagner is known to the majority of people, the Overture to "Tannhauser". Beginning with the Pilgrims' Song, being moved to Venusburg with all its pleasures and back again with the Song of the Faithful ever triumphant, we were captivated by the outstanding rendition which the Orchestra gave this masterpiece.

J. E. F., Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 26 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT SMITH TUESDAY

Koussevitzky Will Lead Orchestra in Sixth Concert at the College

Northampton, Feb. 25—The Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzky will appear at John M. Greene hall, Smith college, Tuesday night at 8. This concert will be the sixth in the Smith college concert course. The program follows:—

Handel—Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, opus 6, No 10 (Seiffert edition.)
1. Overture: Grave-Allegro
2. Air
3. Allegro moderato
4. Allegro

Stravinsky—'Le Sacre du Printemps ("The Rite of Spring.") A picture of pagan Russia.
1. The Adoration of the Earth
   Introduction, Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents, Abduction, Spring Rounds, Games of the Rival Cities, The Procession of the Wise Men, The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man), Dance of the Earth.
2. The Sacrifice
   Introduction, Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents, Glorification of the Chosen One, Evocation of the Ancestors, Ritual of the Ancestors, The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

Intermission

Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," "Siegfried Idyl," Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

---

10 Prov Journal Feb 22

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Third of Season's Concerts Before Packed House at Albee.—Three Selections From Wagner Offered

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the third of its season's concerts before a packed house in the Albee Theatre. The program was composed of a little symphony by Mozart, a grander one by Beethoven and three selections from the works of Richard Wagner, played in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his death.

If mourning and anniversary celebrations are to be counted in decades, half and whole centuries, then a half-century memorial is of very great importance, for in that not inconsiderable span the world has time to evaluate the true worth of the composer whose thoughts come nearest and dearest to the heart. Interest in the concert therefore centred particularly around the memory of Richard Wagner.

One notes with curious interest the material that has been offered by various speakers and writers upon Wagner and the structure of this program. Wagner's worthip of Beethoven is well known. He tells many times in his own biography of his delight in conducting the Beethoven symphonies and his particular admiration of the Ninth. The offering of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is doubtless because of Wagner's fondness for Beethoven, and probably the use of "Einekleine Nachtsmusic" reflects Beethoven's admiration of Mozart.

The "Nachtmusik," although usually called a "serenade," is in reality a little symphony of classis form. It is ever popular and, as placed in this program, serves as a quiet and pleasing introduction or overture to more profound musical thoughts expressed in tonal grandeurs. Mozart wrote many pieces in light though not superficial mood, and this is one of the most charming of them all. The strings delighted with their crisp and agile fluency, tonal balance was maintained with most artistic perfection. The bowing was good to see. Mozart again left the impression of the airy lightheartedness that is so evident in many of his works.

Although preambled by firmness and austerity through which peer rays of melodic beauty, the first movement of the "Seventh Symphony"—there is no other name for it,—is of undisguised cheerfulness but remote from the prettiness of Mozart. This movement affords many opportunities for the woodwind which, as always, showed that beauty of orchestral speech which has contributed so largely to the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sonority of the basses, a quality which has served as an example to all the other orchestras, was highly in evidence and their message, far lower in the musical scale than most people think in, was given with the clarity of articulation often reserved for instruments of higher tessitura. The "Allegretto" is an exquisite threnody of great nobility of character. Its presentation was devout, its tempo slow, its religious nature most beautifully revealed.

That such simple music can be so great is no more remarkable than that conductor and orchestra so often in the heights of orchestral expression can become as little children and make such appealing poetry of the music. We know of no more poignant phrases in all Beethoven than this "little allegro." Then to the "Presto" with its tremendous brasses, its resounding chords and purposeful discords. The kaleidoscopic changes of musical mood in this symphony are as brilliant and as full of contrast as in any of the great master's nine.

If Beethoven warned us of approaching "program music" in his plea "Mehr Ausdruck der Empfindung als Malerei," this suggestion was not heeded by Wagner, who was most definite and descriptive in his "leit motiven" and in his "Waldweben," or relation of "forest sounds." As played by this orchestra it was a thing of rare beauty and a veritable triumph of orchestral expression over any other form of thought conveyance. Our recent hearing of "Tapiola" by Sibelius must be compared with this as far simpler though hardly less effective orchestration. The familiar "Bird Call" by flute and clarinet recalled the legendary gift of Siegfried of magic power to understand the speech of birds and the sounds of the forest.

In the dignified immensities of "Siegfried's Funeral March" Koussevitzky gave a most exalted portrayal of what is considered by many as the greatest elegiac sentiment in all music. The association of conductor and performers in this threnody was most complete. Even without the association of the stage picture, lacking a knowledge of the story of Siegfried, the import of this soulful work is evident and its heroic proportions made apparent. Percussion lent assistance in the tremendous fortes with just and perfect intonation, the brass choir added its tonal richness to the ensemble and plant strings in perfect accord of intonation and unity gave massive richness of orchestral texture. A glorious bass clarinet was heard, such as would have delighted him whose memory was revered in this most solemn music.

The "Overture to Tannhauser" came as a fitting climax to these orchestral wonders. Its lessons of repentance and forgiveness are not surpassed in the entire literature of religious music, and this library is large. If instruments ever speak with lucid and prophetic voices it is in this superb overture which whets the appetite for more and leaves in the memory thoughts of the prayer of pilgrims, of the futility of a life of sin and glorious redemption through repentance.

Wagner wished us to associate his music with these thoughts. He has invoked his genius of orchestration that they might be so united. Until more fitting musical devices became available this method of expression must stand as exemplary and monumental. Wagner's dream of realism in music is fulfilled. His greatness is now acknowledged by the entire musical world and it is doubtful whether it will ever be surpassed. Yet it is only by a large orchestra of musicians equipped with able technique and above all with personal esthetic appreciation of the musical values of the composition that these grandeurs are made manifest to us. Such an assembly is this Boston orchestra, which has made a study of tone qualities and dynamic values, and through constant artistic association has been welded into a perfect tonal unit. Fortunately the "guest conductor" idea has not as yet taken firm hold of this band. But one conductor has made his imprint upon the band, and the divers interpretative idiosyncrasies of a variety of musical minds have not disturbed or interfered. Upon this, both public and orchestra are to be congratulated. Such unity of purpose and soundness of interpretation have a direct bearing upon the perfection of this great orchestra. Again it leaves with the impression of the artistic excellence of its personnel and the fine interpretative powers of its conductor.

The program:

Mozart.......... "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
- I. Allegro.
- II. Romanza: Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.

Beethoven ... Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
- I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
- IV. Allegro con brio.

Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Wagner..Death Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"
Wagner..........Overture to "Tannhauser"

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

FEB 23 1933

It is a matter for local pride that a young Lowell musician, Miss Gladys F. Heathcock, should have been chosen to play as pianoforte soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this evening. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, has done much to encourage American composers and musicians. But properly he requires a high standard of ability for the inclusion of their works or for their participation in performance at the concerts of the orchestra. Of Miss Heathcock's talent he had opportunity to form an opinion as one of the judges in the Conservatory competition last year when the Lowell girl won the prize award. Hopefully before long there will be the opportunity to hear Miss Heathcock in her own city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 22 1933

Symphony Group in Third Offering

Boston Players Present Mozart, Beethoven, Wag- in Providence.

Only four times in a season the great Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Rhode Island. Last evening in the Albee Theatre, Providence, the third of the series of concerts was played before an audience that filled the ample theatre, and the orchestra brought to a throng of highly appreciative listeners the beauty and grandeur of three of the greatest minds in all musical history. Beginning with Mozart's serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," it followed with the glorious Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, and three Wagner numbers closed the concert.

It was appropriately gracious on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky that in this period of the observance of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death he should include three of the great German's numbers in this programme. Perhaps, before the programme was announced, some of the regular symphony patrons hoped for a Wagner symphony, but surely there could be no happier arrangement than a list of numbers beginning with the beauties of Mozart, continuing with the sonorous glories of the Beethoven seventh, and thus leading to the great master of the 19th century. It was in every respect a magnificent offering, and under the inspired direction of Dr. Koussevitzky was magnificently played. To those who heard this concert there shall always remain the memory of the thoroughly inspired playing of the symphony and of the Wagner numbers.

No finer conception of Wagner could be asked for than that of the eminent Russian who has conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in recent years and who has stamped his personality all over it. Koussevitzky is a lover of the music produced by his own nation, but he is a music master first of all, and his fealty to his art is too thorough to permit him to miss any single point of greatness in a composition of any nation. Thus he is one of the greatest of all interpreters of Richard Wagner, and no living director is more fully capable of revealing in its fullest extent the greatness of that marvellous genius. The concert which he closed last evening with the glorious and impressive beauties of the "Tannhauser" overture shall not be forgotten by the Wagner admirer who was fortunate enough to have heard it. The programme follows:

Mozart ..."Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
Serenade for string orchestra (K. 525)
(1) Allegro.
(2) Romanza: Andante.
(3) Menuetto: Allegretto.
(4) Rondo; Allegro.
Beethoven ....
..Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Op. 92
(1) Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
(2) Allegretto.
(3) Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
(4) Allegro con brio.
Wagner ....
.."Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Wagner ....
"Death Music of Siegfried" from "Gotterdammerung"
Wagner ....Overture to "Tannhauser"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 22 1933

IN TERMS OF MUSIC, Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Third of Season's Concerts Before Packed House at Albee.—Three Selections From Wagner Offered

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the third of its season's concerts before a packed house in the Albee Theatre. The program was composed of a little symphony by Mozart, a grander one by Beethoven and three selections from the works of Richard Wagner, played in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his death.

If mourning and anniversary celebrations are to be counted in decades, half and whole centuries, then a half-century memorial is of very great importance, for in that not inconsiderable span the world has time to evaluate the true worth of the composer whose thoughts come nearest and dearest to the heart. Interest in the concert therefore centred particularly around the memory of Richard Wagner.

One notes with curious interest the material that has been offered by various speakers and writers upon Wagner and the structure of this program. Wagner's worthip of Beethoven is well known. He tells many times in his own biography of his delight in conducting the Beethoven symphonies and his particular admiration of the Ninth. The offering of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is doubtless because of Wagner's fondness for Beethoven, and probably the use of "Einekleine Nachtsmusic" reflects Beethoven's admiration of Mozart.

The "Nachtmusik," although usually called a "serenade," is in reality a little symphony of classis form. It is ever popular and, as placed in this program, serves as a quiet and pleasing introduction or overture to more profound musical thoughts expressed in tonal grandeurs. Mozart wrote many pieces in light though not superficial mood, and this is one of the most charming of them all. The strings delighted with their crisp and agile fluency, tonal balance was maintained with most artistic perfection. The bowing was good to see. Mozart again left the impression of the airy lightheartedness that is so evident in many of his works.

Although preambled by firmness and austerity through which peer rays of melodic beauty, the first movement of the "Seventh Symphony"—there is no other name for it,—is of undisguised cheerfulness but remote from the prettiness of Mozart. This movement affords many opportunities for the woodwind which, as always, showed that beauty of orchestral speech which has contributed so largely to the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sonority of the basses, a quality which has served as an example to all the other orchestras, was highly in evidence and their message, far lower in the musical scale than most people think in, was given with the clarity of articulation often reserved for instruments of higher tessitura. The "Allegretto" is an exquisite threnody of great nobility of character. Its presentation was devout, its tempo slow, its religious nature most beautifully revealed.

That such simple music can be so great is no more remarkable than that conductor and orchestra so often in the heights of orchestral expression can become as little children and make such appealing poetry of the music. We know of no more poignant phrases in all Beethoven than this "little allegro." Then to the "Presto" with its tremendous brasses, its resounding chords and purposeful discords. The kaleidoscopic changes of musical mood in this symphony are as brilliant and as full of contrast as in any of the great master's nine.

If Beethoven warned us of approaching "program music" in his plea "Mehr Ausdruck der Empfindung als Malerei," this suggestion was not heeded by Wagner, who was most definite and descriptive in his "leit motiven" and in his "Waldweben," or relation of "forest sounds." As played by this orchestra it was a thing of rare beauty and a veritable triumph of orchestral expression over any other form of thought conveyance. Our recent hearing of "Tapiola" by Sibelius must be compared with this as far simpler though hardly less effective orchestration. The familiar "Bird Call" by flute and clarinet recalled the legendary gift of Siegfried of magic power to understand the speech of birds and the sounds of the forest.

In the dignified immensities of "Siegfried's Funeral March" Koussevitzky gave a most exalted portrayal of what is considered by many as the greatest elegiac sentiment in all music. The association of conductor and performers in this threnody was most complete. Even without the association of the stage picture, lacking a knowledge of the story of Siegfried, the import of this soulful work is evident and its heroic proportions made apparent. Percussion lent assistance in the tremendous fortes with just and perfect intonation, the brass choir added its tonal richness to the ensemble and plant strings in perfect accord of intonation and unity gave massive richness of orchestral texture. A glorious bass clarinet was heard, such as would have delighted him whose memory was revered in this most solemn music.

The "Overture to Tannhauser" came as a fitting climax to these orchestral wonders. Its lessons of repentance and forgiveness are not surpassed in the entire literature of religious music, and this library is large. If instruments ever speak with lucid and prophetic voices it is in this superb overture which whets the appetite for more and leaves in the memory thoughts of the prayer of pilgrims, of the futility of a life of sin and glorious redemption through repentance.

Wagner wished us to associate his music with these thoughts. He has invoked his genius of orchestration that they might be so united. Until more fitting musical devices became available this method of expression must stand as exemplary and monumental. Wagner's dream of realism in music is fulfilled His greatness is now acknowledged by the entire musical world and it is doubtful whether it will ever be surpassed. Yet it is only by a large orchestra of musicians equipped with able technique and above all with personal esthetic appreciation of the musical values of the composition that these grandeurs are made manifest to us. Such an assembly is this Boston orchestra, which has made a study of tone qualities and dynamic values, and through constant artistic association has been welded into a perfect tonal unit. Fortunately the "guest conductor" idea has not as yet taken firm hold of this band. But one conductor has made his imprint upon the band, and the divers interpretative idiosyncrasies of a variety of musical minds have not disturbed or interfered. Upon this, both public and orchestra are to be congratulated. Such unity of purpose and soundness of interpretation have a direct bearing upon the perfection of this great orchestra. Again it leaves with the impression of the artistic excellence of its personnel and the fine interpretative powers of its conductor.

The program:

Mozart .... "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
I. Allegro.
II. Romanza: Andante.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
IV. Rondo: Allegro.
Beethoven ... Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Wagner..Death Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"
Wagner..........Overture to "Tannhauser"

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 22 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Third in Concert Series

Program Composed of Little Symphony by Mozart, a Grander One by Beethoven and Three Selections From Works of Richard Wagner, Played in Observance of 50th Anniversary of His Death.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the third of its season's concerts before a packed house in the Albee Theatre. The program was composed of a little symphony by Mozart, a grander one by Beethoven and three selections from the works of Richard Wagner, played in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his death.

The "Nachtmusik," although usually called a "serenade," is in reality a little symphony of classis form. It is ever popular and, as placed in this program, serves as a quiet and pleasing introduction or overture to more profound musical thoughts expressed in tonal grandeurs. Mozart wrote many pieces in light though not superficial mood, and this is one of the most charming of them all. The strings delighted with their crisp and agile fluency, tonal balance was maintained with most artistic perfection. The bowing was good to see. Mozart again left the impression of the airy lightheartedness that is so evident in many of his works.

Although preambled by firmness and austerity through which peer rays of melodic beauty, the first movement of the "Seventh Symphony"—there is no other name for it,—is of undisguised cheerfulness but remote from the prettiness of Mozart. This movement affords many opportunities for the woodwind which, as always, showed that beauty of orchestral speech which has contributed so largely to the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sonority of the basses, a quality which has served as an example to all the other orchestras, was highly in evidence and their message, far lower in the musical scale than most people think in, was given with the clarity of articulation often reserved for instruments of higher tessitura. The "Allegretto" is an exquisite threnody of great nobility of character. Its presentation was devout, its tempo slow, its religious nature most beautifully revealed.

If Beethoven warned us of approaching "program music" in his plea "Mehr Ausdruck der Empfindung als Malerei," this suggestion was not heeded by Wagner, who was most definite and descriptive in his "leit motiven" and in his "Waldweben," or relation of "forest sounds." As played by this orchestra it was a thing of rare beauty and a veritable triumph of orchestral expression over any other form of thought conveyance.

In the dignified immensities of "Siegfried's Funeral March" Koussevitzky gave a most exalted portrayal of what is considered by many as the greatest elegiac sentiment in all music. The association of conductor and performers in this threnody was most complete. Even without the association of the stage picture, lacking a knowledge of the story of Siegfried, the import of this soulful work is evident and its heroic proportions made apparent. Percussion lent assistance in the tremendous fortes with just and perfect intonation, the brass choir added its tonal richness to the ensemble and plant strings in perfect accord of intonation and unity gave massive richness of orchestral texture. A glorious bass clarinet was heard, such as would have delighted him whose memory was revered in this most solemn music.

The "Overture to Tannhauser" came as a fitting climax to these orchestral wonders. Its lessons of repentance and forgiveness are not surpassed in the entire literature of religious music, and this library is large. If instruments ever speak with lucid and prophetic voices it is in this superb overture which whets the appetite for more and leaves in the memory thoughts of the prayer of pilgrims, of the futility of a life of sin and glorious redemption through repentance.

The program:

Mozart .... "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"
Serenade for String Orchestra (K. 525)
I. Allegro.
II. Romanza: Andante.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto.
IV. Rondo: Allegro.
Beethoven ... Symphony No. 7 in A major Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro con brio.
Wagner—"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried"
Wagner..Death Music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung"
Wagner..........Overture to "Tannhauser"

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 26 1933

Boston Symphony to Play "Le Sacre" at Northampton

Dr Koussevitzky to Direct Important Work By Stravinsky at Greene Hall Tuesday Night In First Performance In This Area—Program Also Includes Selections By Gluck and Wagner

THE Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky will perform at Green hall, Northampton, on Tuesday night at 8 what will probably be one of the most interesting and significant concerts to be given in this vicinity during the present season. The concert is offered in the Smith college series.

In place of the usual symphony, the orchestra will play one of the most important works of modern times, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" for the first time in the area. A work a little more than 20 years ago, the "Sacre" has been performed in most of the capitals of Europe, at New York city and at Boston, but seldom is it heard in the provinces, and for that reason its rendition at Northampton on Tuesday night will be of prime interest.

Few works have created so profound a sensation in recent years. First performed at Paris, it aroused a furore, and as it was introduced to other cities, it never failed to stimulate vast audiences. The "Sacre" was originally written to be performed as a ballet, but was not given as such in this country until a few years ago, when Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra with a large group of dancers appeared in performances at Philadelphia and New York city. As an orchestra composition has been played many times by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Stravinsky work will be preceded by the Ballet Suite No 2 of Gluck, arranged by Mottil, and followed by three selections by Wagner. These will include the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," "A Siegfried Idyl" and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The complete program follows:—

Ballet Suite No 2 .... Gluck-Mottil
In three movements
"Le Sacre du Printemps" ...... Stravinsky
1. The Adoration of the Earth: Introduction; Harbingers of Spring; Dance of the Adolescents; Abduction; Spring Rounds; Games of the Rival Cities; The Procession of the Wise Men; Adoration of the Earth (the Wise man); Dance of the Earth.
11. The Sacrifice: Introduction; Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents; Glorification of the Chosen One; Evocation of the Ancestors; Ritual of the Ancestors; the Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

Intermission

"Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," Wagner
"A Siegfried Idyl" .... Wagner
"Overture to "Tannhaeuser" ...... Wagner

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

FEB 25 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY TUESDAY NIGHT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Will Conduct Program in John Morton Greene Hall

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give the sixth concert in the Smith college concert series on Tuesday evening, Feb. 28, at 8 o'clock in John Morton Greene hall. The program follows.

Ballet Suite, No. 2 Gluck-Mott
Le Sacre du Printemps (The Rite of Spring Stravinsky
A Picture of Pagan Russia
1. The Adoration of the Earth
Introduction — Harbingers of Spring, Dance of the Adolescents, Abduction, Spring Rounds, Games of the Rival Cities, The Procession of the Wise Men, The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise Man), Dance of the Earth
2. The Sacrifice
Introduction, Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents, Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors, Ritual of the Ancestors, The Sacrifical Dance of the Chosen One
Forest Murmurs from Siegfried Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl Wagner
Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg Wagner

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

FEB 22 1933

-:- MUSIC -:-

MOZART, BEETHOVEN, WAGNER

Dr. Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra~~ at the Albee Theatre last night through as emotionally varied a programme as has been heard here for a very long time. Beginning with the well-known "Eine Kleine Nachtmusic" (for strings only) with its typical Mozartian delicacy and charm, he ended with the even better known "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner with its tonal burden of sin, repentance and miraculous deliverance. In between he gave us Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony," a creation out of many contrasted moods, the lovely "Forest Murmurs" from Wagner's "Siegfried" and the majestic "Funeral Music" from the same work.

Thus, the conductor provided a most difficult test for himself and his players. In the opening number the strings were fascinating, so lovely was their tone, clear in phrasing and intriguingly Mozartian in interpretation. When Dr. Koussevitzky chooses to be the virtuoso, no one can be more truly so—and this was a real achievement in virtuosity. But—and here's the rub!—the virtuosity was thus so well-established that not until well into the second movement of the "Seventh Symphony" was it laid aside. We have heard Dr. Koussevitzky play the "Seventh" more than a few times, and we have heard him play it better than he played it last night—from our point of view. For we prefer a broader and stronger interpretation of it than he gave us while in this mood of virtuosity. But if he failed to rouse us as much as usual emotionally, he did delight us mentally. He seemed to be giving his men, too, a sense of a new adventure, though not to be always quite sure of getting from them just what he wanted. But it was all admirable to watch as another illustration of what a man may do who is a master of his craft as well as of his art.

The "Forest Murmurs" was played as beautifully as we have ever heard it played; it is one of those compositions which, though "programme music," reveal what a great master of "absolute music" the irrepressible Richard also was. For it is not in the least necessary to know that this music portrays the fascination of the forest in order to enjoy it. By any other name, or by no name, it would sound as sweet.

So, too, with the great "Funeral Music." To anyone who has seen and heard "Siegfried" it remains, of course, imperishably linked with that masterpiece. Yet it might just as well have been called the "Death of a Hero" or it might have been called simply "tone poem" and it would have been just convincing. The essence of it is unmistakably heroic tragedy and it burst on us again last night with all its grandeur of feeling and its magnificence of phrasing, seeming to create almost before our eyes a mystical bridge between mortal life and spiritual immortality.

CHRONOS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

FEB 28 1933

Boston Symphony at Smith Tonight

Prof. Welch Will Discuss Program at Lecture This Afternoon.

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 28 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will give the sixth concert in the Smith College concert series this evening at 8 o'clock in John M. Greene Hall.

The program will be discussed late this afternoon in Sage Hall auditorium, by Prof. Roy D. Welch of the department of music. He will be assisted by Leland Hall, and Miss Doris Silbert, who will give piano arrangements of some of the numbers especially "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Stravinsky, which will be played in Northampton for the first time tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

FEB 26 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Fourth Concert at Academy of Music on Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will give the fourth concert of the season on Friday evening under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the citizens committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman. The concert will be given in the opera house of the Academy of Music.

The vice chairmen of the committee are Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Frederick T. Aldridge, Dr. Joseph D. Allen, Juan A Almirall, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Jr., Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Dr. William B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, William M. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. George W. Chauncey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Judge James C. Cropsey, former Justice Norman S. Dike, the Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy DuVal, S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, W. Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback, Dr. Alexander C. Howe, William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, James H. Jourdan, Charles D. Lay.

Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall, W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter Jr., H. Stavely Sammond, Mrs. Henry Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Miss Marion J. Terry, William Armour Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B Whitney, Eugene A. Widman, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Surrogate George A. Wingate, Cornelius D. Wood and Mrs. William H. Ziegler.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

FEB 27 1933

Koussevitzky Thursday

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard Here in Next to Final of Its Series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth visit to New York—and its last but one of the season—and give concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At the evening concert Serge Koussevitsky will perform Gluck's Ballet Suite No. 2, arranged by Felix Mottl; Schumann's Symphony No. 1, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," a picture of Pagan Russia.

At the Saturday afternoon concert Dr. Koussevitzky will will give for the first time in New York Louis Gruenberg's symphony, which recently had its first public performance in Boston by his orchestra. Gruenberg, the composer of the opera, "Emperor Jones," is also known by his "Enchanted Isle" and his jazz suite, both of which have been played here by the Boston Symphony. Gruenberg's symphony, written some time ago, has been revised by the composer.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for string orchestra, and close with two Wagnerian exerpts, "A Siegfried Idyl" and Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

FEB 26 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will pay its fourth New York visit of the season this week, playing on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and on Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The feature of Thursday's program will be Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring), subtitled "A Picture of Pagan Russia." This work, which still ranks as one of the important musical achievements of this century, was first performed as a ballet by the Diaghileff company in Paris in 1913. It took nine years to reach this country, where it was first played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski in 1922. New York had to wait until early in 1924, when it was performed by the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux, who repeated it later that season.

In all, "Le Sacre" has been heard here thus far seventeen times. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony gave it here on January 1, 1925; the Philharmonic, under Wilhelm Furtwaengler, followed suit on January 22 and 23. In 1926, Eugene Goossens con-

Symphony will be played instead of the ducted the New York Symphony in this extraordinary work on January 7, 8 and 10; Willem van Hoogstraten ventured to offer it to a Stadium audience on July 26. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony repeated it on January 6, 1927; Mr. Monteux conducted it with the Philadelphia Orchestra on April 17, 1928.

In 1930, Mr. Stokowski conducted it here six times: in ballet form on April 22 and 23 at the Metropolitan, in performances given by his own orchestra in conjunction with the League of Composers, and on December 4, 5, 6 and 7 as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony.

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce here the first symphony of Louis Gruenberg, composer of "The Emperor Jones." This was originally composed in 1919, but quite widely revised in 1929, when various portions were newly orchestrated and a new third movement substituted for a previous Passacaglia. The symphony was first performed in Boston on February 10 and 11 of this year.

"Although classical in form," wrote Mr. Gruenberg for Philip Hale's program notes, "an attempt was made nevertheless to mold logically the entire work into more of a homogeneous whole than is usually the case in the classical symphony — by utilizing themes from the first movement into the second, themes from the first and second movements into the third, finally combining them all in the fourth. This seemed an improvement on the four unrelated compositions usually comprising a classical symphony.

"However, form can only be a fragment for a work of art, material matter alone being of enduring value."

The Boston Symphony has played two other works by Mr. Gruenberg here: "The Enchanted Isle" on November 23, 1929, and the "Jazz Suite" on March 6 and 8, 1930. The former work was also played by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Erich Kleiber in October, 1930.

Mr. Koussevitzky is offering his Brooklyn listeners a conservative program, in which Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the Glazounoff concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

FEB 28 1933

AGAIN, why the dearth of good Saturday night programs? True we have the Boston Symphony and WHAM will ~~have its own~~ high-grade offering next Saturday, but, generally, on the whole they are rather sorry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 26 1933

Boston Symphony To End Concert List

Serge Koussevitzky To Lead Celebrated Organization In Closing Event Of Brilliant Season Here Wednesday

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes here next Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert wlil commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that taxes every available seat in the spacious Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the musical occasion that is annually the climax of this city's artistic schedule.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements —an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo—last only about 12 minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony in F major, which will naturally find favor with all music-lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. This will be done in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occured last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of the world, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city gave two special programs. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure", A Siefried Idyl, and the Overture to "Rienzi."

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most ambitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera, there was presented in order Josef Hofman, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest locally in fine musical events assures New Haven of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 28 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WOOLSEY TOMORROW

Presenting one of the finest programs ever arranged for this city, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, the occasion bringing to a brilliant climax the Woolsey Hall Concert Series of 1932-33. With a roster of 110 men, among them some of the finest musicians in this country, the orchestra will appear here in its full strength, and will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the famed Russian conductor, who has brought the organization to its highest point of achievement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and the usual audiences that fill Woolsey Hall to the doors when the Boston Symphony plays here will be in evidence.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the famous score that is a serenade for string orchestra. Its four movements take but 12 minutes, thus giving it the title of a symphony in miniature. The program continues with the Brahms Third Symphony in F major, which, as rendered by the Boston Orchestra, will be one of the most impressive symphonies ever performed here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

FEB 28 1933

Smith College

Boston Symphony at Smith Tonight

Prof. Welch Will Discuss Program at Lecture This Afternoon.

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 27 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will give the sixth concert in the Smith College concert series Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in John M. Greene Hall.

The program will be discussed at 4 o'clock that afternoon in Sage Hall auditorium, by Prof. Roy D. Welch of the department of music. He will be assisted by Leland Hall, and Miss Doris Silbert, who will give piano arrangements of some of the numbers especially "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Stravinsky, which will be played in Northampton for the first time Tuesday night.

The lecture will be open to the public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

FEB 26 1933

The Boston Symphony Plays Today

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the fourth concert of the season on Friday evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Citizens' Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Those sponsoring this concert are: Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Hon. Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. E. Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Frederick T. Aldridge, Dr. Jos. D. Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr., Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D., Hon. William M. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. George W. Chauncey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs Frederick L. Cranford, Hon. James C. Cropsey, Hon. Norman S. Dike, Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy Du Val, S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback, Dr. Alexander C. Howe, William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, James H. Jourdan, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Hon. George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall, W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr., H. Stavely Sammond, Mrs. Henry Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Miss Marion J. Terry, William Armour Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. P. Whitney, Eugene A. Widmann, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Hon. George A. Wingate, Cornelius D. Wood, Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

FEB 27 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW HAVEN WEDNESDAY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to the Elm City Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the huge Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven Wednesday night.

Particular interest will be assured.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik". This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements — an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo —last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony in M major, which will naturally find favor with all music-lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure", A Siegfried Idyl, and the overture to "Rienzi".

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most abitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera, there was presented in order Josef Hofman, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest in the New Haven musical events assures that city of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

FEB 27 1933

Boston Symphony In New Haven, March 1

DR. GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Kousevitzy, visits New Haven Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the spacious Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony F major. The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurred last week. The numbers are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure." A Siegfried Idyl, and the Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 27 1933

WOOLSEY HALL

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WEDNESDAY.

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to the Elm City, Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men compromise the great organization and the full personnel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the spacious Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey hall, New Haven, Wednesday night.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachmusik." This famous score is a serenade for string orchestras. Since its four movements—an Allegro. Romance, Minuet and Rondo—last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms' Third Symphony in F major, which will naturally find favor with all music lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. This will be done in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurred last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of the world, and the Boston Symphony orchestra in its own city gave two special programs. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure," a Siegfried Idyl, and the overture to "Rienzi."

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most ambitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey hall concert series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan opera, there was presented in order Josef Hofmann, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest in the New Haven musical events assures that city of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

[illegible]28 1933

Boston Symphony Tomorrow Night

Presenting one of the finest programs ever arranged for this city, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall tomorrow evening, the occasion bringing to a brilliant climax the Woolsey hall concert series of 1932-33. With a roster of one hundred an dten men, among them some of the finest musicians in this country, the orchestra will appear here in its full strength, and will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the famed Russian conductor who has brought the organization to its highest point of achievement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and the usual audience that fills Woolsey hall to the doors when the Boston Symphony plays here will be in evidence.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Keine Nachtmusik," the famous score that is a serenade for string orchestra. Its four movements take but twelve minutes, thus giving it the title of a symphony in miniature. The program continues with the Brahms most third Symphony in F major, which, as rendered by the Boston orchestra, will be one of the impressive symphonies ever performed here.

Richard Wagner's music will occupy the last half of the program, this being done in honor of the 50th aniversary of Wagner's death, which is being given recognition the world over. The numbers to be heard are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure," A Siegfried Idyl and the overature to "Rienzi," thus rounding out a musical program such as New Haven has not heard in many a day.

Many Music Lovers At Boston Symphony

Norwood [illegible]

A compilation of the records at Symphony hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to the finest music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular subscribers to Boston symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday and Tuesday afternoon series:

Dedham

Mrs. Cranford R. Brown; Miss E. Marguerite Allen; Miss Frances M. Baaer; Miss Margaret M. Bayne; Arthur T. Bent; Mrs. Rebecca C. Birdsall; Mrs. Morgan Butler; Francis S. Cobb; Miss Mary Cole; Miss Eliza N. Converse; Miss Mary E. Cormerais; Mrs. R. M. Currier; Mrs. John Cutter; George W. Ellis; Mrs. Emile H. Erhard; Samuel C. Endicott; Miss Lucy E. Fisher; Miss Isabel C. French; Mrs B. Nason Hamlin; Miss Carrie F. Hill; Mrs. J. Philip Hartt; Mrs. James R. Hooper, Jr.; Miss Edith Loring; Miss Marion B. Loring; Miss Alice F. Marsh; Theodore T. Marsh; Mrs. R. P. K. Neff; Mrs. Wm. G. Nickerson; Mrs. Rober. L. O'Brien; Mrs. Frederick P. Royce; Miss Sibyl E. Rolland; Mrs. Edmund J. Shattuck, Jr.; Mrs. Leslie Soule; Miss Edith Thurlow; Mrs. Winthrop H. Wade; Miss Margaret Warren; Mrs. Alvan F. Worthington; Miss Julia H. Worthington.

Norwood

Charles H. Brown; Mrs. Harry F. Allen; Mrs. Lyman F. Bigelow; Mrs. Charles Caverly; Mrs. Harold W. Gay; Mrs. Louis C. Marshall; Miss Maud A. Shattuck; Mrs. Clara B. Walker; William T. Whedon.

Westwood

Mrs. Ernest J. Baker; F. S. Converse; Mrs. Edwin S. Dodge; Miss Susan D. Ellis; Mrs. Eldon MacLeod; Mrs. James H. Perkins, Jr.

Beverly Times

Feb 28

SYMPHONY CONCERTS ARE ATTRACTIVE

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to the finest music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The great Orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the Orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular subscribers from Beverly and vicinity to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Beverly—Mrs. George L. Batchelder, Mrs. Edgar A. Emons, Mrs. Arthur A. Forness, Mrs. Peer P. Johnson, Mrs. Herbert W. Kenway, Miss Eleanor B. Kilham, Mrs. Ralph F. Knight, Miss Louise Porter, Mrs. Jasper R. Pope, Miss Edith Rantoul, Miss Harriet C. Rantoul, Mrs. Guy C. Richards, Miss Bertha F. Rogers, Mrs. Clinton B. Tooley, Mrs. E. Lawrence White.

Topsfield—Mrs. George F. Dow, Miss Katherine S. Choate.

Manchester—Miss E. E. Saunders.

Ipswich—Mrs. Edward Morrill, Miss Alice M. Smith, Miss Lucy B. Story, Mrs. Langdon Warner.

Danvers—Mrs. Guy M. Whipple, Mrs. Charles F. Whitney.

South Hamilton—Scott D. Libby, Mrs. C. P. Woodbury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

FEB 26 1933

The Boston Symphony Plays Today

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give the fourth concert of the season on Friday evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Citizens' Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Those sponsoring this concert are: Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Hon. Frederick E. Crane, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. H. E. Dreier, Mrs. William H. Good, Frederick T. Aldridge, Dr. Jos. D. Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr., Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D., Hon. William M. Calder, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. George W. Chauncey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Hon. James C. Cropsey, Hon. Norman S. Dike, Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Guy Du Val, S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Theodore L. Frothingham, Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback, Dr. Alexander C. Howe, William T. Hunter, Darwin R. James, Dr. William A. Jewett, James H. Jourdan, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Hon. George V. McLaughlin, Mrs. William W. Marshall, W. S. Morton Mead, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, James H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr., H. Stavely Sammond, Mrs. Henry Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Miss Marion J. Terry, William Armour Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. P. Whitney, Eugene A. Widmann, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Hon. George A. Wingate, Cornelius D. Wood, Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

Beverly Times

Feb 28

SYMPHONY CONCERTS ARE ATTRACTIVE

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to the finest music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The great Orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the Orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular subscribers from Beverly and vicinity to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Beverly—Mrs. George L. Batchelder, Mrs. Edgar A. Emons, Mrs. Arthur A. Forness, Mrs. Peer P. Johnson, Mrs. Herbert W. Kenway, Miss Eleanor B. Kilham, Mrs. Ralph F. Knight, Miss Louise Porter, Mrs. Jasper R. Pope, Miss Edith Rantoul, Miss Harriet C. Rantoul, Mrs. Guy C. Richards, Miss Bertha F. Rogers, Mrs. Clinton B. Tooley, Mrs. E. Lawrence White.

Topsfield—Mrs. George F. Dow, Miss Katherine S. Choate.

Manchester—Miss E. E. Saunders.

Ipswich—Mrs. Edward Morrill, Miss Alice M. Smith, Miss Lucy B. Story, Mrs. Langdon Warner.

Danvers—Mrs. Guy M. Whipple, Mrs. Charles F. Whitney.

South Hamilton—Scott D. Libby, Mrs. C. P. Woodbury.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

FEB 27 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW HAVEN WEDNESDAY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to the Elm City Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the huge Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven Wednesday night.

Particular interest will be assured.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik". This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements — an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo —last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony in M major, which will naturally find favor with all music-lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure", A Siegfried Idyl, and the overture to "Rienzi".

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most abitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera; there was presented in order Josef Hofman, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest in the New Haven musical events assures that city of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

FEB 27 1933

Boston Symphony In New Haven, March 1

DR. GEORGE KOUSSEVITZKY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, visits New Haven Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the spacious Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony F major. The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurr'd last week. The numbers are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure." A Siegfried Idyl, and the Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANSONIA, CONN.
SENTINEL

FEB 27 1933

WOOLSEY HALL

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA WEDNESDAY.

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to the Elm City, Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men compromise the great organization and the full personnel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the spacious Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey hall, New Haven, Wednesday night.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachmusik." This famous score is a serenade for string orchestras. Since its four movements—an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo—last only about twelve minutes. it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms' Third Symphony in F major, which will naturally find favor with all music lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. This will be done in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurred last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of the world, and the Boston Symphony orchestra in its own city gave two special programs. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure," a Siegfried Idyl, and the overture to "Rienzi."

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most ambitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey hall concert series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan opera, there was presented in order Josef Hofmann, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest in the New Haven musical events assures that city of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

FEB 28 1933

Boston Symphony Tomorrow Night

Presenting one of the finest programs ever arranged for this city, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Woolsey hall tomorrow evening, the occasion bringing to a brilliant climax the Woolsey hall concert series of 1932-33. With a roster of one hundred an dten men, among them some of the finest musicians in this country, the orchestra will appear here in its full strength, and will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the famed Russian conductor who has brought the organization to its highest point of achievement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and the usual audience that fills Woolsey hall to the doors when the Boston Symphony plays here will be in evidence.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Keine Nachtmusik," the famous score that is a serenade for string orchestra. Its four movements take but twelve minutes, thus giving it the title of a symphony in miniature. The program continues with the Brahms most third Symphony in F major, which, as rendered by the Boston orchestra, will be one of the impressive symphonies ever performed here.

Richard Wagner's music will occupy the last half of the program, this being done in honor of the 50th aniversary of Wagner's death, which is being given recognition the world over. The numbers to be heard are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure," A Siegfried Idyl and the overature to "Rienzi," thus rounding out a musical program such as New Haven has not heard in many a day.

Many Music Lovers At Boston Symphony

Norwood Messenger

A compilation of the records at Symphony hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to the finest music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular subscribers to Boston symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday and Tuesday afternoon series:

Dedham

Mrs. Cranford R. Brown; Miss E. Marguerite Allen; Miss Frances M. Baaer; Miss Margaret M. Bayne; Arthur T. Bent; Mrs. Rebecca C. Birdsall; Mrs. Morgan Butler; Francis S. Cobb; Miss Mary Cole; Miss Eliza N. Converse; Miss Mary E. Cormerais; Mrs. R. M. Currier; Mrs. John Cutter; George W. Ellis; Mrs. Emile H. Erhard; Samuel C. Endicott; Miss Lucy E. Fisher; Miss Isabel C. French; Mrs B. Nason Hamlin; Miss Carrie F. Hill; Mrs. J. Philip Hartt; Mrs. James R. Hooper, Jr.; Miss Edith Loring; Miss Marion B. Loring; Miss Alice F. Marsh; Theodore T. Marsh; Mrs. R. P. K. Neff; Mrs. Wm. G. Nickerson; Mrs. Robert L. O'Brien; Mrs. Frederick P. Royce; Miss Sibyl E. Rolland; Mrs. Edmund J. Shattuck, Jr.; Mrs. Leslie Soule; Miss Edith Thurlow; Mrs. Winthrop H. Wade; Miss Margaret Warren; Mrs. Alvan F. Worthington; Miss Julia H. Worthington.

Norwood

Charles H. Brown; Mrs. Harry F. Allen; Mrs. Lyman F. Bigelow; Mrs. Charles Caverly; Mrs. Harold W. Gay; Mrs. Louis C. Marshall; Miss Maud A. Shattuck; Mrs. Clara B. Walker; William T. Whedon.

Westwood

Mrs. Ernest J. Baker; F. S. Converse; Mrs. Edwin S. Dodge; Miss Susan D. Ellis; Mrs. Eldon MacLeod; Mrs. James H. Perkins, Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
FEB 27 1933

Dr. Serge Koresswitzky Who Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra At Woolsey Hall Wednesday Night

In The Local Theatres

Boston Symphony Here Wednesday

As the concluding event of this season's Woolsey Hall Concert Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance here on Wednesday evening at 8:30. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed Russian leader of the great organization, will conduct, and the orchestra's full personnel of one hundred and ten men will participate.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik". This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements—an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo—last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a Symphony in miniature.

The Symphony of the evening will be the third of Brahms in F major, one of the finest works of the great composer, the one hundredth anniversary of whose birth the musical world is recognizing this year.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. This will be done in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurred last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of America and Europe, and the Boston Symphony in its own city gave two special performances. The numbers to be herd here are "The Ride of the Valkaries", from "Die Walkure", a Silegfried Idyl, and the Overture to "Rienzi".

The Woolsey Hall Series that the Boston Symphony concludes has been the most brilliant ever presented in New Haven. Opening last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera, there followed in order Josef Hofmann, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano: Yehundi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Plans for next season's series are still far from complete at this early date, but the fine audiences that have attended the present series gives ample assurance to the management that the finest concert artists will receive generous support in New Haven. Thus the 1933-34 schedule when announced is expected to be fully as attractive as this season's list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
FEB 27 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW HAVEN WEDNESDAY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to the Elm City Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the huge Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven Wednesday night.

Particular interest will be assured.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik". This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements — an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo —last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony in M major, which will naturally find favor with all music-lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure", A Siegfried Idyl, and the overture to "Rienzi".

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most abitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera, there was presented in order Josef Hofman, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest in the New Haven musical events assures that city of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
FEB 28 1933

LOCAL PEOPLE AT CONCERTS

Many Regularly Attend Programs of Boston Symphony

A compilation of the records at Symphony hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. Boston is accessible by motor and rail, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to music that so many Greater Boston people attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended the concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

Among the regular subscribers to the Boston concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series are the following from:

Quincy—Mrs. R. J. Allen, Reginald H. Crowley, Mrs. W. H. Doyle, Mrs. H. F. Barry, Miss Rose E. Drake, Henry M. Faxon, Thomas Fenno, Miss Mary A. Geary, Mrs. A. R. Moulton, Miss Joy L. Nevins, Miss Edith Remick, Mrs. Joseph N. Smith, Mrs. F. N. Terhune, Horatio B. Tower, Miss Lena E. Tufts, and Miss Alice L. Tuttle.

Wollaston—Rev. William B. Ayers, A. B. Chamberlain, Miss Eleanor Horton, and Arthur C. Sprague.

South Weymouth—Mrs. Charles G. Bascom, Newton G. Loud, Frank E. Loud, and Miss Sarah B. Tirrell.

Hingham—Mrs. Dudley M. Baker, Miss Emily F. Blaney, Miss Abby A. Bradley, Mrs. W. Roger Blowers, Mrs. S. M. Harrison, Mrs. G. H. Hartwell, Mrs. Francis Hastings, Bradley Hill, Mrs. A. T. Dyer, Mrs. Gordon P. Marshall, Mrs. T. S. Murfitt, Mrs. John A. Peterson, Miss Molly Pitcher, Mrs. Harold S. Ross, Mrs. F. Morton Smith, Mrs. F. R. Thomas, Mrs. Edward F. Wilder, Mrs. R. H. Wright, Miss Sibyl N. Yarniss, and Miss Violet Osborn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
FEB 27 1933

Dr. Serge Koresswitzky Who Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra At Woolsey Hall Wednesday Night

In The Local Theatres

Boston Symphony Here Wednesday

As the concluding event of this season's Woolsey Hall Concert Series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance here on Wednesday evening at 8:30. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed Russian leader of the great organization, will conduct, and the orchestra's full personnel of one hundred and ten men will participate.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik". This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements—an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo—last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a Symphony in miniature.

The Symphony of the evening will be the third of Brahms in F major, one of the finest works of the great composer, the one hundredth anniversary of whose birth the musical world is recognizing this year.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. This will be done in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurred last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of America and Europe, and the Boston Symphony in its own city gave two special performances. The numbers to be herd here are "The Ride of the Valkaries", from "Die Walkure", a Siiegfried Idyl, and the Overture to "Rienzi".

The Woolsey Hall Series that the Boston Symphony concludes has been the most brilliant ever presented in New Haven. Opening last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera, there followed in order Josef Hofmann, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano: Yehundi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Plans for next season's series are still far from complete at this early date, but the fine audiences that have attended the present series gives ample assurance to the management that the finest concert artists will receive generous support in New Haven. Thus the 1933-34 schedule when announced is expected to be fully as attractive as this season's list.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD
FEB 27 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NEW HAVEN WEDNESDAY

As the concluding event of the finest series of Woolsey Hall concerts in New Haven's musical history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, comes to the Elm City Wednesday evening. One hundred and ten men comprise the great organization, and the full personel of the orchestra will participate in the forthcoming engagement. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as has been the case in recent years an audience that fills every seat in the huge Yale University auditorium will be in attendance for the occasion that is annually the climax of New Haven's musical schedule.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven Wednesday night.

Particular interest will be assured.

Particular interest will be aroused this season by the brilliant program that the orchestra is to present. The opening selection will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik". This famous score is a serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements — an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo —last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The second number will be the Brahms Third Symphony in M major, which will naturally find favor with all music-lovers.

The second half of the program will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner. The numbers to be heard in New Haven are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure", A Siegfried Idyl, and the overture to "Rienzi".

The concert by the Boston Symphony on Wednesday brings to a close the most abitious musical schedule ever arranged by Manager Daggett M. Lee of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Commencing last November with a recital by Lucrezia Bori of the Metropolitan Opera, there was presented in order Josef Hofman, pianist, Lily Pons, soprano, Yehudi Menuhin, boy violinist, and Tito Schipa, tenor. Although next season's plans are far from completion at this early date, the great interest in the New Haven musical events assures that city of another brilliant series when the schedule for 1933-34 is arranged.

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
FEB 28 1933

LOCAL PEOPLE AT CONCERTS

Many Regularly Attend Programs of Boston Symphony

A compilation of the records at Symphony hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston. Boston is accessible by motor and rail, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to music that so many Greater Boston people attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended the concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

Among the regular subscribers to the Boston concerts, either in the Friday ~~afternoon or Saturday~~ evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series are the following from:

Quincy—Mrs. R. J. Allen, Reginald H. Crowley, Mrs. W. H. Doyle, Mrs. H. F. Barry, Miss Rose E. Drake, Henry M. Faxon, Thomas Fenno, Miss Mary A. Geary, Mrs. A. R. Moulton, Miss Joy L. Nevins, Miss Edith Remick, Mrs. Joseph N. Smith, Mrs. F. N. Terhune, Horatio B. Tower, Miss Lena E. Tufts, and Miss Alice L. Tuttle.

Wollaston—Rev. William B. Ayers, A. B. Chamberlain, Miss Eleanor Horton, and Arthur C. Sprague.

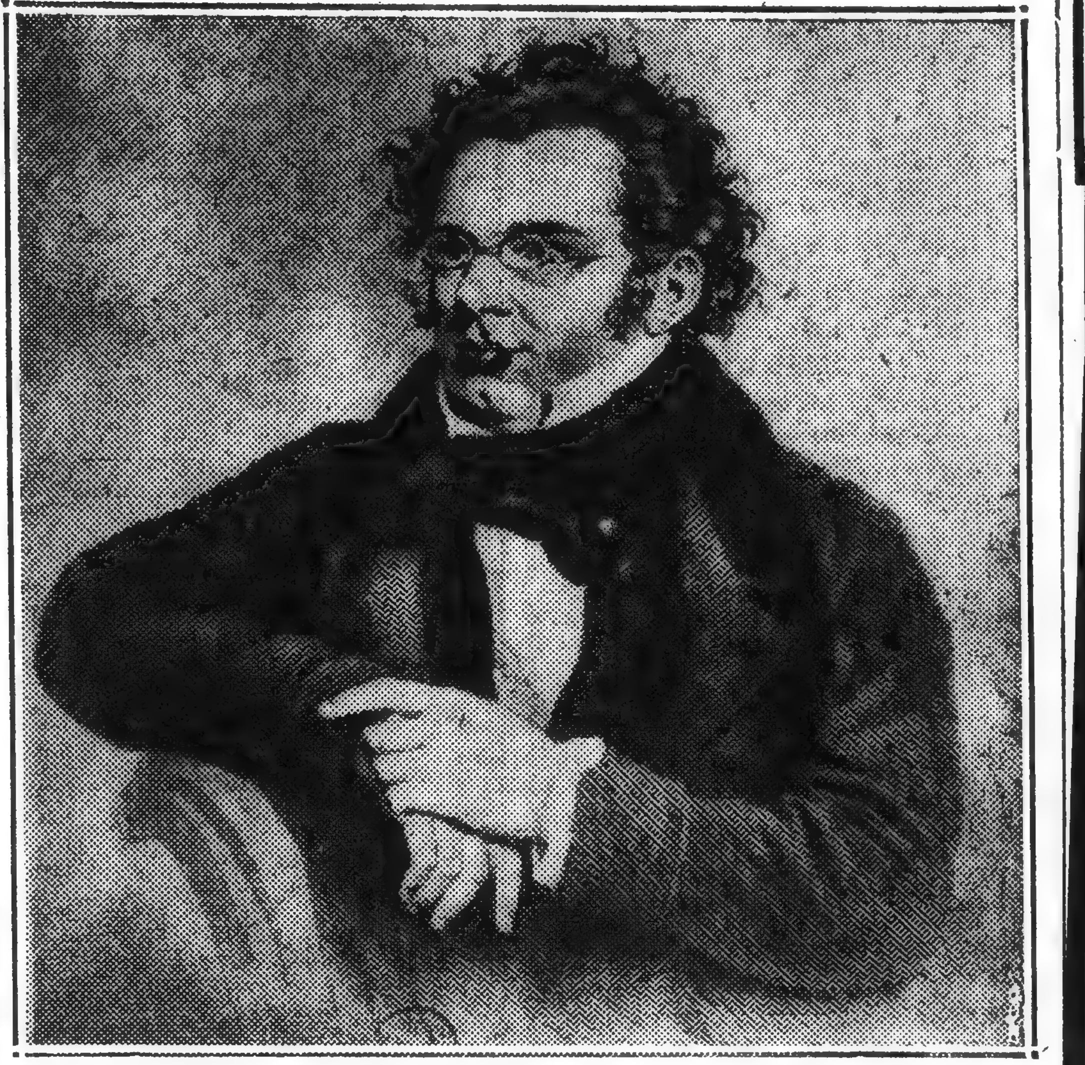
South Weymouth—Mrs. Charles G. Bascom, Newton G. Loud, Frank E. Loud, and Miss Sarah B. Tirrell.

Hingham—Mrs. Dudley M. Baker, Miss Emily F. Blaney, Miss Abby A. Bradley, Mrs. W. Roger Blowers, Mrs. S. M. Harrison, Mrs. G. H. Hartwell, Mrs. Francis Hastings, Bradley Hill, Mrs. A. T. Dyer, Mrs. Gordon P. Marshall, Mrs. T. S. Murfitt, Mrs. John A. Peterson, Miss Molly Pitcher, Mrs. Harold S. Ross, Mrs. F. Morton Smith, Mrs. F. R. Thomas, Mrs. Edward F. Wilder, Mrs. R. H. Wright, Miss Sibyl N. Yarniss, and Miss Violet Osborn.

BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1,

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Schubert's Basil Plant



HE WAS STARVED OUT AT THE AGE OF THIRTY-ONE

A CRUEL fairy story of an affectionate little boy who was kicked, cuffed, beaten and starved to death by people who, after he was dead, found that he was rich and had left them a great fortune, would be the life-history of Franz Schubert. It would be short. He was only 31 years old when he was starved out. It would also be busy. In 18 years he had produced nearly one thousand works.

His musical gift remains one of the enigmas of that solemn miracle which we call the creative faculty. Here that much-misused word, "genius," is for once truly applicable. It was genius, pure and simple. His people were mediocre; father, a parish schoolmaster; mother, a cook. His schooling was sketchy, and in truth his work suffers from want of early intellectual discipline, thus answering the question whether even genius itself can afford to disdain schoolmasters. It cannot.

Violin and piano he was taught by his father; his early teachers of composition he soon outstripped, and at the mature age of 11 he began composing. In that year he was sent to a Court school as chorister. He was first violinist before he was 12, and on visits home the family played string quartets composed by young Franz. At 17 he became a schoolmaster, and yet in his 18th year two symphonies, 146 songs and a mass of other music had poured out of him into ink and paper in the mere intervals of his school drudgery.

Such an insatiable desire to compose has not been seen before or since. Schumann, his successor as a song writer, said, "He could have set a placard to music." To free this pen from school-teaching, a friend allowed him to share his lodgings and must also have paid for his food, for he was too poor to buy the paper on which he wrote music which the world now treasures, music which publishers would not as yet buy, and for which they never paid more than beggarly pittances, though fortunes have been made from it since. It is no use blaming the publishers. Schubert was obscure; the work was so novel and so startling that it took even musicians a long time to accustom themselves to its style. This is the price an innovator pays. Schubert said himself: "My musical works are the product of my genius and my misery, and what the public most relish is what has given me the greatest distress." There is a melody in one of his Impromptus which exactly fits the words:

> My talent is my basil plant,
> I water it with tears . . .

In order to sustain the torrent of creative energy which roared through his brain and heart and out at his fingers incessantly, he needed to be well-fed, well-housed, well-clothed, well-friended, well-wived and well taken care of; and of course he was none of these. It was nobody's business. He would burn on his own fuel and then go out.

Meanwhile, the wistful youth adored Beethoven from afar off, dining in the same restaurant and eyeing him with awe. Finally they met, and Beethoven's honest efforts to be affable were those of a grizzly to a collie pup. He frightened the puppy half out of his wits. But the grizzly knew his successor when he saw his music. Twice Schubert visited Beethoven as that old Prometheus lay chained to his deathbed reading a volume of Schubert's songs and acknowledging their author as a true possessor of the Promethean fire. At Beethoven's funeral he was torch-bearer, and after it was over, stopping at a tavern with three friends, he drank two glasses of wine, one to the memory of Beethoven, the other to the first of those present who should follow him. That first was to be himself.

His privations killed him. Utter poverty, a steady succession of rebuffs, and the distress of coming to realize that no exertion could improve his condition, in the end dragged him down. Enfeebled by undernourishment and overwork, an attack of typhus made an end of him. In his fever delirium he said to his brother:

"I implore you to put me in my own room, and not leave me in this corner under the earth. Don't I deserve a place above ground?"

"You are in your own room, dear Franz, and lying on your own bed."

"No, that is not true; Beethoven is not here."

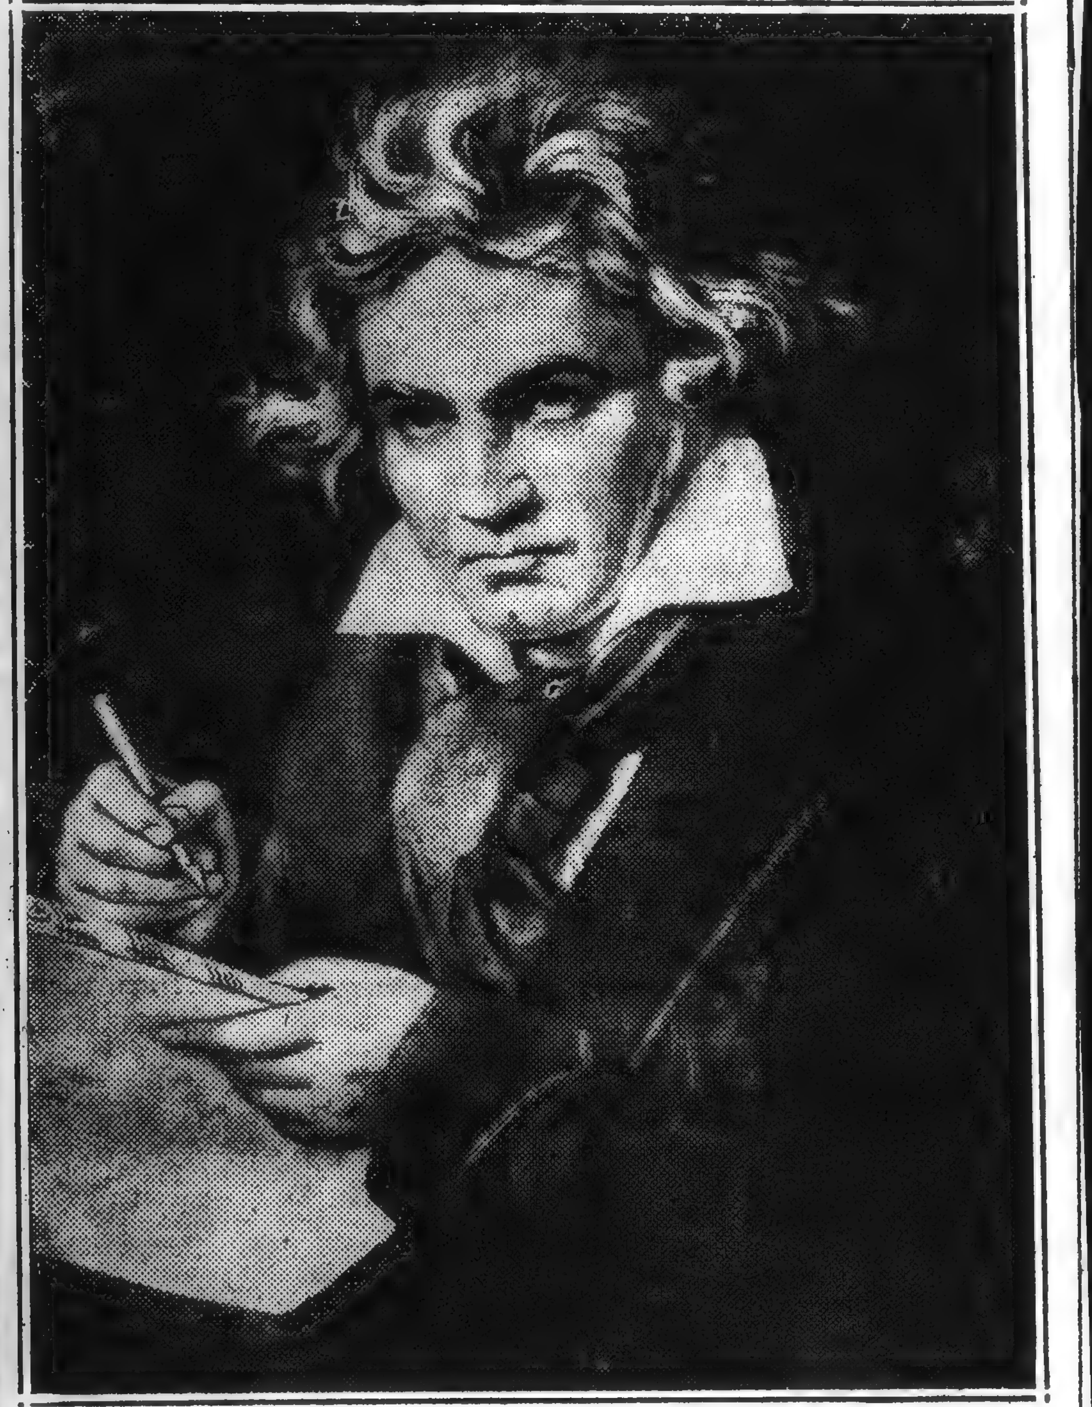
Beethoven was not far off. For those were almost his last words. Two days later he was buried close to Beethoven, as had been his wish. The personal belongings left by him were valued at $10. There was also a heap of "old music" valued at about $2.50. It was really a gold mine.

Ten years later Robert Schumann, visiting Vienna, found it in the possession of Schubert's brother Ferdinand. His eagle eye detected its worth and he drew masterpiece after masterpiece out of it and volleyed them to the publishers. . . .

But have a care, Robert Schumann, and make haste with your own music. For your turn is coming. You will be next in this grisly procession of "mighty poets in their misery dead." L. P.

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

How Beethoven Wrote



"HIS IDEAS CAME BEST IN THE OPEN AIR"

AS a youth he formed the note book habit. These note books went everywhere with him, even to his bedside at night, and he jokingly quoted a verse from Schiller's play "The Maid of Orleans," in which Joan says, "I dare go nowhere without my banner." Beethoven's banners were 200 pages thick, with 16 staves to a page.

His ideas came best in the open air from direct communion with nature. Summers and Autumns in the country he would be up at 5:30, working at his writing-table till breakfast at 7:30, then out roaming the fields, singing, roaring, humming, gesticulating and scribbling. He might be back for dinner at noon, and work in his room until 3, then into the fields again until sunset; supper at 7:30 and to bed at 10. Thus he composed "on the hoof," and "In his music," (as Rolland once remarked), "everything marches!" Yet his oratorio "Christ on the Mount of Olives" was sketched sitting in the fork of a favorite lime-tree in the Schoenbrunn gardens.

These note books contained matter for 50 symphonies though he lived to complete but nine. His practise was to develop three or four compositions concurrently: "I cannot nail my mind to one subject of contemplation, and it is by nourishing two trains of ideas that I can bring one into order." He sketched, resketched, erased and rewrote. "Vide" meant "This might do"; "meilleur" meant "This would be better" It would seem that there was hardly a bar of his music but was rewritten, often as many as a dozen times and sometimes eighteen or more. His ideas in their original forms may be so mediocre that were they not in his handwriting it would be difficult to believe that they were Beethoven's. It is in the 12th, or 18th attempt that he gives his phrase the turn which makes it music that he and he only could have written. Thus the idea often comes as the reward of effort. Themes lay in his note books for years before being rummaged out for use, but once created he never forgot anything.

Winters, back in his lodgings in Vienna, his forenoons went to completing at pianoforte and writing-table the compositions conceived out-of-doors and noted in sketchbooks. If interrupted he was bearish. Dinner—if he thought of it—came at noon, then his daily walk in all weathers round the city. When absorbed in his musical thoughts he was insensible to sun, to rain, to meals, to discomfort, or to the neglect of servants. He was careful to keep his mind fertilized with reading, and read only the best.

Masterpieces seldom pay their own way. The patient care which elaborates a work to perfection is not commercially profitable. Even were publishers minded to pay for it, the question remains whether they could afford to. Yet it is just this deliberate painstaking which makes the work fine art and causes it to live. The craftsman must decide whether his work is worth doing well for its own sake, for there is no money in perfection, not even a living. That must usually be earned in some other way, and the leisure thus won employed to lavish labor on work for which little or no pay can be expected. Even when it is finished the public must be educated to like it, a proceeding which takes years. Half a century after the composer is dead he is acclaimed a master and his works immortal. Thus Beethoven's music came not only out of his head and heart: it also came out of his hide. He could have dashed off salable trifles, "Bagatelles" as he called them, and sometimes had to for need, but never without groaning. Not one of his major works but should be considered a free gift to his fellowmen, purchased at his own expense. For no one compels an artist to rewrite a passage a dozen times until it is as finished as he can make it—no one excepting his own artistic conscience. He fights his battles in silence and solitude, and whether he has lost or won there is little knowing and less certainty until long after he is dead. These are the austerities of the creative spirit. Let him enter here who can.

Near the close of his life Beethoven said,

"It seems to me that I have just begun to compose." L. P.

181

March 1933

out of town concerts and notices

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAR 1 - 1933

"Le Sacre du Printemps" Played at Smith by Boston Orchestra

Dr. Koussevitzky Gives Exciting Rendition of Stravinsky's Pagan Music, Following with Three Wagner Works in Interesting Comparison.

By WILLARD M. CLARK

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 28 — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided a daring and interesting program for their annual appearance in the Smith College concert course tonight in John M. Greene Hall. It was daring to put Gluck and Stravinsky side by side and to follow Stravinsky with Wagner. Interest was intense because, for the first time at the college, "Le Sacre du Printemps" or "The Rite of Spring" by Stravinsky was heard. If our information is correct, last night was the first time the work had been played in the State outside of Boston.

So eager was the audience to hear this work that the charming "Ballet Suite No. 2," by Gluck," as arranged by Felix Mottl, received less than usual attention. This is a charming suite of dances from "Alceste," "Iphigenia in Aulis," and "Paris and Helen." It was delightfully played with that luscious beauty of tone so peculiar to the Boston orchestra. Delightful was the stately minuet, the pert march from "Alceste" and the final wild measures of the Slave Dance.

The audience tonight behaved far better than the audience that first heard the Stravinsky ballet in Paris on May 19, 1913, when hisses and howls took the place of applause. It is interesting to note that when the first concert version of the work was played in Paris the following year it was greeted with applause. Tonight's audience was wildly enthusiastic, although some of the more elderly members blocked their ears or laughed a bit hysterically.

To hear this as absolute music is quite a different thing from hearing it in conjunction with the ballet. This work, one of the most conspicuous of the modern school, has stirred violent controversy. Since the war many musicians have agreed that in this work Stravinsky reaches the goal for which Wagner worked. In it he has overthrown and disregarded the old harmony, he has given us new kinds of melody and invoked rhythms unknown to the classic school or to writers of the 19th Century.

The music has certain outstanding characteristics. It is the pagan music of a Northern country, quite different from that of other primitives, the African, for example. In it there is no trace of joyousness for the Spring festival in Russia 1000 years ago was no occasion for rejoicing. Rather, it was a gloomy period, wholly unjoyous. Perhaps the fact that under the pagan ritual, all knew that the most beautiful girl must be sacrificed had something to do with this and perhaps that is the reason the music is often forlorn and hopeless.

From the first phrases of the symphonic introduction one feels a restless, never-ending urge in the music; onward and onward it goes, cruel and barbarous in its intensity. Its short, monotonous motifs, its lack of definite melody, its continual dissonance are qualities most apparent in the work, qualities which, in toto, cause the somber orchestral coloring which gradually enthralls the senses until one is lost completely in the music. Insistent rhythms almost pull one from one's chair.

The first part of the work consists of a series of antique festival dances and games. There is no dramatic sequence in the work. The second part of the work is ritual from the start; ritual which comes to climax in the chosen maiden's horrid dance of death as a living sacrifice.

The orchestra played the work superbly, but in its readings we missed the crudeness and the vigor of enunciation we had expected. It seemed a bit refined; polished rather than rough; of this century rather than of 1000 years ago.

Anyone who wondered what people mean when they mention Stravinsky and Wagner in the same breath may have been answered tonight as the orchestra played the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siefried" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." It may be that had Wagner lived he would have found the new tonalities of Stravinsky admirably suited to create his tremendous impressions. He might have found in the wavering, vague dissonances of the introduction to the second part of "Le Sacre du Printemps" just the chords he wanted for the murmuring woods in "Siegfried." Certainly Wagner would have joyed in the fury of the "Games of Rival Cities" just as he joyed in his own prelude to "The Mastersingers.." In addition, the orchestra played "A Siegfried Idyl" with exquisite beauty of tone and simplicity of style.

The next concert will be given by Yehudi Menuhin on March 15 and the course will close May 6 with the usual concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1933

MANY DISTRICT MUSIC LOVERS AT CONCERTS

A survey of the concert records at Symphony hall, Boston, show that many local and district people are regular attendants at programs given there.

The orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised ~~to new~~ heights in this its 52d season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony hall, the orchestra's own auditorium. The following are regular subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Brockton—Miss Elva R. Boyden, William B. Chapman, Mrs. James B. Fraser, Miss Lillian Gray, Mrs. Joseph Hewett, Miss Laura B. Kenney, George Knight, I. S. Kibrick, Miss Gerda Nelson, Miss Ruth E. Norris, Donald Richman, Miss Marion S. Reynolds, Miss Alice M. Riley.

Campello—Mrs. Eldon B. Keith, Miss Lillian D. Leach, Mrs. Frank E. Packard.

North Easton—Mrs. Hobart Ames, Mrs. John S. Ames, Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham, Miss Mary L. Lamprey.

Bridgewater—Mrs. H. K. Aldrich, Miss Eusebia Burrill, Miss Lois L. Decker, Joseph Machin, Miss Freida Rand.

Middleboro—Miss Helen F. Archer, Morris C. Hastings.

Whitman—William G. Kirby.

Holbrook—William C. Sprague.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAR 1 - 1933

Praise for Miss Heathcock.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, naturally come in for less attention from the critics than the regular programs in Symphony hall. The Boston Transcript, however, follows them up and A. H. M. of its musical staff had the following to say of Miss Gladys F. Heathcock's playing of the Liszt Concerto in E-flat major last Thursday evening:

"The performance of Liszt's concerto at the hands of Miss Heathcock deserves only praise. If the brilliant passage work of the concerto came with less hard surfaces than it sometimes has had from the hands of some Lisztian Valkyr, the concerto was propably the gainer thereby. And its melodies were played with due expressiveness which avoided the beckoning pitfall of undue sentimentality. Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment was entirely at one with the soloist. Not the least of its qualities is to be found in the fact that he did not allow the orchestral part of the concerto to overshadow the soloist."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN REMARKABLE CONCERT

Stravinsky's Ballet, "Le Sacre du Printemps," Is Highlight of Evening

Tuesday evening in John M. Greene hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky gave us the sixth concert of the Smith college concert course. Between a group of pieces by Gluck, who taught Marie Antoinette music before she became queen of France, and one by Wagner, as big a man in German music as Bismarck in the German state, they played Stravinsky's ballet, Le sacre du printemps. When, with the dance, this music was first performed, way back in 1913 in Paris, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who later became leader of the Boston orchestra, it stirred up a violent protest. The mightier passions of the war buried it for four years and more; but, these being somewhat allayed, it came again before the public, a monumental work of incalculable significance. It was the big piece of modern music. In the light of musical development subsequent to the war, of Stravinsky's own development, many musicians now consider it old-fashioned; but for the world at large it is still modern enough. At the first performances in America not so many years ago, the die-hards massed in phalanx and left the hall with moral indignation. Only last week the dean of American critics found news in the behavior of the Boston audience when it was played there on Friday. The behavior of the audience was commendable; only a few left the hall. Here we had it Tuesday evening plump in the middle of a conventional program; the audience not only sat through it, but rewarded it and the master musicians who played it with long continued and enthusiastic applause.

Perhaps not very many liked it. It is not music that one especially likes. There are few pages in the score of beauty—unfortunate, indefinable word that has become a stumbling block. But it is grandly sincere, an honest work from start to finish and far above trickery of any sort; it is bursting with prodigious vitality. And it is complete, it is a whole; neither the imagination which conceived it nor the skill which fixed it on paper flagged at any moment. Every moment of it is firm. Presumably, the better one knows it the more exciting it is in the hearing; and presumably for a large part of the audience Tuesday evening Le Sacre was not new. There are many sets of phonograph records of it, only last Saturday it was broadcast from Boston over the country. Unless the technical difficulties of performance, which for both leader and men are enormous, stand in the way, it will probably be played more and more often in the concert hall for several years to come. Grim and joyless in the main, it nevertheless packs, as the saying goes, a stupendous wallop; and as a feat of expression, as a recreation of certain moods which are fundamental in the northern races, it is likely to remain unmatched. Mr. Koussevitzky's command over the music and over his men was magnificent, and the men played with a virtuosity and a fire that were irresistible.

L. H.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES
MAR 1 - 1933

A radio fan says he tuned in the Boston Symphony last Saturday while they were playing a selection by STRAVINSKY and that he worked for hours trying to find out what was wrong with his set.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
MAR 1 - 1933

Boston Symphony At Woolsey Hall This Evening, 8:30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert in Woolsey hall tonight, the event bringing to a fine climax the Woolsey hall concert series for the season of 1932-33. As usual, a tremendous audience will gather in the spacious Yale University auditorium for the occasion, for the coming of the Boston Symphony is always the outstanding event of New Haven's musical schedule. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who, since 1924, has been such a dominating figure in the world of music since he took over the leadership of the Boston orchestra in 1924, will conduct, and the full personnel of 110 men who comprise the organization will participate. The concert will commence at 8:30.

The opening number will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the famous serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements, an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo, last only about 12 minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The Third Symphony of Brahms in F major will be the second selection and will complete the first half of the program.

The second half will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, in commemmoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death, which occurred last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of the world, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city gave two special programs. The numbers to be heard tonight are "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure", a Siegfried Idyl and the Overture to "Rienzi."

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, WHO CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL TONIGHT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 1 - 1933

Serge ~~Kossevitsky~~, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WOOLSEY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert in Woolsey Hall tonight, the event bringing to a fine climax the Woolsey Hall Concert Series for the season of 1932-33. As usual a tremendous audience will gather in the spacious Yale University auditorium for the occasion, for the coming of the Boston Symphony is always the outstanding event of New Haven's musical schedule. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who since 1924 ha~~s been such a~~ dominating figure in the world of music since he took over the leadership of the Boston Orchestra in 1924, will conduct, and the full personnel of one hundred and ten men who comprise the organization will participate. The concert will commence at 8:30.

The opening number will be Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the famous serenade for string orchestra. Since its four movements, an Allegro, Romance, Minuet and Rondo, last only about twelve minutes, it has been called a symphony in miniature.

The Third Symphony of Brahms in F major will be the second selection and will complete the first half of the program.

The second half will be devoted to excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death which occurred last week. The occasion has been observed in many parts of the world, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city gave two special programs. The numbers to be heard tonight are "The Ride of the Valkries" from "Die Walkure," a Siegfred Idyl and the Overture to "Rienzi."

THIS CLIPPING FROM HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 1 - 1933

News Notes

From Germany comes the report of Italian opera, which states that during the year ending July, 1932, Verdi operas led those of Wagner in number of performances in that country. The score follows: Verdi, 1420; Wagner, 1385; Puccini, 793, and Mozart, 732. Warren Storey Smith, music critic of the Boston Post, wonders "whether the total number of performance in this country last year of operas by all composers of all lands would approach the German total for Verdi or for Wagner alone—or would pass that of Puccini."

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ will give the first performance of Edward Burlingame Hill's new Symphony No. 3, at the March 10 and 11 concerts of the orchestra in Boston Symphony hall. This symphony by Mr. Hill, resident Boston composer, will take but 11 minutes for performance. Another work of Boston origin on the program of these concerts will be Arthur Foote's "Night Piece" for flute and string orchestra, which has been heard before.

"The Fire Chiefs," a march composed by William H. Woodin, secretary of the treasury in the Roosevelt cabinet, was a feature of the musical program at the Boston Garden, Feb. 27, when the Boston fire department ball was held.

E. B. F.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 2 - 1933

Brilliant Presentation By Boston Symphony Ends Concert Series at Yale

The concert course conducted under the aegis of the Yale School of Music at New Haven was brought to a close brilliantly last night with a presentation of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Woolsey hall was completely filled by an audience that numbered among it many people from Waterbury and environs and a large group of Westover school students. The famous New England orchestra was in a skill of execution that one may venture to note it has not surpassed in the 52 years of its existence. Conductor Koussevitzky is one enrapt in his art, an earnest hard-working artist who never consciously affects any exhibitionism. The more one sees of him, the more one admires, since it is through the interpretation of a well-rehearsed body of splendid musicians that he makes his appeal.

The program gave not only a variety that set forth the orchestra in all its versality, but built to a climax of exaltationl such as sends a concert audience on its way in a thrill of rejoicing at having been present. Mozart, Brahms and Wagner were the composers chosen, the opening being with the serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" by Mozart. This and the symphony No. 3 in F major by Brahms which followed it were rendered in full appreciation of their comparative smallness, delicacy of musical structure, inherent beauty and fine texture in comparison with Wagner's overwhelmingly powerful "Ride of the Valkyries" and the overture to "Rienzi" through which the climax was attained. Between these two latter was played "A Siegfried Idyl," affording a quieter enjoyment and relief from the assaulting sensations of the master composer.

In consideration of these great composers whose music so grandly rendered brought such appreciative enjoyment last night, one might pause to wonder just why theirs should have been the golden age of music creation and why Germany should have been its center. As for Wagner, he has scarcely departed form among us. We are minded that his wife, Cosimo, daughter of Liszt. died only a year or two ago and within a day or two appeared the news that rumor in Germany has it that his daughter-in-law may be soon married to Hitler, revolutionist leader. Wagner himself in consequence of taking part in a revolution that then tore Germany, in 1849, was forced to flee to Zurich where he long lived in exile. Revolution is still with Germany but no composing that may be set beside Wagner's can bear the brilliant light of comparison. As late as 1868 there was no theater in Germany large enough adequately to present the Wagner Nibelungtetralogy, yet in spite of surrounding difficulties, even the rejection of the opera, "Rienzi", when in 1839 he first would have it considered in Paris, he continued great creation. Today we have the monumental theater structures of Radio city but no master creating immortal works for presentation there.

The madness of genius is in the "Ride of the Valkyries". It has more than mere roar of musical crashing that lifts the hearer in imagination to the howl of the furies in the storm sweeping over mountain crags. It is the very spirit of wildness expressed in storm beyond the ken of mortals. It transports far above human things in a sublimation that leaves small fears behind and glories in the unbridled horrors of the speeding wind and thrashing storm in the night blackness. Wagner's amazing use of discords hurled to create emotional and physical sensations but in such composition control that it all becomes smoothly melodic, seizes the sensitive listener to this creation.

At the close of this piece, it appeared that anything that might follow must be anti-climax. The overture to "Rienzi" did not prove so. On the contrary, while within the realm of sanity rather than madness, it lifted its hearers to a plane even above "Die Walkure" and made a fitting ending to a brilliant evening of music.

E. R. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

MAR 2 - 1933

Musical Moments

* * *

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra played ~~more superbly~~ last night than in many recent appearances here, must have been the opinion of all those who packed Woolsey hall to hear its annual performance. This orchestra, considered by many the "first" among orchestras, is expected to give sterling performances, but not necessarily to excell itself. Certainly last night it rose to the topmost peaks, especially in the Brahms Third.

The program opened with Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, serenade for string orchestra. This proved to be delightful, crystal clear, eighteenth-century music, and played with a delicacy and charm that was entrancing. It was then fitting and proper for such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony to observe the fifty and hundred year anniversaries of Wagner and Brahms by devoting the remainder of the program to works by these great composers.

Dr. Koussevitsky was particularly ~~fortunate in his choice~~ of Brahms Third Symphony, for he revealed such a deep understanding and appreciation of the work. He seemed to give everything he could in his interpretation of it. The result was a great performance. It was in this symphony that Brahms appeared to be striving beyond human limitations. This is immediately apparent in the note of aspiration sounded in the first theme. All the dignity of noble purpose seems written there. And the feeling carried through the contemplative Andante into the graceful allegretto of the third movement, finally giving the impression of accomplishment in the final Allegro when at the end the first theme reappears. It is a forceful and, as it is often called, an heroic symphony. The performance of it was unusually fine. In a word, it was an inspiration.

Three Wagner works were included: the Rideof the Valkyries, the Siegfried Idyl, the Overture to Rienzi. The spirited performance of the Valkyries ride brought Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra tremendous applause while that of the Idyl moved the audience profoundly. The deep, personal feeling that was written into this work is always appealing. When played with lyric grace and insight, it is a thing of great beauty. The Overture, though it begins well, is theatrical. It is stolid German music with due respect to the brass instruments. Of course, the orchestra did it magnificently.

True enough, therewas a time when Brahms and Wagner on the same program would have been heresy. But time has wrought the great conciliation. That Brahms won the highest honors last night in receiving the finest performance is almost beyond question. But the whole concert was exceptionally fine and great was the applause at the end.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony again brings to a close the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Considering the difficulties confronted this year, it has been quite successful. To enlarge the course and increase the price was a daring undertaking for Daggett Lee, the series manager. That he assembled a notable array of artists and pleased his subscribers should call forth much praise.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

AR 2 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRINGS CLOSE TO WOOLSEY SERIES

The sixth and last concert of the Woolsey Hall Series, a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place last night, before an audience that crowded the hall to its doors and applauded with as much if not more gusto than any previous audience this year. The following program was heard: Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, Serenade for String Orchestra (Mozart); Symphony No. 3 (Brahms); Ride of the Valkyries (Wagner); A Siegfried Idyl (Wagner); Overture to Rienzi (Wagner.)

The gentle, naive, and happy music of Mozart's, has found, through th eyears, perhaps as many shadings and conceptions of interpretation as there are conductors to interpret it. Written in 1791, this little piece of evening music is highly romantic—in fact, energetically romantic; and Dr. Koussevitzky happily kept it so. He gained delightful effects in the final movement by keeping a straight unswerging rhythm. It is, after all such simple music that the tendency is to personalize and insert unwritten inuendoes—this Dr. Koussevitzky did not do, but preserved the quaint effect of straightforward and unbroken beat through the melody and its repetitions. It was a delicate performance, par excellence, and gave more than a hint of that control of his orchestra that Dr. Koussevitzky showed more impressively in the Brahms Symphony

This symphony, whcih was both hissed and applauded when first played in 1883, contains in its four movements all the elements of Brahs several characetristic styles. Beginning passionately, with full scoring, it moves into the second theme, one of grace. Its third movement makes it difficult to believe that Brahms had not some Russian blod in him, for it is such a poignant though not unhappy character. Perhaps Koussevitzky has a touch of Brahms within him, for the seeming union of national characteristics in this movement is uncanny. It cannot be denied that this symphony has some dull moments, from its wealth of beauty, from a listener's point of view, and that the andante was played last night at a very slow tempo, but the superb hold that these musicians have on their parts, the intensity of their ensemble, and at time their breath-taking liquidness of tone, more than fulfilled Winter-long anticipation of this concert. The ability to strike deeply is given to few orchestras in the world—and this one is certainly one of those. One cannot, on th enegative side, enumerae the falts they do not fall into, by way of praise, and words fail to convey that finely sensitive emotional core of meaning that they do inspire in the listener. Technical analyses can render only a part of this impression, emotional analyses become personal.

The Valkyries was given a brilliant martial performance. Dr. Koussevitzky was only beginning to work in well-known climactic fashion. The Seigfried Idyl, one of the most beautiful things Wagner ever wrote, was played with incomparable beauty and tying-in of its somewhat diffuse themes. It is in the Idyl that one recognizes one's other Wagnerian friends, even to the ghost of Tristan. The Rienzi Overture, with its tIalian opera love of noise and bombast, was played with eclat. How much mere noise, drum rolls and cymbals do move an audience! Our evolution has not yet denied us our concealed love of volume for its own sake. It was a fitting close to the season's program which has been under the direction of Daggett M. Lee.

YALONDE GILBERT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagl

AR 2 - 1933

CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussewitsky, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRITTAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAR 2 - 1933

HARMONY RUCTIONS

When the Boston Orchestra goes to our neighboring city of Hartford it is said that the gentlemen running the Bushnell Memorial are deeply concerned about the programs and do not allow anything too ear-piercing and ultra-modern to smite the aural sensations of the audience. But when Serge Koussevitsky goes to Northampton and has Smith college students in his audience nothing much matters. So at a concert there the other night he let fly with Stavinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." What the intelligentsia of the world is coming to can be noted from the words of one newspaper reviewer: The audience "was wildly enthusiastic, although some of the more elderly members blocked their ears or laughed a bit hysterically." Several years ago, when this great modern opus was started in Carnegie Hall, New York, more than 500 people walked out of the place, leaving about 2,000 who remained to go crazy. Now we find that the Smith college girls went "wildly enthusiastic." Some day the same thing may happen in Hartford, but the furthest the orchestra conductors have been allowed to proceed within the classic corridors of Bushnell has encompassed Ravel and perhaps DeFalla. They are still afraid of the bad boys of modern music, probably mistaking them for reds. There may be a change in about 20 years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 2 - 1933

Boston Symphony Changes Its Brooklyn Program

The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences announces that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its fourth Philharmonic concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music tomorrow evening will play Glazounoff's concerto for violin with orchestra, op. 82, instead of the Mozart concerto for violin as announced. Richard Burgin will be the violin soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 3 - 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY DOES IGOR STRAVINSKY'S 'RITE OF SPRING'

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

For its fourth evening concert at Carnegie Hall this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, visited our demesne last evening in a program consisting of the Ballet Suite, No. 2, by Gluck-Mottl; Schumann's first symphony, in B flat, and Igar Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" (Rite of Spring).

Delicate, beautifully-toned, atmospheric playing was done by the Bostonians in the Gluck excerpts that constituted the opening number. The same euphony, but with richer tints and more emotional revealment, appropriately marked the Schumann symphony, one of the loveliest examples from the most fruitful period of the romantic era in music. These pages have lost none of their fragrance or sparkle, despite the cynical opinion of the Leftest Wing, which would catalogue Schumann as the apostle of sentimentality and an incompetent in the art of orchestration.

Koussevitzky treated the work with affection, tenderness and buoyancy without mushiness or dragging tempos, and the result was a reading that won enthusiastic response from the listeners.

Stravinsky's ponderous piece, an apotheosized exercise in rhythm, no longer causes heated discussion in our musical camps, as it did when the opus was first heard here in 1925, although in its original ballet form it had its Paris premiere in 1913. Twenty years old! Quite a patriarch in the repertoire, as the modernistic calendar goes.

In all, "Le Sacre du Printemps" regaled us seventeen times in New York. Other conductors who took a whack at it —more or less literally—besides Koussevitzky, were Furtwaengler, Goossens, Monteux, Stokowski. Some auditors remained consistently cold to the "Sacre," others listened in neutral wonder; a few turned their eyes skyward and called it Stravinsky's masterpiece.

Koussevitzky did his best last evening to make the huge score assume storied interest, and emphasized its energy, stark power and the thin episodes of lyricism widely dispersed. The orchestra performed superbly. The audience applauded the conductor's propulsiveness and the virtuoso achievement of his players. It is doubtful whether any listener was touched as deeply as by the almost 100-year-old symphony by Schumann, first heard in New York eight years ago. What will have become of "Le Sacre du Printempts" eighty years from now?

* * *

Mrs. Hull's Latest

FINEST MUSIC ATTRACTS MANY PATRONS HERE

They Attend Regularly Boston Symphony Concerts

NOW IN 52D YEAR

Regular Subscribers in Several Towns of the the Vicinity

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall. Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of true devotion to music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturady evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Framingham — Frederick W. Archibald, Mrs. Reginald W. Bird, Miss Helen Bourgain. Mrs. Alberta K. Bowers, Miss Eveline Coolidge, Alden W. Cummings, Mrs. Chas. A. Esty, Charles S. French. Franklin W. Ganse, Mrs. Reginald Jenney, Mrs. Edith N. Greene. Mrs. T. B. Lathrop, Paul B. LeBaron, Mrs. Edwin L. Phipps, Miss Alice M. Ritz, Mrs. H. R. Scott. Mrs. G. C. Scott, Mrs. Alfred B. Rich, Mrs. A. D. K. Shurtleff, Miss Clara L. Willis, Miss Miriam Van Waters.

Hudson—Mrs. George F. Babbitt, Mrs. Ralph Gilroy, Miss Mellicent T. Wheeler.

Ashland—Ray D. Farnsworth.

Milford—Miss Pearl Rose, Miss Alma E. Sweet, Mrs. Shelby D. Vincent Alexander diGiannantonio, P. L. Walker.

Holliston—Miss Dorothy W. Hawes.

Cochituate—Mrs. Ethel L. Gifford.

Natick—Miss Helen Amendola, Miss M. F. Burleigh, Mrs. Basil E. Meymaris, Mrs. Royal W. Tyler, Walnut Hill School. Miss Ellen H. Bartlett, Miss Edna M. Follensby, Miss Mary E. O'Connor.

Charles River—Mrs. C. H. W. Foster, Mrs. F. L. W. Richardson.

Dover—Benjamin Brewster, Mrs. Robert E. Gregg, Charles Jackson, Mrs. Duncan, Jenkins, Mrs. W. T. Porter. Lucian B. Taylor; Miss Dorothy M. Stevens.

Southboro—Harry Burnett, Mrs. James Marr, Mrs. Hollis S. French. Mrs. Frances Parkman, St. Mark's School.

Medfield—Miss Louise Brennan. Mrs. Pliny Jewell. Mrs. C. M. Loeffler, Miss Jessie G. Morse.

Millis—Mrs. Basil Gavin, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. W. A. Washburn.

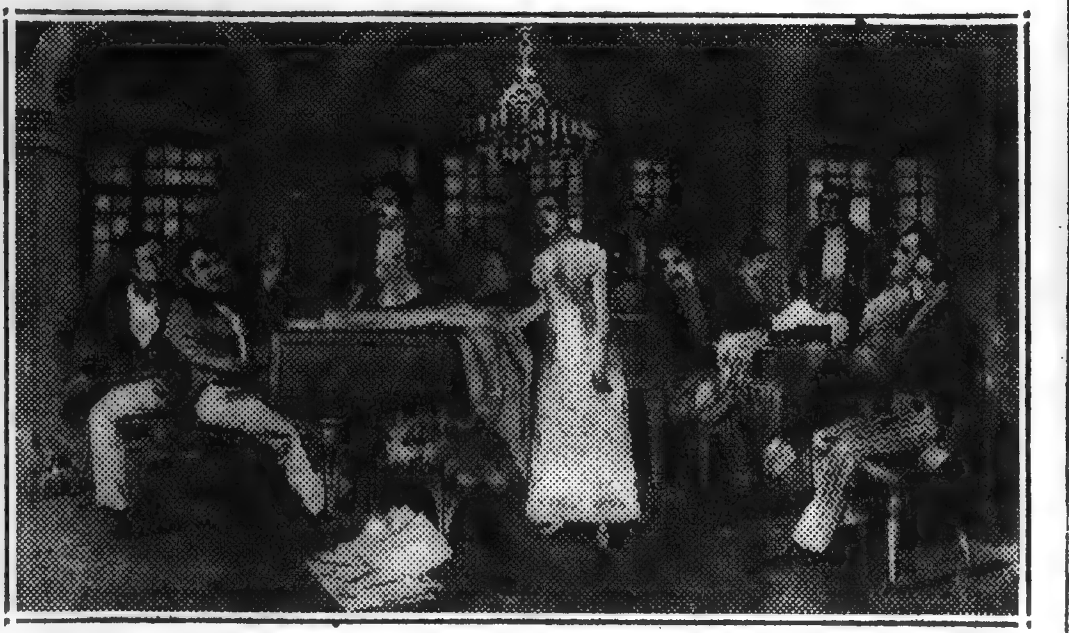
Sherborn—Mrs. George Lewis, Jr., Mrs. Wm. B. Rogers, Mrs. Richard Saltonstall.

Marlboro—Miss Bridget A. Hurley.

BOSTON GLOBE—THURSDAY, MARCH 2,

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Schubert's Mysterious Familiar



MUSIC USED HIM AS HER OUIJA BOARD
Schubert Playing to His Friends
(Courtesy of J. B. Millet, "Famous Composers and Their Works")

WHEN a Christian enters a Mohammedan mosque — supposing that he is permitted to enter at all—he is required to remove his shoes . . . "For the place whereon thou standest is holy." The gift of creating is a sanctuary, and into whatsoever life it is pleased to enter we are required, when dealing with it, to slip off our feet our street shoes of social snobbery and class pride; for no irony is more withering than the spectacle of the snob patronizing the man of talent.

Franz Schubert, whom God, or Nature, or the Spirit—or what you will—endowed with a mysterious familiar, a faculty capable of creating music, was in person short, plump, near-sighted, pasty-complexioned and of utterly undistinguished appearance save that, like Beethoven, his eyes were preternaturally brilliant. Ill at ease with the Viennese aristocracy, he preferred the society of servants and musicians (they were rated virtually the same) into which it pleased Nature that he be born. "Socially," therefore, Franz Schubert was, as the English say, "impossible—quite!" Let an Englishman write about him even today and you are almost certain to be told so before he has finished. But you can be told the same in books about Schubert written by good Bostonians. So slowly do we learn to mind our manners in the presence of our betters.

How did this creative faculty of Schubert work? To speak quite seriously, God only knows. The man's mind started directly he woke, and he even slept in his spectacles to save himself time and bother. Sometimes he wrote in bed. Musical ideas would visit him while he was tying his shoes. From attacks of this composing frenzy he was never safe. One might seize him late in the afternoon and keep him writing till evening without a thought of dinner. Normally, however, he began working early in the morning and continued until luncheon at 2 in the afternoon. Then came walks in the country, visits, chat with companions at a coffee house, and evenings of making music. Once he had completed a piece and heard it performed, he shut it in a drawer and seldom thought of it again. His sole interest in it appears to have been the act of creating and possibly hearing what he had created. These done, oblivion washed clean the slate of his mind and allowed him to start afresh. Some of his finest works he never heard performed at all. Once he said of a song, "I say! the song's good. Whose is it?" It was his own. He had forgotten it in two weeks. This sponging of the mental slate for fresh writing would appear to be a property of fertile minds. Goethe had it, and actors tell me that they can forget disused parts completely.

I am telling an immoral story, for it might lead one to suppose that excellence can be attained without effort; but woe to the average mortal who tries it! Schubert was a species of human ouija-board. His Symphony in C-Major, composed in the last year of his life, 1828, was written (so the manuscript shows) as fast as pen could travel. He could sustain a conversation, not only while writing his music, but also while actually inventing it. Here were none of the labor-pains of a Beethoven, "no sketches, no delay, no anxious period of preparation, no revision." When he composed a song "he had but to read the poem, to surrender himself to the torrent, and put down what was given him to say." His friend Vogl, the opera singer, called his songs, "these utterances of a musical clairvoyance." An acquaintance walked in on the composer in the act of writing his song to the words of Goethe's ballad, "The Erlking," the book propped open before him and he "hurling the notes on paper." There those notes gallop still, to the rhythm of the horse's hoofs, under the agonized cries of the dying child. That very evening the song was performed in private, but it was so startingly novel that no one knew what to make of it. And then, after having discovered a new world in dramatic song writing, Schubert's favorite comedy act was to play it on a comb! His music to Shakespeare's "Hark, hark, the lark!" had an even stranger origin. One afternoon at a beer garden he encountered an acquaintance who carried a volume of Shakespeare's lyrics. Schubert's eye lighted on this poem, and the music began to bubble. But he had no music paper. They ruled staves on the back of a bill of fare and he scribbled that celestial lyric, which shines with the morning sun and glistens with morning dews, at one of the tables amid the clatter and chatter of the beer garden.

In the presence of such marvels all we can do is lift our eyes and, like the pious Moslem, murmur, "Allah is great!" And still, "the lark at Heaven's gate sings." L. P.

133

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

MAR 3 - 1933

Music

Stravinsky's 'Le Sacre' Played By Boston Symphony

By Irving Weil

Serge Koussevitzky, bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall last night for its fourth Thursday visit of the season, once more put the local concertgoer into his debt by making him newly aware of the modernist Igor Stravinsky with a performance of what is probably his greatest work, "Le sacre du printemps," or "The Consecration of Spring."

Conductors hereabouts, one might suppose, were beginning to imagine that Stravinsky, after all, had been only a flash in the pan, simply because several of his latest efforts display indications of imaginative weakness. At any rate, they haven't been playing him any more, except those early works that are as harmless and as easy to listen to as Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Mr. Koussevitzky, one gathers, has decidedly his own opinion and knows when a revival of a great and revolutionary piece of music is about due. The last time "The Consecration of Spring"—or "The Rite of Spring, as you choose—was heard here three years ago, and Leopold Stokowski and his Philadelphians in conjunction with the League of Composers did it as a ballet that was badly mixed and pretty thoroughly manhandled. Later Mr. Stokowski conducted the Philharmonic as a guest director and presented it in its concert form, but he was not happy about it.

Riotous Premiere

So last night's revival was all to the good, in the first place because it eradicated a previously faulty presentation or worse, and secondly because it brought out, under Koussevitzky's penetrative knowledge of Stravinsky's aims and intent, just what the significance of the piece is.

Everyone by now, we suppose, knows that Stravinsky wrote the "Sacre" for Serge Diaghileff's famous Ballet Russe and that the whole thing, with the composer's help, was produced by the inimitable mime, Varslav Nijinsky (and we mean ininitable), and conducted by Pierre Monteux. Nijinsky, now for years confined to a sanatorium, was the principal dancer. That was 18 years ago in Paris and it made almost as much of a furore as Wagner did in his own day.

Stravinsky had then just passed 30. He turned loose on an amazed world—the phrase is not a bit too strong—a completely new sound from the modern orchestra. It was accomplished primarily by harmonic writing in several unrelated keys all at the same time.

Complex Rhythms

A second phase of Stravinsky's astonishing individuality in the "Sacre" is his invention and dazzlingly complex handling of rhythm. It bears out his subtitle of "A Picture of Pagan Russia." The music is about as objective as music can be.

It depicts the pagan Spring renewal as such things perhaps occurred in pre-Christian Russia and the music is as cruel and as brutal as the things themselves doubtless were.

The rest of Mr. Koussevitzky's evening had to do with the Mottl arrangement of a Gluck ballet suite and Schumann's B-flat symphony.

Music Today

Metropolitan Opera, "Lucia di Lammermoor," with Lili Pons, Giacomo Lauri-Volpi and Richard Bonelli, 8.30 p. m.

Philharmonic Orchestra, Arturo Toscanini conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2.30 p. m.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

MAR 3 - 1933

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra Here

Spring Themes of German and Russian Composers Featured at Concert

Heard at Carnegie Hall

Dances From Gluck Operas Precede Principal Works

Serge Koussevitzky, apparently bent on rushing the seasons, brought forward two works with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night, in which spring is tonally depicted: Schumann's first symphony in B flat and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." And how differently the crocuses and daffodils bloomed for the German and Russian composer! Schumann's vernal reactions may have been inspired by the perusal of Boettger's poem; but Stravinsky's seem to be a digest of Fraser's "Golden Bough" and Freud's "Totem and Tabu."

The contrast between German maidens cavorting in Dirndl costume and sentimental youths pouring out their tales of adoration in moonlit dells, as conceived by Schumann, with the violent, primitive and sensual gesticulations of Stravinsky's ballet, is in itself a lesson in musical history. But weak as the German master was in formal, architectural sense, indifferent as was his knowledge of the art of instrumentation, the sheer loveliness of much of this symphony will probably outlast the mere rhythmic impact and genial scoring of the Russian composer. For to tell the truth, the rhythms, once so startling, no longer startle and the musical skeleton that remains is not of bone, but of plaster.

The Schumann and Stravinsky works were preceded by Mottl's second arrangement of dance themes from Gluck operas. The magnificent orchestra played with its customary richness of tonal texture and Mr. Koussevitzky did not neglect to cross all the i's and t's in obtaining his effects.

J. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 3 - 1933

Koussevitzky Heralds Spring

He Offers Vernal Music by Schumann and Stravinsky in Boston Symphony Concert.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was a celebration of the vernal season, just a bit forehanded, but mindful of what is sure to come soon. "When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces," the month of March is the field of the chase.

And there are timid leaves even now on certain bushes in the Park near the famous Casino. Mr. Koussevitzky has not seen those leaves, but perhaps the infant frogs are piping on Boston Common. They do these things well over there, and are not to be terrified by mere snow. Mr. Koussevitzky gave spring music evening in a manner chronological and logical. After prefacing the pleasures of the season with Felix Mottl's second ballet suite from operas of Gluck, he conducted the B flat symphony of Schumann, which is also known as the "Spring" symphony.

The composition had been presented earlier in the season by Eugen Ormandy, directing the Philadelphia Orchestra, and later by Issay Dobrowen manhandling the Philharmonic Symphony. There is no need of comparisons, since neither Mr. Ormandy or Mr. Dobrowen is the court of last resort on Schumann's art. Mr. Koussevitzky is also free of suspicion. But his reading was refreshingly continent, respectful and clarifying. He was not in haste and will not have to repent at leisure. The first movement, so often rushed into a jumble, was played suavely, clearly, yet with abundant spirit. The slow movement was lyrically sung and the scherzo done with crispness, but without excess of either speed or accentuation. The finale had brilliancy without destructive conflagration. In short it was a delightful performance of a frequently overdone composition, beloved by many venerable music lovers.

The program was completed by Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." No one has to be told that, when it is spring in the heart of Stravinsky, it is not like spring in the young man's fancy of Schumann. There were riotous doings in Paris when this score was revealed. It seems they take their music very hard in France. There was a disturbance when Wagner's "Tannhæuser" was produced and another when Stravinsky's ballet was brought out. In this one thing Stravinsky stood side by side with Wagner, but in other respects he differed materially from him. There has been sufficient discussion of the "Rite of Spring." There are still many persons who dislike it. Two score or more walked out last night after the first section of the work. Others stayed to applaud long and vigorously.

The composition renewed its pristine splendors under the authoritative baton of Koussevitzky. If he does not know how this work should be conducted, no one does. He lived in the atmosphere in which it was created, breathed in the passions of its particular spring and saturated himself with the dews of Stravinsky's genius. Result, all the crass ineffectualities of the score were hidden and all the brutal force, the primitive emotion, the pagan blood and fire made to exercise their powerful spell. There is no denying the virility of this music. It is not beautiful, it is not elegant, it is not refined. It is just utterly unrestrained and unashamed. It is one of the few triumphant proclamations of the possibilities of the progressive type of music. When we heard it the last previous time, it seemed to have faded. Last night under the magic of Koussevitzky's recreation it had once against the stark and overmastering savagery it showed when we first heard it. The Boston musicians performed miracles of tone and technic in it and covered themselves with glory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

MAR 3 - 1933

Bostonians Hint at Spring

Koussevitzky's Musicians Present Seasonal Concert to Gratified Hearers at Carnegie Hall.

By PITTS SANBORN.

THAT excellent orchestra, the Boston Symphony, and its magnetic leader, Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated their March visit to Carnegie Hall last night by presenting a spring program. True, Gluck is not as a rule a seasonal composer, but the other composers listed were Schumann and Stravinsky, represented respectively by the B flat symphony, known also as the "Spring" symphony, and Stravinsky's "Consecration of Spring."

The Gluck of the evening consisted of the second ballet suite arranged by Felix Mottl, comprising a march from "Alceste," a minuet from "Iphigenia in Aulis," a grazioso from "Paris and Helen" and the slave dance from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

Schumann Works Again to Fore.

It is always a pleasure to listen to Gluck, especially since it is a number of years since any of his operas has been presented here.

The B flat symphony of Schumann might, however, be granted a period of repose. A few years ago the Schumann symphonies were in disfavor with conductors because of faulty orchestration. Now, on the other hand, they are very much to the fore again. The spring of the symphony in B flat is a pretty boisterous affair. We could get along without it for a while.

Lauri Volpi, who will sing at the Metropolitan tomorrow afternoon.

Score No Longer Exciting.

And how about Stravinsky's tone picture of spring rites in Pagan Russia? The writer has heard this music many times—as accompaniment to the stage performance in the days of the Diaghileff Ballets Russes and recently in a special presentation at the Metropolitan Opera House; also frequently as a concert piece. Of course it is more effective when associated with appropriate scenery, miming and dancing.

As a concert piece, this work has pretty much run its course. There is masterly orchestration, there are delightful bits of Russian folk tune, there is the primitive thumping of its pulse. Nevertheless the excitement that once was inherent in the score has calmed down. Nothing else disappears from music so quickly as the shock.

A very large audience applauded the program cordially.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

MAR 3 - 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Spring and the Bostonians.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 p. m. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting.

THE PROGRAM.

Ballet Suite No. 2..............Gluck
(Arranged by Felix Mottl)
Symphony No. 1 in B flat
(Opus 38) Schumann
"Le Sacre du Printemps"..Stravinsky

Spring peeped coyly into Carnegie Hall last night where the Boston band. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky enthroned, dispensed various strains in the vernal manner—beginning with the Schumann "Spring" symphony and ending quite properly, with "Le Sacre," which wasn't nearly as pagan as it should have been.

It is a lovely thing, this symphony of Schumann's—a golden, joyous, sunlit song, but I think Mr. Koussevitzky must have studied it in one of those Boston fogs, which are apt to discourage our most sanguine, although last night they were scarcely as concise as they have been in the past. The whole performance was conventional, adequate but hardly inspired, and marred occasionally by minor defects in phrasing and attack.

Schumann wrote his first two symphonies, in B flat and D mionr, in 1841, two years before he joined the faculty of the Leipsic Conservatory, founded by Mendelssohn. The opening theme, given to horns and trumpets, was written by Schumann on a portrait of himself he gave to Adolph Boettger, author of the poem which inspired the score. The symphony was first performed from manuscript at a concert given by Clara Schumann for the benefit of the Orchestra Pension Fund in the hall of the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, March 31, 1841.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

MAR 3 - 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky and His Bostonians Evoke the Spring in Terms of Schumann and the Stravinsky "Sacre"

STRAVINSKY and "Le Sacre du Printemps" are still with us. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, paying their fourth visit of the season to New York, gave us what the statisticians have informed us is Manhattan's eighteenth performance of this still astounding dithyramb; astounding, but for some of us increasingly labored in its pounding sonorities and dislocated rhythms. Leopold Stokowski has announced the nineteenth for the near future. Mr. Toscanini has not fallen in line, but it may not be totally irrelevant to note in this connection that his programs of week after next will include Mossoloff's "Iron Foundry."

"The Rites of Spring," to be sure, pertain to prehistoric man rather than to the machine age. But we have come to suspect there is considerably more of kinship between the primordial terrors of the Stravinsky jungle and the boiler-making of Mossoloff's machine shop, than the respective programmatic ideas of the two works well justifies. Anyway, as one to whom we imparted this suspicion sagely observed, Stravinsky has the patent. If any music of this order will live, it will be "Le Sacre du Printemps." Twenty years have passed since the Diaghileff troupe first performed the original ballet in Paris; nine since Pierre Monteux with these same Bostonians first bludgeoned the sensibilities of a Carnegie Hall audience with the concert version's then incredible savagery. It was acclaimed a masterpiece. We have lived to doubt it. We regard "Petruschka" as truer, more durable, if smaller, Stravinsky. But we have not seen the passing of "Le Sacre." We might have preferred a return of "Le Chant du Rossignol"; we get "Le Sacre" and a double dose at that.

Since Monteux's introductory performance, no one has ever quite equaled the effect he produced with it; not even Monteux himself when he gave the work with the Philadelphia visitors four years later than this first disclosure under his baton. Koussevitzky, Furtwaengler, Goossens and Stokowski have performed "Le Sacre" in Carnegie Hall and it has been seen as well as heard at the Metropolitan, where Stokowski again was the conductor. Van Hoogstraaten even had the hardihood to play it at the Stadium. So there is no reason to suspect that it has not made itself understood.

UNLESS we are to dismiss the entire conception and its execution as an adventure in sensation, which the reviewer cannot do, this work must be regarded as the most heroic effort of our day. If it could have held and consolidated the ground it carried in the first assault it might have changed the whole course of music in an era of confused and conflicting trends. But repetitions have diminished its power of evocation and exposed its frequent reliance on derivative or commonplace substance; once this substance has been disentagled from the ingenuity of the works's successive shocks and flagellations. There are pages that come close to genius. But even the "Pagan Night" falls appreciably short, once it is no longer new and strange. Debussy, we feel, wrote some of this, before Stravinsky. The dark mutterings and the stifled, remote calls of the woodwinds, the sardonic, fiendish laughter of the brass, are not to be listened to without something of wonder. But for one such moment, there is page on page of sawing, stamping and thudding only to be made interesting by some visual or literary program in which the motivation is extra-musical, as in the original ballet.

Mr. Koussevitzky, if he could not stun us as his predecessor did in 1924, gave us one of the clearest, most incisive and revelatory performances of this work that we have experienced. If it was not as orgiastic as some, it gained, musically, as a penetrating exposition of a difficult score which, if it is to live, must be comprehended as something quite different from mere sensory excitement.

Conductor and orchestra also evoked the vernal season with a sunlit performance of the Schumann "Spring" Symphony, admirable in its freshness, balance and tonal zest; and must be credited with graceful and charming playing of the second of the over-edited suites which Felix Mottl arranged from airs and dances by Gluck. The audience was one of the size and warmth of response familiar at these concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 4 - 1933

Koussevitzky Again Here

Given, With His Noted Boston Symphony Orchestra, Usual Ovation.

by Walter D. Shackleton

The eminent Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his equally noted Boston Symphony Orchestra opened his next-to-the-last visit of the season here Thursday night at Carnegie Hall in a characteristically enjoyable and satisfactory manner.

The conductor jumped the official opening of the Spring season by nearly three weeks with his program, selecting Schumann's "Spring Symphony," his symphony in B flat, no. 1, opus 38, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." The program opened, however, with Felix Mottl's arrangement of Gluck's Ballet Suite No. 2, which is composed of the march from "Alceste," the minuet from "Iphigenia in Aulis," the grazioso from "Paris and Helen" and the slave dance from "Iphigenia in Aulis."

It seems, in this opinion, that the inclusion of the Gluck work was in contrast with the still controversial Stravinsky composition. The Gluck work has the stately, if restrained, form pictorially in the manner of its day of courtly etiquette. Whereas the Stravinsky group has the wild abandon, orgyistic in feeling, of a voodoo ritual with its clashing dissonances and thumping rhythms.

The Schumann symphony is, of course, a conventional work and its inclusion on a program, other than being seasonal, neither adds nor detracts, and it would not necessarily be missed if it was heard only as the vernal equinox comes around.

Nevertheless, the entire program was given the expected musicianly and deeply thoughtful reading colored by the scholarly and magnetic personality of the conductor. It was highly appreciated by the usual full house which greets Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

MAR 3 - 1933

VARIATIONS

By WILLARD M. CLARK

With both Mary Wigman and her troupe and the Boston Symphony Orchestra appearing ~~at Smith~~ College, the past week has not been devoid of excitement. There was much to admire in both presentations, dance in its most modern conception and, for good measure, that most modern of modern compositions, "Le Sacre du Printemps," by Stravinsky, played by the Boston organization.

This brief excursion into the modern realm has been intensely interesting, and if it left some of the older generation a bit hazy, it will at least have given them something to think about, which is not a bad thing.

Miss Wigman was making her first appearance in the western part of the State. For the past two seasons she has been hailed as a solo dancer, but this season she brought from Germany a dozen of her young women pupils. There are many who seem to feel less satisfaction in her ensemble appearances than in her solo work. Having seen her in a solo performance in Boston a season ago, we feel that her great art loses nothing, but rather gains in effectiveness, through the addition of the ensemble.

One of the finest dances she gave was entitled the "Rukkehr-Hymnus" or "Hymn of Return." This is an austere, stately, ritualized dance design, growing in pattern and glowing imagination as it passes before the eye. Two dancers begin it, entering from each side of the stage and taking their pose. Others, similarly paired, follow and pose. Soon the wandering spirit, Miss Wigman, is caught in the procession. Near the end, four of the dancers clang golden cymbals. In this dance, with its broad lines and its sonorous accompaniment, one finds the Wigman idea in its most exalted state. It becomes more effective when idea and fervor is diffused through 10 dancers instead of one. The eerie mood of "Shadows" danced by the 10 young women clad in long, flowing robes hiding the entire person, was sustained at constant pitch throughout. The play of arms and bodies was precise and they moved en masse seemingly without individual will.

Striking accompaniment was provided for each of the dancers. Sometimes it was only a drum beat, again the piano joined with crashing chords or a plaintive flutelike tone thrust itself upward over the swaying mass of dancers. It was all very impressive, very lovely and imaginative.

"Le Sacre du Printemps."

It has taken Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" 30 years to reach Smith College. For that matter it had reached no city outside of Boston in this State, if our information is correct. A large and enthusiastic audience greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston players ~~Tuesday night~~.

Naturally interest centered on Stravinsky's master work. Probably no work has provoked so much controversy as this ballet which Stravinsky wrote during 1912-1913. Audiences have left the halls where it has been played and, more often than not, hisses have taken the place of applause.

To hear this work as absolute music is quite a different thing from hearing it in its ballet setting. In it, Stravinsky has overthrown old rules of harmony; has given us new kinds of melody and invoked rhythms such as the classic school and 19th century writers never knew.

It is pagan music of a northern country, quite different from that of the other primitives, the African, for example. In it there is no trace of joyousness for the spring festival in Russia 1000 years ago was no season of rejoicing, rather it was a season of gloom for all knew that under their ritual the most beautiful girl in the village must be sacrificed—doomed to dance her life away.

Stravinsky has cleverly kept his music very close to the earth. From the first phrases of the symphonic introduction one is conscious of the never ceasing forward urge of the music, upward and onward toward the inexorable sacrifice. It is cruel and barbarous music. Its short, monotonous, oft repeated motifs, its lack of melody and its continual dissonance are qualities which, in toto, cause the somber orchestral coloring which gradually enthralls the senses until one loses a consciousness of one's surroundings.

Appeals to the Senses.

Listening to this work Tuesday night and regarding the reaction of the audience we felt that Stravinsky had aimed to catch the eye and the ear rather than the intellect. He seemed to want, and marvelously succeeded in doing so, to saturate the senses through sheer abundance of tone; to shatter the nerves with pungent dissonances, rather than to play upon the intellect. This seems to be the aim of the majority of the composers making up the so-called modern school. If it is true, as one musician has said, that music may be divided into two parts, verse and poetry, then it appears that present composers are leaning heavily towards the poetry rather than verse, if verse means musicianship.

The ingenious Prokofieff writes with an eye towards his audience. With an enormous flow of melody and a wicked tongue in his cheek, he writes measure after measure of strange key relationships, heretical combinations and inventive figurations which soon have the disssecting listener frothing at the mouth. Ravel with his steady drum beat in the "Bolero" sets the nerves quivering. Modern writers are making their appeal to the physical. Our dance music is purely a physical thing. It makes no appeal to the intellect, preferring rather to loosen passions by ryhthmic ferver or languishing meter. It is probable that imagination will become the most important single factor in enjoyment of modern music if composers continue as they are.

Product of Environment.

It is not strange that the trend of music aims towards the physical. Music, like other arts, is strongly influenced by the environment of its writers. In this present day it is hardly to be expected that the styles of Mozart and Haydn should abound. Their world was not our world. It is natural that from the strife and discord of present time that there should emerge "machine" music, a "Bolero" or a "Tabloid" with its incessant clamor of typewriters. Present day sensations cannot be expressed in the standard phraseology; these new sensations require new mediums for musical expression.

This opens a wide field for the trained listener, for those who would know "what makes the clock run." This seems to us to be a side issue. The composer today is writing for that mass of people who absorb their music through the skin rather than their brains. Physical rather than cerebral music is their accomplishment. One wonders if the necessity to live does not prompt some of these strange, thoroughly unmusical effusions so often unloaded on an unsuspecting, but gullible public. Have these composers found out that the musical "Hello Sucker" is as much enjoyed as the Texas Guinan variety? Have they learned that in this mad world only a few care for musical profundity and that the great mass desire sensory enjoyment? It seems to us they have learned their lesson well, these socalled Modernists.

Not daring to compete with the masters of the past they have evolved their own idiom relying upon the gullibility of the people to accept it, be they musicians or not. Some few have, perhaps, found the old idiom uncongenial and lacking the power to express what they desire. Thus they have fashioned new tools to cope with a situation as new to them as to their listeners.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

MAR 4 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Plays at the Academy of Music; 'Tristan und Isolde' at the Metropolitan

Made up of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung," the Elazounow violin concerto and a Johann Strauss waltz, the program of last night's Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music was a more than usually unadventurous one. No doubt Mr. Koussewitsky was guided in its arrangement by the tastes of his Brooklyn audience, as communicated to him in the past. It is possible, however, that his instructors in this matter have given him an exaggerated idea of Brooklyn's musical conservatism; I for one am convinced that they have, and am ready to risk impertinence by asking what end is served, what good is expected to◆ come from coddling the prejudices of a musically backward minority. I am not suggesting that Mr. Koussewitsky's program last night should have consisted of Schoenberg's Variations for orchestra, Varese's "Ameriques" and Strawinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," but it does seem to me that more interest in it might have been aroused, even in Brooklyn, had it included Sibellieus' fifth symphony (which the Boston orchestra recently played in Manhattan), or Louis Gruenberg's first symphony, which Mr. Koussewitsky is introducing to New York at Carnegie Hall today. Since the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are sponsored by the Institute of Arts of Sciences, the cultural and educational program of which is presumably progressive, there is all the more reason to expect them to be reasonably broad in scope, representing music as a living as well as

It remains to be said that from the point of view of performance, last night's concert was almost continuously enjoyable. The Haydn symphony was delightfully played—with that touch of elegance with which Mr. Koussewitsky, alone among conductors, reminds us that though Haydn was a peasant born, he was, as a musician, trained at court. The slow movement was a trifle deliberate in tempo and exaggerated in its dynamic contrasts. Otherwise everything about the performance was as it should have been. Mr. Koussewitsky gave a somewhat less satisfactory account of "Tod und Verklaerung;" one had the feeling at times that his grasp of the score was less secure than that of his players, and that he was only a confusing presence to them.

There were, however, fine moments in the performance. The Glazounow concerto followed the intermission, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra (absent from his desk for the evening) as soloist. His playing was assured and brilliant. The concert concluded with Johann Strauss' "Freuhlingstimmen" waltz, the introduction of which on one of Mr. Koussewitsky's programs seems to have created something of a sensation in Boston. Here, however, Strauss waltzes frequently consort symphonies and concertos at orchestral concerts.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last night.

THE PROGRAM

Haydn........."Surprise" Symphony
Strauss....."Tod und Verklaerung"
Glazounow..........Violin Concerto
Richard Burgin, soloist
J. Strauss..Waltz:
"Freuhlingstimmen"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 3 - 1933

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Gives Finest Performance of "Sacre du Printemps" Heard Here.

WORK SEEN IN NEW LIGHT

Climaxes and Contrasts in Stravinsky's Symphony Are Given With Consummate Skill.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a concert of exemplary brilliancy last night in Carnegie Hall. The earlier part of the program was given to acknowledged masterpieces by Gluck and Schumann. The second part was a repetition, and the finest performance of a strange and formidable score that Mr. Koussevitzky, or probably any other conductor, has given in this city. The reference is to Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps."

This score of Stravinsky remains the last great musical provocation. Other interesting music has been heard since the "Sacre," but nothing that has nearly its force or its revolutionary character. It must be immediately explained that the word "revolutionary" has no association with Soviet Russia or any State save the purely musical! Schumann remarked that revolution could be concealed in the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. "Sacre du printemps" is the last important musical revolution, and the music is still so powerful and so laden with dynamite that it is not yet possible to arrive at a settled opinion about it.

Every time he hears this score it has a new aspect for him. Sometimes it is profoundly stirring, as last night. Sometimes it is brutal if not perverted, if not revolting as the expression of animalism. Not for nothing has another modern composer than Stravinsky referred on occasion to the "Sacre" as "music of the super-ape." Or it seems to have, under other interpretive circumstances, or perhaps according to the listener's mood, the freshness, the irresistible budding force, the vernal melancholy of the Spring, and the dark mystery from which the Spring itself arises. Or again, it is a new musical chemical let loose, touched off, as it were, by contact with that other chemical of a modern composer's spirit, and then it is as if the earth which seemed made of clods had suddenly been subjected to a process like that which Sir Oliver Lodge described, when he said that one day science would release from a single atom sufficient energy to blow a battleship out of the sea onto a mountain top.

Is not the surest proof of the vitality of this music the many-faceted manner in which it appeals not only to the emotions but the imagination, and the way in which it grips the concert-goer and will not let him go? And now, after half a dozen hearings or thereabouts, the organic structure of the score begins to become clear—the burgeoning of its archaic, primeval melodies, the germinating precesses which are linear and rhythmical and harmonic in their manifestations; the bold dispensing with symphonic procedure, the complete and confident parting with the past, the passion of a new purpose.

No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky's remarkable reading of the music, his performance, at once a conflagration of tone and a masterpiece of transparent statement, had much to do with the effect of the score. For this is not a simple score to present justly. Its problems of proportion and interpretation are complicate and subtle, as they are often violent in meaning. The music last night was ordered and released. The conductor had it apparently as easily in the palm of his hand as if it had been a symphony by Haydn. At the same time, he planned his contrasts and climaxes with consummate skill, and he loosed the instruments of the orchestra in a manner that was almost a shock to nerves and heart.

Is this a complete and lasting work of art? Is it a debauch of rhythm and of nervous crisis? Is it, as Stravinsky's headings in the score and the nature of the music suggest, born of the earth and its travail, in the night of creation? The only thing which is certain is after all the only thing that matters. The score is the confounding creation, for the good or ill of art, of a genius.

This performance, of itself, would have fully explained the reputation of orchestra and conductor. When he played Gluck and Mozart Mr. Koussevitzky was in other places, other realms, far distant from that of "Le Sacre," of his art. Today, while the music is charming, the Mottl arrangement of a Gluck ballet suite sounds a little heavy and out of date in instrumentation, and thus not wholly native to Gluck's style. But Schumann's symphony was interpreted with rare felicity. For a change, Mr. Koussevitzky did not follow the example of other conductors and perform the first movement at a tempo which made of it not a song of Spring (for this is Schumann's homage to Spring at least as truly and genuinely as Stravinsky's) but a mere jumble and scamper.

Last night the tempi of the whole symphony were extremely well chosen. They were native to the music and the temperament of Schumann and his times. The symphony lost no degree of animation because of this comparative deliberateness. On the contrary, it gained impulse and movement and cumulative effect and the melodies exfoliated naturally from the orchestra. The slow movement was adorably sung by the strings—this music which is as if Spring herself had opened her drowsy eyes and out of her dream had looked upon sky and flowers. The instrumental scheme of Schumann was, moreover, entirely understood, so that not only the actual orchestration was heard to the best advantage, but effects that the composer may not wholly have compassed in his practical writing were conveyed with remarkable illusion, by means of tonal coloring and the art suggestion.

The audience was, of course, a large and brilliant one, and its responsiveness was shown by the applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 5 1933

Gruenberg Symphony Fails To Stir Critic's Interest

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Being the operatic hero of the moment, Louis Gruenberg, composer of "Emperor Jones," does not find it difficult to get his other works produced at this time.

One such opus, Gruenberg's first symphony, came to light yesterday afternoon at the Carnegie Hall concert of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky.

A ~~hasty~~ review of what Mr. Gruenberg achieved in his symphony would indicate to at least one listener that the composer was successful neither in his form nor his material. The work is long—it lasts about forty-five minutes—and even its community of themes does not compel sustained interest. The principal musical motive has a strongly Straussian (Richard), character. There are other episodes that summon the ghosts of Wagner, Debussy, Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky. Oriental suggestions creep in. Also a short invitation to jazz. The orchestration has arresting moments. The second movement, in its lively and piquant parts, stirs grateful reaction. There are sudden, somewhat unaccountable violin solos, brass chorales, shiftings of mood and style.

The composition sounds shreddy and diffuse. It doubtless is clear to Mr. Gruenberg and gave him pleasure to write. I own to being left with a feeling of confusion and futility.

Friendly applause brought bows from the composer, seated in a box.

Mozart's delightful "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," played with tonal finesse and graceful style, opened the concert. It closed with Mr. Koussevitzky's warmly felt and imaginatively conducted performances of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and his not entirely unknown overture from "Tannhaeuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

MAR 5 - 1933

American Symphonists

By EDWARD CUSHING

Afterthoughts on Recent Performances of Symphonies by Bernard Wagenaar, Howard Hanson and Louis Gruenberg

OF THE three symphonies by American composers introduced here this season at concerts of the Philharmonic and Boston orchestras, there is no question in my mind as to which ~~was the~~ most significant. The honors go, without dispute, to Bernard Wagenaar's second symphony, the first performance of which Mr. Toscanini conducted at Carnegie Hall on November 10. Beside this strong and individual work—to which, however disagreeably one may have been affected by its bitter, acerb tone, it is impossible to deny the virtues of conviction and consistence, of mental maturity and emotional vigor—Howard Hanson's "Romantic" symphony, heard for the first time in New York at last Wednesday evening's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, and Louis Gruenberg's first symphony, Op. 7, introduced here at yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee, appear indecisive and ineffectual, the one the work of a self-conscious conservative who seems to have deliberately set out to make capital of a reaction of taste in the direction of nineteenth century romanticism, the other that of a man who, though obviously gifted and honest, has never succeeded in ridding his style of the incubus of an eclecticism that makes everything he has ever said seem the echo of something said by some one else—in the case of thes ymphony, by Strauss. I have a clearer and more vivid memory of Mr. Wagenaar's symphony, which I heard four months ago, than of Mr. Hanson's, which I heard four days ago, or Mr. Gruenberg's, of which I heard a performance broadcast from Boston four weeks ago. This in itself is testimony to the character of Mr. Wagenaar's music, to its strength of personality, the clarity of the composer's ideas and the conviction with which he expounds them. Whether or not Mr. Hanson's "Romantic" symphony or Mr. Gruenberg's Op. 7 is played again is a matter, I should say, of little importance. Neither of these works is significant either in itself or in its relation to the body of contemporary American music. Mr. Wagenaar's, on the other hand, is; this symphony seemed to me, when I heard it last November, profoundly relevant to the background of time and place, against which it made its appearance, the expression of a sensibility and mental attitude distinctly contemporary and American.

* * *

It is not, however, with Mr. Wagenaar that we shall concern ourselves today. Mr. Wagenaar, clear-sighted, self-possessed, his talents, whatever their degree, fully articulated, is not a problem; Mr. Hanson and Mr. Gruenberg are—the one because we feel that in his "Romantic" symphony he is off on a wrong tack, the other because he seems to lack any sense of direction whatsoever.

Mr. Hanson's "Romantic" symphony creates a curious impression of insincerity. The romanticism to which its title confesses gives no effect of spontaneity, but, on the contrary, suggests, as I remarked in a review of Wednesday evening's performance, deliberate attitudinizing on the composer's part. Why this should be I have no idea, unless it is that an artist's natural and unconscious attitude toward the problems of his work becomes a pose as soon as he becomes aware of it and attempts to capitalize it. It is disturbing to read that Mr. Hanson composed the "Romantic" symphony as "an escape from the rather bitter type of modern musical realism which occupies so large a place in contemporary thought," to hear him airing his beliefs that "contemporary music seems to be showing a tendency to become entirely too cerebral," that "music is not primarily a matter of the intellect, but rather a manifestation of the emotions." Disturbing because while all of this is true enough, it scarcely supplies a workable program for a creative artist. Mr. Hanson's bent has always been a conservative, romantic one; if he had followed it naturally in his second symphony, without the deliberation which his comments suggest, he might conceivably have produced an honest and vital score—honest and vital, that is, in its emotional substance. The trouble with Mr. Hanson in the second symphony would seem to be that he has here adopted the celebral method, which he deplores, to the creation of an emotional, romantic work—a paradoxical procedure which results chiefly in sentimentality and bathos.

As for Mr. Gruenberg's first symphony, we should bear in mind, of course, that it was written over a dozen years ago (though subsequently revised), that it is, by the composer's confession, "different in feeling, technique and subject matter from the music he writes today. Still, it poses essentially the same problem for our consideration that we have been faced with in Mr. Gruenberg's later works: the Jazz Suite, the tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," the operas "Jack and the Beanstalk" and "The Emperor Jones."'

In 1919 Mr. Gruenberg's style derived largely from Strauss; today it exhibits a greater eclecticism. But it is still lacking in individuality, in personality, it is still a misfit garment clothing Mr. Gruenberg's ideas. There is no question of Mr. Gruenberg's gifts, of the fact, at least, that he is a composer through necessity, one who has not chosen but has been driven by some inner compulsion to express himself in music. His music has the intense sincerity and honesty which is the mark of the composer born, not made. At the same time, Mr. Gruenberg seems to be curiously inhibited in the development of the personal style that we must conclude is latent in him. He thinks for himself as a creative musician, but he expresses himself, almost invariably, in borrowed terms, which, since they do not precisely define his meaning, are responsible for the curious impression of inarticulateness which his music almost invariably produces, the listener's feeling that something is intervening between himself and the composer, preventing a complete understanding between them.

What is the answer to this? Is Mr. Gruenberg, like so many modern composers, like so many modern artists in other fields, too conscious of his heritage, of the past that looks so mightily behind him, dwarfing his personal significance and capacity? His trouble, I feel, must be psychological. He needs, perhaps, to take himself less seriously, to risk naivete (if he is afraid of it, or considers it an unadmirable characteristic in an artist) by expressing himself more simply, freely, spontaneously, setting forth his experience directly in the terms he apprehends it, even though, from the standpoint of the sophisticated artist that he is, these may appeal to him as trivial and unworthy of the honor of artistic celebration.

◆

135

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 3 - 1933

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Gives Finest Performance of "Sacre du Printemps" Heard Here.

WORK SEEN IN NEW LIGHT

Climaxes and Contrasts in Stravinsky's Symphony Are Given With Consummate Skill.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave a concert of exemplary brilliancy last night in Carnegie Hall. The earlier part of the program was given to acknowledged masterpieces by Gluck and Schumann. The second part was a repetition, and the finest performance of a strange and formidable score that Mr. Koussevitzky, or probably any other conductor, has given in this city. The reference is to Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps."

This score of Stravinsky remains the last great musical provocation. Other interesting music has been heard since the "Sacre," but nothing that has nearly its force or its revolutionary character. It must be immediately explained that the word "revolutionary" has no association with Soviet Russia or any State save the purely musical! Schumann remarked that revolution could be concealed in the walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser. "Sacre du printemps" is the last important musical revolution, and the music is still so powerful and so laden with dynamite that it is not yet possible to arrive at a settled opinion about it.

Every time he hears this score it has a new aspect for him. Sometimes it is profoundly stirring, as last night. Sometimes it is brutal if not perverted, if not revolting as the expression of animalism. Not for nothing has another modern composer than Stravinsky referred on occasion to the "Sacre" as "music of the super-ape." Or it seems to have, under other interpretive circumstances, or perhaps according to the listener's mood, the freshness, the irresistible budding force, the vernal melancholy of the Spring, and the dark mystery from which the Spring itself arises. Or again, it is a new musical chemical let loose, touched off, as it were, by contact with that other chemical of a modern composer's spirit, and then it is as if the earth which seemed made of clods had suddenly been subjected to a process like that which Sir Oliver Lodge described, when he said that one day science would release from a single atom sufficient energy to blow a battleship out of the sea onto a mountain top.

Is not the surest proof of the vitality of this music the many-faceted manner in which it appeals not only to the emotions but the imagination, and the way in which it grips the concert-goer and will not let him go? And now, after half a dozen hearings or thereabouts, the organic structure of the score begins to become clear—the burgeoning of its archaic, primeval melodies, the germinating precesses which are linear and rhythmical and harmonic in their manifestations; the bold dispensing with symphonic procedure, the complete and confident parting with the past, the passion of a new purpose.

No doubt Mr. Koussevitzky's remarkable reading of the music, his performance, at once a conflagration of tone and a masterpiece of transparent statement, had much to do with the effect of the score. For this is not a simple score to present justly. Its problems of proportion and interpretation are complicate and subtle, as they are often violent in meaning. The music last night was ordered and released. The conductor had it apparently as easily in the palm of his hand as if it had been a symphony by Haydn. At the same time, he planned his contrasts and climaxes with consummate skill, and he loosed the instruments of the orchestra in a manner that was almost a shock to nerves and heart.

Is this a complete and lasting work of art? Is it a debauch of rhythm and of nervous crisis? Is it, as Stravinsky's headings in the score and the nature of the music suggest, born of the earth and its travail, in the night of creation? The only thing which is certain is after all the only thing that matters. The score is the confounding creation, for the good or ill of art, of a genius.

This performance, of itself, would have fully explained the reputation of orchestra and conductor. When he played Gluck and Mozart Mr. Koussevitzky was in other places, other realms, far distant from that of "Le Sacre," of his art. Today, while the music is charming, the Mottl arrangement of a Gluck ballet suite sounds a little heavy and out of date in instrumentation, and thus not wholly native to Gluck's style. But Schumann's symphony was interpreted with rare felicity. For a change, Mr. Koussevitzky did not follow the example of other conductors and perform the first movement at a tempo which made of it not a song of Spring (for this is Schumann's homage to Spring at least as truly and genuinely as Stravinsky's) but a mere jumble and scamper.

Last night the tempi of the whole symphony were extremely well chosen. They were native to the music and the temperament of Schumann and his times. The symphony lost no degree of animation because of this comparative deliberatness. On the contrary, it gained impulse and movement and cumulative effect and the melodies exfoliated naturally from the orchestra. The slow movement was adorably sung by the strings—this music which is as if Spring herself had opened her drowsy eyes and out of her dream had looked upon sky and flowers. The instrumental scheme of Schumann was, moreover, entirely understood, so that not only the actual orchestration was heard to the best advantage, but effects that the composer may not wholly have compassed in his practical writing were conveyed with remarkable illusion, by means of tonal coloring and the art suggestion.

The audience was, of course, a large and brilliant one, and its responsiveness was shown by the applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

MAR 5 1933

Gruenberg Symphony Fails To Stir Critic's Interest

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Being the operatic hero of the moment, Louis Gruenberg, composer of "Emperor Jones," does not find it difficult to get his other works produced at this time.

One such opus, Gruenberg's first symphony, came to light yesterday afternoon at the Carnegie Hall concert of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky.

A ~~hasty~~ review of what Mr. Gruenberg achieved in his symphony would indicate to at least one listener that the composer was successful neither in his form nor his material. The work is long—it lasts about forty-five minutes—and even its community of themes does not compel sustained interest. The principal musical motive has a strongly Straussian (Richard), character. There are other episodes that summon the ghosts of Wagner, Debussy, Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky. Oriental suggestions creep in. Also a short invitation to jazz. The orchestration has arresting moments. The second movement, in its lively and piquant parts, stirs grateful reaction. There are sudden, somewhat unaccountable violin solos, brass chorales, shiftings of mood and style.

The composition sounds shreddy and diffuse. It doubtless is clear to Mr. Gruenberg and gave him pleasure to write. I own to being left with a feeling of confusion and futility.

Friendly applause brought bows from the composer, seated in a box.

Mozart's delightful "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," played with tonal finesse and graceful style, opened the concert. It closed with Mr. Koussevitzky's warmly felt and imaginatively conducted performances of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and his not entirely unknown overture from "Tannhaeuser."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

MAR 5 - 1933

American Symphonists

By EDWARD CUSHING

Afterthoughts on Recent Performances of Symphonies by Bernard Wagenaar, Howard Hanson and Louis Gruenberg

OF THE three symphonies by American composers introduced here this season at concerts of the Philharmonic and Boston orchestras, there is no question in my mind as to which ~~was the~~ most significant. The honors go, without dispute, to Bernard Wagenaar's second symphony, the first performance of which Mr. Toscanini conducted at Carnegie Hall on November 10. Beside this strong and individual work—to which, however disagreeably one may have been affected by its bitter, acerb tone, it is impossible to deny the virtues of conviction and consistence, of mental maturity and emotional vigor—Howard Hanson's "Romantic" symphony, heard for the first time in New York at last Wednesday evening's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, and Louis Gruenberg's first symphony, Op. 7, introduced here at yesterday's Boston Symphony matinee, appear indecisive and ineffectual, the one the work of a self-conscious conservative who seems to have deliberately set out to make capital of a reaction of taste in the direction of nineteenth century romanticism, the other that of a man who, though obviously gifted and honest, has never succeeded in ridding his style of the incubus of an eclecticism that makes everything he has ever said seem the echo of something said by some one else—in the case of thes ymphony, by Strauss. I have a clearer and more vivid memory of Mr. Wagenaar's symphony, which I heard four months ago, than of Mr. Hanson's, which I heard four days ago, or Mr. Gruenberg's, of which I heard a performance broadcast from Boston four weeks ago. This in itself is testimony to the character of Mr. Wagenaar's music, to its strength of personality, the clarity of the composer's ideas and the conviction with which he expounds them. Whether or not Mr. Hanson's "Romantic" symphony or Mr. Gruenberg's Op. 7 is played again is a matter, I should say, of little importance. Neither of these works is significant either in itself or in its relation to the body of contemporary American music. Mr. Wagenaar's, on the other hand, is; this symphony seemed to me, when I heard it last November, profoundly relevant to the background of time and place, against which it made its appearance, the expression of a sensibility and mental attitude distinctly contemporary and American.

* * *

It is not, however, with Mr. Wagenaar that we shall concern ourselves today. Mr. Wagenaar, clear-sighted, self-possessed, his talents, whatever their degree, fully articulated, is not a problem; Mr. Hanson and Mr. Gruenberg are—the one because we feel that in his "Romantic" symphony he is off on a wrong tack, the other because he seems to lack any sense of direction whatsoever.

Mr. Hanson's "Romantic" symphony creates a curious impression of insincerity. The romanticism to which its title confesses gives no effect of spontaneity, but, on the contrary, suggests, as I remarked in a review of Wednesday evening's performance, deliberate attitudinizing on the composer's part. Why this should be I have no idea, unless it is that an artist's natural and unconscious attitude toward the problems of his work becomes a pose as soon as he becomes aware of it and attempts to capitalize it. It is disturbing to read that Mr. Hanson composed the "Romantic" symphony as "an escape from the rather bitter type of modern musical realism which occupies so large a place in contemporary thought," to hear him airing his beliefs that "contemporary music seems to be showing a tendency to become entirely too cerebral," that "music is not primarily a matter of the intellect, but rather a manifestation of the emotions." Disturbing because while all of this is true enough, it scarcely supplies a workable program for a creative artist. Mr. Hanson's bent has always been a conservative, romantic one; if he had followed it naturally in his second symphony, without the deliberation which his comments suggest, he might conceivably have produced an honest and vital score—honest and vital, that is, in its emotional substance. The trouble with Mr. Hanson in the second symphony would seem to be that he has here adopted the celebral method, which he deplores, to the creation of an emotional, romantic work—a paradoxical procedure which results chiefly in sentimentality and bathos.

As for Mr. Gruenberg's first symphony, we should bear in mind, of course, that it was written over a dozen years ago (though subsequently revised), that it is, by the composer's confession, "different in feeling, technique and subject matter from the music he writes today. Still, it poses essentially the same problem for our consideration that we have been faced with in Mr. Gruenberg's later works: the Jazz Suite, the tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," the operas "Jack and the Beanstalk" and "The Emperor Jones."'

In 1919 Mr. Gruenberg's style derived largely from Strauss; today it exhibits a greater eclecticism. But it is still lacking in individuality, in personality, it is still a misfit garment clothing Mr. Gruenberg's ideas. There is no question of Mr. Gruenberg's gifts, of the fact, at least, that he is a composer through necessity, one who has not chosen but has been driven by some inner compulsion to express himself in music. His music has the intense sincerity and honesty which is the mark of the composer born, not made. At the same time, Mr. Gruenberg seems to be curiously inhibited in the development of the personal style that we must conclude is latent in him. He thinks for himself as a creative musician, but he expresses himself, almost invariably, in borrowed terms, which, since they do not precisely define his meaning, are responsible for the curious impression of inarticulateness which his music almost invariably produces, the listener's feeling that something is intervening between himself and the composer, preventing a complete understanding between them.

What is the answer to this? Is Mr. Gruenberg, like so many modern composers, like so many modern artists in other fields, too conscious of his heritage, of the past that looks so mightily behind him, dwarfing his personal significance and capacity? His trouble, I feel, must be psychological. He needs, perhaps, to take himself less seriously, to risk naivete (if he is afraid of it, or considers it an unadmirable characteristic in an artist) by expressing himself more simply, freely, spontaneously, setting forth his experience directly in the terms he apprehends it, even though, from the standpoint of the sophisticated artist that he is, these may appeal to him as trivial and unworthy of the honor of artistic celebration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

MAR 5 - 1933

FirstSymphony By Gruenberg Is Heard Here

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Premiere of Work

Was Composed in 1919

Mozart and Wagner Pieces CompleteMatineeProgram

By Francis D. Perkins

Sarge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their fourth matinee of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, where Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" preceded the novelty of the afternoon, the first symphony by Louis Gruenberg, of "Emperor Jones" fame. Mr. Koussevitzky completed his program with Wagner: the Siegfried Idyll and overture to "Tannhauser." While yesterday's performance of the Gruenberg work was the first in New York, it was not the first time that the symphony had been heard here, as the second Boston performance, of February 11, had been broadcast.

Mr. Gruenberg's symphony was composed in 1919 and revised ten years later, the changes including reorchestration at various points and a new third movement. It did not reach public performance until this year, when it was first played by the Boston Symphony in its home concerts of February 10 and 11. It is in four movements, with no pause between the third and fourth; themes from the earlier movements reappear in later ones.

Represents Earlier Style

According to Mr. Gruenberg, the symphony does not represent his work of the present period. In Mr. Hale's program notes, he avowed "mingled feelings" on looking back to a work written many years ago, and "so different in feeling, technique and subject matter from what I do today." As heard yesterday, it proved interesting, while not uniformly so; one strong point is its orchestration, vivid, variously hued, making skilled use of the resources, in color and sonority, of the modern orchestra. The themes do not lack contrast, the transitions between and interminglings of the various musical ideas are, for the most part, adroitly handled. The majority of these ideas do not seem likely to exert a strong appeal to the listener's musical memory, and Mr Gruenberg, fourteen years ago, reveals occasional influences of various composers, but the work has many appealing measures—moments of ingratiating fancifulness amid the more proclamative measures of the first movement—and, in some of these moments, the scoring for the strings harked back to Strauss; light-footed sweep and momentum in the second movement; an impressive beginning in the Lento.

Length Lessens Effectiveness

But the symphony is over-long, sometimes repetitious during its forty-four minute course; its length exceeds its capacity for effective eloquence. The first and third movements, from the formal point of view, are the best; the second, with a few hints at jazz, and an interlude for solo violin, pleases at first, but is too diffuse; the finale also lets interest flag at times. The symphony was excellently played and cordially received; Mr. Koussevitzky summoned Mr. Gruenberg to the stage to receive the plaudits.

The Bostonians' interpretation of the Siegfried Idyll revealed its tenderness and eloquence, despite one or two not altogether necessary modifications of tempo, while the overture was well played except for an acceleration at the close suggesting that there was a train for Boston to be caught. The usual large audience warmy welcomed the notable conductor and orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 5 1933

GRUENBERG WORK BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Conductor Gives Composer's Revised First Symphony for First Time Here.

NOVELTY IS APPLAUDED

Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" and Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" on the Program.

By OLIN DOWNES.

By way of gilding the pill of ultramodernism contained in the first performance here of Louis Gruenberg's First Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky commenced his Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik," and this delicious music was played with fine taste and with the glorification of virtuosity by the strings.

Then came Mr. Gruenberg's symphony. This work was composed in 1919. In 1929 it was revised and a complete new movement replaced the original third part. Mr. Gruenberg had similarly revised his tone-poem, "The Enchanted Isle," which Mr. Koussevitzky, always alert in the discovery of new talent, gave its first performance here.

It is question how much good a revision of an early work accomplishes, particularly when a composer is in his prime and rapidly changing his style. It did not seem difficult to distinguish Gruenberg's music of yesterday from that of today. The style is certainly incongrous, and the score gives the impression of having been fussed with. It is much too long. The material wavers between a stressful and dissonant manner and more obvious things, and in the finale a considerable amount of jazz. Passages which the writer would unhesitatingly have designated as being of the earlier vintage were much more melodic in essence than those of more advanced idiom, but there was little or nothing that had the quality of inspired utterance and of ideas with enough inner force to insure germination. The writer believes that Mr. Gruenberg's development has been such as tardily to give him a voice and a style of his own, and this symphony he sets down as transitional and experimental and not, at that, a felicitous experiment

There was amiable and long-continued applause for this work, and Mr. Koussevitzky brought the composer to the stage. The remainder of the program consisted of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and "Tannhäuser" overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

MAR 6 - 1933

Music :

LOUIS GRUENBERG, composer of "The Emperor Jones," was represented, perhaps misrepresented, on Saturday's program of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall by a symphony he composed in 1919 and revised in 1929. The work has pleasant, even charming, moments, particularly those of a semi-jazz savor, and reveals a sturdy grasp of the complexities of a Straussian orchestra; but it is derivative, often labored and much too long, even as pruned by the composer after a recent first performance in Boston. Mr. Gruenberg appeared on the platform to receive his share of the cordial applause. Other numbers conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky were Mozart's "Kleine Nachtmusik" and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and "Tannhaeuser" Overture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

AR 5 - 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Symphony by Mr. Gruenberg.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

THE PROGRAM:

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (Kochel 525) .... Mozart
Symphony No. 1 (Opus 17)...... Gruenberg
A Siegfried Idyll.......... Wagner
Overture to "Tannhaeuser"...... Wagner

The matinee concert of the Boston Orchestra yesterday revealed a startling fact. We had supposed that most symphonies exuded by the modern cult of composers were very much alike—vapid and meandering, or frankly imitative of well-worn manners. And along comes Mr. Louis Gruenberg, the general tenor of whose work we had consigned to this discouraging category, with a symphony of decided worth. The realization is still rather disturbing.

There are footprints, to be sure—of Strauss, Debussy and Wagner. But there is Mr. Gruenberg, also, and he has committed the unforgivable sin of beauty in his moods; his orchestrations are clever, adroit and seldom extravagant; the hues of his tonal picture are definite, vivid and arresting, yet he manages to weave a fabric of blended graces, holding, like some ancient tapestry, the panorama of past drama.

The Straussian influence prevails, particularly in the third movement (lento sostenuto—e molto maestoso), which reminded me forcibly of passages indescribably haunting in "Don Juan" and in the love episode of "Ein Heldenleben." He seems to be a master of orchestral color, which he uses discreetly but skillfully, sure of every effect.

It is only a first symphony. There are points in the first movement, for instance, which lack coherence and the whole would benefit by a more abstemious orchestration. But it is a work which deserves a continual repetition, if only to show us that American composers may concern themselves profitably with the vast task of creating music, without regard for nationality.

The exquisite precision and clarity of Mr. Koussevitzky's strings in the charming serenade by Mozart merit the highest praise.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 8 1933

Boston Programs.

Featured in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week will be the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius in D minor as well as Hill's new Sinfonietta. On the program also will be Foote's Night Piece for Flute and Strings and the Strauss tone poem "Zarathustra." Mr. Foote, by the way, celebrated his 80th birthday anniversary last Sunday.

At the supplementary concert of the orchestra yesterday J. M. Sanroma was the pianist in the Liszt E major Concerto in E-flat major, which was played recently by our own Miss Heathcock in Cambridge.

In Brown hall at the Conservatory this evening there will be another program of chamber music by members of the faculty including Messrs. Fourel, Malkin and Pacini. Miss A. Malkin will assist.

To Symphony hall on Sunday, March 19 Serge Rachmaninoff will return in a program of compositions for the piano.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

MAR 6 - 1933

Music

Gruenberg's First Symphony Played by Bostonians

By Irving Weil

American composers, or in any case, a certain circle of them that is by no means narrow, really has no cause for complaint that their works are not played in public. No less than two American symphonies have been set before New York audiences within a week, the second being introduced by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra at their latest visit to Carnegie Hall.

This symphony was by Louis Gruenberg, composer of the Metropolitan's "The Emperor Jones"; of the fairy opera, "Jack and the Beanstalk," produced by the Juilliard School; of "The Enchanted Isle," done by several orchestras, of "The Daniel Jazz" to Vachel Lindsay's text and long familiar, and to numerous works of chamber music presented by the League of Composers. Mr. Gruenberg leads a charmed life as a composer—he needs only to write something and hands are stretched forth ready to give it a hearing.

Soon Loses Place.

A curious outcome of this ready acceptance of Mr. Gruenberg's work, however, is that just as readily it seems to lose its place in any of the several classifiable repertoires before very long. And this symphony offered by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians seems to be an apt case in point. We venture to say that this performance was its first and last in New York.

Mr. Gruenberg is indubitably one of those composers who has a particular soft spot in his heart for his early work. He burns up no manuscripts. This symphony, his first, was originally written thirteen or fourteen years ago, and since every contemporary American composer changes his style at least every five years or so, it was nothing like "The Emperor Jones" or anything else Mr. Gruenberg has been putting to paper recently.

New Third Movement.

But the composer went back to his symphony three or four years ago, looked it over, found it, as in the case of "The Enchanted Isle," worth working over, wrote a whole new third movement for it and, in a word, made feathers grow where before there had been fur. The symphony thus reminded us of our long, long past zoological studies and our first discovery of the ornithoringus, if that is what it is still called. More simply it is known as the duck-billed mole and is the missing link between two animal genera.

Every few minutes in the symphony one would discover the composer of a not fully subjugated past emerging above the composer of modern harmonies and the instrumentation of today. We have said that there are now four movements to the work—and they make it seem interminable.

Mr. Koussevitzky prefaced his afternoon with a delicate and winning performance of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and ended it with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Wedded Lovers

THAT PAIR OF NIGHTINGALES. ROBERT AND CLARA

"WE are now living a romance." Schumann wrote these words of his imaginative piano music, but they were equally true of his life. His suit to wed Clara Wieck became a suit at law. Father Wieck was summoned to appear in court and specify his objections to the composer as son-in-law. The case dragged on for a year, until his reasons were adjudged to be trivial. Finally, on Sept 12, 1840, Robert Schumann walked off in triumph with his wife on his arm.

Then sounded such a paean of music as peals in meadow and wood on a June morning from nesting birds. "I used to rack my brains for a long time," he said, "but now I scarcely ever scratch out a note. It all comes from within, and I often feel as if I could go playing straight on without ever coming to an end." In four years most of his finest work poured out of him in a flood, more than 100 songs in a single year, then the "Spring" symphony, the Pianoforte Concerto and the Quintet for pianoforte and strings (which musicians speak of as "the one and only"), as well as the secular oratorio, "Paradise and the Peri," and a beginning with his music for "Faust," which was finished for the 100th anniversary of Goethe's birth in 1848.

Like Beethoven, "he composed as he walked or stood, and could not be distracted"; like Schubert, he wrote songs in restaurants, "sitting alone at a table, back to wall, whistling softly to himself." His music has a peculiar effect. People lose their hearts to it without quite understanding why. The Pianoforte Quintet glows with such a smile of happiness as only shines from the eyes of a lover—which its author was—besides being one of the most exquisitely perfect works of art in the whole literature of chamber music.

The reception accorded Schumann's music was a queer reversal of the usual process. It was welcomed by critics and musicians, but sounded so novel and original in the 1840s that the public thought it eccentric and received it coldly. But in his wife he had not only a concert pianist, but also a melodious bee who flew from hall to hall till the blossoms pollinated and the fruit matured. And after his untimely death this brave woman picked up the pieces of her broken heart and devoted the rest of her life to interpreting his music.

Schumann's nervous system had always been fragile. Such organisms are cruelly high-strung and respond to pain with an intensity as much greater than the average as they do to joy. Already in his 34th year, he had been forced to cease composing and live for months in seclusion. Seven years later overwork brought a return of the symptoms; melancholia and delusions. He asked to be placed in a sanitarium, but went on writing. In February, 1854, he threw himself from a bridge into the Rhine, but was rescued by boatmen. Two years longer he lingered in a wretched waking dream of bewilderment and helplessness, with periods of acute mental anguish, and finally, at the age of 46, died in the arms of his wife. Miserable end for a gentle poet? A man who can fill the world [illegible] of love and joy can well afford to endure a miserable end.

His soul, too, was prophetic. In October of 1853, his last good year, a young unknown, a tow-headed youth from Hamburg, came to see him, bearing a letter from that Olympian of violinists, Joachim. Schumann listened to him play his own pieces and then, for the last time, resumed his journalistic pen to write an essay, which is now musical history. It proclaimed this youth of 20 the next inheritor in the classic dynasty of German music. "This," said Schumann, in Biblical language, "this is he that was to come!"

The poet's soul had prophesied truly. The boy was Johannes Brahms.

L. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 6 - 1933

Gruenberg Symphony Played

Composer Applauded as Koussevitsky Presents Work in Concert at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

It was said long ago that nothing succeeds like success. On the wings, not of song, but of Eugene O'Neill's drama Louis Gruenberg recently floated into the glory of Metropolitan Opera House sunlight. Whereupon conductors, singers and players who had bestowed upon him but a modicum of their august patronage suddenly saw a great light and rushed to illumine themselves in it.

Serge Koussevitzky, commander-in-chief of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, produced Mr. Gruenberg's symphony No. 1, opus 17, and after enlightening Boston uncovered the splendors of the work to a New York audience in the concert of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. An assembly which did not completely fill the hall gave the composition its patient and enduring consideration and liberally applauded the composer when he appeared on the stage to receive his honors.

The work was written in 1919. It was revised in 1929. Parts were reorchestrated and a new third movement was inserted in place of a passacaglia previously heard. The official information tells us that though the symphony is classical in form, themes from the first movement are used in the second, themes from the first and second in the third, and all again in the fourth. Thus the composer avoided writing "the four unrelated compositions usually comprising a classical symphony."

The music shows diversity of styles, of course, and some uncertainties. It is ingenious in spots and reminiscent in others. It ranges from Daniel Jazz to Richard Strauss. Since oil and water do not mix there were some singular and disconcerting contrasts between the two varities of thought. It was a long symphony. It did much preparing and little achieving. The jazz motives were spicy and prominent. The Strauss inspirations were strenuous at times and lyric at others. There was an apparently important violin solo in the slow movement, admirably played by Richard Burgin. It reminded us of Mr. Strauss's homage to the immortal beloved in "Ein Heldenleben," which we preferred greatly to Mr. Gruenberg's homage to Strauss.

The symphony furnished some explanation of the score of "Emperor Jones." Listening to it one could understand why the music of the opera occupied a subsidiary place in the scheme of the drama which lately excited the populace at the Metropolitan. There was some excellent orchestration of which the Boston musicians made much. Mr. Koussevitzky directed the work with fervor and evident sympathy.

The concert began with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," daintily performed by a reduced body of strings. The two numbers which followed the symphony after the intermission were doubtless intended as Mr. Koussevitzky's contribution to the current celebrations of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner. They were happily chosen. The "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture represent two of the most significant phases in the development of Wagner's genius. After the laborious ineffectualities of Mr. Gruenberg they were distinctly refreshing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 6 - 1933

Gruenberg Is Puzzled
What To Do for Einstein

Louis Gruenberg, about whose "Emperor Jones" those who purport to know what is and what is not opera have stopped just short of fighting duels, has started four violin sonatas for Professor Albert Einstein to play, but cannot make up his mind which to finish.

Gruenberg has been asked by the committee in charge of the tribute dinner to be tendered Einstein at the Hotel Commodore the evening of March 15 to compose a piece for the famous scientist. Einstein is a violinist of no mean ability.

Not at All Sure

"Glad of the opportunity to show the appreciation of a composer to a scientist," since it "seems that science and music composition are much related to each other," Gruenberg, who has never met Einstein, is not at all sure what he will write. It will be a simple melody, he promises, and he will play the accompaniment.

Asked whether the music would be an interpretation of the theory of relativity, Gruenberg shrugged an equivocal shoulder. He hopes, he declared, it will be simple enough for Einstein to understand.

Probably the most discussed serious composer of the day, Gruenberg, whose Symphony No. 1, written in 1919, was given its first performance Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, was born in Russia, August 3, 1883, the year Wagner died.

Came Here in 1885

He came to this country in 1885, vas educated in the public schools of New York and studied piano under Adele Margulies, after which he attended the master school at the Vienna Conservatory. He became a pupil of Ferruccio Busoni, friend of Liszt, and studied composition with Fr. E. Koch. After a concert tour of Europe he came back to New York, where he made his debut in 1919 playing his own composition, "Five Impressions Based on Oriental Themes."

With nearly thirty compositions n the major form to his credit, Gruenberg was best known before he adapted Eugene O'Neill's "Emperor Jones" for his "Daniel Jazz" or chamber orchestra, produced at he festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, Venice, in 1923, and since played all over he world, and for his "Jazz Suite," written in 1925 and first given by he Boston Symphony in 1930.

Among his stage works is an pera, "The Dumb Wife," which he as never been able to have produced, though he wrote it nearly two ecades ago. He has never succeeded in obtaining permission from he heirs of Anatole France, who wrote "The Man Who Married a Dumb Wife," on which it is based.

One of Guild Founders

Gruenberg was one of the founders of the American Composers' Guild, is a director of the International Composers' Guild and heads he United States section of the nternational Society for Contemporary Music.

The Einstein tribute dinner, to be given the evening following the cientist's fifty-fourth birthday, will rovide a fund to be donated in Einstein's name to the Hebrew University in Palestine, on whose board of governors he has served. Part of the fund will go to the American Hebrew Physicians' Committee, however.

Several persons prominent in theatrical circles are on the committee, including A. C. Blumenthal, Eddie Cantor, Max Gordon, Arthur Hopkins, Fannie Hurst, Howard Inches, Hendrik van Loon, L. Lawrence Weber, Maj. Edward Bowes, Paul D. Cravath, Arthur Guiterman, Theresa Helburn, Carl Laemmle, Louis B. Mayer, Conde Nast, Charles L. O'Reilly, Charles C. Pettijohn, Lawrence Tibbett, Joseph Urban and Harry M. Warner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 - 1933

Gruenberg Is Heard
Symphony Best of Works

by Muriel Williams

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave its fourth matinee concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky ran true to form in that, as usual, he produced a first performance, in this city, of an American composer. On this occasion it was Louis Gruenberg's Symphony No. 1, Op. 17, a work in four movements, which adhered pretty strictly to the regular symphony form, indedd possessing greater coherence of themes throughout the opus than is generally found among the moderns.

The first movement opened with a broad theme, somewhat lyric in character, which was soon followed by a secondary motif, introduced by the winds, with an effective undertone of strings. In the second subsidiary theme the orchestral coloring in the development of overtones was particularly effective. The movement closed with some palatable dissonances that resolved themselves into the first theme and a closing cadence of pastoral feeling.

Second Movement Laughing

The second movement was introduced with a slight chromatic development, laughing, humorous. The themes of the first movement were repeated in the second, with a Bachanalian strain and some interesting antiphonal developments between doubles basses, second strings and winds. A plaintive and romantic aria for solo violin against muted strings and sustained winds was beautifully interpreted by Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, and this aria, in slightly differing forms, recurred until the closing of the movement.

The third and last movements were played without interruption, and combined the themes from the Allegro maestoso and the Allegro vivace e molto leggiero. There was more than a hint of the jungle, its dense undergrowths and exotic blooms, in the woeful and portentious strains of the winds and brasses against the reiterated and increasingly fervent tremolo of the strings. Indeed, we were reminded, succinctly, of the third act of Mr. Gruenberg's "Emperor Jones," in the development of thematic material, although the latter was composed thirteen years later.

Most Interesting of Works

On the whole the symphony was by far, the most musically interesting of Mr. Gruenberg's works. It is classical in form, direct and sincere in development, and colorful in material. Its continuity is logical, its harmonies tuneful and imaginative. It is pastoral in character and although not designated by the composer as programatic is, nevertheless, distinctly objective music. Mr. Gruenberg states that although the Symphony was composed in 1919, it was revised as late as 1929, when a whole new third movement was inserted. The composer, who was present at the performance of his work, was recalled many times by the audience.

The concert opened with the familiar "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for strings, in four movements, by Mozart, which was delicately delineated by Dr. Koussevitzky. The closing half of the program offered two Richard Wagner selections; the Siegfried Idyll and the overture to Tannhaeuser. The former, with its moving principal theme was played with a wealth of tenderness and understanding, while the Tannhaeuser overture was brought out with all the richness and imaginative beauty with which it is so replete. Altogether we have Dr. Koussevitzky to thank for another memorable musical occasion. It is to be regretted that these concerts will close their season next month with the two performances to be given on April 6 and 8.

[illegible] O, O.
NEWS BEE

[illegible] 33

OLIN DOWNES wears me down with his attempts to impress the radio audience each Sunday on the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra program. He mispronounces a lot of words, too, tho that isn't very important. Pitts Sanborn, on the other hand, is practically perfect most of the time and his introductions of the various instruments in the choir are swell. The gentleman with the Boston Symphony orchestra annoys me almost as much as Mr. Downes.

Post Mar 12

INFORMATION OBSCURED

131

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

MAR 6 - 1933

Gruenberg Symphony Played

Composer Applauded as Koussevitsky Presents Work in Concert at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

It was said long ago that nothing succeeds like success. On the wings, not of song, but of Eugene O'Neill's drama Louis Gruenberg recently floated into the glory of Metropolitan Opera House sunlight. Whereupon conductors, singers and players who had bestowed upon him but a modicum of their august patronage suddenly saw a great light and rushed to illumine themselves in it.

Serge Koussevitzky, commander-in-chief of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, produced Mr. Gruenberg's symphony No. 1, opus 17, and after enlightening Boston uncovered the splendors of the work to a New York audience in the concert of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. An assembly which did not completely fill the hall gave the composition its patient and enduring consideration and liberally applauded the composer when he appeared on the stage to receive his honors.

The work was written in 1919. It was revised in 1929. Parts were reorchestrated and a new third movement was inserted in place of a passacaglia previously heard. The official information tells us that though the symphony is classical in form, themes from the first movement are used in the second, themes from the first and second in the third, and all again in the fourth. Thus the composer avoided writing "the four unrelated compositions usually comprising a classical symphony."

The music shows diversity of styles, of course, and some uncertainties. It is ingenious in spots and reminiscent in others. It ranges from Daniel Jazz to Richard Strauss. Since oil and water do not mix there were some singular and disconcerting contrasts between the two varities of thought. It was a long symphony. It did much preparing and little achieving. The jazz motives were spicy and prominent. The Strauss inspirations were strenuous at times and lyric at others. There was an apparently important violin solo in the slow movement, admirably played by Richard Burgin. It reminded us of Mr. Strauss's homage to the immortal beloved in "Ein Heldenleben," which we preferred greatly to Mr. Gruenberg's homage to Strauss.

The symphony furnished some explanation of the score of "Emperor Jones." Listening to it one could understand why the music of the opera occupied a subsidiary place in the scheme of the drama which lately excited the populace at the Metropolitan. There was some excellent orchestration of which the Boston musicians made much. Mr. Koussevitzky directed the work with fervor and evident sympathy.

The concert began with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," daintily performed by a reduced body of strings. The two numbers which followed the symphony after the intermission were doubtless intended as Mr. Koussevitzky's contribution to the current celebrations of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner. They were happily chosen. The "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture represent two of the most significant phases in the development of Wagner's genius. After the laborious ineffectualities of Mr. Gruenberg they were distinctly refreshing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 6 - 1933

Gruenberg Is Puzzled

What To Do for Einstein

Louis Gruenberg, about whose "Emperor Jones" those who purport to know what is and what is not opera have stopped just short of fighting duels, has started four violin sonatas for Professor Albert Einstein to play, but cannot make up his mind which to finish.

Gruenberg has been asked by the committee in charge of the tribute dinner to be tendered Einstein at the Hotel Commodore the evening of March 15 to compose a piece for the famous scientist. Einstein is a violinist of no mean ability.

Not at All Sure

"Glad of the opportunity to show the appreciation of a composer to a scientist," since it "seems that science and music composition are much related to each other," Gruenberg, who has never met Einstein, is not at all sure what he will write. It will be a simple melody, he promises, and he will play the accompaniment.

Asked whether the music would be an interpretation of the theory of relativity, Gruenberg shrugged an equivocal shoulder. He hopes, he declared, it will be simple enough for Einstein to understand.

Probably the most discussed serious composer of the day, Gruenberg, whose Symphony No. 1, written in 1919, was given its first performance Saturday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, was born in Russia, August 3, 1883, the year Wagner died.

Came Here in 1885

He came to this country in 1885, was educated in the public schools of New York and studied piano under Adele Margulies, after which he attended the master school at the Vienna Conservatory. He became a pupil of Ferruccio Busoni, friend of Liszt, and studied composition with Fr. E. Koch. After a concert tour of Europe he came back to New York, where he made his debut in 1919 playing his own composition, "Five Impressions Based on Oriental Themes."

With nearly thirty compositions in the major form to his credit, Gruenberg was best known before he adapted Eugene O'Neill's "Emperor Jones" for his "Daniel Jazz" for chamber orchestra, produced at the festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music, Venice, in 1923, and since played all over the world, and for his "Jazz Suite," written in 1925 and first given by the Boston Symphony in 1930.

Among his stage works is an opera, "The Dumb Wife," which he has never been able to have produced, though he wrote it nearly two decades ago. He has never succeeded in obtaining permission from the heirs of Anatole France, who wrote "The Man Who Married a Dumb Wife," on which it is based.

One of Guild Founders

Gruenberg was one of the founders of the American Composers' Guild, is a director of the International Composers' Guild and heads the United States section of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

The Einstein tribute dinner, to be given the evening following the scientist's fifty-fourth birthday, will provide a fund to be donated in Einstein's name to the Hebrew University in Palestine, on whose board of governors he has served. Part of the fund will go to the American Hebrew Physicians' Committee, however.

Several persons prominent in theatrical circles are on the committee, including A. C. Blumenthal, Eddie Cantor, Max Gordon, Arthur Hopkins, Fannie Hurst, Howard Inches, Hendrik van Loon, L. Lawrence Weber, Maj. Edward Bowes, Paul D. Cravath, Arthur Guiterman, Theresa Helburn, Carl Laemmle, Louis B. Mayer, Conde Nast, Charles L. O'Reilly, Charles C. Pettijohn, Lawrence Tibbett, Joseph Urban and Harry M. Warner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 7 - 1933

Gruenberg Is Heard

Symphony Best of Works

by Muriel Williams

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave its fourth matinee concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon.

Dr. Koussevitzky ran true to form in that, as usual, he produced a first performance, in this city, of an American composer. On this occasion it was Louis Gruenberg's Symphony No. 1, Op. 17, a work in four movements, which adhered pretty strictly to the regular symphony form, indedd possessing greater coherence of themes throughout the opus than is generally found among the moderns.

The first movement opened with a broad theme, somewhat lyric in character, which was soon followed by a secondary motif, introduced by the winds, with an effective undertone of strings. In the second subsidiary theme the orchestral coloring in the development of overtones was particularly effective. The movement closed with some palatable dissonances that resolved themselves into the first theme and a closing cadence of pastoral feeling.

Second Movement Laughing

The second movement was introduced with a slight chromatic development, laughing, humorous. The themes of the first movement were repeated in the second, with a Bachanalian strain and some interesting antiphonal developments between doubles basses, second strings and winds. A plaintive and romantic aria for solo violin against muted strings and sustained winds was beautifully interpreted by Mr. Burgin concertmaster of the orchestra, and this aria, in slightly differing forms, recurred until the closing of the movement.

The third and last movements were played without interruption, and combined the themes from the Allegro maestoso and the Allegro vivace e molto leggiero. There was more than a hint of the jungle, its dense undergrowths and exotic blooms, in the woeful and portentious strains of the winds and brasses against the reiterated and increasingly fervent tremolo of the strings. Indeed, we were reminded, succinctly, of the third act of Mr. Gruenberg's "Emperor Jones," in the development of thematic material, although the latter was composed thirteen years later.

Most Interesting of Works

On the whole the symphony was by far, the most musically interesting of Mr. Gruenberg's works. It is classical in form, direct a sincere in development, and color in material. Its continuity is local, its harmonies tuneful and ima inative. It is pastoral in charac and although not designated by composer as programatic is, nev theless, distinctly objective mu Mr. Gruenberg states that altho the Symphony was composed 1919, it was revised as late as 19 when a whole new third movem was inserted. The composer, was present at the performance his work, was recalled many by the audience.

The concert opened with the miliar "Eine Kleine Nachtmus a serenade for strings, in movements, by Mozart, wl was delicately delineated by Koussevitzky. The closing of the program offered two Rich Wagner selections; the Siegf Idyll and the overture to Ta haeuser. The former, with its m ing principal theme was played a wealth of tenderness and un standing, while the Tannhaei overture was brought out with the richness and imaginative beauty with which it is so replete. Altogether we have Dr. Koussevitzky to thank for another memorable musical occasion. It is to be regretted that these concerts will close their season next month with the two performances to be given on April 6 and 8.

[illegible] DO, O.
NEWS BEE

[illegible] 3

OLIN DOWNES wears me down with his attempts to impress the radio audience each Sunday on the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra program. He mispronounces a lot of words, too, tho that isn't very important. Pitts Sanborn, on the other hand, is practically perfect most of the time and his introductions of the various instruments in the choir are swell. The gentleman with the Boston Symphony orchestra annoys me almost as much as Mr. Downes.

Post Mar 12

13

Boston Concerts and Notices

4th Tuesday Concert

Mar 8 MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, Liszt's E-flat piano concerto and Tchaikovsky's F minor Symphony occupied the program of the fourth Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert yesterday. Dr Koussevitzky conducted, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in the concerto.

Since these compositions are 19th century music, distinctly in what is loosely called the "romantic" style, all have features in common. All are written in the effusive, highly personal manner adopted by 19th century composers, who shook off the preoccupation with structural design and the principle of "music for its own sake" that dominated 18th century music. All three are expressive in terms of tone, of the composers' intellectual and temperamental peculiarities. Liszt's concerto is, as well, a medium for technical display by the pianist.

In years to come the most notable feature of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony may prove to be his uncontrolled exuberance. Indeed, such already appears to be the case. Schumann's themes and his manner of constructing this work become trite after repeated hearings. This, of course, by no means disparages his individual melodic and harmonic gifts. His place, insofar as those are concerned, was long since made secure.

Of the six Symphonies that Tchaikovsky wrote, only the last three are played nowadays. This Fourth Symphony is perhaps the best in respect of formal unity and freedom from Tchaikovsky's occasiinal weakness of thematic banality. Here, too, the textune—is somewhat more involved. The composer refrained from the extremes of emotional feeling which are hallmarks of the Fifth and "Pathetic" Symphonies. Moreover, the passages where the drum beats and the brass blares in the triple forte, have a strong under-current that invariably stirs one. Such pages, in the Fifth Symphony especially, are more often than not superficial noise.

Mr Sanroma was heartily acclaimed for his playing of Liszt's concerto. One is inclined to feel, however, that this pianist's domain is modern music. His playing yesterday lacked the frenzy, the sweeping outline, that this concerto ought to have. Wrong notes were at times conspicuous. It is sufficient to say that Dr Koussevitzky's conducting was of customary order. This obviates the necessity of describing, paragraph after paragraph, his gorgeous tone, stimulating rhythm, and individual phrasing.

The next concert of the series comes March 28.

C. W. D.

Her. MUSIC Mar 8

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY

The fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series took place yesterday. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist, and the program was as follows:

Schumann..........Symphony No. 1 in B flat
Liszt........Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat
Tchaikovsky....Symphony No. 4 in F minor

It is a habit of biographers and a mildly amusing pastime of other people to conceive of certain artists as having lived in the wrong century. Schumann lived exactly when he ought to have, even though he was not precisely happy. Liszt, certainly, should be living today. What would he not do with modern sound devices? The triangle of this E flat concerto would be a mere bagatelle in the orchestration. Tchaikovsky should, at times (such as the finale of this 4th symphony), have never been born at all or, because of it, have taken to "out-Sousaing" Sousa.

The "Spring" symphony of Schumann is the finest flower of romantic music, or if not, and there are any finer examples, then Schumann composed them. Complaints have been heard that this symphony is performed too much. On can only throw up one's hands in despair and ask: What about Tchaikovsky, the Franck D minor, the uninterrupted torrent of Strauss? If one must be nasty—what about Brahms? Even without calling names, which is hardly argument, the Spring symphony is quite sturdy enough to stand more repetition than Symphony hall has heard.

Mr. Sanroma's performance of the Liszt concerto was superb. Liszt should be played with all the style and brio possible, a fact which Mr. Sanroma understood. In some of the sentimental passages Mr. Sanroma's playing might be called "overripe." Such playing makes the concerto too much of a period piece and as such merely ludicrous. At one point Mr. Sanroma held a leading note so long that one expected an elderly patron to fall off the balcony from suspense. Mr. Sanroma's brilliant performances of Liszt have long been known to Boston, so that it is only fair to add that his playing yesterday afternoon was not merely impressive because it was Liszt.

A. W. W.

Post Mar 8

FOURTH TUESDAY CONCERT

Sanroma Soloist With Symphony in Liszt Concert

Yesterday afternoon brought to Symphony Hall the fourth of the series of Tuesday afternoon Symphony Concerts in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra set before their audience masterpieces of symphonic music old and new, and brought to this particular audience three outstanding examples of romanticism, the "Spring" Symphony of Schumann, reçently heard at a regular pair of subscription concerts, the E-flat Piano Concerto of Liszt, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

REPEATEDLY RECALLED

Mr. Sanroma has of recent years taken his place as one of Boston's favored pianists, and particularly has he been hailed by his own generation, the younger habitues of the concert-hall. Much of his attention has been bestowed upon composers of our own day, and his reputation as executant and interpreter of these moderns is well deserved. Yet he has now and again proved that his sympathies have a wider range, and yesterday his playing of this more-than-80-year-old Concerto of Liszt revealed his response to the musical expression of an earlier day.

There is opportunity for brilliance, for technical display, in this as in other works of Liszt; there is also opportunity for a poetizing touch, and this Mr. Sanroma supplied with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra aiding and abetting. The enthusiastic hearers recalled Mr. Sanroma repeatedly to the stage.

Schumann's Symphony was warmly received, too, as the finely wrought performance warranted. And to Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony audience, orchestra and conductor alike responded. That Dr. Koussevitzky is stirred and swayed by the music of Tchaikovsky is a point that no longer requires laboring; that thus stirred he draws from his orchestra a performance that is something more than technical proficiency is likewise by now familiar knowledge. Whatever the individual response to this Fourth Symphony, there can be no gainsaying the fact that any in yesterday's audience who were actually being introduced to this music heard it in complete revelation.

FROM DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Trans Mar 2

To the Editor of the Transcript:

My attention has been called to an article in your respected journal in which my name was used. In it I read that I was entertained by a certain Mr. Paneyko to hear a new radio apparatus. I have never been entertained by Mr. Paneyko.

I have, indeed, heard the apparatus of the inventor Mr. Boris Nagashev and wish to make it clear that I have no connection with Mr. Paneyko and have never heard any apparatus which may be in his possession.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston; Feb. 27.

The Falmouth Enterprise

Falmouth, Mass.. Thursday, March 2, 1933.

DOROTHY G. WAYMAN
Editor
GEORGE A. HOUGH, JR.,
Publisher

The Falmouth Enterprise and The Bourne Enterprise, owned by the Falmouth Publishing Co., Inc., are the only newspapers printed and published in Falmouth. The Bourne Enterprise is the only weekly edited especially for Bourne.
Successors to
The Nautical Intelligencer, Barnstable County's first newspaper, established in Falmouth, November 21, 1823.
The Falmouth Local—1886.
The Cape Cod Independent—1890.

Foreign Advertising Representative: American Press Association, 225 West 39th Street, New York City.

on to all interested to attend.

ON ORCHESTRA LIST

Cape Codders are well represent-d on the subscription list of the oston Symphony Orchestra. The ollowing are regular subscribers:

Miss Constance Ayer
Miss Josephine Atkins
Miss Mary C. Baker
Mrs. Chas. L. Ayling
Mrs. Robert W. Cumming
Mrs. George T. Minot
Thomas Nassi
Mrs. George B. Johnson
Mrs. W. Wood Smith
Miss Ruth S. Silver
Mrs. A. L. Thorndike
Miss Isabel Wesson
Mrs. Goddard White
Mrs. W. D. Wright

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52d season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

Many Concord Music Lovers Attend Boston Symphony Concerts

Mar 2

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of Concord people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The following are regular subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Miss Mary A. Barrett, Mrs. George H. Blake, Mrs. Wells Blanchard, Dr. Theodore Chamberlain, Frederic H. Chase, Mrs. Gaylord C. Cummin, Mrs. Alfred Curtis, Mrs. Raymond Emerson, Miss Elizabeth L. Everett, Mrs. Allen French, Miss Sarah S. Goodwin, Miss Grace A. Heard, Hubert W. Lamb, Middlesex School, Miss Helen A. Legate, Mrs. H. F. Leith, Mrs. Harry Little, Mrs. Frederick H. Lovejoy, Mrs. M. Irving Motte, Mrs. Charles H. Pepper, Mrs. George B. Proctor, Mrs. Russell Robb, Mrs. T. Mott Shaw, Mrs. Walter K. Shaw, Mrs. Henry F. Smith, Mrs. Theodore I. Smith, Miss Eleanor R. Snelling, Mrs. Louis A. Sohier, Mrs. Brooks Stevens, Jr., Thomas Whitney Surette, Mrs. Frederick Winsor, Miss Mary Wheeler, Miss Elizabeth D. Wood.

MANY MUSIC LOVERS ATTEND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Winchester Star Mar 3

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor. has raised to new heights in this its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular Winchester subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Robert Bacon
W. H. W. Bicknell
Mrs. George Bryne
Mrs. Fiske Bradford
Mrs. Elinor R. Clark
Mrs. George Coit
A. T. Downer
Mrs. Cutler Downer
Miss Abby Dunham
Mrs. L. K. Ely
Miss B. E. Eaton
Miss E. Maud Folts
Mrs. T. I. Freeburn
Mrs C. Farnsworth
Mrs. Arthur E. Gates
Mrs. Edwing Ginn
Miss Louise Giles
Mrs. Douglas Graves
Miss Emma Grebe
Mrs. W. R. Healey
Miss Ella M. Horne
Mrs Mabel A. Horne
Miss Alice Joy
Mrs. John H. Joy
Mrs. Anthony Kelly
Mrs. H. J. Kellogg
Mrs. C. Livingstone
Mrs. George Meade
Miss Alice A. Main
Elizabeth Marston
Mrs. C. Ordway
Miss Barbara Pike
Mrs. Lewis Parkhurst
Mrs. John E. Page
Mrs. Paul S. Phenix
Mrs. George Proctor
Mrs. Arthur Robbins
Mrs. Albert Sisson
Mrs. T. W. Smith
Arthur T. Smith
Mrs. F. S. Snyder
L. R. Talbot
Mrs. P. R. Taylor
Mrs Ida H. Tufts
Miss Frances Ullman
Mrs. C. A. Warren
Mrs. F. M. White
Mrs. W. Wightman
Mrs. J. B. Willing
William U. Wyman
William L. Ziegel

BROCKTONIANS ARE PATRONS

Subscribers For Series of Hub Concerts.

Boston, March 1.—A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, revealed that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this its 52d season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own auditorium. The following are regular subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Brockton—Miss Elva R. Boyden, William B. Chapman, Mrs. James B. Fraser, Miss Lillian Gray, Mrs. Joseph Hewett, Miss Laura B. Kenney, George Knight, I. S. Kibrick, Miss Gerda Nelson, Miss Ruth E. Norris, Donald Richman, Miss Marion S. Reynolds, Miss Alice M. Riley.

Campello—Mrs. Eldon B. Keith, Miss Lillian D. Leach, Mrs. Frank E. Packard.

North Easton—Mrs. Hobart Ames, Mrs. John S. Ames, Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham, Miss Mary L. Lamprey.

Bridgewater—Mrs. H. K. Aldrich, Miss Eusebia Burrill, Miss Lois L. Decker, Joseph Machin, Miss Frieda Rand.

Braintree—Miss Dorothy H. Blewett, Mrs. Porter Brown, Mrs. J. S. Cohen, Miss Laura M. Currie, Miss Caroline E. Flint, Mrs. Hans Hagen, Miss S. Emma Keith, Mrs. George W. Treat, Mrs. W. H. Weatherbee.

Middleboro—Miss Helen F. Archer, Morris C. Hastings.

Whitman—William G. Kirby.

Holbrook—William C. Sprague.

Boston Concerts and notices

4th Tuesday Concert

Mar 8 MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, Liszt's E-flat piano concerto and Tchaikovsky's F minor Symphony occupied the program of the fourth Tuesday afternoon Symphony concert yesterday. Dr Koussevitzky conducted, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in the concerto.

Since these compositions are 19th century music, distinctly in what is loosely called the "romantic" style, all have features in common. All are written in the effusive, highly personal manner adopted by 19th century composers, who shook off the preoccupation with structural design and the principle of "music for its own sake" that dominated 18th century music. All three are expressive in terms of tone, of the composers' intellectual and temperamental peculiarities. Liszt's concerto is, as well, a medium for technical display by the pianist.

In years to come the most notable feature of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony may prove to be his uncontrolled exuberance. Indeed, such already appears to be the case. Schumann's themes and his manner of constructing this work become trite after repeated hearings. This, of course, by no means disparages his individual melodic and harmonic gifts. His place, insofar as those are concerned, was long since made secure.

Of the six Symphonies that Tchaikovsky wrote, only the last three are played nowadays. This Fourth Symphony is perhaps the best in respect of formal unity and freedom from Tchaikovsky's occasiinal weakness of thematic banality. Here, too, the textune—is somewhat more involved. The composer refrained from the extremes of emotional feeling which are hallmarks of the Fifth and "Pathetic" Symphonies. Moreover, the passages where the drum beats and the brass blares in the triple forte, have a strong under-current that invariably stirs one. Such pages, in the Fifth Symphony especially, are more often than not superficial noise.

Mr Sanroma was heartily acclaimed for his playing of Liszt's concerto. One is inclined to feel, however, that this pianist's domain is modern music. His playing yesterday lacked the frenzy, the sweeping outline, that this concerto ought to have. Wrong notes were at times conspicuous. It is sufficient to say that Dr Koussevitzky's conducting was of customary order. This obviates the necessity of describing, paragraph after paragraph, his gorgeous tone, stimulating rhythm, and individual phrasing.

The next concert of the series comes March 28. C. W. D.

Her. MUSIC Mar 8

TUESDAY AFTERNOON SYMPHONY

The fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series took place yesterday. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist, and the program was as follows:

Schumann..........Symphony No. 1 in B flat
Liszt.........Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat
Tchaikovsky....Symphony No. 4 in F minor

It is a habit of biographers and a mildly amusing pastime of other people to conceive of certain artists as having lived in the wrong century. Schumann lived exactly when he ought to have, even though he was not precisely happy. Liszt, certainly, should be living today. What would he not do with modern sound devices? The triangle of this E flat concerto would be a mere bagatelle in the orchestration. Tchaikovsky should, at times (such as the finale of this 4th symphony), have never been born at all or, because of it, have taken to "out-Sousaing" Sousa.

The "Spring" symphony of Schumann is the finest flower of romantic music, or if not, and there are any finer examples, then Schumann composed them. Complaints have been heard that this symphony is performed too much. On can only throw up one's hands in despair and ask: What about Tchaikovsky, the Franck D minor, the uninterrupted torrent of Strauss? If one must be nasty—what about Brahms? Even without calling names, which is hardly argument, the Spring symphony is quite sturdy enough to stand more repetition than Symphony hall has heard.

Mr. Sanroma's performance of the Liszt concerto was superb. Liszt should be played with all the style and brio possible, a fact which Mr. Sanroma understood. In some of the sentimental passages Mr. Sanroma's playing might be called "overripe." Such playing makes the concerto too much of a period piece and as such merely ludicrous. At one point Mr. Sanroma held a leading note so long that one expected an elderly patron to fall off the balcony from suspense. Mr. Sanroma's brilliant performances of Liszt have long been known to Boston, so that it is only fair to add that his playing yesterday afternoon was not merely impressive because it was Liszt.

A. W. W.

Post Mar 8

FOURTH TUESDAY CONCERT

Sanroma Soloist With Symphony in Liszt Concert

Yesterday afternoon brought to Symphony Hall the fourth of the series of Tuesday afternoon Symphony Concerts in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra set before their audience masterpieces of symphonic music old and new, and brought to this particular audience three outstanding examples of romanticism, the "Spring" Symphony of Schumann, recently heard at a regular pair of subscription concerts, the E-flat Piano Concerto of Liszt, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

REPEATEDLY RECALLED

Mr. Sanroma has of recent years taken his place as one of Boston's favored pianists, and particularly has he been hailed by his own generation, the younger habitues of the concert-hall. Much of his attention has been bestowed upon composers of our own day, and his reputation as executant and interpreter of these moderns is well deserved. Yet he has now and again proved that his sympathies have a wider range, and yesterday his playing of this more-than-80-year-old Concerto of Liszt revealed his response to the musical expression of an earlier day.

There is opportunity for brilliance, for technical display, in this as in other works of Liszt; there is also opportunity for a poetizing touch, and this Mr. Sanroma supplied with Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra aiding and abetting. The enthusiastic hearers recalled Mr. Sanroma repeatedly to the stage.

Schumann's Symphony was warmly received, too, as the finely wrought performance warranted. And to Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony audience, orchestra and conductor alike responded. That Dr. Koussevitzky is stirred and swayed by the music of Tchaikovsky is a point that no longer requires laboring; that thus stirred he draws from his orchestra a performance that is something more than technical proficiency is likewise by now familiar knowledge. Whatever the individual response to this Fourth Symphony, there can be no gainsaying the fact that any in yesterday's audience who were actually being introduced to this music heard it in complete revelation.

FROM DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Trans Mar 2

To the Editor of the Transcript:

My attention has been called to an article in your respected journal in which my name was used. In it I read that I was entertained by a certain Mr. Paneyko to hear a new radio apparatus. I have never been entertained by Mr. Paneyko.

I have, indeed, heard the apparatus of the inventor Mr. Boris Nagashev and wish to make it clear that I have no connection with Mr. Paneyko and have never heard any apparatus which may be in his possession. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Feb. 27.

The Falmouth Enterprise

Falmouth, Mass.. Thursday, March 2, 1933.

DOROTHY G. WAYMAN
Editor
GEORGE A. HOUGH, JR.,
Publisher

The Falmouth Enterprise and The Bourne Enterprise, owned by the Falmouth Publishing Co., Inc., are the only newspapers printed and published in Falmouth. The Bourne Enterprise is the only weekly edited especially for Bourne.

Successors to
The Nautical Intelligencer, Barnstable County's first newspaper, established in Falmouth, November 21, 1823.
The Falmouth Local—1886.
The Cape Cod Independent—1890.

Foreign Advertising Representative: American Press Association, 225 West 39th Street, New York City.

on to all interested to attend.

ON ORCHESTRA LIST

Cape Codders are well represented on the subscription list of the oston Symphony Orchestra. The llowing are regular subscribers:

Miss Constance Ayer
Miss Josephine Atkins
Miss Mary C. Baker
Mrs. Chas. L. Ayling
Mrs. Robert W. Cumming
Mrs. George T. Minot
Thomas Nassi
Mrs. George B. Johnson
Mrs. W. Wood Smith
Miss Ruth S. Silver
Mrs. A. L. Thorndike
Miss Isabel Wesson
Mrs. Goddard White
Mrs. W. D. Wright

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52d season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

Many Concord Music Lovers Attend Boston Symphony Concerts

Concord [illegible] Mar 2

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of Concord people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The following are regular subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Miss Mary A. Barrett, Mrs. George H. Blake, Mrs. Wells Blanchard, Dr. Theodore Chamberlain, Frederic H. Chase, Mrs. Gaylord C. Cummin, Mrs. Alfred Curtis, Mrs. Raymond Emerson, Miss Elizabeth L. Everett, Mrs. Allen French, Miss Sarah S. Goodwin, Miss Grace A. Heard, Hubert W. Lamb, Middlesex School, Miss Helen A. Legate, Mrs. H. F. Leith, Mrs. Harry Little, Mrs. Frederick H. Lovejoy, Mrs. M. Irving Motte, Mrs. Charles H. Pepper, Mrs. George B. Proctor, Mrs. Russell Robb, Mrs. T. Mott Shaw, Mrs. Walter K. Shaw, Mrs. Henry F. Smith, Mrs. Theodore I. Smith, Miss Eleanor R. Snelling, Mrs. Louis A. Sohier, Mrs. Brooks Stevens, Jr., Thomas Whitney Surette, Mrs. Frederick Winsor, Miss Mary Wheeler, Miss Elizabeth D. Wood.

MANY MUSIC LOVERS ATTEND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Winchester Star Mar 3

A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The great orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own magnificent auditorium.

The following are regular Winchester subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Robert Bacon
W. H. W. Bicknell
Mrs. George Bryne
Mrs. Fiske Bradford
Mrs. Elinor R. Clark
Mrs. George Coit
A. T. Downer
Mrs. Cutler Downer
Miss Abby Dunham
Mrs. L. K. Ely
Miss B. E. Eaton
Miss E. Maud Folts
Mrs. T. I. Freeburn
Mrs C. Farnsworth
Mrs. Arthur E. Gates
Mrs. Edwing Ginn
Miss Louise Giles
Mrs. Douglas Graves
Miss Emma Grebe
Mrs. W. R. Healey
Miss Ella M. Horne
Mrs Mabel A. Horne
Miss Alice Joy
Mrs. John H. Joy
Mrs. Anthony Kelly
Mrs. H. J. Kellogg
Mrs. C. Livingstone
Mrs. George Meade
Miss Alice A. Main
Elizabeth Marston
Mrs. C. Ordway
Miss Barbara Pike
Mrs. Lewis Parkhurst
Mrs. John E. Page
Mrs. Paul S. Phenix
Mrs. George Proctor
Mrs. Arthur Robbins
Mrs. Albert Sisson
Mrs. T. W. Smith
Arthur T. Smith
Mrs. F. S. Snyder
L. R. Talbot
Mrs. P. R. Taylor
Mrs Ida H. Tufts
Miss Frances Ullman
Mrs. C. A. Warren
Mrs. F. M. White
Mrs. W. Wightman
Mrs. J. B. Willing
William U. Wyman
William L. Ziegel

BROCKTONIANS ARE PATRONS

Mar 1

Subscribers For Series of Hub Concerts.

Brock. Enterprise

Boston, March 1.—A compilation of the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, revealed that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this its 52d season, has been forced to curtail visits to New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston. Many who attended these concerts when the orchestra was an annual visitor in the days past are still patrons of music and enjoy the concerts in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's own auditorium. The following are regular subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series:

Brockton—Miss Elva R. Boyden. William B. Chapman, Mrs. James B. Fraser, Miss Lillian Gray, Mrs. Joseph Hewett, Miss Laura B. Kenney, George Knight, I. S. Kibrick, Miss Gerda Nelson, Miss Ruth E. Norris, Donald Richman, Miss Marion S. Reynolds, Miss Alice M. Riley.

Campello—Mrs. Eldon B. Keith, Miss Lillian D. Leach, Mrs. Frank E. Packard.

North Easton—Mrs. Hobart Ames, Mrs. John S. Ames, Mrs. William H. Ames, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham, Miss Mary L. Lamprey.

Bridgewater—Mrs. H. K. Aldrich, Miss Eusebia Burrill, Miss Lois L. Decker, Joseph Machin, Miss Frieda Rand.

Braintree—Miss Dorothy H. Blewett, Mrs. Porter Brown, Mrs. J. S. Cohen, Miss Laura M. Currie, Miss Caroline E. Flint, Mrs. Hans Hagen, Miss S. Emma Keith, Mrs. George W. Treat, Mrs. W. H. Weatherbee.

Middleboro—Miss Helen F. Archer, Morris C. Hastings.

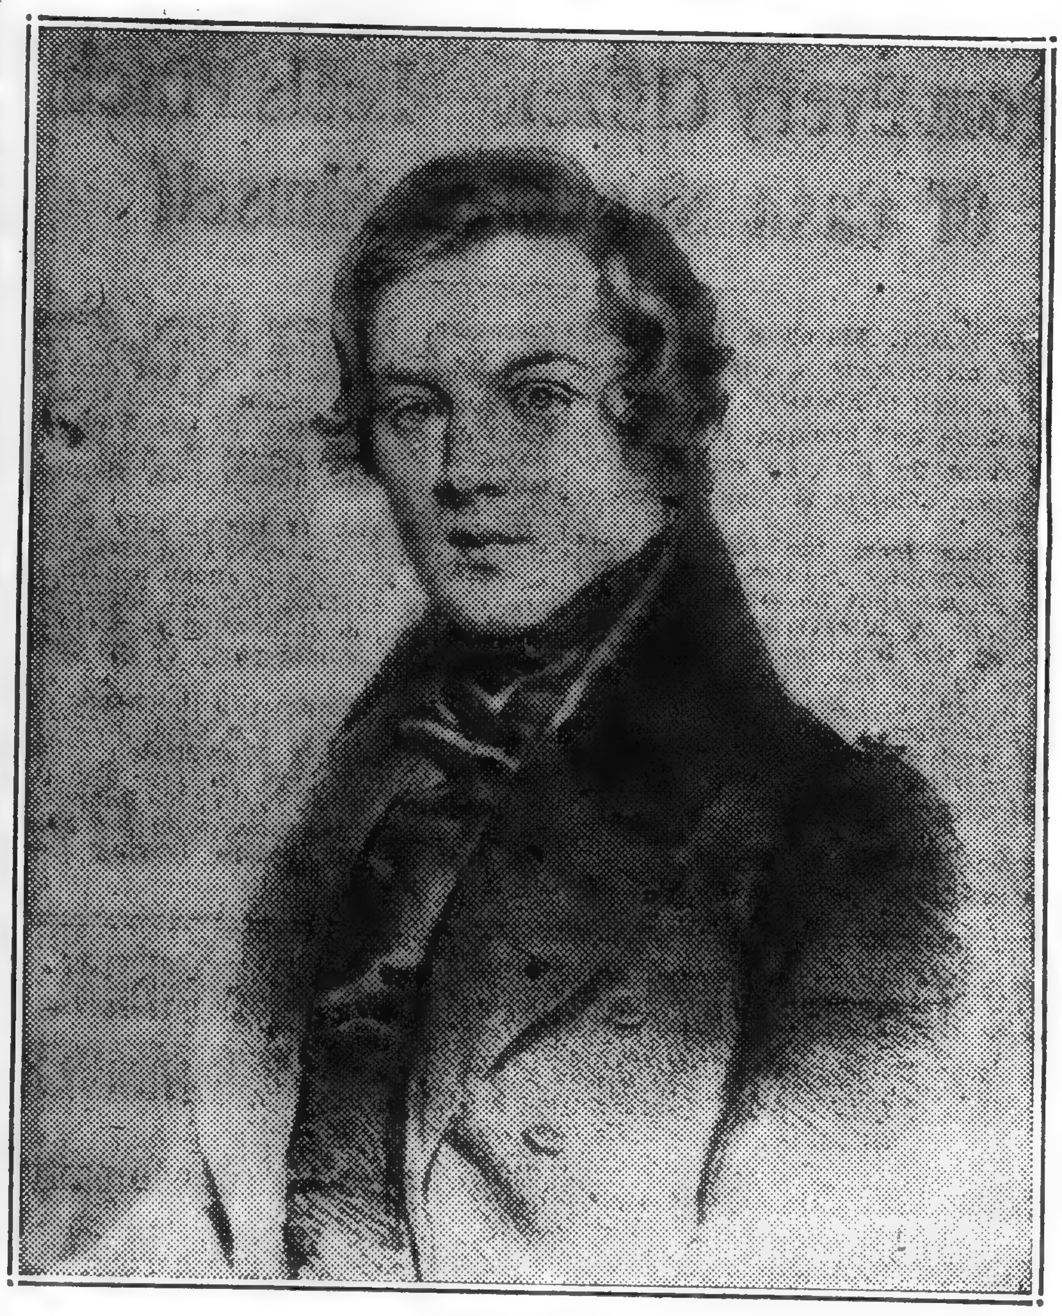
Whitman—William G. Kirby.

Holbrook—William C. Sprague.

E BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, MARCH 7,

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Friend Robert



NOBLE YOUTH

SINCE there is such music in the world as Robert Schumann's, it would be a pity not to have people know about it.

That anyone should be able to write finer songs than Schubert's would seem preposterous, yet Schumann wrote them. How could the deepest emotion of a man genuinely in love be sounded more beautifully than in his "Widmung" (Dedication)? A lover might carry that song in his heart for a lifetime. And not an April should return without reawakening the gusty pangs of delight which pulsate through his "Fruhlingsnacht" (Spring Night)—a song like the breath of warm winds drawing across new-ploughed fields on the first mild evening, when windows stand open to the jocund roar of torrents and the shrill-sweet tweet-tweeting of hylas in the marsh bottoms. There is another to the words of Byron's "Sun of the Sleepless" which can haunt the memory year after year and brush with its finger-tips the violoncello strings of the hungry heart. . . . And these are only three out of a hundred.

"What's the use of music?" Allow me to mention one. Schumann's "Carnaval" is a joyous festival for pianoforte, which opens with the silvern shock of chords struck out with both hands. Youth, vitality and high spirits crackle in it like electricity. Suppose you get up in the morning feeling rather groggy and wondering how you are going to get through the day. Start the music of that first page of the "Carnaval" going through your head, and you are ready for whatever comes. Its effect exceeds that of a stiff shot of whisky plus a cold water bath. This may be useful to know. For besides the "Faschingsswanck aus Wien" (Vienna Carnival Pranks), and the "Etudes Symphoniques" (Symphonic Studies) both of which are in the same vein; besides such gay little lyrics as the "Aufschwung" (Soaring) and "Grillen" (Whims).

Now to come to the Pianoforte Quintet. If I were custodian at Heaven's Gate, and the Machine Age, none too sure of a welcome, presented itself for admission, I would, despite all the crimes wherewith its face is blackened, let it in without a murmur. And wherefore? All for the sake of one good deed. What one? That it has produced phonograph records which enable us to live day by day with the music of the Quintet for Pianoforte and strings until it becomes so familiar as to be an unconscious part of the waking consciousness which can be enjoyed at any time and in any place at will. Not only has it brought this Quintet (which could serve as a textbook for an understanding of the "sonata form," central to classical music), but there are also excellent recordings of the "Spring" Symphony and the Pianoforte Concerto which radiate just as inexhaustible energizations of pleasure. These works are such music as could only have been created by a man whose heart was bubbling over with affection and joy. Its effect on listeners is extraordinary. As Schumann himself wittily said, "The sound of music sets birds singing and dogs barking!"

Suggestion: On a Sunday morning in June carry the phonograph out on the lawn under the big maple, spread a steamer rug on the grass, stretch out on it at ease, eyes to the rustling branches, the sky and the clouds, have someone start the "Spring" Symphony, and see what happens to you! Perhaps it may require more than one hearing to make its way, for, to my astonishment, I have discovered that not every one likes even that matchless Quintet the first time through. But give Robert Schumann a fair chance and he will make friends.

To be young without knowing his music is a misfortune I would not care to contemplate; but to know his music at any age whatsoever is never to grow old, for out of its heart perpetually and perennially streams the elixir of eternal youth.

L. P.

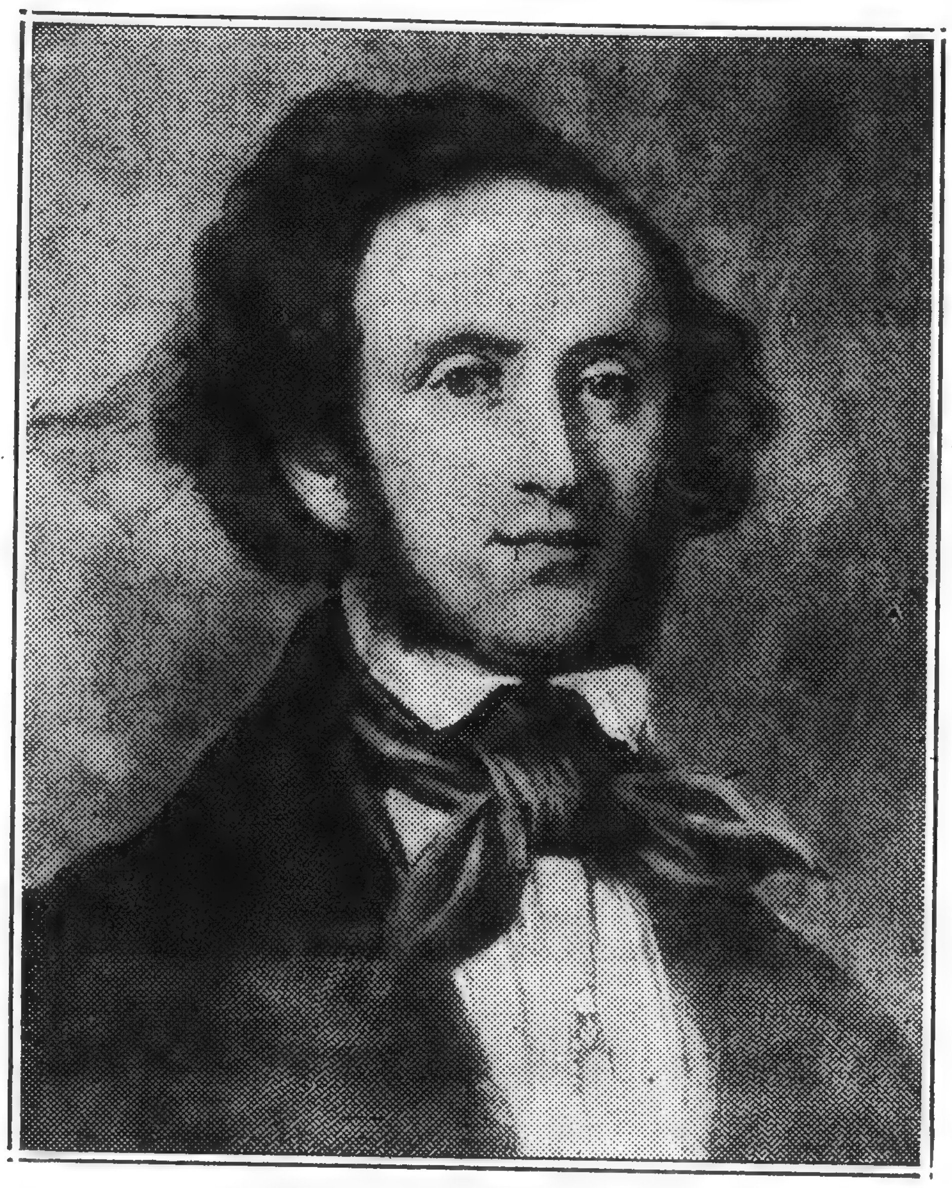
Abe Martin Sayings

Ther's more worryin' t' day o'er gittin' gray than ther is over all th' wayward children an' business depressions put t'gether. Th' only way t' entertain some folks is t' listen t' 'em.

BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8,

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Felix the Fortunate



"HE BEHAVED HANDSOMELY, AS USUAL"

FELIX means happy, and Felix Mendelssohn was happily named. His people were wealthy Jews who had embraced Christianity and the grandfather was an author of repute. In fact, the Berlin banker complained that he had spent the first half of his life being the son of Moses Mendelssohn and its second half, the father of Felix.

To have been Fortune's favorite is the one offense a man is never forgiven, and the world has held it against Mendelssohn that there was always a cab waiting for him at the railroad station. But never did favorite more perfectly play the gentleman. Many a good musician had occasion to thank his stars for the generosity of Felix Mendelssohn. He was a shade egotistical, was he? Well, how much do you expect for your nickle?

He was nourished on the cream of German culture. Their Berlin house had a concert hall in its garden which was frequented on Sunday afternoons by the pick of the town and of the land, and Felix was taught by Zelter, Goethe's major domo Grand Vizier in questions of musical taste (often a bad one), and as a boy Felix played for the aged Goethe at Weimar.

His short life was a triumphal progress. England became his adoptive step-Fatherland; his oratorios, the "St Paul" and "Elijah," have made England resound scarcely less than those of Handel, and the London musical public did its best to spoil him. As head of the Leipsic Conservatory he made that city the musical capital of Germany. It was he who rescued Bach's music from its century of oblivion and caused to be performed Schubert's mighty C-Major Symphony after his friend Schumann had exhumed the manuscript from the composer's posthumus papers. It took Mendelssohn a long while to find out that Schumann was primarily a composer and not a journalist, but when he did he behaved handsomely, as usual.

Mendelssohn's symphonies will wear well, his oratorios are hardy annuals and his violin concerto survives 89 years of war-horsing. Never suggest to violinists that it be given a rest, for you will get nowhere. Indeed, its charm is irresistible, and besides its being lovely music, it is admirably "violinistic," thanks to its author having repeatedly submitted the manuscript to Ferdinand David, his concert-meister, for technical criticism. His piano concertos have fallen to conservatory students, and it was Hector Berlioz' little joke that from much playing of Mendelssohn's G Major Concerto one of the pianofortes in the Paris Conservatoire went mad and kept on playing it all Summer when the institution was closed!

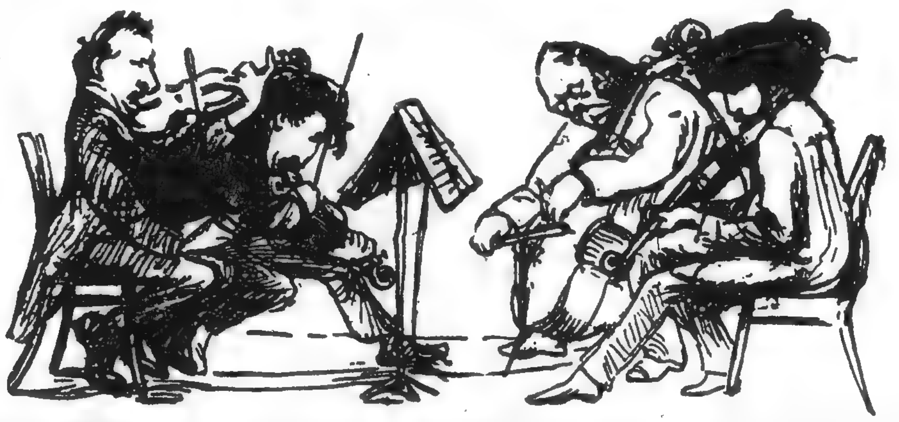
Mendelssohn did one thing that wins every heart. That delightful 17-year-old boy wrote an "Overture" to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" which was, and remains, one of those astounding feats of artistic perfection that embarrass the author the remainder of his life, although 16 years later he added the rest of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and it is all equally magical. Do not let anyone persuade you to go to your grave until you have stored this music in your head and have taken it out into the woods on a moonlit night of Summer. (The phonograph records are excellent and make memorization easy). The music is moonlight made audible, and Shakespeare's elves dance before the very eyes of the hearing.

Why begrudge Felix Mendelssohn his happy life? Was it not about time a composer had one? Besides, it only lasted 38 years. What voltage music must carry, to burn out its luminaries in so short a time? But who would not be burnt out, if by so being he might shine eternally?

BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, MARCH 11,

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Friends Worth Cultivating



CARICATURE OF THAT ARISTOCRAT IN MUSIC, THE STRING QUARTET

(From "History of Music in Pictures," by Georg Kinsky, published by E. P. Dutton Company, New York)

FRIENDS worth having are seldom made in a day. A fine personality has more depth than that; and besides, the affair is too serious. We are placed on probation, tested a hundred ways, for disposition, stamina, reliability, brains, and the ability to hold our tongues. Our behavior is watched under conditions of discomfort, danger, adversity, perhaps even injustice and persecution. When these tests are weathered, suddenly we find ourselves accepted completely, and for life. It was worth working for and waiting for.

Great music is a friend worth cultivating. These works are not for the shallow or the idle. Some of them, it is true, are instantly likable; yet all of them require to be lived with and heard repeatedly. But when they do accept us, it is for life.

How straight runs this apostolic succession of composers. Bach learns from Heinrich Schutz, and begets a son, Karl, from whom Haydn learns; Mozart and Beethoven study under Haydn; Schubert knows Beethoven, and Beethoven guesses Schubert's talent; Schumann venerates Schubert, and Brahms is musical godson of Schumann. Mendelssohn and Schumann are close friends. Sibelius meets Brahms, and so it goes. "Thy truth endureth from generation to generation," and likewise from generation to generation of these composers there is almost physically an apostolic laying-on of hands. Each heir elects himself. Genius does not descend from sire to son, but from great soul to great soul.

These men are the heroes, founders, saints and martyrs of a religion. They go through hell that they may fill our world with beauty and joy. If we are to speak of revealed religion at all, then what is music? For no one knows what it is. Like electricity, we use it; but our knowledge ends there. It is a vibration. And since the discovery of radio, our frame of mind in the presence of these unseen worlds is much more respectful.

Music, whatever else it may be, is a direct communication from the invisible. That, as we have seen, is how it gets itself composed and written down. The quality of these thought vibrations which go into the making of great music has a subtle and powerful effect, even upon such a practical issue as conduct. It brings the listener into a state of mind similar to that of the composer when he created it. We thus become participators in the highest states of consciousness possible to mankind.

This influence of course permeates the whole personality and it can become involuntarily ennobling. We are uplifted whether we will or no, and left with an instinctive disrelish for ignobility of any sort. Is it any wonder, then, that the performance of fine music is a religious rite which people are willing to pay good money to attend? Here is a world of peace and joy in which we can take refuge, where the wicked (including our troublesome selves) cease from troubling; an emergency exit, "This Way Out in Case of Distress," inscribed in letters of gold over the gateway to music.

If one has money, music is worth paying for handsomely (there is really no cash equivalent for it) in lessons, concerts and phonograph records, exactly as though these last were books, which in fact they are—printed sound; if not, then music comes, thank Heaven, free, over the air to anyone who can rig up a radio set. Have the Immortals relented and sent us this Great Consoler exactly when we need it most?

This is what the composers have done for us. What are we prepared to do for them? Are they not worth an effort to comprehend? Shall we permit these sacred writings to be cheapened, vulgarized, insulted, preyed upon, and filched from by the unworthy? When we might have the best, shall we tamely accept the sixth-rate? And shall we not give this holy art our gratitude and reverence? For it may well be that the artist, and especially the musician, will prove to have been the unique contribution of us European peoples to the religious experience of mankind.

L. P.

(CONCLUSION OF THIS SERIES)

Current News From Boston's Concert-Halls

The Sinfonietta of Mr. Hill, "Zarathustra" Again, Programs Ahead

TRANS MAR 9

UPON this week's program for the Symphony Concerts Dr. Koussevitzky has placed two pieces of novel interest. One, appropriately, will be heard for the first time on the excursion of the orchestra to Cambridge this evening. The other had a single hearing at Symphony Hall ten years ago. The new work is a Sinfonietta by Professor Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard University. The revival is a Night Piece for Flute and Strings by the veteran, Arthur Foote, who turned his eightieth birthday last Sunday. There are still resident composers whom conductor and audiences welcome.

First, for the Sinfonietta, this department is privileged to print the following note from the composer himself: "Last spring Dr. Koussevitzky suggested my trying a symphony in one movement. Despite numerous experiments from the time of Liszt's piano-concertos and his piano-sonata, the problem is still not without interest. I planned therefore to begin with the usual exposition of sonata-form, to substitute for the usual development section, a slow movement on independent themes, somewhat brief but fulfilling its normal function of contrast. This section, in turn, leads to a finale, based also upon independent themes. Before the end, a return is made to the opening theme of the first section by way of recapitulation before the piece ends.

"The themes as a whole are suggestive of a 'sinfonietta' rather than a full-grown symphony; hence the title. I may add that as in others of my recent pieces there is no descriptive basis. The task of developing musical themes is sufficiently difficult without trying simultaneously to attain a specific atmosphere to agree with some program. It has not seemed necessary, however, to restrict the orchestra."

More Particularly

The Sinfonietta—writes A. H. M. in weekly function as able analyst—runs in one movement with three principal divisions. It was written last summer. It is self-contained music, with not a sign or a vestige of a program. Out of the themes and the contrasts between themes Mr. Hill designs his music. It is the most compact and concise of the three symphonies which he has written to date. The orchestra assembles four flutes (one alternating with piccolo), two oboes and an English horn, three clarinets and a bass clarinet, two bassoons and a double bassoon, six horns, three trumpets, three trombones and a tuba, the usual modern percussion, piano and strings.

Each of the three divisions contains two contrasting themes. The first theme of the first division begins with energetic repeated chords. Interwoven with these chords is a counter-theme played by horns which probably has more significance in the work as a whole than any one of the principal themes. It is characterized by the rhythm, one of the typically "American" species of rhythm. It forms the basis for the accompaniment to a number of the other themes; appears to be the most used piece of musical matter in the entire composition. It also lends a distinctively "American" flavor to the whole —a flavor different, however, from that of the composer's first symphony, which was found to be typical of New England. The present sinfonietta might be called typically American, A. D. 1933.

The second theme of the first division is more melodic, as is the way of second themes, somewhat suggestive of a waltz in the rhythm. The middle divisions contains two contrasted melodies of long breath, highly lyrical in connotation. The counter-theme, discussed above, is frequently used by way of accompaniment. The concluding section is brilliant, again with its own themes. As a whole, the work contains two fine climaxes: one at the end of the first division; the other, more considerable, at the close of the whole. Mr. Hill is liberal in the use of dissonance. Such an interval as the diminished octave occurs frequently. His dissonances, as always, have reason and give pleasure; will not offend those, even, to whom the very term "dissonance" is anathema.

And Mr. Foote

The performance of Mr. Foote's Night Piece—A. H. M. continues—is almost an anniversary. The one previous performance at Symphony Hall came to pass almost ten years ago—on April 13, 1923, when Mr. Laurent was also the flutist. The music was composed in 1918 for flute and string quartet for the Chamber-Music Society of San Francisco, first performed at its concerts on Jan. 28, 1919. In the same form it was heard at a concert of the Flute-Players' Club in Boston on Oct. 30, 1921.

On the occasion of the previous performance Mr. Foote was exceedingly modest about his piece. The eminent programmist could get no other word from him than that it was "a slight little thing." And, without belittling it, so it is. A half-dozen pages of score-paper contain the whole. But on those half-dozen pages one can find melody of rare quality. When it was played ten years ago reviewers preferred it to a more elaborate piece for solo-flute and orchestra, with which it was paired. It is lyric, reflective music, avoiding "modernisms," avoiding also the pitfall of an attempt at a final climax—often disastrous, or even ludicrous, where so gentle an instrument as the flute is concerned. Such an idyllic, gentle, musing piece is sure to be welcomed by many.

Nine Days' Wonder

Sibelius's Sixth Symphony, in D minor, not the most impressive in the present sequence of seven, stands first on the current program. Last comes Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." When it was new piece in 1897, the composer confided the first performances in America to the Boston Orchestra, then under Mr. Paur. This town heard it in October; New York in the following December. Loud and long was the debate; strange and fierce the rhapsodies, that it provoked. Now "Zarathustra" is established concert-piece; then it was nine days' wonder upon an innocent world bedeviled. Mr. Lawrence Gilman, who was eye-and-ear witness, once recalled all this amusingly:

"Huneker, then in full prime, "declared that when the music reached the section called 'The Song of the Night Wanderer,' he renounced Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms, and became maddeningly intoxicated—not with joy, but with doubt, despair and defiance.' 'Never,' he remarked, 'shall I forget that screaming trumpet [sic] as it cut, jaggedly across the baleful gloom! Sinister beyond compare was the atmosphere, and I could have cried aloud with Dante, 'Lo! this is Dis!' " Huneker recommended that 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' be played once every season, and the audience be limited to poets, musicians, and madmen.. 'The latter, being Overmen, would grasp its sad truths.' Huneker was not the only critic who was moved to ransack Heaven and Hell for suitable images of praise or blame—though most of the appraisers stuck to Hell (or Bedlam) for their similes.

"We have long since learned to view the once amazing score more calmly. Thirty-five years take serious toll of the modernity, the startlingness, of any music. Strauss's cathedral in tones, 'dangerously sublime,' with its fantastic arches, half Gothic, half infernal, its 'hideous flying abutments, gorgeous façades, heaven-splitting spires,' does not awe us as it did in 1897. The arches are less fantastic, and not even half infernal. The flying abutments are no longer hideous. The rim of eternity does not seem quite so accessible from its soaring spires as it evidently did in the impressible and innocent nineties."

Programs to Hand

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of next week on March 17 and 18:

Suite in F major....................Roussel
Symphony on a French Mountain Air for Piano and Orchestra....................d'Indy
(Pianist: Mr. Gebhard)
Forest Murmurs from the Opera, "Siegfried"....................Wagner
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde"....................Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser"..Wagner

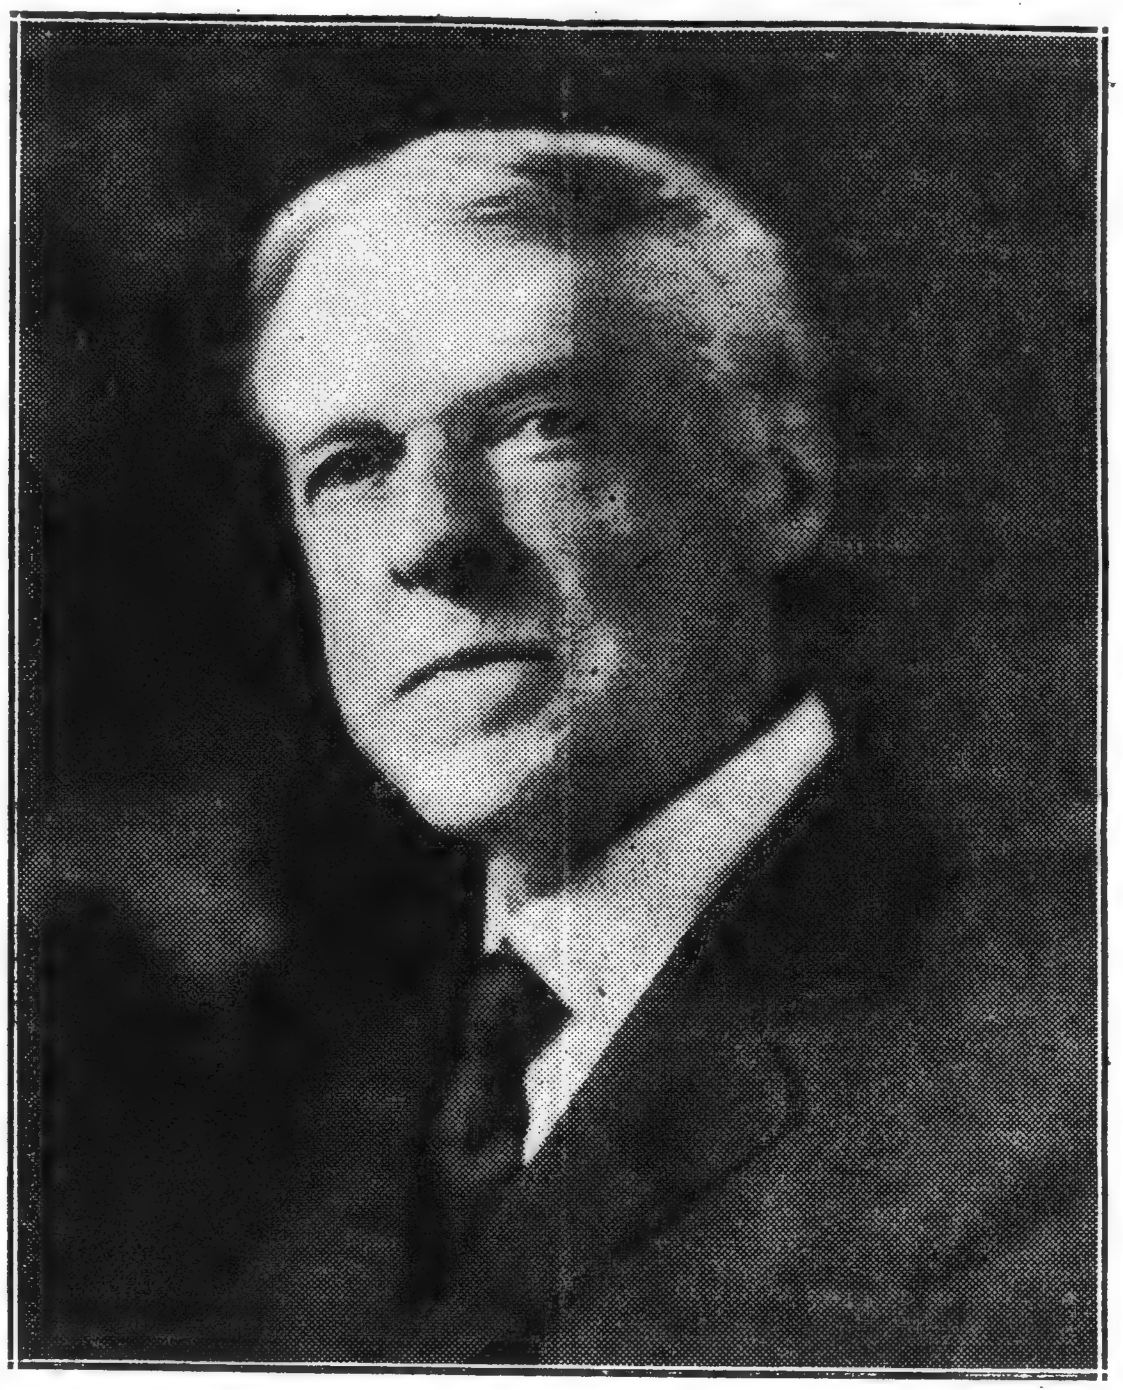
From Dr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening next:

Overture to the Opera, "Russian and Ludmilla"....................Glinka
Concerto in D major for Violin and Orchestra....................Chaikovsky
(Violinist: Miss Ippolito)
The Rite of Spring: Pictures of Pagan Russia....................Stravinsky

From Mr. Rakhmaninov, as pianist and composer, for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 19, two new transcriptions included:

Variations in C minor on an Original Theme.................... Beethoven
Prelude from the Sonata for violin in E major.................... Bach
(Transcribed by Rakhmaninov)
Night Piece, Op. 23....................Schumann
Impromptu in F minor....................Schubert
Invitation to the Dance....................Weber
(Edited by Taussig)
Scherzo from the Incidental Music to Shakspeare's Comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"....................Mendelssohn
(Transcribed by Rakhmaninov)
Nocturne and Ballad....................Chopin
Preludes in E major, B minor, A minor Rakhmaninov
Sonnet of Petrarch—Hungarian Rhapsody.Liszt

Flute—Tied with Laurel



Arthur Foote

The Eldest of Resident Composers, Whose Eightieth Birthday, on Sunday Last, Will Be Marked at the Symphony Concerts This Week by the Playing of his Night Piece for Flute and Strings

---

Tran. Mar. 9

As plans now stand at Symphony Hall, "Belshazzar's Feast" and "Evocation" will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of March 31 and April 1, with the choir of The Cecelia for assisting chorus. "Belshazzar's Feast" is the choral piece of swift and cumulative power, written by young Mr. Walton and first heard in England eighteen months ago. "Evocation," for orchestra, chorus and declaiming voice is the piece that Mr. Loeffler wrote, a year ago, for the dedication of the new hall of the Cleveland Orchestra. Mr. Walton's music will be heard for the first times in America; Mr. Loeffler's for the first times in Boston.

Post Mar 12

Daily Report Of The Music-Makers

Mr. Hill's Symphony Produced, Slonimsky and Varese, Fiedler's Concert

TRANS MAR 10

TO Cambridge one went last evening to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater. The concert might well be called "all features." Surely the first performance of a new work by Professor Hill is feature enough for any concert. Surely, also, the playing of a violin concerto of considerable proportions by Mr. Burgin is a thing to be considered. And where is the concert that would not be set off from its neighbors by the inclusion of a waltz by Johann Strauss? While finally, for all these, the major item on the program was still the performance of Schumann's "Spring" symphony.

It is proper that Professor Hill's Sinfonietta await for a full review the report on this afternoon's concert at Symphony Hall. The present writer has already treated it analytically. To that analysis he desires merely to add certain remarks of Mr. Hill, made during his exposition of the Sinfonietta at the lecture room in the Boston Public Library yesterday afternoon. Said he: "It is not a matter of affectation on my part when I say that a composer is the last person on earth who ought to talk about his own composition. I believe I have wrought thus and so. But I cannot really tell. I am not even as well fitted to judge when I hear the work in performance, as is someone to whom it is fresh and not so personal. Whether it has the necessary coherence and balance it is not for me to say. I only hope that it has." Wise words. This paragraph is only to assure Professor Hill that to one pair of ears the necessary qualities were present in abundance.

Certainly Mr. Burgin distinguished himself last evening in the playing of Glazunov's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra. Melodic qualities of an intense and exalted nature fill the first movement. A quieter and more sustained lyricism is the essence of the slow movement. Virile, mounting rhythms character the third. An elaborate cadenza provides ample opportunity for the display of technical prowess if that were needed in addition to the demands made by the concerto as a whole. Eminent artists have played many a concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One cannot honestly say that one has enjoyed any of them more than one enjoyed Mr. Burgin in this concerto last evening. The passion that is engendered by the melodies of the first part, the smooth flowing song of the second, the keen-edged, whipping rhythms of the third, the high virtuoso technic, all were his and to spare.

It is a commonplace of criticism that Schumann is at his weakest in his orchestration. But the Koussevitzkian Schumann bids fair to change all that. In the conductor's Schumann there is no muddiness of orchestral effect. And this he accomplishes without changing a note of Schumann's scores, without re-orchestrating a single measure—as has sometime been done. A wise distribution of dynamic effect assures Schumann all necessary clarity. And given this clarity, where on earth can one find more Schumannesque Schumann than in this symphony? Does one look for his ardent exuberance, it is to be found in the first and last movements. Does one look for his chordal structure, one finds it in the first movement. Does one think of his cross-rhythms, they are contained in the third movement. Is one on the alert for his especial brand of lyricism, so "innig" and so "schwärmerisch," as the Germans would have it in their untranslatable but apt descriptions, the second movement, the second theme of the first movement, are rich with it. Of a truth there is no more essential Schumann than the Schumann of the Koussevitzkian Spring Symphony.

In Strauss's waltzes called the Voices of Spring conductor and audience were entirely at one. One saw elderly, straight-laced ladies visibly unbend when the measures were first heard. And when at the end of the concert Dr. Koussevitzky faced the audience with the usual bows, a smile spread over his countenance. It was all just so much good fun, carried off superbly.

A. H. M.

13th Concert - Fri-Sat

Symphony

Concert Of Contrasted Composers

TRANS

MAR 11

Strauss with "Zarathustra," Symphony of Sibelius, Hill and Foote

ONCE MORE, at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky excelled as conductor in the music of Strauss. He gains this merit because he treats it primarily as music sufficient and significant in itself, regardless of the sub-titles that the composer may have affixed to it, of the inferences that analysts may choose to draw from it. Through thirty years the pother has continued over the domesticity, so to say, of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica"—father, mother, child, the baby's bath, the baby's awakening, whatever might tickle the first or the second childhood of many a commentator. Dr. Koussevitzky plays the piece for intrinsic musical content, for the conjugal emotions within it poetized; while few think twice of the actual or the alleged detailing along the way. Every tone-poem of Strauss is mixed metal; contains pages in which his invention flags, his discrimination wanes, in which he is content with something very like platitudes. By every pertinent device of pace and accent, volume, energy and quality of tone, the conductor would minimize or gloss these errors and shortcomings. His versions of the "Sinfonia Domestica," "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote," alike bear him witness. The Straussian faults recede; the Straussian virtues stand forth.

So, again on Friday, with the conductor's return to "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Dr. Koussevitzky was not concerned with the Nietzschean implications of the tone-poem; possibly they may be left in these days to Herr Hitler; nor with the sub-titles of Strauss; nor yet with the excerpts from Nietzsche's book tagged to them. He had in hand, first, a piece of music that to this day, with every actual or attributed demerit on its head, remains remarkable for far-flung design, puissant progress, wealth of resource, mastery of means, the sense upon many a hearer of intensified, rhapsodic creation. The conductor was concerned also with a music that in the eighteen-nineties may have been more or less homage to Nietzsche; but that in these nineteen-thirties is expression in tones of the emotional gamut of man: his ascents out of darkness into light, from spiritual sickness into spiritual health; his longings and passions and raptures, depressions, disillusions, despairs; his final encounter with the insolvable enigma of this mortal life. He was concerned, finally, with performance that should transfigure the superficial, passing platitudes; that should the more maintain the high pitch of imagination, creation, transmission.

There is, for example, the "Dance Song" in which Zarathustra sets free his rejoicing spirit. Played blatantly, the Straussian measures may seem no better than the banalities of the Viennese dance enlarged. Played as Dr. Koussevitzky played them, as from an inner intensity striving toward ecstasy, they become plausible, if not potent, a music of concentrated, cumulative rhythm. If the listener chooses, he may hear only from the pages "of joys and passions" the chromatics that were Wagner's legacy to the next generation of composers. The evoking and unrolling Koussevitzky clothes them in a darkling splendor of tone. The temptation to sentimentalize the unfolding motiv of the ideal is nearly irresistible. Dr. Koussevitzky prefers that it challenge the enigma of our living.

To note these things is not to indicate a negative, over-studied, over-repressed version of the tone-poem. Dr. Koussevitzky abounds in affirmations: the surge of the introduction into the one epical daybreak that music has yet achieved and by mighty simplicities; the tensely singing strings outreaching toward "the great longing," the strange, remote beauty that haunts "the grave-song" above the isle of the dead; the sententious fugue mocking at dry-as-dusts' learning; the march of the ideal from Dance Song into Night Song, toward the twelve tolling bell-strokes that doom it, hushed into the riddle of the universe. In a word, Dr. Koussevitzky divines and sounds the note that in these days must pervade "Zarathustra" if the tone-poem is to prevail—the note from within outward of ever-expanding, ever-mounting ecstasy. A coarse-fibered performance and this inner intensity is smothered. A sentimentalized performance, and the power and the beauty are smeared away. Strauss wrote, Dr. Koussevitzky sounds, a music of rhapsody, measured by the mysteries of which it would sing.

The Sixth Symphony of Sibelius proffered the sharpest contrast. It is terse and stripped. It is without literary or any other origin than the making of music. It is unified rather than diversified. In substance and procedure it is the expression of an independent, individualized mind. No movement follows the orthodox formulas. In none of the four is there conventional statement and subsequent development. The scherzo lacks a contrasting trio. The slow movement has little to distinguish it from the preceding first, the following third. Sibelius assembles and assorts his themes and scraps of themes; draws them together into a pattern steadily tightened; intensifies the musical thought; reaches the concentration-point; releases his hand, and wraith-like all has vanished. There is no expression or emotion in the ordinary sense of the words. Yet every measure runs clear; while the whole symphony is strangely luminous and serene. The ear hears it as the eye sees reflections in clear, still water.

As there is evolution, so there is mood. The first movement is a muted music of converging lines, almost monotonous in color. The second is both simple and ingenious, capricious with little devices and conceits. The third has the pungency that marks almost all Sibelius's scherzi as music of the folk. The finale renews, with more energy, the impression of the beginning—of motivs assembled, intensified, concentrated, then suddenly dispersed. . . . Even a composer may write wholly for his own musing pleasure Seemingly, in the Sixth Symphony, Sibelius has taken that privilege. The conductor met him half way. From both the luminous calm of the whole remains the abiding memory. If the reader must have literary comparison, here is music less of Finland than of Prospero's isle.

Between Strauss and Sibelius two resident composers. . . . Once more Dr. Koussevitzky has remembered Mr. Arthur Foote; recalled one of his later pieces to performance; so given pleasure to all that heard. The chosen music was the little Night Piece of 1917 for Flute and Strings, with Mr. Laurent to play the solo-part. Few flutes flow with such rich, full-bodied, edgeless tone as his. Few flutists excel him in felicities of skill, in musician's aptness. Out of the abundance of his later years Mr. Foote found a melody at once smooth, sweet, melancholy. Debussy's song for the oboe in "Iberia" is not more pungent of the sensuous night, more suggestive of distant sound against surrounding stillness. "A slight little thing," if Mr. Foote will have it so, but a "thing" perfect in kind and degree. Even the poets, who like to hear "flutes across the glamouring dark" would agree to it. For the audience there was nothing left but round upon round of applause directed toward our eldest composer for his years, his work, his life

---

Block-Notes Of a Journey Bostonwards

The Sports and Pastimes Of The Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky Speaks

THE scene is the Gilt Edge train leaving New York on a Saturday at six P. M. Inquiring riders of the Pullman cars are told in hushed whispers that the first two cars of the train carry the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning from a triumphant tour.

Wending our way to these two cars, we enter a veritable paradise of smoke. Efforts have been made to confine smoking to one car, but there are so few of the musicians who do not indulge in one or another of the forms of smoking that one car would scarcely suffice to hold those who do. Cigars, cigarettes and some pipes are in evidence, and one might even see Mr. Sidow, who pontificates at the tuba, indulging in a pinch of snuff. Cherkassky, Perret, Langendoen, Mayer and Bernard Zighera are devotees of the pipe.

Presently Max Polster arrives carrying the umbrella without which no tour of the Symphony would be quite the same. A door flies open, there is a commotion, and Boaz Piller, whose cane is as necessary to the tour as Polster's umbrella, has arrived, and the train starts. Cutaways, and even ordinary coats are exchanged for the comforts of shirt sleeves or sweaters. Theo Grundy, the young Belgian trumpet-player easily carries off the honors for wearing the most highly colored sweater, rivaling even Joseph's many-colored coat.

Bridge, some contract, some auction, claims many: Burgin and Piller are excellent players, as are Hamilton, Battles, Gillet and Zung. The American sector is represented by the four inseparable musketeers, Pinfield, Tapley, Stonestreet and Gundersen. There is also bridge à la française, with Mayer, Dufresne, Lauga and Bernard Zighera, though one would not suspect it to hear in the bidding the strange words, piques, tréfles, carreaux, cœurs. Zighera employs his time when he is dummy with drawing from a pocket a leather case which he opens and studies warmly. We peer over his shoulder and see innumerable snapshots of a most engaging infant. He is Frederic Zighera, four months old, and still he and his daddy have not met; for the young man is with his mother in Paris, where he was born. With good reason Zighera can tell how many more concerts there are this season.

Poker in its various phases is the next popular diversion, and though the banks have been closed all day and the financial state of the country is under discussion, the incorrigible Amerena, known as Patsy, announces in stentorian tones that the only bank in America is now open.

Messrs. Lorbeer, Polster and Sidow are playing skat, a German game played with thirty-two cards. Nearby, Hanson and Panenka have put their blond heads together over a puzzle. Sanromá and Arthur Fiedler are having a studious time at anagrams.

We disturb Leslie Rogers, the orchestra's librarian, who is reading a desert island story to inquire the contents of a newspaper bundle he carries, and with great interest he shows us a most villainous-looking blade said to be the sword of a Dyak head-hunter, which he is taking home for that remarkable collection of his, consisting of guns, pistols, war-clubs and arrowheads.

Marcel Lannoye, the young horn player, is talking to anyone who will listen to him about Hitler, unemployment and the stock market. Before such things were, his principal subject was Shakspeare.

Kassman and Arcieri, violinist and clarinetist, respectively, are busily studying French, while Boettcher and Schindler are devouring German newspapers.

There are other readers among the orchestra. One sees the Saturday Evening Post and Collier's more than once, and Valkenier of the horn section, is reading Harper's. Mr. Ritter of the tympani is fascinated with Thomas Mann's "Magic Mountain," because he has played in Davos where the story is laid. White, who presides at the xylophone, is reading Lawrence's "Sons and Lovers," Grundy, Maeterlinck's "Life of the Bee" and Caughey of the harps, Dante.

We proceed now toward the dining car, passing Gaston Elcus asleep, his head protected from draughts by a beret. A strange sounding language falls upon the ear, and we se Madam Sauvlet who has accompanied her husband, the violinist from New York. She is a famous hostess and almost every musician has nothing but pæans for her hospitality. The language is Dutch, and is spoken by the little court which surrounds her: van Wynbergen, Langendoen, to be later joined by Valkenier and Erkelens, all Hollanders like herself.

In the parlor cars we find Messrs. Mager, Laurent and Bedetti, and we discover that the latter's occasional disappearances are to have a hand in one or another of the games in the special cars.

In the diner we are joined by a quiet looking, rather tired gentleman of medium height. So quiet is he that it is obvious that the few Connecticut Yankees in the car who have attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall that afternoon do not recognize in him the dynamic and dramatic figure that projected a magnificent performance of Sibelius's Fifth Symphony and an acutely poignant reading of "Tod and Verklärung." It is indeed, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

We learn that, because of the matinée concert, he has not lunched, and is "very, very hungry." One surmises that a Trimalchian feast will be ordered, but au contraire, he begins with a half grapefruit, proceeds to a lamb chop, and tops it off with figs and a cup of hot water in which is a bit of lemon. So is genius fed. There is no after dinner cigar, nor yet a cigarette, and the food is consumed without enthusiasm which is entirely confined to his conversation.

With just enthusiasm he speaks of the tour as having been the most brilliant and successful of the year. Acclaimed everywhere, at a time when other orchestras are tottering under the economic strain, he has been asked for series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore. Doubters of his sincerity, if there be any, should well remark that he has refused these brilliant offers because it would mean giving up the orchestra's concerts in Northampton and New Haven, and, he says, it is much more important that the Symphony Orchestra should appear before the potential concert-goers. the student youth.

He talks of many things. He is interested in American literature, and has the current European curiosity of Sinclair Lewis. We explain that we hold with Lewisohn, that Lewis is popular in Europe because he presents what the European believes to be the typical American. He inquires of us concerning our tastes, and the name of George Moore arises. He was a personal admirer of the conductor and a friend. One can imagine Moore's enthusiasm for this leader.

This leads him to speak of the library which he had in Russia, with its rare and valuable manuscripts both of music and literature. And from there is but a step to his art collection in which his catholic taste is again patent; we hear of Rubens, Monet, Renoir and many others. One wonders a little if this remarkable collection misses now the love it must have had before the revolution—if some spiritual essence flows from the pictures into some dry heart denied religion.

We tell him that in our opinion his lovely things have been sacrificed to a futile cause, and a sidelong glance at the famous profile reveals that for a moment he is again living among his treasures. And then he speaks with disapproval of the overthrow of religion in Russia, for he is, above all, a devout and believing man. There are eras, he thinks, when the supremacy of the devil is unchallenged, and he is of the opinion that we are living in such an era, but he adds that so long as one has the belief in God here, and he places his hand over his heart, all will be well. And the sonority with which he pronounces the word God, recalls the legendary fervor of the Middle Ages.

We speak of his work as litterateur, such as was made public at the time he received his doctorate at Harvard, and he tells us that he has many other ideas to set to paper. We venture to suggest that we believe it to be a duty for him to write his memoirs, and he assures us that such is his purpose. He speaks of his personal relations with Chaikovsky and Skriabin, of his friendship with Debussy and Strauss, and of the remarkable letters which he has had from Sibelius discussing points of interpretation of the latter's works, into which, according to the conductor, the great Finn has poured the cream of his austere and majestic intellect.

We inquire concernedly about the twice projected promises of Strauss's "Domestica," and he assures us that it will be performed this season. He recounts with wonderful humor how he was studying conducting in Berlin when the score was first performed, and tells how all the students and assistant conductors were never to be seen without scores, piano, orchestral, and arrangements of it for four hands at a piano. He speaks with enthusiasm of the fugue in the last movement which is so gay, so well constructed that one is not conscious of the form.

At length the time has come for him to rest, so we leave him, carrying with us new enthusiasm for this magnetic personality who has done more to acquaint the younger generation, to say nothing of the older, with the whole gamut of music, than has almost any other conductor in America today.

TRISTRIM LIVINGSTONE

141

MUSIC

Globe Mar 11

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two compositions by American composers are included on the program of the Symphony concerts this week. The first is a new Sinfonietta by Edward Burlingame Hill, heard for the first time in Boston yesterday, following its premiere in Cambridge Thursday evening. The other is Arthur Foote's "Night Piece" for flute and orchestra, the solo part of which is played by Georges Laurent with his customary superb musicianship. Sibelius' Sixth Symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," are the remaining numbers.

Mr Hill's Sinfonietta was written last Summer in response to Dr Koussevitzky's suggestion that the composer write a symphony in one movement. Mr Hill decided, in the course of composition, that his material was better suited to the smaller form of Sinfonietta. Scored for large orchestra, including a piano, the Sinfonietta is direct, almost terse, in manner. The first pages are modern in harmonic idiom and in the brief themes that are quickly sounded by various groups of instruments. Toward the middle, however, the general style reverts to that of the late 19th and early 20th centuries; the harmony becomes less dissonant and the phrases, notably those for the strings, are longer and more sinuous. The Sinfonietta is stimulating, but like other modern music that is highly concentrated, it requires several hearings to be appraised at all fairly. The audience was pleased, applauding heartily Mr Hill's appearances upon the stage.

Mr Foote is said to have modestly termed his "Night Piece" a "slight little thing." To be sure, the piece is scored for a small number of players, and its ideas are unpretentious. Yet by virtue of simplicity, sincerity and craftsmanship, it is a highly effective score. The writing for flute, a lyrical melody played over soft interweavings of muted strings, brings out the solo instrument's capacity for sustained song. This "Night Piece" bears repetition, especially when so beautifully played as yesterday. Mr Foote, too, was present, and bowed from his seat. The handclapping which greeted his music was the most persistent of the afternoon.

Sibelius' Sixth Symphony has, to one listener, a spiritual affinity with the tone poem "Tapiola," first heard here last Fall. The Symphony was composed in 1923 or 1924, "Tapiola" in 1926. Although as highly personal in manner as any of the five symphonies that preceded it, this Sixth partakes more than they of that indefinable, somewhat descriptive element called "Nordic." Certainly no man but he who dwells in a northern country could have written this music. Whether it is distinctly racial in feeling is another matter, and apparently one not easily to be settled. The material of the Sixth Symphony and the general style are more fastidious, more the work of supreme genius than those of "Tapiola."

The spareness of Sibelius' instrumentation and the calmness of his musical speech are quite different from Strauss' sonorous utterances and the Gargantuan orchestra he employs. Yet each has written great music. This is an excellent example of the divergent ways of genius, and the fact that there is a place for all.

"Thus Spake Zarathustra" is one of Strauss' better creations, despite the mingling of great pages with those that are blatantly trite—and labored, to boot. The introduction, the fugue, and the conclusion, for example, make up for the banality of the waltz. The Nietzschean philisophy that prompted Strauss to write his work, and the success—or lack of it—in his tonal portrayal of the development of man, may be disregarded. After all, only the music is important.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will play D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," Roussel's Suite in F major and three Wagnerian fragments: the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siefried," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "Tannhauser." Heinrich Gebhard will be soloist. C. W. D.

SYMPHONY IN PRODUCTS OF MODERNS

Post Mar 11

Hills' Sinfonietta for First Time in Boston

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Four living composers are represented on the programme of this week's Symphony concerts: Jan Sibelius, Richard Strauss, Arthur Foote and Edward Burlingame Hill. The two last-named were present at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to receive the well-deserved and hearty plaudits of their fellow-townsmen.

HILL'S SINFONIETTA

Mr. Hill's piece, a Sinfonietta in one movement, so brief as to be almost epigrammatic, was played yesterday for the first time in Boston; the actual premiere occurred in Cambridge the night before. Mr. Foote's ingratiating "Night Piece" for flute and strings, delightfully played yesterday by Mr. Laurent and his colleagues, was first heard here in 1923 and the present performances are in honor of the composer's 80th birthday. The season's cycle of Sibelius' symphonies brought yesterday what might be alliteratively described as the singular Sixth, and the concert closed with the tonal splendors of Strauss' tone-poem after Nietzsche, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Mr. Hill's little symphony begins promisingly. The idiom is that of the modernists, but in it Mr. Hill seems to say more than do many of his confreres. In the succeeding slow division he takes a step backward harmonically and writes music that hints at but just misses sentiment. The finale is again contemporaneous in spirit, with the inevitable suggestion of jazz. All in all, an engaging piece and orchestrated with great skill.

Sibelius' Sixth

Sibelius' Symphony grows upon acquaintance, but it can never be popular in the sense that some of its predecessors have already attained to that distinction. The first movement still seems barren almost to futility and the other three, although meatier thematically, all deserve the reproach, if reproach it be, of asceticism. The Seventh Symphony now in prospect also betrays this horror of the tonal flesh; curiosity regarding the nature of the Eighth may not be satisfied until next season as the work after all will not be ready for performance this spring.

Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this music with a sympathy worthy of remark, in view of the reserve and austerity on the part of the composer that amount almost to ungraciousness.

Strauss' Tone Poem

Barring a slight confusion of pitch near the end, the performance of Strauss' once daring tone-poem was both brilliant and discerning. The piece itself is more uneven than any of its fellows from "Don Juan" through the Alpine Symphony, a much underrated work. At times in "Zarathustra" Strauss is merely a sort of super-Liszt, at times his own genius flames brightly and the music achieves the almost impossible feat of reflecting the spirit of Nietzsche's extraordinary book.

It has been said of Strauss, and the comment is pertinent here, that even when his musical thought is commonplace he nevertheless holds the listener's attention. That in itself is no mean accomplishment.

Local Composers Honored at Boston Symphony Concert

By MOSES SMITH

The program of this week's Boston Symphony concerts is as enjoyable as any momentarily recalled during the year. Heard by yesterday's matinee audience, the concert, delivered with the customary virtuosity by the orchestra under Koussevitzky, was applauded by the audience, but the reception should have been even warmer.

The concert began with a new Sinfonietta by Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard. In one movement, the work combines briefly the form and content of three movements—fast, slow, then fast again. The structure is compact, the writing is neat, as in Professor Hill's earlier compositions. But more important was the fact that this music is gay, bubbling over with melody and arresting modulations and rhythmic devices.

This music is jazzy in spirit, but the jazz is not of the blues variety. Though he wrote the Sinfonietta as recently as last summer, Prof. Hill seems to have ignored the depression. The work was spiritedly performed yesterday.

The other numbers heard were Sibelius' sixth symphony, also "Sprach Zarathustra" by Strauss, and "A Night Piece," by Arthur Foote, Boston composer and musician. The performance of the latter work was a gesture in recognition of the achievements of Mr. Foote, who reached his 80th birthday this week. He was present at the performance yesterday to acknowledge the applause which followed. In the shuffle the audience almost forgot the sensitive and impeccable Georges Laurent, who played the flute solo.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented a poetic and beautifuly rounded conception of the Strauss score, as he has done in the past. It goes without saying that he was similarly happy in his treatment of Sibelius, for whose superb music he has been a more ardent propagandist than any other conductor in America.

MUSIC

Her Mar 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 18th concert of the present season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Hill, Sinfonietta (first time in Boston); Sibelius, Symphony No. 6; Foote, "A Night Piece," for flute (Mr. Laurent) and string orchestra; Strauss, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

It would seem as if Sibelius, writing his sixth symphony, had tried to show how different he could be from the composer of the preceding five. It is true that he is still faithful to his scheme of repeating patterns, but in this symphony the repetition is not so impressive, nor does it lead so often to dramatic or eloquent outbursts. On the other hand, the sixth symphony is without a slow movement. The allegretto that replaces it has comparatively little character; the scherzo is without a trio. The first movement ends in a singular manner, it stops without rhyme or reason, as if the composer had said to himself, "This thing has gone on long enough. Let's change the subject." There are fine things in the symphony: as the introduction for strings, the frequent passages for wood-wind instruments; but as a whole the music is not of the greater Sibelius; it often disappoints expectation and at times is unexpectedly dry. Shall one say it is a composition for student to examine the workmanship rather than for the enjoyment of an audience? The melodic invention is not conspicuous and there are no compelling climaxes.

Richard Strauss in search of a subject to inspire him bethought him of Nietzsch's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." It is strange that he did not choose Immanuel Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason." Cesar Franck was once found reading it, but he did not attempt to turn it into a tone poem. Strauss's huge work was first heard here in 1897. Then we were all thrilled by the "stupendous" opening; by the mighty climax on the chord of C major. There was curiosity about the trumpet solos; would the trumpeter bring out the top note securely? Yesterday this passage was played brilliantly and with apparent ease. One tried to solve the "mystery" of the conclusion in two keys—"The theme of the ideal sways aloft in the higher regions in B major; double basses repeating C. G. C., the World Riddle." How old this tone poem is today! Old and futile except for a few pages—Introduction and the "Dance Song."

Mr. Hill's sinfonietta was played for the first time at the Symphony concert in Cambridge last Thursday night. Mr. Hill wrote that Dr. Koussevitzky suggested his writing a symphony in one movement. "The resulting material seemed to approach a sinfonietta rather than a symphony." The impression of a symphony's first movement was not absent yesterday in the mind of this hearer. The word "sinfonietta" suggests a lighter treatment than that given to this work. Yesterday the slow section was the most ingratiating. The other passages are scholarly, as was to be expected from Mr. Hill, but one reasonably expected a lighter touch, more piquant harmonies and more diversified instrumentation. The work was loudly applauded. This was true of Mr. Foote's melodious and romantic piece with the flute beautifully played by Mr. Laurent. Mr. Foote's name has been on programs of this orchestra since 1887. Throughout the years his ideal has been high. He has never striven after cheaply acquired success. He has always been a musician, respecting himself and his art.

Dr. Koussevitzky and a chamber orchestra from Symphony Hall will share in the festival of chamber-music, next month, in the Library of Congress at Washington. They will fill the concert of Monday evening, April 24, with numbers from Bach, Ravel, Hindemith, Copland and other composers. . . . Mr. Laurent's Wind Ensemble will also be heard at the festival, in a new quintet by Gustav Strube, once of Symphony Hall.

Novel Concert By Symphony

Trav Mar 11

A varied and novel concert of exceptional interest was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday afternoon. It was unusual in several ways: (1) these was an American atmosphere; (2) a sinfonietta was given its first performance in Boston; (3) all of the four composers, Hill, Sibelius Strauss and Foote, were still alive; and (4) two of them, Hill and Foote, were present. The guest soloist was Georges Laurent, flutist.

The program began with the first playing here of a sinfonietta in one movement, written last summer by Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard, at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky. There was a soothing, self-contained newness, a lack of blatant dissonance, surprising in something so typically American. Definite rhythm, modified dissonance and the diminished octave were to be found, but there was no sign of great musical character. A mildly pleasing piece, nothing more.

The sixth symphony by Sibelius was of different calibre. Next to the last of the Sibelius cycle being played this season, it spoke of a rugged nature understandable to North Americans. There was peculiar force to the music, which while 18th century in sense, was yet extremely modern in manner. Though not the most impressive of the sequence, this symphony in D minor had pureness of tone and splendid power in a subdued and restrained style. One hardly need speak of the superbly polished performance given by Dr. Koussevitzky, now the greatest disciple of Sibelius in this country.

Following the intermission came Foote's "A Night Piece" for flute and string orchestra. As flutist, Georges Laurent gave a distinguished interpretation of this piece termed "a slight little thing" by its modest composer, now living in Newton Centre.

The rare charm of the musing flute voice held and delighted all as Dr. Koussevitzky skilfully wove together the flute tones and the gentle melody of the strings, creating an impression of night that was near perfection. There was prolonged applause—applause for Mr. Foote, 80 last Sunday, who was forced to rise many times from his seat on the floor, for the conductor, for Mr. Laurent and for the stringed section of the orchestra.

A tone poem by Strauss entitled "Also Sprach Zarathustra" brought the concert to a close. According to Richard Strauss this symphonic poem was composed as his tribute to the genius of Friedrich Nietzsche. Yesterday it was played with a deep feeling due a work portraying in music the development of the human race up to Nietzsche's idea of the superman. W. T. C., Jr.

Music

Monitor Mar 11 '33

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A meaty and balanced program was provided by Dr. Koussevitzky for the eighteenth pair of concerts (March 10-11) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It opened with a new Sinfonietta in one movement by Prof. Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard, an engaging work full of melodic graciousness and rhythmic vitality. It is divided into three sections, of which the first is classic in form but modern in style; the second, charmingly lyrical, and the third lively and vivacious. A figure which plays a big part in the work lends it a popular flavor through its implications of jazz. Mr. Hill has toyed with jazz before; he even wrote a jazz concerto for two pianos which he later withdrew. In this instance the touch of jazz is very mild and inoffensive; just enough to connect the music in spirit with the great mass of the American people. The score is of course scholarly in construction and orchestration, but it is far from academic; it seems rather a spontaneous, personal expression, perhaps the most individual of the composer's works. It was well received by the audience.

Mr. Arthur Foote, another distinguished Boston composer, also had a place on this program, with his "Night Piece" for flute and string orchestra, to which he has referred as "a slight little thing." It is slight, but by no means negligible or unworthy. It is in fact a very appealing "little thing," with charming melodies and transparent texture. It was played with most ingratiating tone and most fluent line by that superb flutist, Mr. Georges Laurent, and the string choirs. The composer was much applauded.

Mr. Hill's Sinfonietta was followed by the Sixth Symphony of Sibelius, the neglected sister in the series of seven. Many commentators appear to feel that it has scant appeal. Even Mr. Cecil Gray, high priest of the composer, finds comparatively little to say for it in his "Sibelius." It had been performed in Boston three years ago, and then was repeated within a month by Dr. Koussevitzky, who only now has revived it. To the present commentator it is one of the most alluring of Sibelius's symphonic works, marked by technical economy and directness, restrained emotional intensity and rare subtlety of rhythmic pattern.

The program closed with a very musical rendering of Dr. Richard Strauss's modest attempt to describe, in a half-hour tonal lecture, "the development of the human race from its origin." The result was impressive, not because of Nietzsche but because of Strauss—and because of Koussevitzky, who made the tale a musical, not a philosophical, revelation. L. A. S.

Incidents and Prospects

The audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday outdid its predecessor in warmths toward Mr. Arthur Foote. At the end of his Night Piece for Flute and Strings Dr. Koussevitzky first persuaded him to the stage; then the audience twice had him back to unlessening applause. The heartiness, the honesty, were unmistakable. Nor, at the end of his Sinfonietta, was Mr. Hill overlooked. Bostonian evening, said the wits, with Strauss and Sibelius each tucked into his corner like the attendant saints in old frescos.

Trans Mar 14

The Symphony composed by Monsieur Roussel for the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts was lately played in London by the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation. It was well received as the work of a "distinguished mind and an accomplished craftsman."

H. T. P.

Are there readers of these pages who recall how great was the stir caused when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra introduced to Boston in 1924 Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"? Are there perchance any who saw how numerous were the departures of those, chiefly beyond the middle years of life, who could not hear it to its close when Dr. Koussevitzky revived the piece a few weeks ago? Yet Dr. Koussevitzky, nothing daunted, regarding the "Rite of Spring," and rightly, as one of the epoch-making pieces of the 20th century, is presenting it tomorrow in his Monday evening series of concerts as announced elsewhere in these columns. These listeners of Monday evenings are of necessity less practiced hearers of music than are those who make up the audiences of the "regular" subscription concerts. It will be interesting to find their reaction to this much-discussed composition.

Post Mar 12

147

5th Monday Concert

Orchestras Sounding In Three Cities

The Monday of Koussevitzky, Stokowski's Innovation, Safety in New York

Mar 14 — Herald

THREE Russians and a soloist made up Dr. Koussevitzky's program at Symphony Hall last evening. The Russians were Glinka, Cha.kovsky and Stravinsky; the soloist, Carmela Ippolito. The overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," the violin concerto in D, the "Rite of Spring," were the works which the composers provided.

Beyond a doubt it was Stravinsky's "Rite" which furnished the chief point of interest. To one who has heard it frequently, and who still remembers with astonishing clearness the first time he heard it, not the least part of the interest consisted in observing the reactions of those who had not previously come in contact with the work. For the Monday audience contains not a few of such. There were of course the dissenters. A few of them left the concert during the intermission. But not many. Again, there were those who departed between the two halves of the "Rite." Also not many, and without exception of the elderly contingent. Of the rest (and they were surely more than 99 per cent) none gave signs of displeasure or boredom. Whether assenters or dissenters to what Stravinsky's work contains and to the method of revealing it, they showed interest in hearing the work to its end. After it was all over one could hear that lively discussion pro and con which one heard almost ten years ago when Pierre Monteux first ventured "Le Sacre du Printemps" in Boston. Not before during the present season did the audience linger so long or recall the conductor so often as they did last evening after their first hearing of the most debated work of the last quarter century.

As to performance, Dr. Koussevitzky's reading far surpasses any previous that has come to one's notice. One sits spellbound before the two great crescendi which lead to the conclusions of the two parts of the work. Far back the conductor lays the foundations for them; gradually, but with an electric energy builds them up. So vitalized are they that at any point one might be willing to stop and say, "This is the ultimate; from here it can't go on." But on it does go. Till at the last that exhaustion which Stravinsky had in mind for his dancers is accomplished.

There are also poetic portions, great backgrounds against which the sacrificial rites in honor of spring are placed. It matters not a whit whether the shades of Debussy or of Rimsky are stalking just out of sight behind those backgrounds. The proper grays and soft and misty greens they do furnish for the rest of the picture. And Dr. Koussevitzky lays on those soft colors with infinite care and subtlety until in their way their magic is as great as that of the sacrificial dances themselves. Of course the secret of "Le Sacre" is its rhythm. To the god—or the demon—rhythm, the composer Stravinsky and the conductor Koussevitzky in this work give to the last ounce their effort and their accomplishment.

Colorful rhythm was also the key to Glinka's overture last evening, rhythm bright and gay, plus rich melody that might have come out of almost any opera in Italianate style. Of the effect of sparkling rhythm and luscious melody conductor and men missed not the least fraction. A simple work in high performance, such was this overture.

Miss Ippolito, for her part, gave a somewhat colorless reading of Chaikovsky's violin concerto. Technic was adequate, perhaps a little more than adequate; tone was often silken, often full and warm. And there the matter stops. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave marvelous support where support was sometimes exceedingly difficult. A. H. M.

Her MUSIC Mar 14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The fifth program of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, was given last night at Symphony hall with Carmela Ippolito, Boston violinist, as soloist. This was the program:

Glinka..Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"
Tchaikovsky..Concerto for violin in D major Stravinsky..............The Rite of Spring.
A picture of Pagan Russia

The music was skilfully selected and placed. One might ruminate on the different conceptions of pagan Russia as portrayed in sound by Glinka (for "Russlan and Ludmilla" is a fairy tale of pagan Russian days) and by Stravinsky, to whose "Rite of Spring" audiences still pay the tribute of leaving in hauteur, though the work is past 20 years old, and generally accepted as the composer's best, and one of the most likely to live of all our welter of modern music. One might watch, in the music of the three Russians, each of whom dominated the music of his country in his day and greatly influenced musicians outside his land, the progress of orchestral technique, the development of orchestral expressiveness.

Glinka lived during the first half of the 19th century, Tchaikovsky during the second half of it; Stravinsky dominates our time in music. Glinka sang out the wild Russian tunes of the peasants with simple appreciation; Tchaikovsky used them as the core of some of the most emotional (sometimes morbidly emotional) music ever written and because one touch of sentiment makes the whole world kin, he wielded a far greater influence than his less gifted and less fervent predecessor; Stravinsky uses the Russian themes as incantations, by which he hauls us, as by the hair, back into an atavistic age, when rhythm and sound soothed not the soft surface emotions, but stirred up depths that could rouse to savage ecstacy.

Carmela Ippolito, playing the Tchaikovsky concerto, was not at her best—possibly because of sudden program changes—possibly because she stood on the stage of Symphony hall, playing with the Boston Symphony, an honor young musicians do not take lightly. But even her less-than-best is still very lovely. She has a luscious tone, warm and singing; her phrasing is rounded and her bowing free; she plays sonorous double-stops and crystal-clear harmonics. Nervousness may have induced her to telescope her rhythms; Dr. Koussevitsky solved those difficulties in tempo with masterly skill, holding orchestra and soloist together with unobstructive firmness. She was warmly applauded.

It was the "Rite of Spring" after all, which made the evening memorable. Dr. Koussevitsky has never conducted it more intensely; the orchestra has never played it more brilliantly. It still startles, still annoys, still irritates, and still provokes wildest pleasure in the initiates. If initial public disapproval be a test of the greatness of a piece of music—and history shows such a close parallelism between them that one is tempted to say it does—"The Rite of Spring" will live when everything else written since 1900 will have been forgotten. E. B.

RUSSIAN NIGHT AT SYMPHONY

Heartily Applaud Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"

Post Mar 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An all-Russian programme was offered at the Symphony concert of last evening, the outstanding feature of which was the performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Since this epoch-making work had last been heard in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had carried it to New York and there scored with it an emphatic success. Last evening the performance excelled and exceeded even that of the Friday concert of two weeks ago when the piece was revived after a silence of some half dozen years, and in a manner to convince the sceptical that here was, in truth, not a passing sensation of the concert hall, but an authentic masterpiece.

There had been reason to wonder how the Monday audience, a company little habituated to symphonic music in its more recent and radical manifestations, would accept Stravinsky's formidable score. There was every indication, however, that this audience not only tolerated, but even responded to "Le Sacre." Only a handful left the hall in the pause between the two parts of the work, and at the end the applause was unmistakably hearty. By such evidence this audience is musically open-minded, more so, indeed, than that of the Friday matinees.

The tale of the rest of the concert is quickly told. It began with Glinka's still vigorous overture to his opera, "Russlan and Ludmilla," played last evening with uncommon brilliance. And between the music of the first Russian composer of importance and that of the foremost living Russian music-maker came the Violin Concerto of Tchaikovsky, with Miss Carmela Ippolito to play the solo part. Not in some time had Miss Ippolito been heard in this, her native city, and the audience received her warmly. Today this concerto is showing signs of age and Miss Ippolito, able and musicianly player that she is, is hardly the one to restore to its faded cheeks the flush of youth. It would have been wiser of her to choose a piece that could better make its own way.

Globe MUSIC Mar 14

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Music by Russian composers filled last evening's Boston Symphony concert, the fifth of the Monday series. Glinka's Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," a pleasant piece, came first, followed by Tchaikovsky's D major Violin Concerto, and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." Carmela Ippolito was the soloist.

Tchaikovsky's concerto, a battle-horse of more campaigns than any except the eldest generation can remember, has been enjoying a respite for several years. If memory serves, orchestral performances have been few in the past nine seasons, and only rarely has a violinist offered it in recital. Like Mendelssohn's concerto, this of Tchaikovsky's is a good, sound, concerto, neither the sparkling music of a Mozart nor the Olympian work of a Beethoven or a Brahms.

Miss Ippolito, a violinist whom Boston may claim as one of its own, has long been regarded a player of taste and skill. These qualities were fully in evidence last evening, together with a fine, silken tone, good intonation, and technical ease that indicates the seasoned artist. Strangely, however, her work lacked fire and zest, presenting marked contrast to Dr Koussevitzky's mettlesome reading of the orchestral portion. Miss Ippolito was heartily applauded when the piece was over. She was recalled several times.

Fewer persons left the hall last evening, on account of "The Rite of Spring," than when it was played a few weeks ago. Probably this proves that one can get used to anything, given time enough. Or, as one would prefer to believe, concert-goers are perhaps becoming fond of a score that is not only a specimen of masterly orchestral technique and an amazing study of rhythm, but one which set a new style in musical expression when it was given to the world 20 years ago. Since then it has served as model for more than a few compositions. The "Rite of Spring" may still be unpleasant, shocking to some ears, but it cannot be dismissed as a stupid bore. It is anything but that. Possibly in 10 or 20 years it will seem as harmless as Tchaikovsky.

The last concert of this series will be played April 3. C. W. D.

Russian Program at Symphony

Amer Mar 14

By MOSES SMITH

The reappearance of Carmela Ippolito, violinist, who received her youthful training in Boston, marked the Boston Symphony concert of last evening. For several years Miss Ippolito has been a less familiar figure here than in Philadelphia, where she has studied at the Curtis Institute.

She played the Tchaikovsky concerto last night, bringing to the performance the virtuoso technic which the piece demands, a good, if not robust tone, and a generally well-rounded violinistic style. Her presentation was for the most part accurate and secure. There were no outbursts of passion, neither was there sentimentalism, in this playing. The proverbial excesses of youth were fortunately absent.

On the other hand, there might have been greater plasticity, a more searching analysis beneath the composer's superficial notes and lines, a more intimate identification of the performer with the mood intended by the composer. Of course, one allows for an inevitable nervousness—for the occasion was important to an aspiring violinist. Perhaps at next opportunity Miss Ippolito will forget a little of her reserve and correctness (which would do her credit as a pupil), and strike out boldly for herself.

Music

Mon Mar

Monday Symphony Concert

Three classics of Russian music had been selected by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to make up the program of the fifth in the Monday series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Symphony Hall. They were Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." Miss Carmela Ippolito was the soloist.

The program was well arranged to display the resources and development of Russian music. The overture, taken at a dizzy pace, was brilliantly and eloquently performed The concerto, not the most appealing of all the works that have been written in this form, still offers a challenge to virtuosity and to musicianship. Miss Ippolito brought to its interpretation an adequate technique (her harmonics were particularly good), a pleasing though not a large tone and a clear structural conception. She was, however, too busy with these fundamentals to give the work the rhythmic subtlety and the musical imaginativeness which it requires if it is to be raised out of routine performance.

The "Sacre" caused no rioting. Not even hisses or boos competed with the applause. A few persons left unobtrusively at the intermission, but the majority of the Monday subscribers, most of whom were probably hearing the work for the first time, listened with open minds and remained to applaud until the conductor was justified in calling the men to their feet. It may be that part of the clapping was intended more for the interpreters than for the composer, since the performance was a marvel of virtuosity; but on the whole, the Monday audience distinguished itself by its receptiveness to this modern masterpiece. L. A. S.

The Day's Round Of Concert-Halls

Return to d'Indy's Symphony On a Mountain Air, Announcements

Trans Mar 16

AMONG the problems which a conductor must face, probably none is more trying than that of maintaining the largest possible active repertory. It is all too easy to have a comparatively short list of pieces that are played over and over again, and an exceedingly long list of worthy and pleasurable things that are credited with only a nominal number of performances, often not more than one. Surely no program-maker is more diligent than Dr. Koussevitzky in avoiding these extremes. Season after season, concert after concert, he finds room for works in danger of undeserved oblivion. Last week he salvaged Mr. Foote's admirable "Nightpiece," these ten years left silent, on the library shelves. This week he restores to the Symphony Concerts another music unheard there through nine years, of larger dimensions and signed by a more noted name. For Vincent d'Indy's "Symphonie pour Orchestre et Piano sur un Chant Montagnard Français" was last played by the Boston Orchestra in the spring of 1924. It has been heard at these concerts with Mr. Bauer, Mr. Cortot and Mr. Gebhard as pianists. On Friday and Saturday it is again Mr. Gebhard who is to take his place "at the piano."

There are those who hold this symphony the most pleasurable of d'Indy's works. It was composed when the composer was still in the first flush of young maturity, at the age of about thirty-five. (One says "about" advisedly; for there appears to be doubt as to the year of d'Indy's birth; 1850, 1851, 1852 are all cited with authority; while d'Indy's own word in the matter is apparently contradicted by the official records of his natal town.) The "Symphony on a Mountain Air" was written in 1886. At this time d'Indy was still sensitive to romantic influences around him; still willing and eager that his music should reflect his love of nature, his delight in the mountains of his native province. Not yet had he become the high priest and conservator of classic method and the system of César Franck. True, Franckian methods of composition dominate the technical procedures of this symphony. But those procedures are the means to an end, not the end itself.

The "Cévenole Symphonie," as the French often call it, is both an adventure in strict symphonic form and a set of variations upon the mountain tune. That tune is listed in d'Indy's "Chansons populaires du Vivarais" as No. 1 under the caption, "Mélodies sans paroles." A note states that it was "entendue au loin, sur la crête de Tourtons, entre Saint-Péray et Touland." This pleasing melody of the Cévennes Mountains is there given in the identical form (save for one note) in which it is heard from the English horn at the beginning of the symphony. A literal repetition by a flute follows close. After this introduction "Assez lent," the first movement continues through a sonata-form "Modérément animé." The second movement follows in song-form, "Assez modéré, mais sans lenteur." The finale, "Animé." is a freer handling of sonata-form. In the use of the piano, the "Symphony on a Mountain Air" is forerunner of the many modern works in which the piano is of less importance than in a concerto, but of more prominence than would be accorded it as mere orchestral voice.

The "mountain air" during the course of these three movements suffers many variations. In energetically rhythmed figures it forms the basis for the first theme of the first movement. In lyric form, with some alteration, it is also the principal theme of the second division. As hunting call for two horns it begins the middle section of this movement. In the first section of the finale it is heard in two forms simultaneously—in the figuration for the piano and in the woodwind melody to which that figuration is accompaniment. After the exposition of this movement it is found in still another form, in the development in the rhythm of a tarantella; in two further variants in the increasingly active "Très animé" which follows. In addition it is heard in original form more or less throughout the symphony. Indeed the only portions of the whole work which are not directly derived from this air are the second themes of the first and the last movements. The Franckian principle is thus already fully developed in this symphony. But in it, the peasant whom d'Indy may have heard playing this tune on a shepherd's pipe in the distant mountains, the nature-lover who is d'Indy himself, the rugged and massive Cévennes, far outrank Franckian procedures.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Fiedler's program for the concert of his chamber orchestra, the Boston Sinfonietta, in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, April 4, will include a Concerto for Piano and Strings by the elder Bach; a Sinfonia in E major by his son Philipp-Emanuel, the Suite from Stravinsky's "Story of the Soldier"; a Divertimento by the light-fingered Jacques Ibert of Paris.

For reasons best known to himself Mr. Stokowski put by the performances of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in Philadelphia and New York, announced in quick sequence to the performances of the same piece under Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston and New York. Instead of a Russian program, Mr. Stokowski divided his concerts between Bach and Brahms.

Mrs. Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge is again providing the Public Library with a concert of chamber-music, open to all comers—on Sunday evening, March 26, by the Manhattan String Quartet.

19th Concert - Fri-Sat

MUSIC

Post Mar 18

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

If the shade of Richard Wagner happened to be present in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon while the "Tannhauser" overture was being played, it must have remarked to the sculptured gentlemen high on the walls that below them a revelation was taking place. A revelation of how a man's imagination, interpretive powers and will with an orchestra can bring new fire and new beauty out of a hackneyed, 90-year-old score. (Though the anything but humble Richard would doubtless not have so referred to this product of his 30's!)

This overture—by no means the supremely masterly music that Wagner wrote later in life—has had all sorts of performances in its time, many of them bad. So many times in the past, under other hands, has the Pilgrims' chorus seemed theatrical artifice, lacking in the religious fervor it is intended to convey; how frequently have the Venusberg pages sounded old-fashioned and melodramatic rather than suggestive of the pagan creatures and frenzied routs of Venus' subterranean court. But yesterday, by virtue of gorgeous tone, dynamic emphasis, and an indefinable sixth sense of conducting, the overture moved and thrilled as never before.

Dr Koussevitzky's personal reading, although familiar, had not previously seemed quite so incandescent. It wrung every bit of effect from the printed notes. Some may call this exaggeration, compared to more sober readings; but one listener is unregenerate enough to look with favor upon such a course when it really improves the music.

There were two other Wagner fragments on the program, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Earlier had come Roussel's Suite in F major, and Vincent D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," with Heinrich Gebhard playing the solo piano part.

The "Forest Murmurs" was meticulously, transparently, played. This was one of the few occasions within memory when the elusive detail of the beginning received as much attention as the clarion sounding of the various motives that occur later in the score. The "Tristan" excerpts were—as always—very moving, but one listener would have enjoyed them even more had they been played faster. To linger over the sinuous measures just long enough to draw out full effect is different from remaining until the phrases are stretched out and thereby lose their force.

D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air" is in some respects a remarkable piece of music. To begin with, it is a highly personal creation, romantic in style and feeling, but not sedulously imitative of that supreme romanticist, Richard Wagner, whose influence, in 1886, still dominated composition. For a young man to assert his individuality in those days was ghastly conceit. Even Richard Strauss, the enfant terrible of the time, had barely began to emerge from this influence. The symphony was composed when D'Indy was in his 30s, when he apparently valued feeling and imagination above academic theories of symphonic construction.

He treated the mountain tune respectfully and delicately, harmonizing it tastefully and developing it in an interesting fashion. The instrumentation now and then pays homage to Wagner, but for the most part D'Indy speaks his own message in his own voice.

Mr Gebhard was justly called back to the stage time and again for his customary eloquent playing. There are not many pianists now to he heard who can equal Mr Gebhard for sensitive musicianship. There are none who surpass him.

When Roussel wrote his suite, he poured a tart cocktail of modern music into the old wine bottles of form. Listening to this exuberant, stimulating piece, one is not at all concerned with preludes, sarabandes, and gigues. One thinks only of the fact that here is some original modern music worth hearing. For once, lack of sentiment does not imply lack of spirit. Mr Roussel, praise be, is not a member of the mechanical school of composition, whose adherents scramble several keys together simultaneously, according to approved formula, and then loudly proclaim a new musical deal. His middle-course theories on the use of unrelated keys are indeed shrewd.

Gregor Piatigorsky, the Russian cellist, will be soloist next week in Mozart's Horn concerto, transcribed for cello by Gaspar Cassado, and in Strauss' "Don Quixote." The remaining number will be Locatelli's "Elegiac" Symphony.

C. W. D.

Side by Side French Music And Wagner's

Room for More of His Music At Symphony Concerts, D'Indy and Roussel

Trans. Mar. 18

NUMBERS from Wagner's operas filled half the program at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky intended them as continuance of the commemoration, begun last month, of the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death. More probably, he was following his frequent custom, to give half a program in a season to such pieces. All three had been recently heard, though by other audiences, at the orchestra's concert for its Pension Fund last December; at the "Monday concert" in February that to a day marked the semi-centenary. One, the "Forest Scene" from "Siegfried," returns not too often to Symphony Hall. The other two—the Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde," the Overture to "Tannhäuser"—have long been "standard pieces" there and everywhere else. The Friday audience listened to all three tensely; upon each heaped applause. After the excerpts from "Tristan," it was not stilled until the orchestra had risen in crescent around the conductor. Contrary to its custom at the end of a concert, it lingered for recalls after the overture to "Tannhäuser," which most must have known by heart—for that reason welcomed the more.

The performance—to say nothing of the music itself—justified these excitements. A symphony orchestra may lack in degree the projecting, dramatizing accents that an operatic orchestra gives to such excerpts. (One may have reasonable doubts, if Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Stokowski or Dr. Koussevitzky happens to be conductor). But in America there is not, and there never has been, an operatic orchestra of the first rank. Our operatic seasons are too short, changeful and overcrowded for that perfection. We prefer to spend our operatic money upon other things.

In Boston, New York and Philadelphia concert-performance of excerpts from Wagner's operas gains much from the skill, intelligence and sensibility of the players, from the consequent quality of tone, force of accent and finesse of shading; from alert and full response to the conductor, from the disclosure of the symphonic as well as the operatic composer hand in hand. Here in America, the concert-hall has often known the largest splendor and the finest divination in the interpretation of Wagner. Stage aside, and theater-pit compared with concert-platform, from the latter flows the clearer Wagnerian spring.

Once more, yesterday, these advantages of the American concert-hall stood plain in the performance of the three excerpts. (Only one, the arrangement from the Second Act of "Siegfried," gains by the visualizing of a well-ordered stage.) The qualities of the orchestra, the sense of a self-contained music, were further enhanced by the conducting of Dr. Koussevitzky. Through his nine years at Symphony Hall he has gained materially with Wagner's music—in wisdom and measure, in clear insight and projecting eloquence. He is now less disposed to substitute a "very personal reading" for the discernible intentions of Wagner himself. (No composer knew more certainly what he wanted nor more plainly indicated the intention, the ways, the means.) No longer does the conductor try to outdo in revelation even the Wagner who made revelation possible. Perhaps there was a reminiscence of this fault in the tonal whisper, almost inaudible, with which the "Forest Scene" began. But once in course, the music sounded the truer, wrought the more illusion, for the conductor's just proportioning. The measures of forest whir and glimmer and stillness, the measures of the memories astir in Siegfried's young mind, the song of the woodland bird, the hint of the fire-girt Brünnhilde—all fell into place and picture.

The performance of the Prelude to "Tristan"—one of the present heights of Dr. Koussevitzky with Wagner—was remarkable for the richness of the orchestral texture, the incisiveness of the orchestral accent, the sensuous euphonies of instrument with instrument and choir with choir; the imaginative adjustment of the turn from the fateful beginning into the outset of amorous ecstasy; the intensive advance, with the unfolding of the music and the mounting of the passion in closest unity. As one flood were the two. The finest of tonal fiber, the justest of proportioning, distinguished the playing of the final scene. Again the unfolding of a music in which Wagner is at the full of symphonic creation; the final sublimation in Isolde's death-song of the passion and fate that fill the opera, were inseparable.

No conductor will forbear the splendors of tone with which an orchestra of the nineteen-thirties can enrich and re-voice the overture to "Tannhäuser" of the eighteen-forties. For what else are three-score strings, a master of the clarinet, the numbers and quality of the brass choir at his command? Many a conductor—Mr. Mengelberg for example—only rants and rages in this quest of power and splendor. By richness of tone, by balance and measure, by edged orchestral accent Dr. Koussevitzky gains it. Ninety years have mellowed the Pilgrims' melody; only in the later Paris version does the music of the Venusberg keep voluptuous sting. The tonal strife of flesh and spirit persists; but it is better, with Dr. Koussevitzky, not to overdo and burst it.

These three excerpts, the quality of the performance, the response of the audience, the obvious excitement on the stage and in the auditorium, suggested reflections. The place of Wagner in a capital city of music is obviously its opera house: Dr. Muck was manifestly right when he insisted that only the overtures, the preludes and a few self-contained fragments from the music-dramas could be transferred in integrity to the concert-hall. Boston indeed has an opera house, opened in recent years for as many as two weeks out of fifty-two, including in that fortnight as many as four, five or six performances of Wagner's operas, usually the more familiar. Boston is now an altogether opera-less city. It may remain such for some years to come, while we are adjusting our American world to a new life. Yet the public of concerts, and many who do not frequent them, are keen to hear the music of Wagner. It is at apogee now in America; as some say in Europe as well. If we in Boston may not have Wagner in the theater then we should have him in the concert-hall which is the next best place. We should have him in particular at the Symphony Concerts for the quality of performance already cited. Dr. Muck's ruling, which his successors at Symphony Hall have generally followed, is applicable to any city with a functioning opera house. But Boston has none.

For these reasons it seems desirable to break away from the succession of overtures and preludes and a few established excerpts—the mourning for Siegfried dead, the Good Friday Spell in "Parsifal" are convenient examples—that have too long been the standard Wagnerian repertory at Symphony Hall. If we do not hear there the Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla, the farewells of Wotan and Brünnhilde, the mounting of Siegfried to Brünnhilde's rock, the duet of hero and valkyr, the song of the Rhine-Maidens, the death of Siegfried, Brünnhilde opening her lips in prophecy and doom, when and where shall we hear them? Not few of these pages are summits of music—symphonic, operatic, what the hearer will. So also with the Introduction to the third acts of "Tristan" and of "Die Meistersinger"; the rapture of Tristan and Isolde in the garden; the choral close of "Die Meistersinger," the rites of the grail in "Parsifal." The third act of "Siegfried" is towering Wagnerian monument. In the half century through which it has been known to Boston, how many times has it been heard in either opera house or concert-hall?

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski has made bold to transfer whole acts from Wagner's operas to the concerts of his orchestra. In a fortnight he will venture all of "Parsifal" under those conditions. He has assembled and played as well long excerpts, suite-like, from Wagner's operas; while to every one the public of the Philadelphia Orchestra has risen. Allow for Mr. Stokowski's operatic ambitions. Dr. Koussevitzky nurses none. Even so, in the present state of Wagner in opera-less Boston, here are courses to be considered, perhaps to be followed, by the powers that be at Symphony Hall. At the least the Wagnerian repertory there should be widened by the restoration of orchestral excerpts too long neglected, by the inclusion of self-contained scenes that also employ voices. (These voices are essential strands in Wagner's symphonic web.) As present signs go, the response of the public may not be doubted. Until there is opera again, only from the Symphony Orchestra may we receive such music.

The first half of the concert fell to pieces that well deserved revival—the Suite in F major of Roussel, last heard when it was new work in 1927, written with thought of the orchestra and the conductor that again were playing it; d'Indy's early Symphony on a Mountain Air for Orchestra and Piano, overlooked through nine years "at these concerts," now returned with Mr. Gebhard to play, as of old, the piano-part. Roussel's Suite is the "modern stuff" of a poised and receptive composing mind, of a distinguished craftsman's skill. There are new means and modes of creation and expression; but no excesses and no affectations, neither dryness nor emptiness. The Prelude is a tumult of rhythm and dissonant chords stinging and stimulating to hear. It is wrought as largely, firmly, vigorously, as though it were introduction to what our grandfathers called a "grand symphony." Time and again in force and exhilaration it is near to bursting the bounds of a Suite.

The second movement returns to the ancient form of a saraband; shapes it with sense of style; fills it with gentle, measured instrumental song; yet does not always forbear the modern, acidulous note. Like the rest of us, in this century of ours, Monsieur Roussel may not muse without a bitter memory edging within. The final Gigue returns to the rhythmic animation of the beginning, peppers in the jazz that a sensitive composer hears out of the times then transforms into his own musical image; renews also the exhilaration tha pervades the whole Suite. It is the wa of Roussel as we know him in Boston, t write a stimulating music—lightly as i this Suite, deeply as in the Symphony in B-flat of Dr. Koussevitzky's first year

Within belief the d'Indy of this "Symphony on a Mountain Air," the d'Indy whose musical culmination is the tone poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain," may outlast in the long run the d'Indy o dogmatic theorizing and, on occasion, o narrow and pedantic practice. Out of th Symphony on the melody from his nativ Cévennes sings the d'Indy who in our pe American word is also "human." How inventively the composer adapts to his purpose this shepherd's song, yet how ingratiating it remains in itself! How admirable is the craftsmanship of the whole music—that blessed French ability to hold to a clear design and governing purpose; to find the fit means to the desired end! Yet how fresh and warm o mood and imagination is this symphony that is not quite a symphony, nor ye again a concerto! D'Indy sat at his study table in Paris and put black notes o ruled staves. Yet his mind and hear lingered on the countryside and in th summer life that he loved. While h was aptly distributing piano and orchestra the mood within him infused th music and endures fresh and communi cating to this day. The lyrical d'Ind outdoes the others that were t come, dogmatic, ascetic, embittered. Th mingled simplicity, sympathy and ski with which Dr. Koussevitzky and M Gebhard approached and achieved th symphony were the complement of th composer's will and works. They renewe the life of the music; made it pleasure t most that heard.

H. T. P.

Heinrich Gebhard Is Symphony Soloist

Amer. Mar 18

By MOSES SMITH

The program for the symphony concerts of this week is divided between French composers and Wagner. In a year that marks a half-century since Wagner's death, and in a city which for the present is devoid of opera, Serge Koussevitzky assumes no doubt that occasional sprinkling of the master's music-dramas on concert programs will be well received. And he is right for Wagner is still much alive in spirit.

The chosen excerpts are the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfriend," the prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "Tannhauser." The preceding half of the concert is devoted to Vincent d'Indy's great symphony on a French Mountain Air and a suite in F major, by Roussel, composed especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and first played by that organization under Koussevitzky six years ago.

The d'Indy symphony was given a great performance at yesterday's matinee concert. The soloist was Heinrich Gebhard, local pianistic veteran. Apparently he and Dr. Koussevitzky had agreed on all essential points of interpretation, including the vital concept that this is no display piece for a pianist; the piano is but a part (though a most important and brilliant part) of the orchestral web.

The resulting presentation was rich and romantic and passionate. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted at white heat, and Mr. Gebhard and the orchestra were similarly warmed.

Music

Monitor Mar 18

Boston Symphony Orchestra

French composers had a prominent place on the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (March 17-18). First came M. Roussel with his Suite in F, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and first played by the Boston orchestra six years ago. Its revival was appropriate, and not only because of the dedication. The suite is an interesting and successful attempt to adapt the modern idiom to an ancient form. M. Roussel here wrote with French clarity and taste—except that the thematic material of the Gigue is rather ordinary.

The suite was followed by D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air, in which Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part. Here was another timely revival, for the work had not been heard in Boston since 1924, when it was directed by Mr. Monteux. Its charming pages seem today a little faded. D'Indy, and other French composers of his period, appear to have been trying very hard not to write like Wagner, but not succeeding—except in the sense that they did not write so well. This symphony is perfectly correct, but not very exciting. The originality of a Debussy or a Strauss had been denied to D'Indy. And to what extent is the famous Franckian cyclic formula, carried on by D'Indy, to be regarded as a valuable enlargement of symphonic resources? Does it not tend rather to monotony than to unity, depriving the symphony of a needed element of contrast? The performance of D'Indy's work was brilliant, and Mr. Gebhard, excellent pianist and fine musician, covered himself with glory.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has, and deserves, the reputation of being probably the best symphonic program-maker in America, slipped, however, when he made up this list; for he filled second half of it with the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser." Only a month before the conductor had paid his memorial tribute to Wagner in a concert which concluded with a noble performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Why, on no provocation whatever, now trot out some of the most hackneyed of Wagnerian excerpts?

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Her. Mar 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 19th symphony concert given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon and conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky was as follows: Roussel, Suite in F major; d'Indy, Symphony on a French mountain air for orchestra and piano (Heinrich Gebhard, pianist); Wagner, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Roussel's Suite was composed for this orchestra and dedicated to its conductor in 1926. The performance yesterday was the second. The Suite is of such a joyous and at the same time thoroughly musical nature, so well planned, so interesting to professional and layman, it is surprising that it has been kept in the background. The Prelude is fashioned in a masterly manner, nor does the composer's exhibition of technical ability lead to cudgeling of the brain on the part of the hearer. The writing is clear, and arresting.

Some might wish a sterner Sarabande, or at least one with a more melancholy tinge; but Roussel was not intent on baring the soul of Spain, nor striving to follow in the footsteps of Handel and others who fancied that grave dance. Though Mr. Dolmetsch insists that there were lively sarabandes; which reminds one of a remark by Charles Reade: "There was once an Israelite without guile, but you and I, dear reader, never saw him."

There is a piece, originally a ballet, by Roussel, "The Spider's Festival," which, although it has been performed in Boston is not in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Roussel are good friends. The latter's Symphony was one of the marked features of the orchestra's Jubilee exercises. Is not this "Spider's Festival" worth doing? Like Rosa Dartle, we only ask for information. "The Spider's Festival" was brought here by Mr. Toscanini in January, 1912. A few days later the Boston Musical Association, Mr. Longy, conductor, gave a performance. The title interests one; we should very likely find the music without the stage settings and the action disappointing. Sahary Djelli was the chief dancer in Paris 20 years ago. Any woman with a name like that was worth seeing.

Vincent d'Indy was attached to the Cevenne mountains and the neighboring plains. It would seem as if like the giant Antaeus of old he retained his strength as long as his feet touched the ground, for this Symphony built on an air of the Cevenes is surely one of his most interesting orchestral works. Though it has been performed here several times, with various pianists—Mr. Gebhard was the pianist as far back as 1906—the composition still fascinates, though the late composer would have probably preferred his "Istar," "Summer Day on the Mountain" or his fine Symphony in B flat. For the general public this "Symphony on a Mountain Air" is the thing. The performance was excellent. Mr. Gebhard realized that the Symphony was for orchestra and piano, not for piano and orchestra, and so preserved the proper proportion and relationship. Thus, indispensable, he did not demand exclusive attention and admiration. In other words he played as a musician, not merely well equipped as a pianist. The orchestral performance was brilliant, as was that of the Wagnerian excerpts.

Some may remember how Arthur Nikisch, when he ruled this symphony's roast, excited wild enthusiasm by bringing out inner parts in the "Tannhaeuser" overtures, louder than the chief theme. But that was in Nikisch's green and salad days when he often lacked judgment.

Wagner years ago had protested against conductors doing this trick for the sake of an undesirable effect; he had written in unmistakable terms against undue prominence given to the horns in the final measures.

It was a pleasure to hear the music of "Waldweben" again. When "Siegfried" is performed on the stage the spectator is disturbed musically from fear that the bird will not fly off with proper regard for the composer and the hero.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Locatelli's "Elegaic" symphony; Mozart's Concerto for horn (K. 447) transcribed freely for violoncello by Gaspar Carrado, and Strauss's "Don Quixote." Mr. Piatigorsky will play the concerto, also the violoncello solo in "Don Quixote"; Mr. Lefranc will play the viola solo in Strauss's tone poem.

19th Concert · Fri-Sat

143

Globe MUSIC Ma 18

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

If the shade of Richard Wagner happened to be present in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon while the "Tannhauser" overture was being played, it must have remarked to the sculptured gentlemen high on the walls that below them a revelation was taking place. A revelation of how a man's imagination, interpretive powers and will with an orchestra can bring new fire and new beauty out of a hackneyed, 90-year-old score. (Though the anything but humble Richard would doubtless not have so referred to this product of his 30's!)

This overture—by no means the supremely masterly music that Wagner wrote later in life—has had all sorts of performances in its time, many of them bad. So many times in the past, under other hands, has the Pilgrims' chorus seemed theatrical artifice, lacking in the religious fervor it is intended to convey; how frequently have the Venusberg pages sounded old-fashioned and melodramatic rather than suggestive of the pagan creatures and frenzied routs of Venus' subterranean court. But yesterday, by virtue of gorgeous tone, dynamic emphasis, and an indefinable sixth sense of conducting, the overture moved and thrilled as never before.

Dr Koussevitzky's personal reading, although familiar, had not previously seemed quite so incandescent. It wrung every bit of effect from the printed notes. Some may call this exaggeration, compared to more sober readings; but one listener is unregenerate enough to look with favor upon such a course when it really improves the music.

There were two other Wagner fragments on the program, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Earlier had come Roussel's Suite in F major, and Vincent D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," with Heinrich Gebhard playing the solo piano part.

The "Forest Murmurs" was meticulously, transparently, played. This was one of the few occasions within memory when the elusive detail of the beginning received as much attention as the clarion sounding of the various motives that occur later in the score. The "Tristan" excerpts were—as always—very moving, but one listener would have enjoyed them even more had they been played faster. To linger over the sinuous measures just long enough to draw out full effect is different from remaining until the phrases are stretched out and thereby lose their force.

D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air" is in some respects a remarkable piece of music. To begin with, it is a highly personal creation, romantic in style and feeling, but not sedulously imitative of that supreme romanticist, Richard Wagner, whose influence, in 1886, still dominated composition. For a young man to assert his individuality in those days was ghastly conceit. Even Richard Strauss, the enfant terrible of the time, had barely began to emerge from this influence. The symphony was composed when D'Indy was in his 30s, when he apparently valued feeling and imagination above academic theories of symphonic construction.

He treated the mountain tune respectfully and delicately, harmonizing it tastefully and developing it in an interesting fashion. The instrumentation now and then pays homage to Wagner, but for the most part D'Indy speaks his own message in his own voice.

Mr Gebhard was justly called back to the stage time and again for his customary eloquent playing. There are not many pianists now to he heard who can equal Mr Gebhard for sensitive musicianship. There are none who surpass him.

When Roussel wrote his suite, he poured a tart cocktail of modern music into the old wine bottles of form. Listening to this exuberant, stimulating piece, one is not at all concerned with preludes, sarabandes, and gigues. One thinks only of the fact that here is some original modern music worth hearing. For once, lack of sentiment does not imply lack of spirit. Mr Roussel, praise be, is not a member of the mechanical school of composition, whose adherents scramble several keys together simultaneously, according to approved formula, and then loudly proclaim a new musical deal. His middle-course theories on the use of unrelated keys are indeed shrewd.

Gregor Piatigorsky, the Russian cellist, will be soloist next week in Mozart's Horn concerto, transcribed for cello by Gaspar Cassado, and in Strauss' "Don Quixote." The remaining number will be Locatelli's "Elegiac" Symphony. C. W. D.

Side by Side French Music And Wagner's

Room for More of His Music At Symphony Concerts, D'Indy and Roussel

Trans. Mar 18

NUMBERS from Wagner's operas filled half the program at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon. Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky intended them as continuance of the commemoration, begun last month, of the fiftieth anniversary of Wagner's death. More probably, he was following his frequent custom, to give half a program in a season to such pieces. All three had been recently heard, though by other audiences, at the orchestra's concert for its Pension Fund last December; at the "Monday concert" in February that to a day marked the semi-centenary. One, the "Forest Scene" from "Siegfried," returns not too often to Symphony Hall. The other two—the Prelude and Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde," the Overture to "Tannhäuser"—have long been "standard pieces" there and everywhere else. The Friday audience listened to all three tensely; upon each heaped applause. After the excerpts from "Tristan," it was not stilled until the orchestra had risen in crescent around the conductor. Contrary to its custom at the end of a concert, it lingered for recalls after the overture to "Tannhäuser," which most must have known by heart—for that reason welcomed the more.

The performance—to say nothing of the music itself—justified these excitements. A symphony orchestra may lack in degree the projecting, dramatizing accents that an operatic orchestra gives to such excerpts. (One may have reasonable doubts, if Mr. Toscanini, Mr. Stokowski or Dr. Koussevitzky happens to be conductor). But in America there is not, and there never has been, an operatic orchestra of the first rank. Our operatic seasons are too short, changeful and overcrowded for that perfection. We prefer to spend our operatic money upon other things.

In Boston, New York and Philadelphia concert-performance of excerpts from Wagner's operas gains much from the skill, intelligence and sensibility of the players, from the consequent quality of tone, force of accent and finesse of shading; from alert and full response to the conductor, from the disclosure of the symphonic as well as the operatic composer hand in hand. Here in America, the concert-hall has often known the largest splendor and the finest diviniation in the interpretation of Wagner. Stage aside, and theater-pit compared with concert-platform, from the latter flows the clearer Wagnerian spring.

Once more, yesterday, these advantages of the American concert-hall stood plain in the performance of the three excerpts. (Only one, the arrangement from the Second Act of "Siegfried," gains by the visualizing of a well-ordered stage.) The qualities of the orchestra, the sense of a self-contained music, were further enhanced by the conducting of Dr. Koussevitzky. Through his nine years at Symphony Hall he has gained materially with Wagner's music—in wisdom and measure, in clear insight and projecting eloquence. He is now less disposed to substitute a "very personal reading" for the discernible intentions of Wagner himself. (No composer knew more certainly what he wanted nor more plainly indicated the intention, the ways, the means.) No longer does the conductor try to outdo in revelation even the Wagner who made revelation possible. Perhaps there was a reminiscence of this fault in the tonal whisper, almost inaudible, with which the "Forest Scene" began. But once in course, the music sounded the truer, wrought the more illusion, for the conductor's just proportioning. The measures of forest whir and glimmer and stillness, the measures of the memories astir in Siegfried's young mind, the song of the woodland bird, the hint of the fire-girt Brünnhilde—all fell into place and picture.

The performance of the Prelude to "Tristan"—one of the present heights of Dr. Koussevitzky with Wagner—was remarkable for the richness of the orchestral texture, the incisiveness of the orchestral accent, the sensuous euphonies of instrument with instrument and choir with choir; the imaginative adjustment of the turn from the fateful beginning into the outset of amorous ecstasy; the intensive advance, with the unfolding of the music and the mounting of the passion in closest unity. As one flood were the two. The finest of tonal fiber, the justest of proportioning, distinguished the playing of the final scene. Again the unfolding of a music in which Wagner is at the full of symphonic creation; the final sublimation in Isolde's death-song of the passion and fate that fill the opera, were inseparable.

No conductor will forbear the splendors of tone with which an orchestra of the nineteen-thirties can enrich and re-voice the overture to "Tannhäuser" of the eighteen-forties. For what else are threescore strings, a master of the clarinet, the numbers and quality of the brass choir at his command? Many a conductor—Mr. Mengelberg for example—only rants and rages in this quest of power and splendor. By richness of tone, by balance and measure, by edged orchestral accent Dr. Koussevitzky gains it. Ninety years have mellowed the Pilgrims' melody; only in the later Paris version does the music of the Venusberg keep voluptuous sting. The tonal strife of flesh and spirit persists; but it is better, with Dr. Koussevitzky, not to overdo and burst it.

These three excerpts, the quality of the performance, the response of the audience, the obvious excitement on the stage and in the auditorium, suggested reflections. The place of Wagner in a capital city of music is obviously its opera house. Dr. Muck was manifestly right when he insisted that only the overtures, the preludes and a few self-contained fragments from the music-dramas could be transferred in integrity to the concert-hall. Boston indeed has an opera house, opened in recent years for as many as two weeks out of fifty-two, including in that fortnight as many as four, five or six performances of Wagner's operas, usually the more familiar. Boston is now an altogether opera-less city. It may remain such for some years to come, while we are adjusting our American world to a new life. Yet the public of concerts, and many who do not frequent them, are keen to hear the music of Wagner. It is at apogee now in America; as some say in Europe as well. If we in Boston may not have Wagner in the theater then we should have him in the concert-hall which is the next best place. We should have him in particular at the Symphony Concerts for the quality of performance already cited. Dr. Muck's ruling, which his successors at Symphony Hall have generally followed, is applicable to any city with a functioning opera house. But Boston has none.

For these reasons it seems desirable to break away from the succession of overtures and preludes and a few established excerpts—the mourning for Siegfried dead, the Good Friday Spell in "Parsifal" are convenient examples—that have too long been the standard Wagnerian repertory at Symphony Hall. If we do not hear there the Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla, the farewells of Wotan and Brünnhilde, the mounting of Siegfried to Brünnhilde's rock, the duet of hero and valkyr, the song of the Rhine-Maidens, the death of Siegfried, Brünnhilde opening her lips in prophecy and doom, when and where shall we hear them? Not few of these pages are summits of music—symphonic, operatic, what the hearer will. So also with the Introduction to the third acts of "Tristan" and of "Die Meistersinger"; the rapture of Tristan and Isolde in the garden; the choral close of "Die Meistersinger," the rites of the grail in "Parsifal." The third act of "Siegfried" is towering Wagnerian monument. In the half century through which it has been known to Boston, how many times has it been heard in either opera house or concert-hall?

In Philadelphia Mr. Stokowski has made bold to transfer whole acts from Wagner's operas to the concerts of his orchestra. In a fortnight he will venture all of "Parsifal" under those conditions. He has assembled and played as well long excerpts, suite-like, from Wagner's operas; while to every one the public of the Philadelphia Orchestra has risen. Allow for Mr. Stokowski's operatic ambitions. Dr. Koussevitzky nurses none. Even so, in the present state of Wagner in opera-less Boston, here are courses to be considered, perhaps to be followed, by the powers that be at Symphony Hall. At the least the Wagnerian repertory there should be widened by the restoration of orchestral excerpts too long neglected, by the inclusion of self-contained scenes that also employ voices. (These voices are essential strands in Wagner's symphonic web.) As present signs go, the response of the public may not be doubted. Until there is opera again, only from the Symphony Orchestra may we receive such music.

The first half of the concert fell to pieces that well deserved revival—the Suite in F major of Roussel, last heard when it was new work in 1927, written with thought of the orchestra and the conductor that again were playing it; d'Indy's early Symphony on a Mountain Air for Orchestra and Piano, overlooked through nine years "at these concerts," now returned with Mr. Gebhard to play, as of old, the piano-part. Roussel's Suite is the "modern stuff" of a poised and receptive composing mind, of a distinguished craftsman's skill. There are new means and modes of creation and expression; but no excesses and no affectations, neither dryness nor emptiness. The Prelude is a tumult of rhythm and dissonant chords stinging and stimulating to hear. It is wrought as largely, firmly, vigorously, as though it were introduction to what our grandfathers called a "grand symphony." Time and again in force and exhilaration it is near to bursting the bounds of a Suite.

The second movement returns to the ancient form of a saraband; shapes it with sense of style; fills it with gentle, measured instrumental song; yet does not always forbear the modern, acidulous note. Like the rest of us, in this century of ours, Monsieur Roussel may not muse without a bitter memory edging within. The final Gigue returns to the rhythmic animation of the beginning, peppers in the jazz that a sensitive composer hears out of the times then transforms into his own musica image; renews also the exhilaration tha pervades the whole Suite. It is the wa of Roussel as we know him in Boston, t write a stimulating music—lightly as i this Suite, deeply as in the Symphony in B-flat of Dr. Koussevitzky's first year.

Within belief the d'Indy of this "Symphony on a Mountain Air," the d'Ind whose musical culmination is the tone poem, "Summer Day on the Mountain, may outlast in the long run the d'Indy o dogmatic theorizing and, on occasion, o narrow and pedantic practice. Out of th Symphony on the melody from his nativ Cévennes sings the d'Indy who in our pe American word is also "human." How inventively the composer adapts to his purpose this shepherd's song, yet how ingratiating it remains in itself! How admirable is the craftsmanship of th whole music—that blessed French ability to hold to a clear design and governing purpose; to find the fit means to the desired end!. Yet how fresh and warm o mood and imagination is this symphony that is not quite a symphony, nor ye again a concerto! D'Indy sat at his study table in Paris and put black notes o ruled staves. Yet his mind and hear lingered on the countryside and in th summer life that he loved. While h was aptly distributing piano and orchestra the mood within him infused th music and endures fresh and communicating to this day. The lyrical d'Ind outdoes the others that were t come, dogmatic, ascetic, embittered. Th mingled simplicity, sympathy and ski with which Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr Gebhard approached and achieved th symphony were the complement of th composer's will and works. They renewe the life of the music; made it pleasure t most that heard. H. T. P.

Heinrich Gebhard Is Symphony Soloist

Amer By MOSES SMITH Mar 18

The program for the symphony concerts of this week is divided between French composers and Wagner. In a year that marks a half-century since Wagner's death, and in a city which for the present is devoid of opera, Serge Koussevitzky assumes no doubt that occasional sprinkling of the master's music-dramas on concert programs will be well received. And he is right—for Wagner is still much alive in spirit.

The chosen excerpts are the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfriend," the prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "Tannhauser." The preceding half of the concert is devoted to Vincent d'Indy's great symphony on a French Mountain Air and a suite in F major, by Roussel, composed especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and first played by that organization under Koussevitzky six years ago.

The d'Indy symphony was given a great performance at yesterday's matinee concert. The soloist was Heinrich Gebhard, local pianistic veteran. Apparently he and Dr. Koussevitzky had agreed on all essential points of interpretation, including the vital concept that this is no display piece for a pianist; the piano is but a part (though a most important and brilliant part) of the orchestral web.

The resulting presentation was rich and romantic and passionate. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted at white heat, and Mr. Gebhard and the orchestra were similarly warmed.

Music

Monitor Mar 18

Boston Symphony Orchestra

French composers had a prominent place on the nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (March 17-18). First came M. Roussel with his Suite in F, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and first played by the Boston orchestra six years ago. Its revival was appropriate, and not only because of the dedication. The suite is an interesting and successful attempt to adapt the modern idiom to an ancient form. M. Roussel here wrote with French clarity and taste—except that the thematic material of the Gigue is rather ordinary.

The suite was followed by D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air, in which Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part. Here was another timely revival, for the work had not been heard in Boston since 1924, when it was directed by Mr. Monteux. Its charming pages seem today a little faded. D'Indy, and other French composers of his period, appear to have been trying very hard not to write like Wagner, but not succeeding—except in the sense that they did not write so well. This symphony is perfectly correct, but not very exciting. The originality of a Debussy or a Strauss had been denied to D'Indy. And to what extent is the famous Franckian cyclic formula, carried on by D'Indy, to be regarded as a valuable enlargement of symphonic resources? Does it not tend rather to monotony than to unity, depriving the symphony of a needed element of contrast? The performance of D'Indy's work was brilliant, and Mr. Gebhard, excellent pianist and fine musician, covered himself with glory.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has, and deserves, the reputation of being probably the best symphonic program-maker in America, slipped, however, when he made up this list; for he filled second half of it with the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan" and the Overture to "Tannhäuser." Only a month before the conductor had paid his memorial tribute to Wagner in a concert which concluded with a noble performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Why, on no provocation whatever, now trot out some of the most hackneyed of Wagnerian excerpts? L. A. S.

MUSIC

Her. Mar. 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 19th symphony concert given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon and conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky was as follows: Roussel, Suite in F major; d'Indy, Symphony on a French mountain air for orchestra and piano (Heinrich Gebhard, pianist); Wagner, "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Roussel's Suite was composed for this orchestra and dedicated to its conductor in 1926. The performance yesterday was the second. The Suite is of such a joyous and at the same time thoroughly musical nature, so well planned, so interesting to professional and layman, it is surprising that it has been kept in the background. The Prelude is fashioned in a masterly manner, nor does the composer's exhibition of technical ability lead to cudgeling of the brain on the part of the hearer. The writing is clear, and arresting.

Some might wish a sterner Sarabande, or at least one with a more melancholy tinge; but Roussel was not intent on baring the soul of Spain, nor striving to follow in the footsteps of Handel and others who fancied that grave dance. Though Mr. Dolmetsch insists that there were lively sarabandes; which reminds one of a remark by Charles Reade: "There was once an Israelite without guile, but you and I, dear reader, never saw him."

There is a piece, originally a ballet, by Roussel, "The Spider's Festival," which, although it has been performed in Boston is not in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Roussel are good friends. The latter's Symphony was one of the marked features of the orchestra's Jubilee exercises. Is not this "Spider's Festival" worth doing? Like Rosa Dartle, we only ask for information. "The Spider's Festival" was brought here by Mr. Toscanini in January, 1912. A few days later the Boston Musical Association, Mr. Longy, conductor, gave a performance. The title interests one; we should very likely find the music without the stage settings and the action disappointing. Sahary Djelli was the chief dancer in Paris 20 years ago. Any woman with a name like that was worth seeing.

Vincent d'Indy was attached to the Cevenne mountains and the neighboring plains. It would seem as if like the giant Antaeus of old he retained his strength as long as his feet touched the ground, for this Symphony built on an air of the Cevenes is surely one of his most interesting orchestral works. Though it has been performed here several times, with various pianists—Mr. Gebhard was the pianist as far back as 1906—the composition still fascinates, though the late composer would have probably preferred his "Istar," "Summer Day on the Mountain" or his fine Symphony in B flat. For the general public this "Symphony on a Mountain Air" is the thing. The performance was excellent. Mr. Gebhard realized that the Symphony was for orchestra and piano, not for piano and orchestra, and so preserved the proper proportion and relationship. Thus, indispensable, he did not demand exclusive attention and admiration. In other words he played as a musician, not merely well equipped as a pianist. The orchestral performance was brilliant, as was that of the Wagnerian excerpts.

Some may remember how Arthur Nikisch, when he ruled this symphony's roast, excited wild enthusiasm by bringing out inner parts in the "Tannhaeuser" overtures, louder than the chief theme. But that was in Nikisch's green and salad days when he often lacked judgment.

Wagner years ago had protested against conductors doing this trick for the sake of an undesirable effect; he had written in unmistakable terms against undue prominence given to the horns in the final measures.

It was a pleasure to hear the music of "Waldweben" again. When "Siegfried" is performed on the stage the spectator is disturbed musically from fear that the bird will not fly off with proper regard for the composer and the hero.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Locatelli's "Elegaic" symphony; Mozart's Concerto for horn (K. 447) transcribed freely for violoncello by Gaspar Carrado, and Strauss's "Don Quixote." Mr. Piatigorsky will play the concerto, also the violoncello solo in "Don Quixote"; Mr. Lefranc will play the viola solo in Strauss's tone poem.

ENGAGING MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post MAR 18

Heinrich Gebhard at Piano in D'Indy's Number

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A programme of exuberant music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon suited well the day. If one must needs stay indoors when warmth and sunlight beckoned without, at least there were compensations.

VIGOR AND BEAUTY

This lustiness was immediately in evidence in the Suite of Roussel, composed for Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra and first performed here six years ago. The succeeding number, d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" for orchestra and pianoforte, sustained the vigor that are in Roussel's Prelude and Gigue, while in the second half of the concert came three excerpts from Wagner, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," for more music of urge and impulse; the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," for excitement of a different sort, and for ringing conclusion the Overture to "Tannhauser."

D'Indy's Symphony, now nearly 50 years old, is wearing well, much better, in fact, than its far more pretentious successor, the Symphony in B flat. There are Wagnerians in the earlier work, but they do not disturb. Not before had Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this Symphony here, but the pianist yesterday was Heinrich Gebhard, who has participated in many performances of it here in days gone by. The sympathy that he has always shown for this music was again in evidence, as was the technical skill that could realize his every intention.

Hope for His Masterpiece

Nor was this sympathy unshared yesterday by conductor and orchestra. It now remains for Dr. Koussevitzky to give us the work that some hold to be d'Indy's masterpiece, "A Summer Day on the Mountain."

Roussel's Suite and his compatriot's Symphony have certain things in common. In each the first two of the three movements are the finest. At the outset, both pieces seize and captivate; the listener becomes sensible and appreciative of the lucidity of the French mind and of the propulsive vitality that now and then goes hand in hand with it. Both slow divisions please, though the elder composer courts, as the younger shuns, the sensuous and sentimental note. Both Finales again start off bravely, and both descend a little towards cheapness and blatancy. And there are other French works, for example, the Symphony of Chausson, in which the Finales exhibit the same fault. Is the attainment of liveliness and vigor without loss of dignity, of ardor without sacrifice of breadth, to be reckoned as something that evades the Latin music-maker?

Three From Wagner

It is possible to believe that the presence of Wagner's music on yesterday's programme was intended as a sop for those who felt themselves cheated when most of a Wagner memorial concert was given over to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

The three numbers, eloquently played, were warmly received. After the "Tristan" excerpts, for once not dragged, Dr. Koussevitzky bade his deserving players rise and bow, and the close of the "Tannhauser" Overture provoked the inevitable storm of enthusiasm.

Gebhard Soloist at Symphony

Herald Mar 18

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert of great feeling and power yesterday afternoon. It was the 19th of the current season. The guest soloist was Heinrich Gebhard. The program included the suite in F major by Roussel, the symphony on a French mountain air for pianoforte and orchestra by d'Indy and Wagner's "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," prelude and liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

There was much of the 19th century in the score. Wagner, aided and abetted by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, reigned supreme. His style, ever brave and full of tonal pomp and ceremony, was superbly interpreted, particularly in the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this Dr. Koussevitzky lent sumptuous texture to Wagner's magnificent address, bringing out to the full the proud processional, the blazing trumpets, the passionate surges and delightful hesitations that finally mount and flare and unroll themselves in glorious fullness. At conclusion the audience burst into tremendous applause. Many stamped their feet and shouted "Bravo!" a thing seldom done at these symphony concerts.

Vincent d'Indy's symphony on a French mountain air for pianoforte and orchestra was given a delightful reading by Mr. Gebhard, the conductor and orchestra. The "Cevenole Symphonie" as the French often term it, reflected the composer's love of nature in a pleasing melody of the Cavannes mountains. For the most part the piano was treated as part of the orchestra. The reception given this performance must have pleased Mr. Gebhard who played the symphony at a concert here in 1906. Dr. Koussevitzky is to be commended for the skill with which he correlated pianoforte, harp and horns.

The program began with Roussel's suite in F major, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and first played here in 1927. A modern piece full of syncopations and polytonalities, it seemed strangely out of place in this concert of 19th century heritage. Yet withall it was greeted with pleasure.

W. T. C. JR.

Incidents and Prospects

Trans Mar 20

The demoiselles of the Vincent Club should be invited to transfer to Symphony Hall their burlesque of the indignant but impotent dowagers who, wrath in every step and defiance in every glance, stalk out of the Friday matinées whenever modernist music is played. Four times last week, it brought down the house at the Wilbur. Repeated, say in the room back of the lower balcony in an intermission on a Friday, it would draw a gratified and exuberant audience.

"Sibelius's Eighth Symphony," says the London Daily Telegraph, "should have been played at the concert of Sir Thomas Beecham's Philharmonic Orchestra on March 9. But the score is not ready; while the composer's friends doubt whether the much-talked-of work has yet taken any sort of form." The symphony has also been expected for production in Boston through nearly a year.

The student orchestra of Boston University announces a concert in the auditorium at 29 Exeter Street on Tuesday evening, March 28, at 8.15. The program traverses Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon"; the Good-Friday Spell from Wagner's opera, "Parsifal"; Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice"; a new symphony by Hisato Ozawa, a Japanese student, who has already written songs, piano-pieces and chamber-music. David Blair McClosky will be assisting singer in the Prelude to "Pagliacci."

Mr. Hill's new Sinfonietta, lately heard at the Symphony Concerts, will be played at the concert of Fabien Sevitzky with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin on March 29; in his concert with the Pasdeloup Orchestra in Paris on April 9. Mr. Sevitzky has lately conducted in Boston at the Metropolitan Theater.

H. T. P.

THE ROVING REPORTER

The Rover Sets Forth His Plans for Making Boston Properly Beer Conscious—But a Dismal Picture Arises at the Thought of the Actual Prospect

Herald Mar 18

For the first time in his life the Rover is agog to lead a campaign—its object, the proper use and veneration of beer.

Many times in this column he has intimated that he has never lost an opportunity to observe racial customs regarding the use and abuse of this beverage—common to every nation, creed and age except the United States during the past 14 years.

He has watched the British navvy tossing off his pint of mull-and-bitter under a portrait of the royal family in the gloom of a London pub; has seen the genial Frenchman slowly absorbing his brassy "biere" over a checkerboard in the Rue Duphot; the phlegmatic Dutchman trying with a pewter tankard to emulate a portrait by an old master; the Belgian bathing his golden mustaches in the more golden depths of a stein; the stolid German growing mellow and tuneful amid the tumult of the fifth floor of the Hofbrau Haus; the formal Hungarian lifting his stein with gloved fingers on the terrace of the St. Gellert; the noisy Czech trying to set himself afloat in Pilsener in a dark cellar, and the gay Viennese waving his stein to "G'schichten aus der Wienerwald."

These sights have been most pleasing to the Rover's eyes. Never has he spent more pleasant moments than when filling himself with his subject during his beer researches.

The word "beer" is one with which the Rover can summon up pictures of rare beauty. Heidelberg students shouting "Ruckblick" beside the Neckar. Old Prague by moonlight from the Bierhaus on the castled hill. Berlin at sunset, and the Krollgarten orchestra playing "Marche Militaire." A dock in Wales, with a fish-and-chips shop beside the pub. The terrace of the Chateau Frontenac of a summer afternoon.

No wonder half the poets of the world have poured out their best in praise of beer. The words themselves are poetry—Pilsener, Muenchener, Loewenbrau, Black Horse, Burton's, Guinness's.

But when the Rover thinks of beer and Boston and the future, two dismal pictures arise.

The first is a sort of glorified Thompson's Spa; efficient, businesslike and practical, where the business men of State street can drop in at intervals to toss off a schooner or a seidel standing up. A filling station for beer, where it can be taken abroad in the shortest possible space of time.

Beer demands leisure as apple pie demands cheese, but leisure is a commodity that has disappeared from the American market. Boston will want its beer in a hurry, and in place of the gaiety and the music, the quiet tables and the views, the checker boards and the laughter, there will be toss-it-off-and-run emporia minus everything that beer requires.

The second picture is the glorified speakeasy. Modernistic architecture, all restless angles, meaningless planes of glaring light and garish color; shouting orchestras, chaos on earth. A place that calls for cocktails, gin fizzes and whiskey sours, but where beer is no more at home than the Angel Gabriel.

Roused by the dismal prospect of these two pictures, the Rover has conducted alone a canvass of the city for places where beer can be served as it should be served.

First, there is the Common. Remove the hard wooden benches from around the Parkman bandstand, fence in a space with neat white pickets, fill it with painted tables and chairs, search the welfare lists for genial women of not less than 200 pounds, train them to carry 20 steins at once, and Boston has a beer garden to be proud of, with a first-class orchestra playing every afternoon and evening.

Place the director of public celebrations at the gate with a bunch of ten-cent tickets, and the municipal debt is paid off within six months, with no one on earth the loser, and every one in Boston better for it.

Then there's the Esplanade. Picture it with tables, and waiters running about with trays of steins over their heads, and the orchestra playing Beethoven, Bach, Brahms and Liszt, the sun setting beyond the Tech buildings and the lights along the Harvard bridge. Europe would have nothing better to show for a perfect frame for beer.

Or the Pops with beer at the tables, or even Symphony with beer in the tea room during the intermission, or a beer garden under the walls of the fortress on Castle Island, with striped awnings waving in the summer breeze, or the main hall at the Mechanics building turned into a vast beer hall, with singing every Wednesday night.

Treated as it should be treated, with beer there should return a new love for music and quiet family enjoyment, for pleasant summer prospects and the out of doors, for conversation and games and mass conviviality—the very things America needs most after the rough sledding of the past two years.

Yes, the Rover is almost tempted to lead the movement. If someone would contribute the capital and the site and the waiters and the music and the beer, the Rover would create a beer garden that would be the envy of the civilized world.

Beer needs no chamipon in any country, age or day, but it should be treated as it deserves to be treated, not tossed about like the bottled tonics of an amusement park.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORKER

MAR 18 1933

MUSICAL EVENTS

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, a conductor who not only has heard of American music but also isn't afraid to play it, brought to town with him the first symphony of Louis Gruenberg, who composed "The Emperor Jones." The symphony was written fourteen years ago, revised in 1929, and is, according to the composer, "different in feeling, technique, and subject matter to what I do today." Consequently, there are two Gruenbergs represented in this plaid of a symphony. One is slightly sentimental and lingering; the other, who wrote the third movement, is restrained and concise. The whole effect couldn't be too satisfactory, but Mr. Gruenberg's music never is dull, and there is enough of the later Gruenberg in it (especially in the scoring) to make it worth hearing.

Some conductor might find it worth while to investigate a more characteristic sample of Gruenberg: "Nine Moods," which I heard Mr. Stokowski perform in an all-American radio concert last season.

Gathered from Concerts over The Week-End

A Problem at Symphony Hall, The Flute-Players Range Widely and Well

Trans Mar 20

BOTH on Friday and Saturday the audiences at the Symphony Concerts last week took hearty pleasure in Monsieur Roussel's Suite in F major, repeated for the first times since Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra produced it six years ago. Intrinsically also the piece deserved replaying and rehearing. Other works by living composers, heard for the first time in Boston at these concerts, then well received, come readily to mind for repetition. There is Mr. Bloch's Concerto Grosso for Piano and Strings; or Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" far more worth while than his lately played Symphony; or Mr. Copland's half forgotten "Music for the Theater," which Dr. Koussevitzky will take next month to the festival of chamber music at Washington; or Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" or his Second Symphony; Honegger's Symphony, again from the semi-centenary year; possibly his "Rugby," albeit rather outmoded; the amusing Suite from Kodály's comic opera, "Háry János"; Lazär's Concerto Grosso. So forth as recollection may prompt. Or to go further back and among more eminent composers, why not Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," virtually a forgotten piece, or Ravel's artful and insinuating "Tombeau de Couperin?" Almost all these pieces are as deserving and would be received as warmly as Monsieur Roussel's repeated Suite.

As every conductor knows, the obstacle in the way is to find room for such repetitions. A certain number of newly produced pieces perish after a single hearing. Either they are news of the musical day that having been heard, may pass; or they lack preservative interest; or in the fallibility of human nature prove mistaken choices. The saving remnant deserves place in the more or less active repertory—quite as much as do some of the minor classics. But that active repertory must also comprise a just proportion of perdurable and major classics, of approved moderns, of music of the hour, of occasional pieces not to be escaped. Set these within a schedule of twenty-four programs, and few are the empty niches for these desirable repetitions. A conductor once said that such pieces were the ghosts that haunted his artistic conscience; while only rarely, by some chance opening in a program, could he lay so much as one.

The only practicable suggestion that an outsider may venture is a holiday hereabouts for certain over-played classics like Franck's Symphony or Schumann's Symphony of the spring, for over-repeated pieces of our own day, like the Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushke" or Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." True, these are "popular" numbers. But it is believable that the public of the Symphony Concerts would now and again forego them, of even a classic masterpiece, for the sake of an interesting music from a secondary composer, who has earned his right to be heard again. The reception of Monsieur Roussel's Suite is current proof.

144

ENGAGING MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Post — Mar 18

Heinrich Gebhard at Piano in D'Indy's Number

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A programme of exuberant music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon suited well the day. If one must needs stay indoors when warmth and sunlight beckoned without, at least there were compensations.

VIGOR AND BEAUTY

This lustiness was immediately in evidence in the Suite of Roussel, composed for Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra and first performed here six years ago. The succeeding number, d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" for orchestra and pianoforte, sustained the vigor that are in Roussel's Prelude and Gigue, while in the second half of the concert came three excerpts from Wagner, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," for more music of urge and impulse; the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," for excitement of a different sort, and for ringing conclusion the Overture to "Tannhauser."

D'Indy's Symphony, now nearly 50 years old, is wearing well, much better, in fact, than its far more pretentious successor, the Symphony in B flat. There are Wagnerians in the earlier work, but they do not disturb. Not before had Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this Symphony here, but the pianist yesterday was Heinrich Gebhard, who has participated in many performances of it here in days gone by. The sympathy that he has always shown for this music was again in evidence, as was the technical skill that could realize his every intention.

Hope for His Masterpiece

Nor was this sympathy unshared yesterday by conductor and orchestra. It now remains for Dr. Koussevitzky to give us the work that some hold to be d'Indy's masterpiece, "A Summer Day on the Mountain."

Roussel's Suite and his compatriot's Symphony have certain things in common. In each the first two of the three movements are the finest. At the outset, both pieces seize and captivate; the listener becomes sensible and appreciative of the lucidity of the French mind and of the propulsive vitality that now and then goes hand in hand with it. Both slow divisions please, though the elder composer courts, as the younger shuns, the sensuous and sentimental note. Both Finales again start off bravely, and both descend a little towards cheapness and blatancy. And there are other French works, for example, the Symphony of Chausson, in which the Finales exhibit the same fault. Is the attainment of liveliness and vigor without loss of dignity, of ardor without sacrifice of breadth, to be reckoned as something that evades the Latin music-maker?

Three From Wagner

It is possible to believe that the presence of Wagner's music on yesterday's programme was intended as a sop for those who felt themselves cheated when most of a Wagner memorial concert was given over to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

The three numbers, eloquently played, were warmly received. After the "Tristan" excerpts, for once not dragged, Dr. Koussevitzky bade his deserving players rise and bow, and the close of the "Tannhauser" Overture provoked the inevitable storm of enthusiasm.

Gebhard Soloist at Symphony

Herald Mar 18

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert of great feeling and power yesterday afternoon. It was the 19th of the current season. The guest soloist was Heinrich Gebhard. The program included the suite in F major by Roussel, the symphony on a French mountain air for pianoforte and orchestra by d'Indy and Wagner's "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," prelude and liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," and the overture to "Tannhauser."

There was much of the 19th century in the score. Wagner, aided and abetted by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, reigned supreme. His style, ever brave and full of tonal pomp and ceremony, was superbly interpreted, particularly in the "Tannhauser" overture.

In this Dr. Koussevitzky lent sumptuous texture to Wagner's magnificent address, bringing out to the full the proud processional, the blazing trumpets, the passionate surges and delightful hesitations that finally mount and flare and unroll themselves in glorious fullness. At conclusion the audience burst into tremendous applause. Many stamped their feet and shouted "Bravo!" a thing seldom done at these symphony concerts.

Vincent d'Indy's symphony on a French mountain air for pianoforte and orchestra was given a delightful reading by Mr. Gebhard, the conductor and orchestra. The "Cevenole Symphonie" as the French often term it, reflected the composer's love of nature in a pleasing melody of the Cavannes mountains. For the most part the piano was treated as part of the orchestra. The reception given this performance must have pleased Mr. Gebhard who played the symphony at a concert here in 1906. Dr. Koussevitzky is to be commended for the skill with which he correlated pianoforte, harp and horns.

The program began with Roussel's suite in F major, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and first played here in 1927. A modern piece full of syncopations and polytonalities, it seemed strangely out of place in this concert of 19th century heritage. Yet withall it was greeted with pleasure.

W. T. C. JR.

Incidents and Prospects Trans Mar 20

The demoiselles of the Vincent Club should be invited to transfer to Symphony Hall their burlesque of the indignant but impotent dowagers who, wrath in every step and defiance in every glance, stalk out of the Friday matinées whenever modernist music is played. Four times last week, it brought down the house at the Wilbur. Repeated, say in the room back of the lower balcony in an intermission on a Friday, it would draw a gratified and exuberant audience.

"Sibelius's Eighth Symphony," says the London Daily Telegraph, "should have been played at the concert of Sir Thomas Beecham's Philharmonic Orchestra on March 9. But the score is not ready; while the composer's friends doubt whether the much-talked-of work has yet taken any sort of form." The symphony has also been expected for production in Boston through nearly a year.

The student orchestra of Boston University announces a concert in the auditorium at 29 Exeter Street on Tuesday evening, March 28, at 8.15. The program traverses Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon"; the Good-Friday Spell from Wagner's opera, "Parsifal"; Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice"; a new symphony by Hisato Ozawa, a Japanese student, who has already written songs, piano-pieces and chamber-music. David Blair McClosky will be assisting singer in the Prelude to "Pagliacci."

Mr. Hill's new Sinfonietta, lately heard at the Symphony Concerts, will be playe at the concert of Fabien Sevitzky wit the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin o March 29; in his concert with the Pas deloup Orchestra in Paris on April 9. M Sevitzky has lately conducted in Bosto at the Metropolitan Theater.

H. T. P.

THE ROVING REPORTER

The Rover Sets Forth His Plans for Making Boston Properly Beer Conscious—But a Dismal Picture Arises at the Thought of the Actual Prospect

Herald — Mar 18

For the first time in his life the Rover is agog to lead a campaign—its object, the proper use and veneration of beer.

Many times in this column he has intimated that he has never lost an opportunity to observe racial customs regarding the use and abuse of this beverage—common to every nation, creed and age except the United States during the past 14 years.

He has watched the British navvy tossing off his pint of mull-and-bitter under a portrait of the royal family in the gloom of a London pub; has seen the genial Frenchman slowly absorbing his brassy "biere" over a checkerboard in the Rue Duphot; the phlegmatic Dutchman trying with a pewter tankard to emulate a portrait by an old master; the Belgian bathing his golden mustaches in the more golden depths of a stein; the stolid German growing mellow and tuneful amid the tumult of the fifth floor of the Hofbrau Haus; the formal Hungarian lifting his stein with gloved fingers on the terrace of the St. Gellert; the noisy Czech trying to set himself afloat in Pilsener in a dark cellar, and the gay Viennese waving his stein to "G'schichten aus der Wienerwald."

These sights have been most pleasing to the Rover's eyes. Never has he spent more pleasant moments than when filling himself with his subject during his beer researches.

The word "beer" is one with which the Rover can summon up pictures of rare beauty. Heidelberg students shouting "Ruckblick" beside the Neckar. Old Prague by moonlight from the Bierhaus on the castled hill. Berlin at sunset, and the Krollgarten orchestra playing "Marche Militaire." A dock in Wales, with a fish-and-chips shop beside the pub. The terrace of the Chateau Frontenac of a summer afternoon.

No wonder half the poets of the world have poured out their best in praise of beer. The words themselves are poetry —Pilsener, Muenchener, Loewenbrau, Black Horse, Burton's, Guinness's.

But when the Rover thinks of beer and Boston and the future, two dismal pictures arise.

The first is a sort of glorified Thompson's Spa; efficient, businesslike and practical, where the business men of State street can drop in at intervals to toss off a schooner or a seidel standing up. A filling station for beer, where it can be taken abroad in the shortest possible space of time.

Beer demands leisure as apple pie demands cheese, but leisure is a commodity that has disappeared from the American market. Boston will want its beer in a hurry, and in place of the gaiety and the music, the quiet tables and the views, the checker boards and the laughter, there will be toss-it-off-and-run emporia minus everything that beer requires.

The second picture is the glorified speakeasy. Modernistic architecture, all restless angles, meaningless planes of glaring light and garish color; shouting orchestras, chaos on earth. A place that calls for cocktails, gin fizzes and whiskey sours, but where beer is no more at home than the Angel Gabriel.

Roused by the dismal prospect of these two pictures, the Rover has conducted alone a canvass of the city for places where beer can be served as it should be served.

First, there is the Common. Remove the hard wooden benches from around the Parkman bandstand, fence in a space with neat white pickets, fill it with painted tables and chairs, search the welfare lists for genial women of not less than 200 pounds, train them to carry 20 steins at once, and Boston has a beer garden to be proud of, with a first-class orchestra playing every afternoon and evening.

Place the director of public celebrations at the gate with a bunch of ten-cent tickets, and the municipal debt is paid off within six months, with no one on earth the loser, and every one in Boston better for it.

Then there's the Esplanade. Picture it with tables, and waiters running about with trays of steins over their heads, and the orchestra playing Beethoven, Bach, Brahms and Liszt, the sun setting beyond the Tech buildings and the lights along the Harvard bridge. Europe would have nothing better to show for a perfect frame for beer.

~~Or the Pops~~ with beer at the tables, or even Symphony with beer in the tea room during the intermission, or a beer garden under the walls of the fortress on Castle Island, with striped awnings waving in the summer breeze, or the main hall at the Mechanics building turned into a vast beer hall, with singing every Wednesday night.

Treated as it should be treated, with beer there should return a new love for music and quiet family enjoyment, for pleasant summer prospects and the out of doors, for conversation and games and mass conviviality—the very things America needs most after the rough sledding of the past two years.

Yes, the Rover is almost tempted to lead the movement. If someone would contribute the capital and the site and the waiters and the music and the beer, the Rover would create a beer garden that would be the envy of the civilized world.

Beer needs no chamipon in any country, age or day, but it should be treated as it deserves to be treated, not tossed about like the bottled tonics of an amusement park.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORKER

NYC

MAR 18 1933

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mr. Koussevitzky, a conductor who not only has heard of American music but also isn't afraid to play it, brought to town with him the first symphony of Louis Gruenberg, who composed "The Emperor Jones." The symphony was written fourteen years ago, revised in 1929, and is, according to the composer, "different in feeling, technique, and subject matter to what I do today." Consequently, there are two Gruenbergs represented in this plaid of a symphony. One is slightly sentimental and lingering; the other, who wrote the third movement, is restrained and concise. The whole effect couldn't be too satisfactory, but Mr. Gruenberg's music never is dull, and there is enough of the later Gruenberg in it (especially in the scoring) to make it worth hearing.

Some conductor might find it worth while to investigate a more characteristic sample of Gruenberg: "Nine Moods," which I heard Mr. Stokowski perform in an all-American radio concert last season.

Gathered from Concerts over The Week-End

A Problem at Symphony Hall, The Flute-Players Range Widely and Well

Trans — Mar 20

Both on Friday and Saturday the audiences at the Symphony Concerts last week took hearty pleasure in Monsieur Roussel's Suite in F major, repeated for the first times since Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra produced it six years ago. Intrinsically also the piece deserved replaying and rehearing. Other works by living composers, heard for the first time in Boston at these concerts, then well received, come readily to mind for repetition. There is Mr. Bloch's Concerto Grosso for Piano and Strings; or Mr. Gruenberg's "Jazz Suite" far more worth while than his lately played Symphony; or Mr. Copland's half forgotten "Music for the Theater," which Dr. Koussevitzky will take next month to the festival of chamber music at Washington; or Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" or his Second Symphony; Honegger's Symphony, again from the semi-centenary year; possibly his "Rugby," albeit rather outmoded; the amusing Suite from Kodály's comic opera, "Háry János"; Lazär's Concerto Grosso. So forth as recollection may prompt. Or to go further back and among more eminent composers, why not Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," virtually a forgotten piece, or Ravel's artful and insinuating "Tombeau de Couperin?" Almost all these pieces are as deserving and would be received as warmly as Monsieur Roussel's repeated Suite.

As every conductor knows, the obstacle in the way is to find room for such repetitions. A certain number of newly produced pieces perish after a single hearing. Either they are news of the musical day that having been heard, may pass; or they lack preservative interest; or in the fallibility of human nature prove mistaken choices. The saving remnant deserves place in the more or less active repertory—quite as much as do some of the minor classics. But that active repertory must also comprise a just proportion of perdurable and major classics, of approved moderns, of music of the hour, of occasional pieces not to be escaped. Set these within a schedule of twenty-four programs, and few are the empty niches for these desirable repetitions. A conductor once said that such pieces were the ghosts that haunted his artistic conscience; while only rarely, by some chance opening in a program, could he lay so much as one.

The only practicable suggestion that an outsider may venture is a holiday hereabouts for certain over-played classics like Franck's Symphony or Schumann's Symphony of the spring, for over-repeated pieces of our own day, like the Suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushke" or Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." True, these are "popular" numbers. But it is believable that the public of the Symphony Concerts would now and again forego them; of even a classic masterpiece, for the sake of an interesting music from a secondary composer, who has earned his right to be heard again. The reception of Monsieur Roussel's Suite is current proof.

ROTOGRAVURE
SECTION

THE BOSTON HERALD

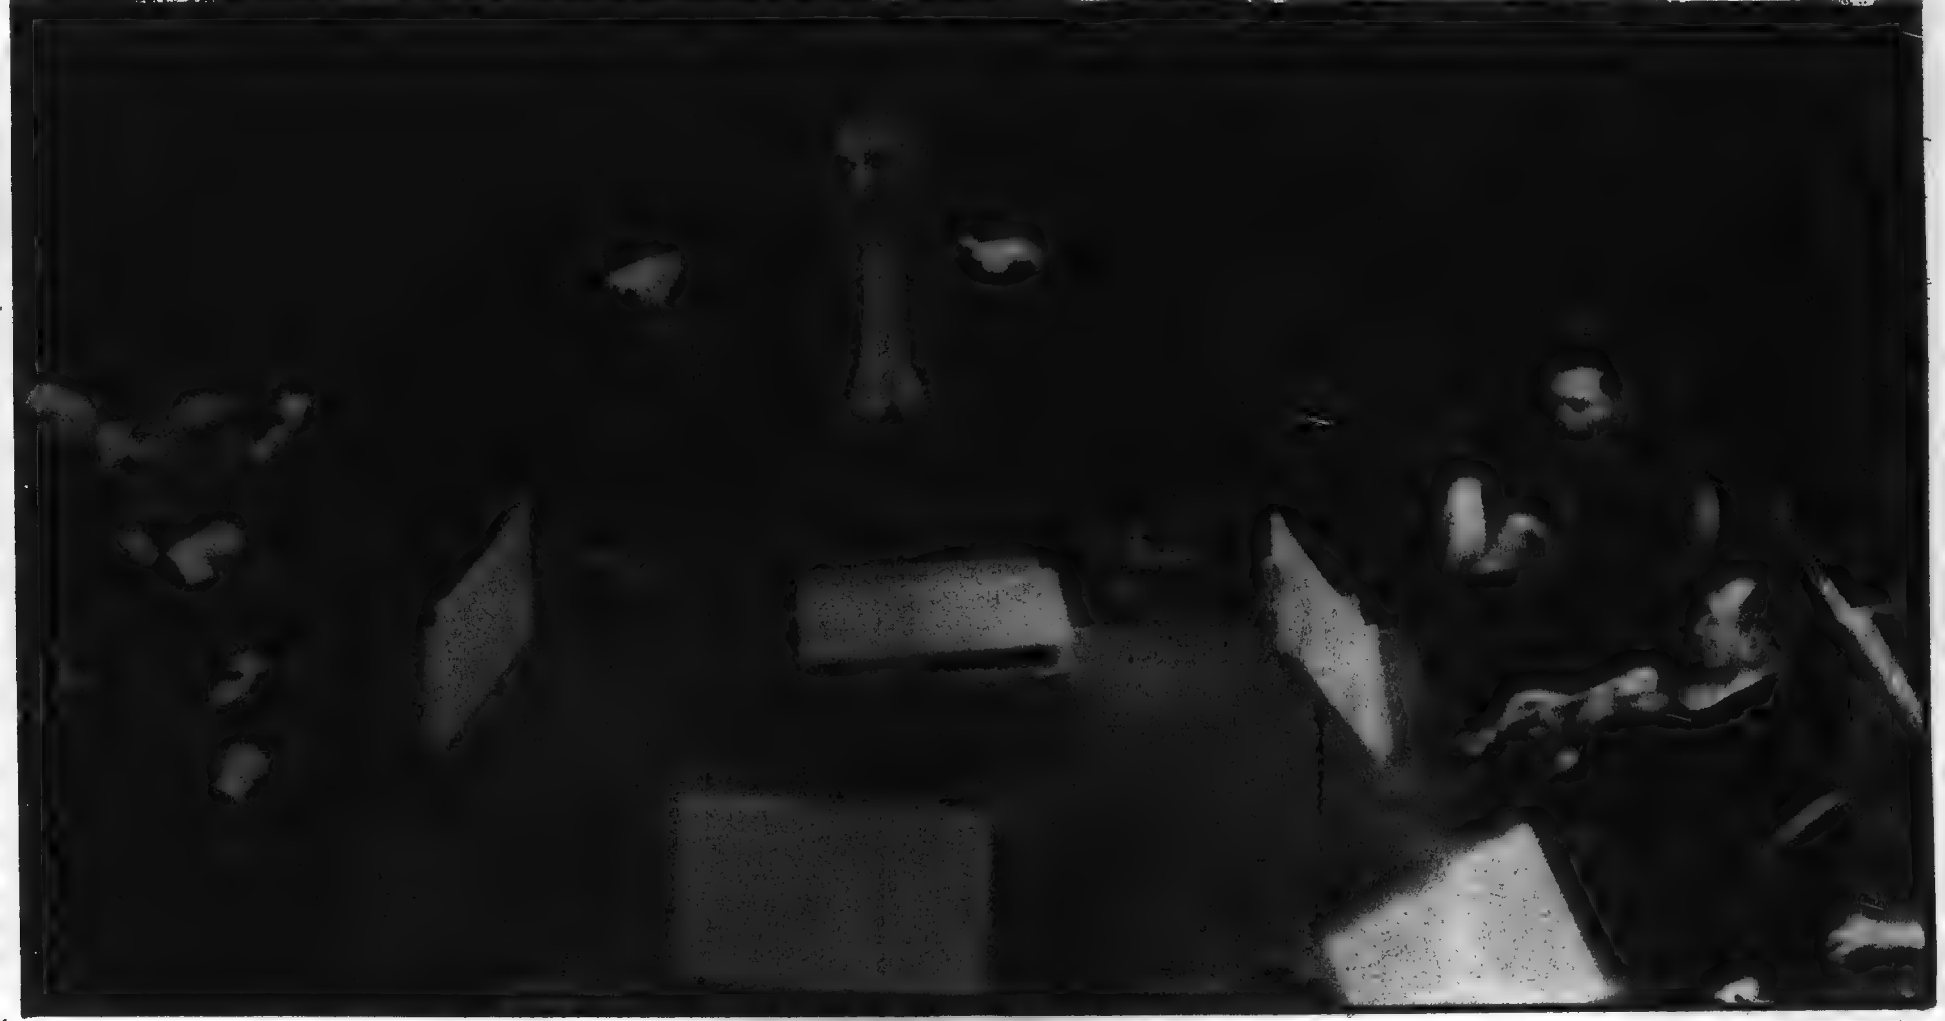
BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1933

★★★

ROTOGRAVURE
SECTION

KOUSSEVITZKY—AS THE AUDIENCE NEVER SEES HIM

PIANISSIMO



CATCHING UP THE BEAT

PIZZICATO

LEGATO

APPEALING TO BRASS

RHYTHMIC ACCENT

(Boston Herald-John B. Sanroma)

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION

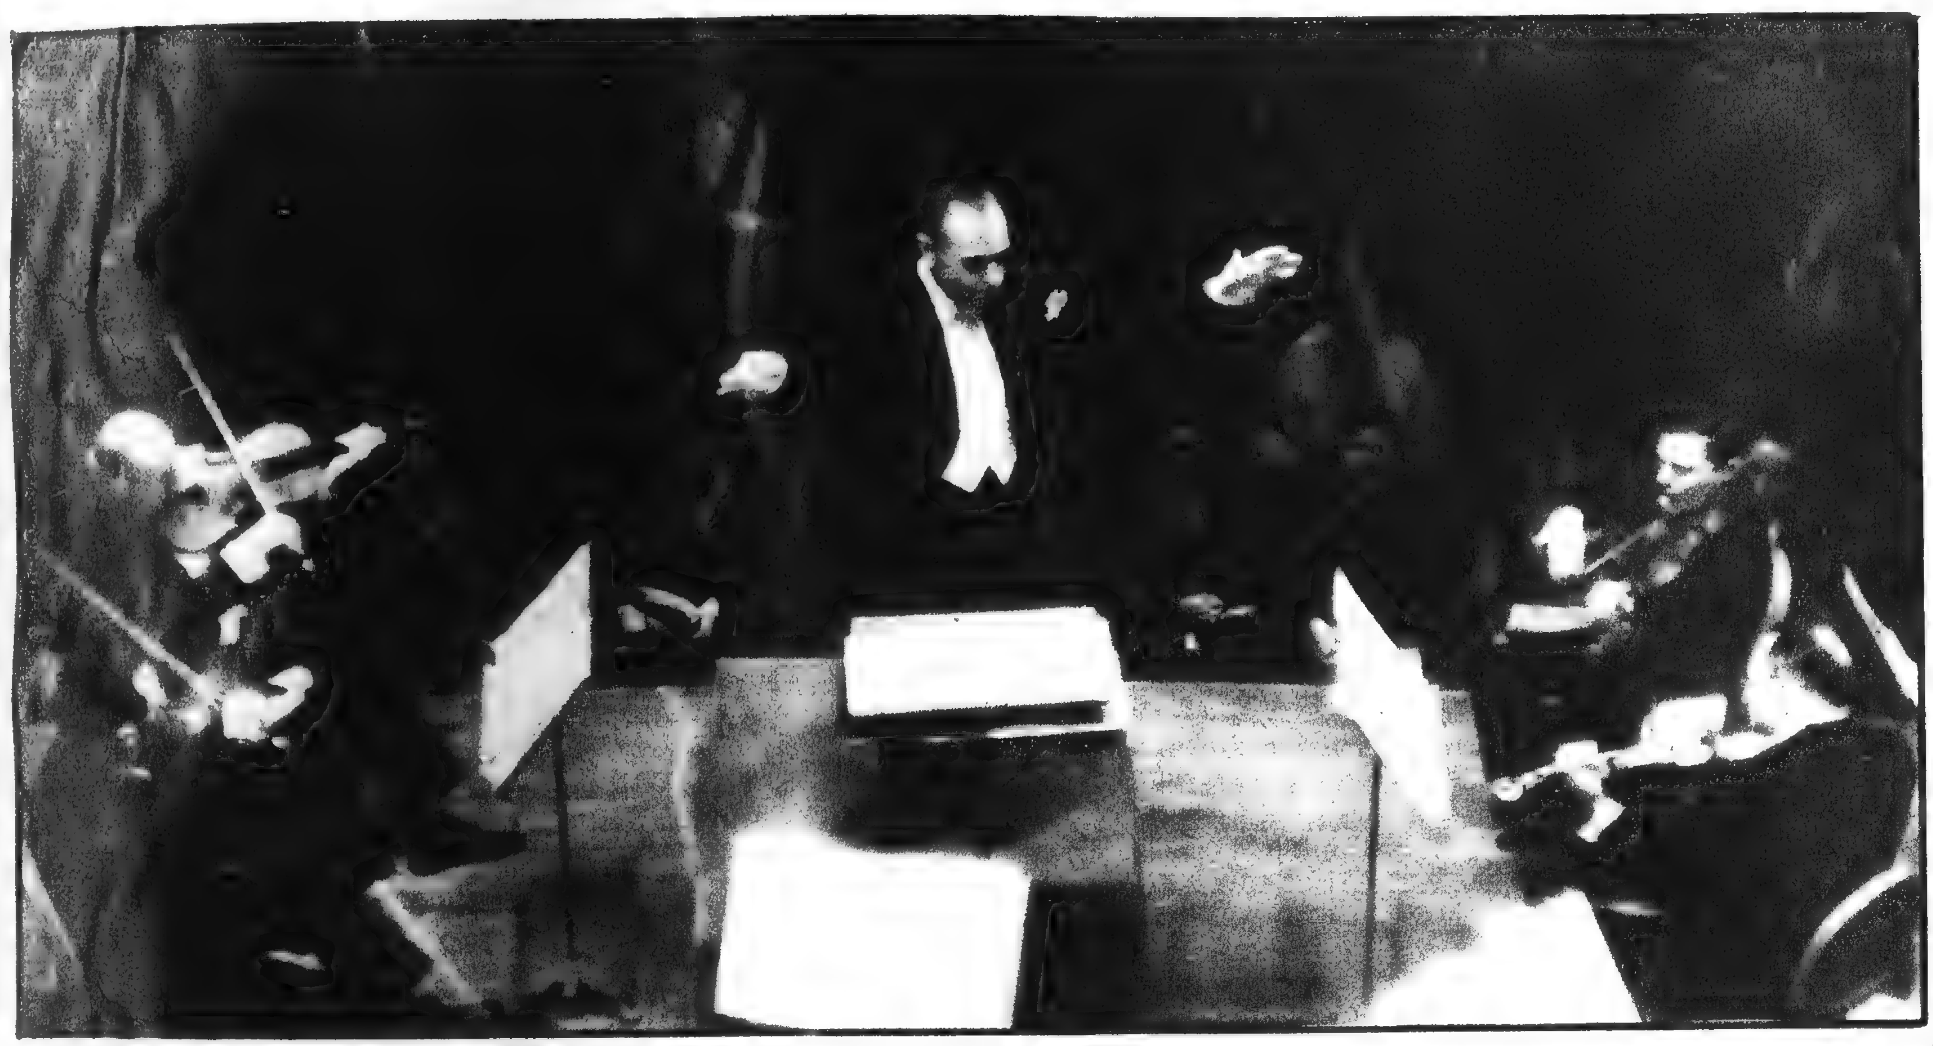
THE BOSTON HERALD

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1933

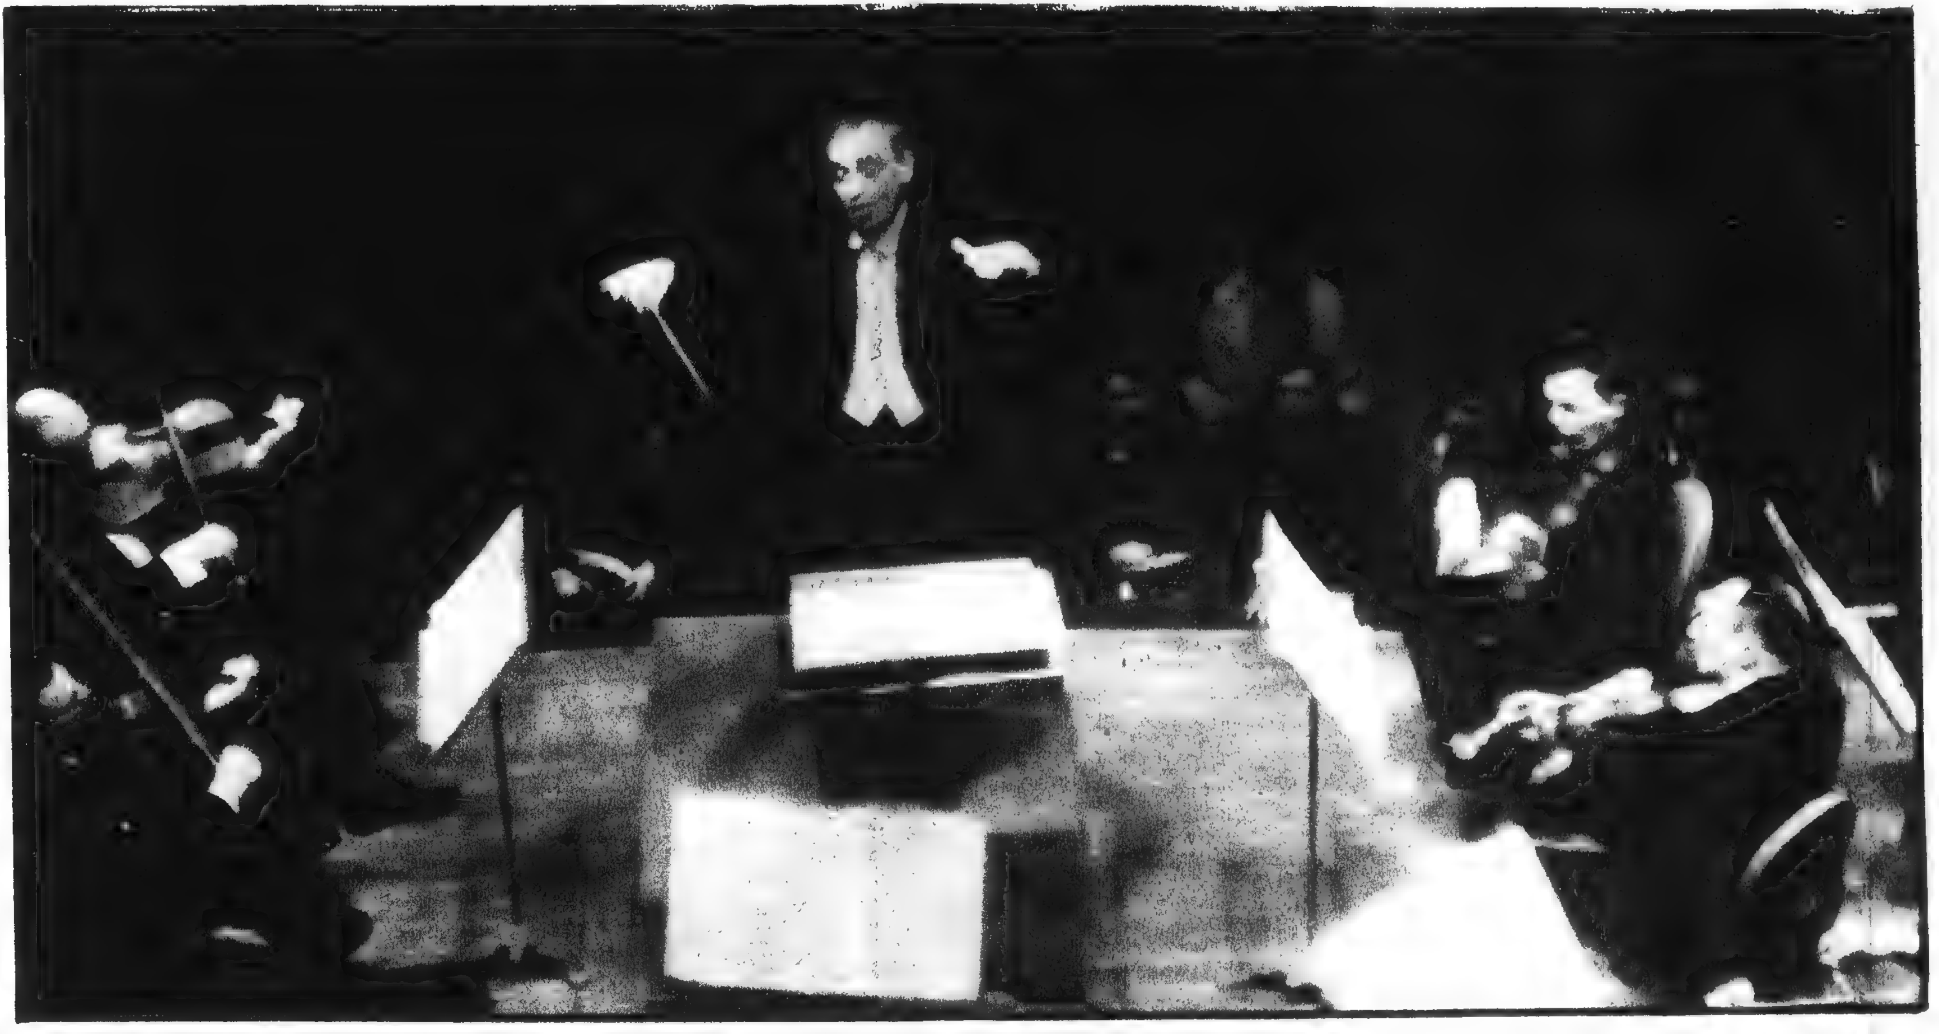
★★★

ROTOGRAVURE SECTION

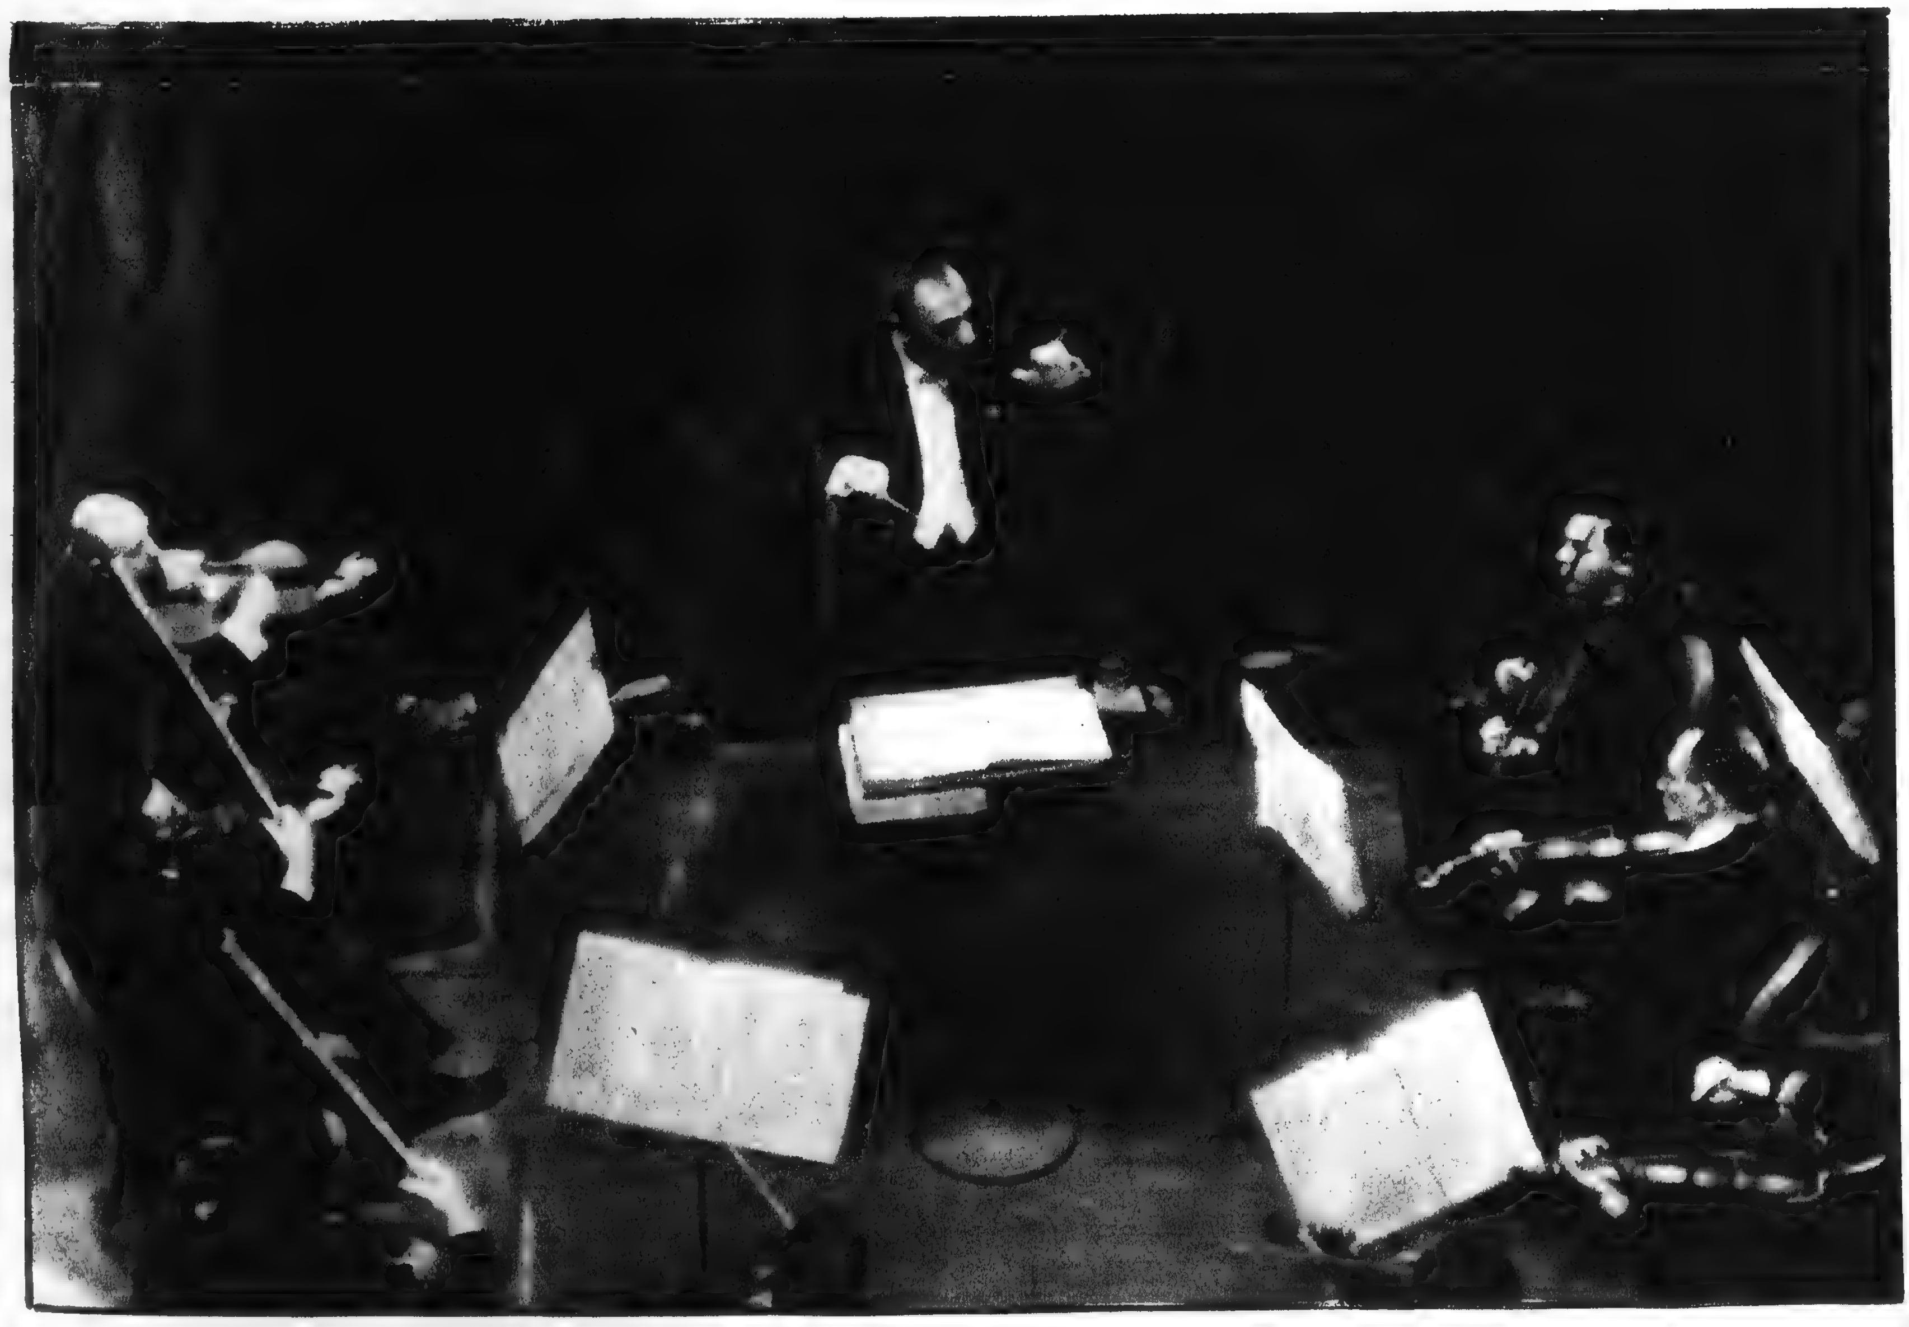
KOUSSEVITZKY—AS THE AUDIENCE NEVER SEES HIM



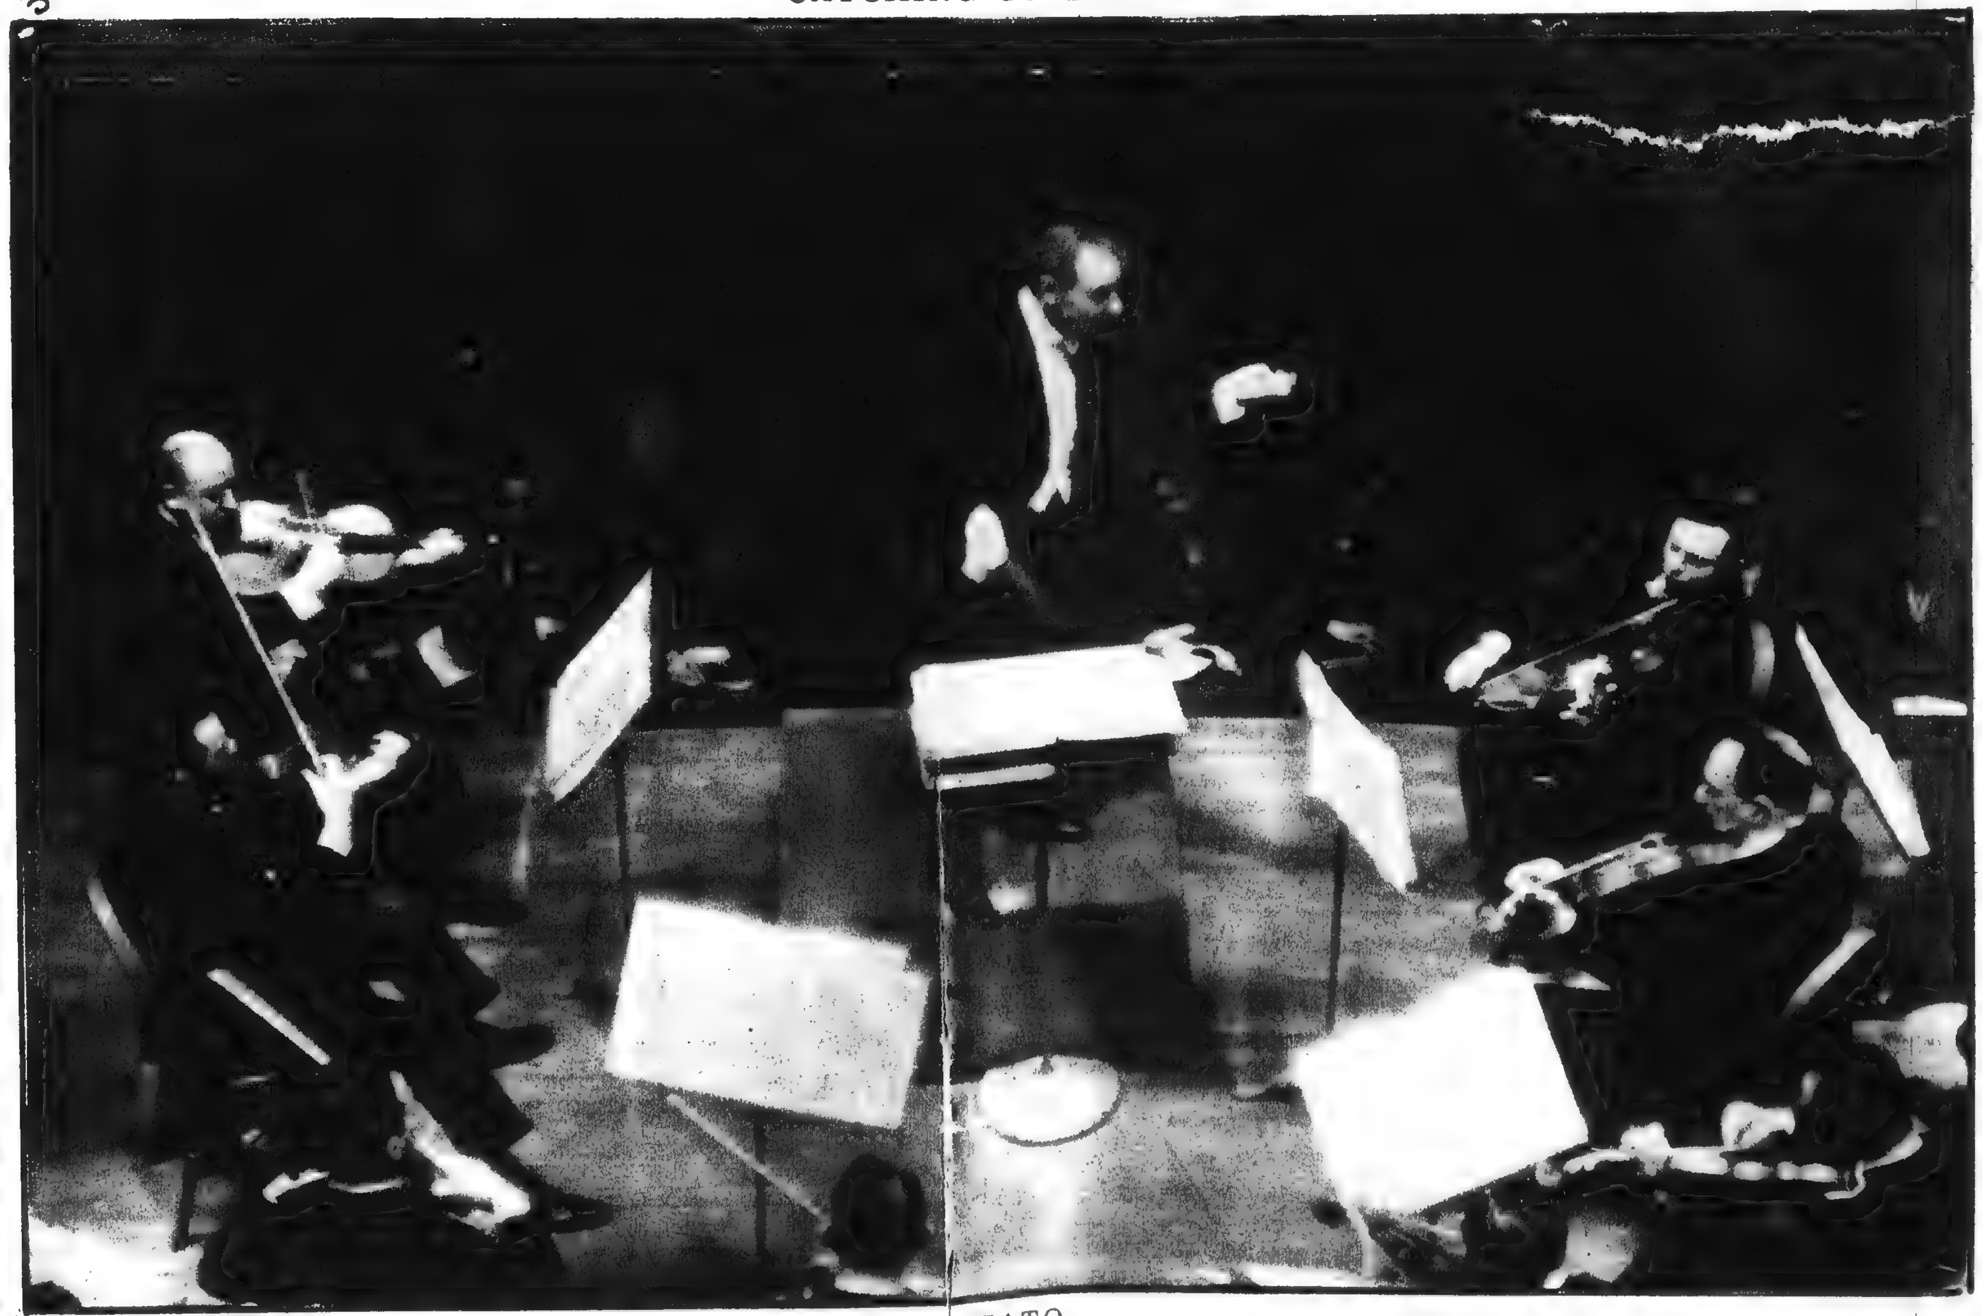
PIANISSIMO



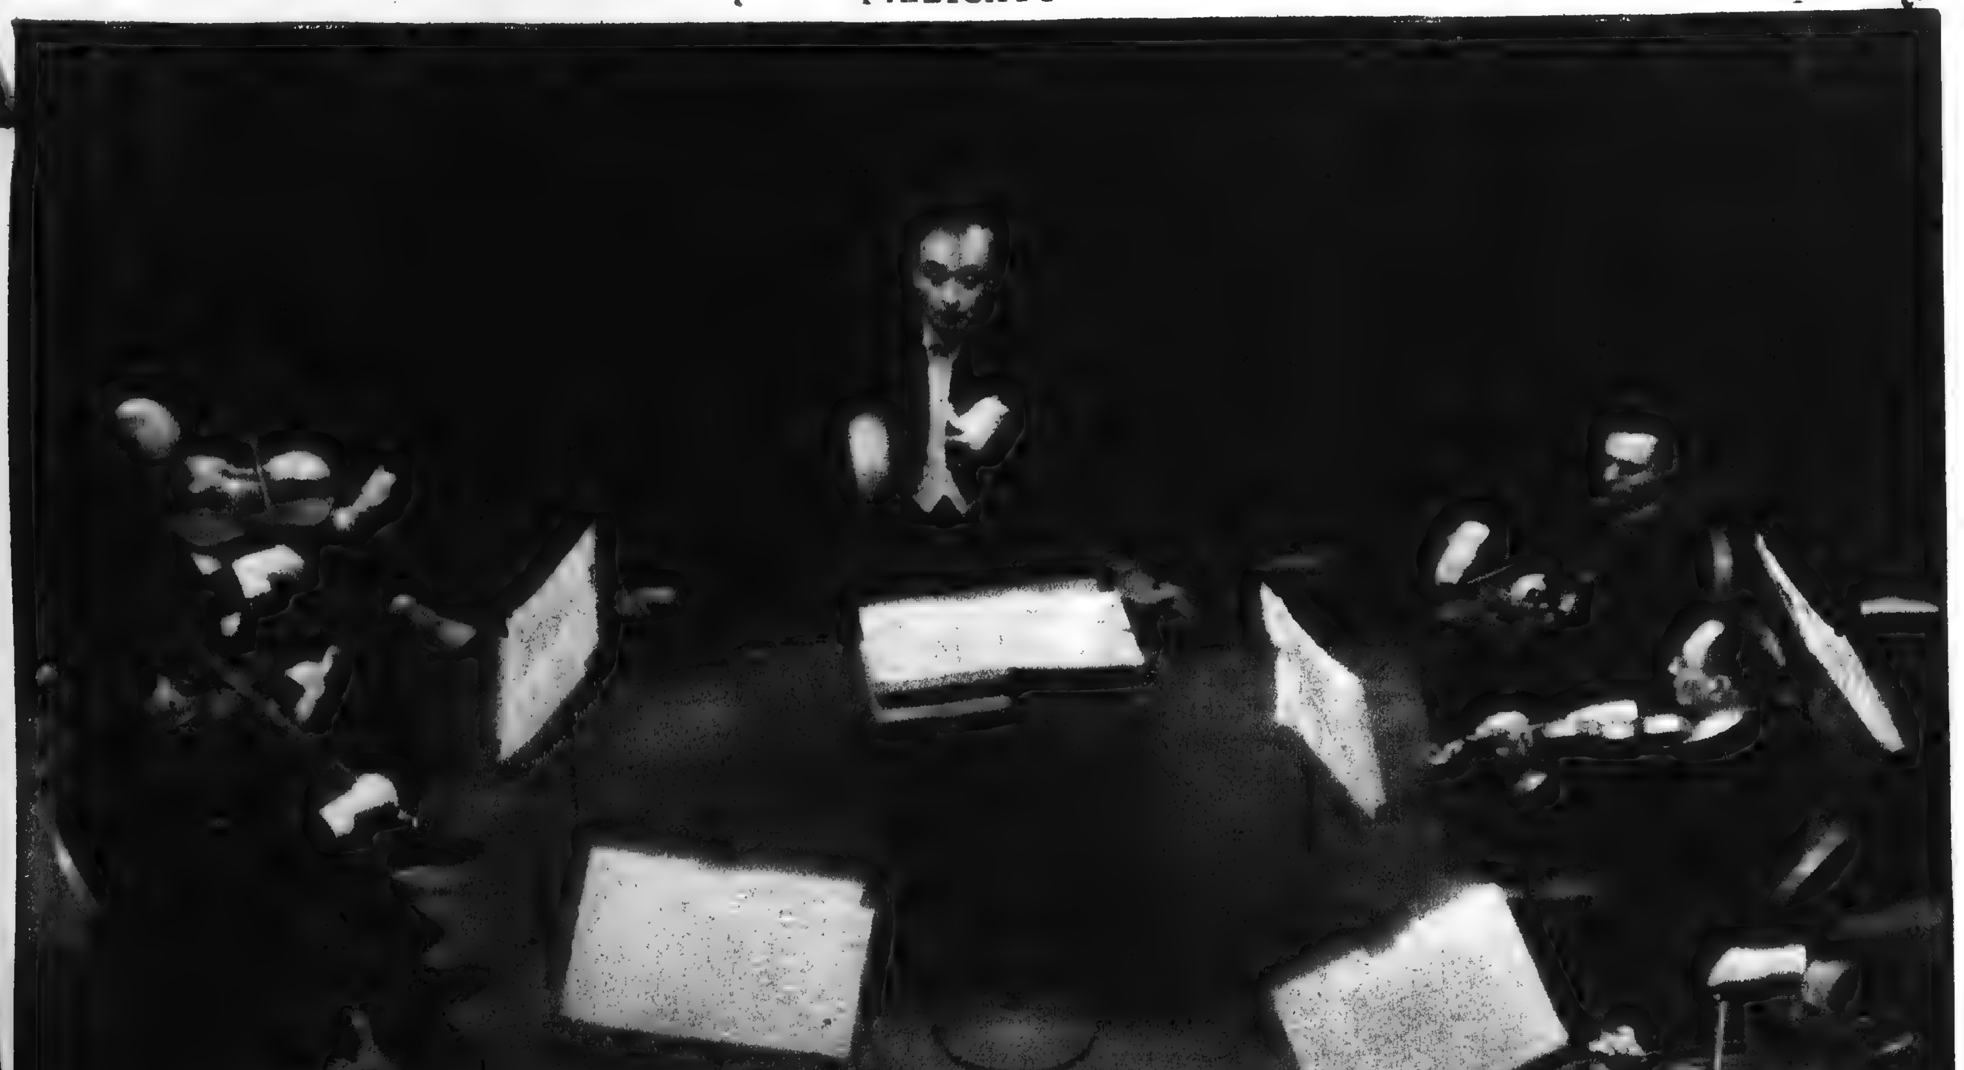
CATCHING UP THE BEAT



PIZZICATO



LEGATO



APPEALING TO BRASS

RHYTHMIC ACCENT

(Boston Herald-John B. Sanroma)

146

THIS CLIPPING FROM RADIO GUIDE

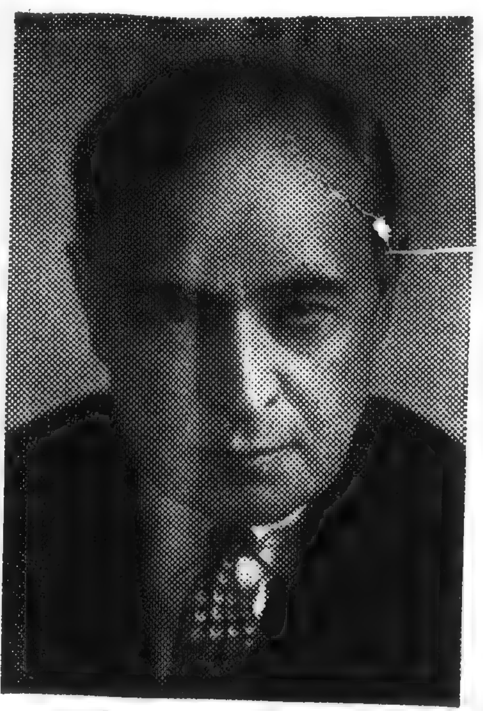
N. Y.

MAR 19 1933

MUSIC in the AIR + By Carleton Smith



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have lifted our Saturday evenings out of the doldrums.

The concerts from Symphony Hall relieve the monotony of ordinary, mediocre programs, and cause us to look forward eagerly to Saturday. Undoubtedly, no worthier addition has been made to the current radio season than the Boston Symphony series.

The residents of Beacon Hill and Back Bay are justly proud of their orchestra. Like other Bostonian institutions, it has a tradition. Fifty-two years ago, a number of the finest musicians in Europe were brought together under the baton of George Henschel, who was followed by the most illustrious conductor of the day.

These leaders, including Nikisch and Karl Muck, were given complete artistic freedom, and each expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which came to be world renowned. The Boston Orchestra today gives testimony to the fact that a great symphonic organization can not be built in a day, nor even in a season.

A grain of truth is found in the statement that there are no great orchestas, but only great conductors. Given the finest individual players, you will not find them very convincing without the guidance of a dynamic intellect. A conductor does not merely beat time, though, as Wagner said, that is his chief function. He needs a penetrating perception and the ability to shape his orchestra into an instrument capable of expressing his visions. Such perception and such ability the present conductor of the Boston Symphony has.

While the worship of conductors, that has today largely usurped the adoration of musical art, cannot be commended, every lover of music is grateful for such leadership as that of Mr. Koussevitsky. A craftsman of the first rank, he is not satisfied with a bare and impersonal reproduction of the musical text. His performances are bold interpretations of works that have filtered through his perceptions and feelings.

Koussevitzky

An emotional pathos underlies Koussevitzky's orchestral conducting. To him it is everything. The conviction, the power of his performance depends solely on the emotional element he obtains from the music and imparts to the audience. The less emotional fire there is in the music, the greater will be its resistance to his conducting. Conversely, of course, the more a composition is saturated with feeling, the more easily does it submit itself to him. He must feel and experience music that he loves; he must then be in a state of ecstasy to be at his best. It is because he can not always be in such a state that his concerts are sometimes uneven.

When he conducts music that is his, he projects it with an impact that is devastating alike to nerves and heart. He is master, of course, of every graduation, and can give a demonstration of any music you choose to mention. But if the interpretation is casual, and if you do not receive Koussevitzky's genuine feeling, you may know that he is making a compromise with himself.

No mention of Koussevitzky would be complete without comment on his boundless enthusiasm for all music, no matter how unexpected and paradoxical its form. Consequently, he has brough us many new gifts, as supplements to the classics on his programs. He has been the foremost champion here of the powerful writings of Sibelius, a composer for whom I have great admiration. Koussevitzky has championed the cause of his compatriots, and given considerabel encouragement to native composers.

The famous and prolonged anniversary festival of the Boston Symphony added materially to the stock of contemporary writings. Music lovers have been feasting on its fruits ever since, and the radio audience is grateful for the invitation to sit at the same table with those who enjoy each week the fare of Mr. Koussevitzky and his famous group.

Even over the air, you feel his tremendous mastery of his instrument . . . not impersonal like Toscanini's, nor glittering like Stokowski's . . . but flaming and personal, a mastery existing solely for the sake of emotional identity with himself.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribun

MAR 23 1933

Symphonies and "Tripe"

To the New York Herald Tribune:

The broadcasting companies certainly "slipped up" badly last Saturday night when they broadcast three symphony-orchestra concerts simultanecusly over their various networks. The National Broadcasting Company sent us programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Cleveland All High School Orchestra at the same time that the Columbia Broadcasting Company was broadcasting the Philadelphia Orchestra concert. By a little forethought and co-operation it would seem that it should have been possible to enable us to hear all three of these excellent (at least one of them was) programs.

Goodness knows, symphony broadcasts aren't yet so frequent that we can afford to waste them thus. The same thing often occurs with other types of broadcasts, and we sometimes have to listen (if we can stand it that long) to several hours of "tripe" from all over the dial before we can get anything that is not an insult to our ears. All of which makes us wonder how long we shall have to put up with the misuse and monopoly of the radio.

PAUL H. OEHSER.
Clarendon, Va., March 20, 1933.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRITTAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAR 21 1933

Boston 'Pops' Concert Goers Hail Return of Beer and Wine In Spring

Beverages That Helped Give Musicales Their Name to Play Their Part Again — Conductor Prefers Draught to Bottled Beer.

Boston, March 21 (UP) — Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Plays Dual Role

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "technology night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Prefers Draught Beer

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM

①

MAR 21 1933

Stein Songs To Be Theme Songs For "The Pops"

BOSTON, March 21—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "the pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the pops will return in May to beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1895 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping fo cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special State Commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like symphony hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology Night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener Ale. There were other advertisements of "The Beer That Made Milwaukee Famous," and the beer that was Richer Than Wine, Smoother Than Milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fielders' pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 19 1933

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their home concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, are this week playing Locatelli's "Elegiac" symphony, Mozart's concerto for horn (Koechel edition No. 447) as transcribed for 'cello by Joaquin Cassado, and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." Gregor Piatigorsky is the guest 'cellist, both in the solo part of Mozart's work and in that of the Cervantes-Strauss hero. Jean Lefranc, viola, will be the voice of Sancho Panza.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

MAR 26 1933

The first American performance of William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in Boston next Friday afternoon. The work calls for mixed chorus, baritone solo (to be sung by David Blair McClosky) and orchestra. Other works on this program, to be repeated Saturday evening, are Haydn's symphony in E flat major, No. 99, and Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra and women's chorus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

MAR 21 1933

Boston Orchestra to Feature Stein Songs at Concerts

By United Press

BOSTON—Stein songs will be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at "The Pops" will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of corks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

MAR 22 1933

Famous 'Pops' Concert Will Provide Beer

The famous summer concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are known as "Pops" Concerts. The seats are cleared off the first floor of the hall. Tables and chairs are substituted. Since prohibition nothing has stood upon these tables but ginger ale and small glasses. In the attic of the hall, someone found hundreds of old mugs of pint capacity. They are being dusted off and will be appropriately employed once more when the "Pops" season comes around again.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 23 1933

RETURN OF REAL BEER AND WINES GOOD NEWS TO "POPS" PATRONS

By FRANK MURPHY
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON, Mar. 23 (UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ail and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevaile from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "Popular Concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connecter with the Pops, including German. French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special program for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology Night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener Ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many cf the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 21 1933

Hub Happy Over Prospects of Beer at "Pop" Concerts

Boston, March 21.—(UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts," and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the cars of all connected with the Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists, who, in the opinion of some critics, play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special State commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses cf concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology Night." June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122nd, reached his seat at the 123rd and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

---

①

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.

MAR 22 1933

SYMPHONY TO PLAY OLD STEIN SONGS

Return of Beer Turns Musical Thought in Boston—Polish Mugs.

BOSTON, Mar. 22.—(UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "the pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the pops will return in may to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerns their name.

"The pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalist who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "technology night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122nd, reached his seat at the 123rd and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

MAR 21 1933

STEIN SONGS TO BE THEME SONGS OF BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston, March 21 (AP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "the pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the pops will return in may to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very lig wines will have flowed 'round th corner by the first week of Apr was music to the ears of all connected with the pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass; more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 21 1933

'Pops' Concerts In Boston Wait Popping of Corks

Warren, Chairman of Trustees of Institution, Head of Liquor Board, Inserts Little Clause In Recommendations

Boston, March 21—Stein songs are to be the ne" theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audience at "The Pops" will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with The Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of The Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE REPUBLICAN
Mitchell, S. D.

MAR 28 1933

Boston Orchestra to Feature Stein Songs at Concerts

Boston, Mass.—Stein songs will be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at "The Pops" will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of corks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 21 1933

Beer King Again At "Pop" Concerts

Musicians, Public to Quaff Old Time Hub Symphony Beverage

(By Frank Murphy.)

BOSTON, March 21 (United Press)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

Welcome News.

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himsel fin the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and technology men. The program for "Technology Night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

147

3

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 23 1933

RETURN OF REAL BEER AND WINES GOOD NEWS TO "POPS" PATRONS

By FRANK MURPHY
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON, Mar. 23 (UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ail and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevaile from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "Popular Concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connecter with the Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special program for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology Night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener Ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many cf the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 21 1933

Hub Happy Over Prospects of Beer at "Pop" Concerts

Boston, March 21.—(UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts," and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists, who, in the opinion of some critics, play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special State commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology Night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122nd, reached his seat at the 123rd and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

1

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.

MAR 22 1933

SYMPHONY TO PLAY OLD STEIN SONGS

Return of Beer Turns Musical Thought in Boston—Polish Mugs.

BOSTON, Mar. 22.—(UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "the pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the pops will return in may to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerns their name.

"The pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalist who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "technology night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122nd, reached his seat at the 123rd and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 21 1933

'Pops' Concerts In Boston Wait Popping of Corks

Warren, Chairman of Trustees of Institution, Head of Liquor Board, Inserts Little Clause In Recommendations

Boston, March 21—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audience at "The Pops" will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with The Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of The Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

Many of the 90 members of Fiedler's Pops orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks. Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE REPUBLICAN

Mitchell, S.D.

MAR 28 1933

Boston Orchestra to Feature Stein Songs at Concerts

Boston, Mass.—Stein songs will be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at "The Pops" will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of corks.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS

MAR 21 1933

STEIN SONGS TO BE THEME SONGS OF BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston, March 21 (AP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "the pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the pops will return in may to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass; more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Beer King Again At "Pop" Concerts

Musicians, Public to Quaff Old Time Hub Symphony Beverage

(By Frank Murphy.).

BOSTON, March 21 (United Press)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After 14 seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

Welcome News.

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with the Pops, including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who in the opinion of some critics play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, found himsel fin the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, were pleased to find hundreds of well-preserved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 Pops season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and technology men. The program for "Technology Night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen," as well as an advertisement for Pilsener ale. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. He thinks beer on draught is the better and regrets a provision under which it could be sold only in bottles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 21 1933

Foam Is to Accompany Boston "Pops" Music

Players of "Abbreviated" Symphony Orchestra Greet Legislative Developments and Steins Are Scoured.

Boston, Mar. 21.—(UP)—Stein songs are to be the new theme songs of "the Pops," annual spring and early-summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony orchestra.

After fourteen seasons of enforced ginger ale and fruit punch, the roundtable audiences at "the Pops" will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of cork stoppers at the tables in "the good old days."

Another Kind of Music.

News that beer and very light wines will have flowed 'round the corner by the first week of April was music to the ears of all connected with "the Pops," including German, French and Italian instrumentalists who, in the opinion of some critics, play mellower brass, more liquid woodwinds and more spirited strings in a homelike atmosphere.

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, found himself in the influential position of being chairman also of the special state commission for drafting of a "model liquor law" for Massachusetts. In its report the Warren committee recommended that persons be permitted to drink beer and light wines in such public places as hotels and restaurants—and in "halls conducting courses of concerts."

Sttins Being Scoured.

Attaches of tempei-like Symphony hall, exploring a dusety attic storeroom were pleased to find hundreds of well-presedved side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These are being scoured for use during the 1933 "Pop" season.

The workers also found programs of pre-war vintage, including special programs for the annual "nights" attended by classes of Harvard and Technology men. The program for "Technology night," June 6, 1911, listed the favorite, "Prince of Pilsen." as well as an advertisement for Pilsener beer. There were other advertisements of "the beer that made Milwaukee famous," and the beer that was "richer than wine, smoother than milk."

Beer is a favorite beverage of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of "the Pops" and first American-born musician to direct the orchestra. Many of the ninety members of Fiedler's "Pops" orchestra likewise prefer beer and light wines to soft drinks.

Kettle Drummer's Feat.

Some of the veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room amid scornful glances because his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a nearby barroom and had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle doring the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triomphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

MAR 22 1933

'Pops' to Use Stein Songs

Annual Spring Series of Boston Orchestra Will Revive Beer Tunes.

BOSTON, March 21.—Stein songs will be the new theme songs of "The Pops," annual Spring and early Summer concerts of light music by an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After fourteen seasons of enforced gingerale and fruit punch, the round-table audiences at the Pops will return in May to the beer and wine standard that prevailed from 1885 to 1919 and helped give the concerts their name.

"The Pops," authorities say, is short for "popular concerts" and onomatopoeia for the continual popping of corks at the tables in "the good old days."

Attaches of temple-like Symphony Hall, exploring a dusty attic storeroom, found hundreds of side-handle beer mugs of pint capacity. These were scoured for use.

Many of the ninety members of the orchestra prefer beer to almost anything else. Veterans recall a rehearsal years ago when the kettle drum player left the room when his score showed 123 measures of rest. He went to a barroom, had several glasses of beer, returned to the rehearsal room at the 120th measure, walked quickly down the aisle during the 121st and 122d, reached his seat at the 123d and sat down triumphantly just in time to pound his big drum on the proper note.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

MAR 29 1933

DR. STOCK OFFERS 'PSALMODIC' WORK BY IGOR STRAVINSKY

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

WHEN THE DIRECTORS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra engaged the much discussed Russian composer, Igor Stravinsky, to compose a work in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of that institution they got both what they paid for and what they deserved.

What they paid for was a distinguished European name to adorn a historic program, it being the practice of the Boston orchestra to prove its superiority by ignoring, or at least making secondary, all American music. What they got was the least important work (unless ugliness be important) in the whole range of twentieth century choral art, which was just what they deserved.

* * *

STRAVINSKY'S "Psalmodic Symphony" was offered to the Tuesday matinee subscribers at the Symphony and on the same program there was a great deal of fine choral music, some of it American. The setting was, therefore, unfortunate in a musical sense, though effective enough from the standpoint of the theater. For Stravinsky's diluted orchestra banished all the violins, demanded two pianos and a harp, the deeper strings and some wood-winds and brasses. Hence the entire stage had to be reset, always an interesting procedure when pianos have to be hoisted from the basement, and always expertly done at Orchestra Hall.

One hastens to congratulate the stage hands and to condole with Dr. Stock, the members of the Chicago A Cappella Choir and the Chicago Symphony. They did what could be done with music that was uninspired, deliberately cacophonous, illiterate and generally typical of modern degeneracy. Doubtless it was with that intention that Dr. Stock presented it in conjunction with choral works of Bach, Byrd, Cain and Gretschaninow, not to mention a Mozart symphony, a Handel overture, the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and Dr. Stock's own tremendous and imposing transcription of the Bach C minor "Passacaglia and Fugue."

* * *

IN DEMONSTRATING the impotence of Stravinsky and others like him Dr. Stock performed a service to art that was, after all, less important than his way with the lyric themes of Mozart, which was something heavenly; or power of his treatment of the Handelian idiom; or his magic with the Wagnerian sonorities. This was orchestral art raised to its final power in taste, beauty and emotional significance.

The only choral organization that can match the virtuosity of the Chicago Symphony is Noble Cain's A Cappella Choir. From no other chorus, here or abroad, have I heard a performance of Bach at once so expert and so expressive. Their treatment of the ancient English "Miserere Mei" of Byrd, with its echo choir, was another miracle of taste and technic. Mr. Cain's setting of Thomas Moore's lovely verse, "Wake Up, Sweet Melody," proved that choral resource has not been exhausted either by the contrapuntalists of the ancient Brittain, the Netherlands, Italy and Spain, nor by such modern Russians as Gretschaninow. He has shown the way to new worlds of beauty.

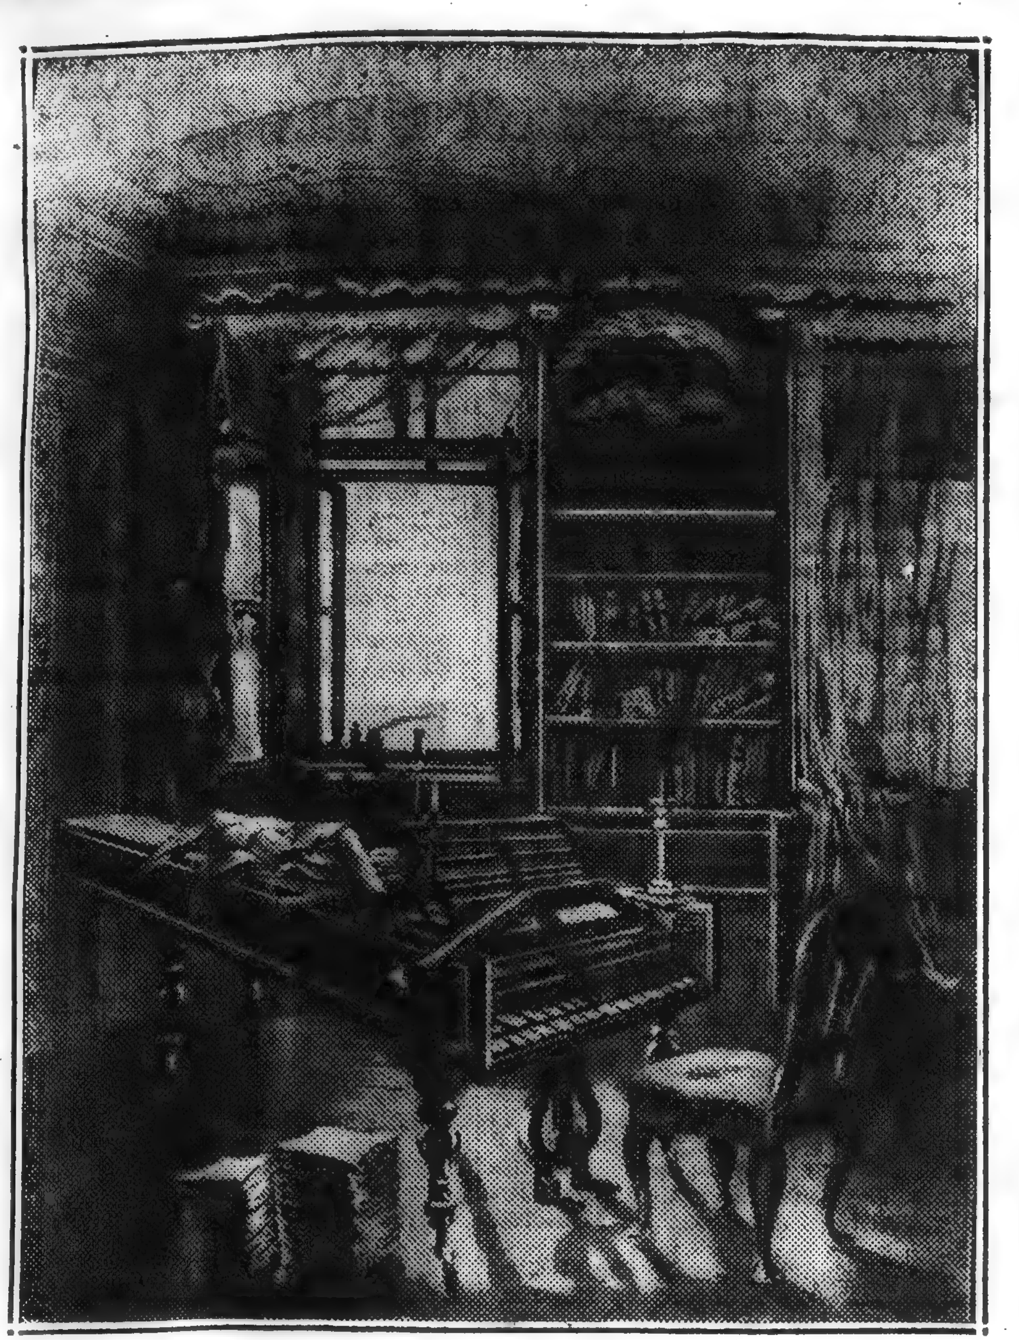
The A Cappella Choir is to sing again next week for the Thursday-Friday subscribers, which is something to anticipate with the liveliest satisfaction. Jose Iturbi, Spanish pianist, is to be the soloist this Thursday evening and Friday afternoon with the Symphony.

"Buy American"

BOSTON GLOBE—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY

THE HEROIC WORLD of MUSIC

Beethoven: The Loser Wins



BEETHOVEN'S STUDIO
From a drawing made three days after his death
(Courtesy of "Famous Composers and Their Works," J. B. Millet Co.)

THE spectacle of a fellow mortal winning the eternal losing fight against illness, financial pressure, advancing years and death may be worth watching, regardless of whether one is interested in music. This fight for Beethoven began at the age of 29 with the discovery that he was going deaf. His retort to that calamity was an "Heroic Symphony," music so revolutionary that his former publishers declined it; and, though finished in 1804, it remained in manuscript two years.

His battle in middle life was the same as Wagner's after him—how to fight off poverty with one hand while with the other he went on writing—writing music which it had taken him half a lifetime to qualify himself to produce. Harassed with the guardianship of his nephew, in 1815 Beethoven wrote little, but, although 1816 was nearly as bad a year, it brought three of those gigantic sonatas which terminate his work for the piano, and he was paid for them on the scale of Milton's $25 for "Paradise Lost." Then, having earned money by composing trifles which would sell, he plunged, in 1818, into the composition of his monumental Mass in D, the "Missa Solemnis," working at it steadily till 1819. How he worked may be judged from that scene of his finishing the "Credo" whilst he stayed on in the country at a dismantled house in the Autumn, deserted by servants, and, like a man possessed, battled with ideas, ink and paper 24 hours on end without food, until the music was safely written.

Two major efforts remained to him, and it was as though in his subconscious mind he knew it. A theme for the 9th and last symphony occurs in the note books as early as 1815. The symphony was finished in 1823 after a Summer's continuous work, and in its finale he augments his orchestra with a chorus to the words of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," a project he had first entertained as a youth in Bonn 30 years before. This symphony and parts of the Mass were performed at a concert in Vienna in May, 1824, but by now their composer was so deaf that he heard not a note, and at the end of the performance he had to be seized and turned round so that he could see the applause.

His shaggy mane was now white and his health fragile. When death did come, one may say he died by accident for the want of a woman to take care of him. There remained to his pen the last String Quartets. These are music which is only beginning to be understood, if even now. He expressed in it an elevation of thought which has rarely been equalled except by philosophers, religionists and men of science. These quartets were mostly dismissed by his contemporaries as the regrettable effusions of a composer too deaf to know what he was writing. Even such a good musican and fine fellow as Louis Sphor shared that opinion.

A cold caught through exposure on a journey in an open carriage in November, 1826, laid Beethoven low and developed into cirrhosis of the liver. He was four mortal months in dying. There were four operations, all, of course, without anesthetic. How unerringly the double crown of music and poverty descends from one king to his successor! On his deathbed Beethoven lay reading a volume of Franz Schubert's songs and exclaimed, "Truly, Schubert has the divine fire." Is it pure coincidence that at his funeral Schubert should have been torch-bearer?

The death struggle of this stricken old soldier of the spirit lasted nearly two days and was almost intolerable for his friends to abide. At last, late in the afternoon of March 26, a furious storm of hail swept over the city. There was lightning and thunder. The dying man raised himself, lifted the clenched fist of a defiant Titan, and fell back dead.

* *

Years before, at Linz, in 1811, he had written three solemn hymns to be played by a choir of trombones for All Souls' Day. This music was rearranged for his funeral to be sung by a men's chorus, to the words of the "Miserere," and four trombones, playing and singing in alternate strophes.

Like Mozart, Beethoven had written his own requiem, and for All Souls. L. P.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES
MAR 29 1933

"BRIEF FOR THE DEFENSE OF RADIO" BY A DISTINGUISHED COMPOSER OF OPERA

Deems Taylor, Representing the Lovers of "Good Music," Compares Favorably the Quality of American Broadcasting With European Offerings, and Finds the Ratio of Superior to "Popular" Entertainment Impressively Higher Than That Between the "Cultured" and "Uncultured" Listeners.

AS a prophet of radio ten years ago, I was not, I regret to say, very good, says Deems Taylor, distinguished American composer of operas and symphonies, writing in the current Harper's Magazine a notable "Brief for the Defense" of radio. Had I been one of the "men of vision" who used to figure so prominently in the magazines before the depression, I should have sensed the fact that radio was destined to become an entertainment enterprise that quite literally covers the earth; that engages, irregularly, the talents of the foremost dramatic and musical artists; that furnishes a living for thousands of engineers, speakers, singers and instrumentalists; that keeps nearly 600 stations busy in the United States alone; that has swallowed the concert business and the phonograph industry, and almost abolished the publishing of popular music.

I might have put my life's savings into radio stock, sold it for a million dollars, and "lost all" in the crash of 1929. Instead of which, I let opportunity slip through my fingers, and must now sit in envious silence while my friends are telling how they were ruined.

In one respect, however, I did anticipate the present. I criticized. I said that the woman's voice I heard over the radio at that time was no good, and the song was worse, and the transmission terrible; that broadcasting was just an advertising dodge and the whole business just a passing fad.

CLOSE TO PERFECT REPRODUCTION.

With the passing of years, certain of those observations have been refuted. Radio transmission and reception have improved almost beyond belief. A modern first class radio set comes so close to perfect reproduction that it is obviously only a question of time before that perfection becomes absolute. And certainly radio's sincerest ill-wisher will admit that, for better or worse, it is here to stay. It is not a passing fad.

What comes out of our radio sets, however, remains to vex us. During the last few years the broadcasters have had to face a steadily increasing volume of criticism and complaint regarding the quality of radio programs. The dissatisfied listeners present two counts in their indictment: first, that there is too much vulgar material, particularly vulgar music, in today's programs; and, second, that there is far too much blatant advertising and selling talk connected with radio.

Its defenders retort that it takes a pretty ungrateful listener to criticize a free show. But the retort will not hold. Radio is not a free show. It is paid for by its listeners; in Europe, and particularly in England, directly, through taxation; in America, indirectly, through purchases of goods sold by the manufacturers and dealers whose use of radio as an advertising medium makes our broadcasting possible.

Judging from the evidence of private and public utterances and letters to the newspapers, there is a growing belief among a fairly large body of the more literate and intelligent radio listeners that the English system is better; that American broadcasting would be vastly improved were it controlled, or at least closely supervised, by the government, or paid for by a tax on radio sets. We should, they argue, be freed from the intolerable nuisance of selling talks and from the vast quantity of cheap and vulgar entertainment that is now put on the air.

A FOREIGN SUNDAY PROGRAM.

Suppose, to begin, we make a rough test of the validity of the assumption that broadcasting in England and on the continent is on a higher plane than it is here. I offer you herewith exhibit A. being a typical radio Sunday in Europe. It is a summary of the radio page of Le Temps of Paris, on which are listed those of the day's programs that are considered to possess more than purely local interest. The combined programs of four Paris stations, Toulouse, Strasbourg, Warsaw, Brussels, Rome, Milan, Prague, Barcelona, Daventry and London—fifteen stations in all—offer us the following:

Twenty-seven mixed programs by studio orchestras (by "mixed" I mean a program that includes popular as well as symphonic numbers); one concert by a permanent symphony orchestra (the B. B. C.); ten song recitals; six periods of dance music; two organ programs; four band concerts; one cello recital; one accordion recital; one piano recital; one opera in concert form; two chamber music recitals, and twenty-three broadcasts from disc records. (I regret, by the way, that I am unable to include any German stations in the list. They would, I imagine, considerably improve its average quality. But my information was derived from a French newspaper; and French newspapers, although they print English, French, Belgian, Spanish, Italian, Polish and Czecho-Slovakian radio programs, do not print German or Austrian ones.)

Now let us consider exhibit B, a typical radio Sunday in America. It is a digest of the radio page of the New York Herald Tribune for January 8, 1933. The combined programs of ten stations in and around New York only offer the following:

Seventeen mixed programs by studio orchestras; one concert by a permanent symphony orchestra (the New York Philharmonic-Symphony); ten song recitals; thirty periods of dance music; four organ programs; two band concerts; one ukulele recital; three piano recitals; two operas in concert form; seven chamber music programs; one disc record broadcast; nine periods of choral music.

HOLD OUR OWN WITH EUROPE.

I see little difference between the two lists. The European one offers more orchestra and band music. The American list offers more organ music, more piano music, more chamber music, more opera, to say nothing of nine periods of choral music as against Europe's none. The American list is topheavy with dance music, true enough; but so is the European list topheavy with broadcasts of recorded music. These are not our "electrical transcriptions," that is, special recordings of special programs, but ordinary phonograph records such as any listener might buy and play for himself.

DEEMS TAYLOR, AMERICAN COMPOSER, WHO STRIKES A FAVORABLE BALANCE ANALYZING THE QUALITY OF RADIO PROGRAMS.

These disc broadcasts seem to me an avoidance rather than a solution of the artistic problems of broadcasting. I think it is fair, therefore, to put them down as possessing only negative musical interest. On the negative side, likewise, let us put all performances of dance music and the ukulele and accordion recitals. The comparative scores then add up as follows:

Europe: Negative 30, positive 49.
American: Negative 32, positive 55.

In other words, while we broadcast more light—or, if you insist, "bad"—music than Europe does, at least our largest stations do not eke out their studio programs by broadcasting phonograph records, and they excel in the actual number of meritorious musical events that they put on the air.

PERFECT SYNCHRONIZATION.

This quantitative element cannot be ignored in any survey of European and American broadcasting. Our larger American stations are compelled by the terms of their licenses to be on the air continuously for eighteen hours out of the twenty-four. Broadcasting begins usually at 7 a. m. and continues without a break until 1 o'clock the following morning. The European stations, even the largest, attempt no such feat.

Here, a program announced for a certain hour and minute begins exactly on that hour and minute, by government standard time. You can, quite literally, set your watch by it. So perfect is the synchronization among our stations that the customary error allowance, for a national hookup involving thirty or forty stations scattered over an area of 300,000 square miles, is twenty seconds. Twenty seconds for Washington, Cleveland, Chicago, Seattle and San Francisco to sign off their local programs and pick up, on the dot, the beginning of a program from New York!

But let us return to our list. "That was Sunday," the American critic of radio insists. "Everybody knows that our broadcasting stations put their best foot forward on that day and fill the remaining hours of the week with trash."

Suppose we see what the actual proportions are, in good material and "bad," during a typical week of radio from the big New York stations. Let us put into the "good" category only such events as would appeal to the most serious-minded listener. Into outer darkness, therefore, we cast all comedy, all concerts whose programs contain any admixture of popular music.

A TYPICAL WEEK OF "GOOD" OFFERINGS.

Let us confine our survey to the four principal New York stations, WABC, WJZ, WOR and WEAF. Furthermore, let us consider only the hours between noon and midnight, on the assumption that the average listener is not at leisure between breakfast time and luncheon. Such a time limitation gives us twelve hours for each of the four stations, forty-eight radio hours per diem. According to the radio page of the Herald Tribune for January 8, 1933, the serious offerings for the week were as follows:

Orchestral Music (symphonic)—seventeen and one-half hours (equivalent to seven symphony concerts of two and one-fourth hours each). Addresses and discussions—fourteen hours (equivalent to seven 2-hour lectures). Recitals, vocal and instrumental—four and one-half hours. Opera—four and one-half hours. News, market and weather reports—three and three-fourths hours. Sermons and religious services (Sunday only)—three and one-half hours. Chamber and choral music—two and three-fourths hours. Drama—three-quarters of an hour.

Of the 336 radio hours under consideration, fifty-one, that is, 10½ per cent, were given for the benefit of the listener whose standards are serious and exacting. The percentage sounds low; but is it? New York, which considers itself our cultural metropolis, is estimated to have a combined symphony and opera public of not much more than 75,000—a shade over 1 per cent of its population. If the estimate of the broadcasters errs, it does not do so apparently on the low side.

The Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia, Bori, Tibbett, ~~Alda, Hutche~~son, McCormack, "Il Trovatore," "The Damnation of Faust," "Lohengrin"—how many of the music-lovers who grumble about the superabundance of rubbish over the radio would undertake to attend eleven major musical events in a single week, even on free tickets? And this was no exceptional week. It was fairly typical of what the radio has to offer during the winter season.

American radio programs today are a reflection of the will of the American radio listener, so far as he can be induced to make that will known. The fact that they represent the taste of the majority does not mean that the minority need go unrepresented. The broadcasters are no fools. Their response to a minority report would not be based upon numerical considerations alone. Only, the minority must take the trouble to write it.

Plays and Players --- Music and Musicians --- Films

From Red-Hot Conception To Red-Hot Expression

Walton's Noted Choral Piece, "Belshazzar's Feast" for First Times in America

Neither Haste Nor Waste

(Swaine Ltd.)

William Walton

The Ablest of the Younger English Composers Whose "Belshazzar's Feast" Will be Heard at the Symphony Concerts This Week

THE program for the Symphony Concerts this week is too rich in new pieces of the first order to permit exposition in a single article. Hence Mr. Loeffler's finely wrought "Evocation" was discussed yesterday; while today there is room for William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast: for Mixed Chorus, Baritone Solo and Orchestra." Mr. Fiedler's Cecilia is the chorus, Mr. David Blair McClosky, the soloist. This work was first heard in 1931 at the Leeds Festival in England. From the outset it took reviewers by the ears; brought them up sharply to words of unusual praise. One of them wrote: "Festival novelties fall into two categories; those remembered because they got a hearing at the Festival, and those which made the Festival memorable. We shall be surprised if 'Belshazzar's Feast' (1931) does not create another landmark." The conservative Ernest Newman went farther: "Nothing so full-booded as this, nothing so bursting with a very fury of exultation in the power of modern music, has been produced in this or any other country for a long time; by the side of it Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony" is anaemic stuff indeed. Mr. Walton works consistently at a voltage that takes our breath away.

"But it is not mere sound and fury; the astounding thing about it all is the composer's musical control of the pounding, panting engine he has launched. It is difficult to realize that so young a man has so complete a command of his subject, of his craftsmanship and of himself. It is all new, all individual, yet all so thoroughly competent musically. After this, I should not care to place any theoretical bounds to Mr. Walton's possible development."

The Composer

The composer was just under thirty when he wrote this music. He was born March 29, 1902. He is an Oxford prodnet; studied music for a short time with Sir Hugh Allen; but since the age of sixteen was self-taught! In 1923, in his twenty-first year, he won attention with a string quartet, played at the Festival of Contemporary Music at Salzburg. In the same year appeared the "entertainment for reciting voice and instruments," entitled "Façade." [Parts of it have been heard at the Pop Concerts in Boston.] There were no works of note forthcoming until 1926, which brought "Siesta," for small orchestra, and the overture, "Portsmouth Point," more than once included in the concerts of the Boston Orchestra. From 1928 dates the Sinfonia Concertante for Orchestra with Piano, [also heard at Symphony Hall]. Mr. Newman wrote: "I have heard few works lately that have given me so much pleasure, or filled me with such hope for the authors of them. Here is a young mind strong enough to throw over the facile composition dodges of the last few years, yet show itself unmistakably original." The year 1929 brought the revision of a piano-quartet originally written in 1918-19, and a viola-concerto in which Paul Hindemith first played the solo-part. Of this concerto Mr. Cardus wrote in The Manchester Guardian: "The two finest concertos of the last quarter of a century or so are both by Englishmen—the Violin-Concerto of Elgar and the Viola-Concerto of William Walton." Lastly, in 1931, came "Belshazzar's Feast." [Mr. Walton is now at work on a symphony.]

In an informative article in The Chesterian Hubert J. Foss thus expresses himself: "Walton has broken down, without trying, an international barrier raised a long time ago against [English] music. . . . The fact is worthy of contemplation, that this young man should have succeeded where Elgar has always failed; should gain admiration against Vaughan Williams's respect, and repetition in three or four countries against Moeran's infrequency in one. This is the best sign of all, a sign that in Walton we have a natural composer, one who can speak in music to a world-wide audience; a sign, too, that the audience may well continue to listen. . . . The singularity of this music is the absence from it of minor characteristics, personal tricks and mannerisms, or points on which to hang a description of the musical style. Without a touch of eccentricity, Walton is individual: but how? . . .

"Two qualities particularly stand out. . . . First, this is not modern music in the sense in which those words are derisively used. This music is based on no theory of sound or of sources, on no one school's teaching, on no reaction. It grows out of the past, but it builds on itself only. Let us frankly give it a label and call it classical, but let us qualify the word to avoid misunderstanding. Walton follows Brahms no more than he follows Debussy, or Grieg, or Scarlatti; yet in his layout, his form, he seeks a classical ideal, having seemingly swallowed and digested and incorporated into his being the tricks and modernities of the newer times. Here, as corroboration, comes in Walton's second special quality—an extraordinary sense of style. In its final complete sense, style must mean that the idea conceived is expressed musically in the fullest and most perfect way, with every detail fitted to its place and every attendant circumstance contributing rightly to the whole." This, then, is the composer of "Belshazzar's Feast."

His Text

"Belshazzar's Feast" lacks a classifying label. As has been seen, Mr. Walton attempts none either in the piano or the orchestral score, both published by the Oxford University Press through their American agents, Carl Fischer, Inc., in New York. Nor has he contributed to the discussion of "cantata," "oratorio" or some new term yet to be invented as designation. He inscribes the piece to his fellow composer, the Lord Berners. His friend, Osbert Sitwell, prepared the text, with the Bible for source. It falls into an introduction and three major parts. The introduction is short:

"Thus spake Isaiah:
Thy sons that thou shalt beget
They shall be taken away,
And be eunuchs
In the palace of the King of Babylon.
Howl ye, howl ye, therefore:
For the day of the Lord is at hand!"

The first major part is a setting of Psalm CXXXVII., "By the Waters of Babylon we sat down and wept," the Psalm of the lamenting Children of Israel in captivity at Babylon, of their tears for their beloved Jerusalem. It foretells also of their captors, the destruction of the city. Following the Psalm Mr. Sitwell has interpolated a description of Babylon: "Babylon was a great city. Her merchandise was of gold and silver, of precious stones, of pearls, of fine linen, . . . And the souls of men."

The second part dramatizes the fall of Babylon as told in the fifth chapter of the Book of Daniel. Mr. Sitwell abridges, concentrates and points up for music the prophet's narrative. There is vivid description of the Feast of Belshazzar. The King commands the bringing of the golden vessels taken from the Jewish temple; bids the captives make music. Then spake the King:

"Praise ye
The God of Gold
Praise ye
The God of Silver
Praise ye
The God of Iron
Praise ye
The God of Stone
Praise ye
The God of Wood
Praise ye
The God of Brass."

The revelling feast reaches its height with:

"They they pledged the King before the people,
Crying, Thou, O King, art King of Kings:
O King, live forever . . ."

Into the midst of this are the four lines:

"And in that same hour, as they feasted
Came forth fingers of a man's hand
And the King saw
The part of the hand that wrote!"

The Bible here has some eighteen verses about the search for the prophet Daniel as the only possible interpreter, about the preachments of Daniel, before the reading of the mysterious characters. Mr. Sitwell proceeds with the stark:

"And this was the writing that was written:
'MENE, MENE, TEKEL UPHARSIN'
'THOU ART WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE AND FOUND WANTING'."

Again there is omission of two impeding verses. With direct cumulative power the second part ends:

"In that night was Belshazzar the King slain
And his Kingdom divided."

The third part is an expansion of the first three verses of Psalm LXXXI.: a psalm of high praise and rejoicing: "Then sing aloud to God our strength; Make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob. Take a psalm, bring hither the timbrel. Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, Blow up the trumpet in Zion." Appropriately Mr. Sitwell adds, "For Babylon the Great is fallen, is fallen. Alleluia!"

His Music

The introduction, preceded only by a rhythmic flourish on a single note in the orchestra, is for men's choir unaccompanied. After an interlude of no more than seven measures the double chorus, also unaccompanied, begins. Of this first part the program-book of the British Broadcasting Corporation in a note written by Mr. Frank Howes, says: "The early part of the work is not merely dark but bitter, and contrives to match the ferocious hate which lies beneath the mournful surface of the text. The flavor of Jewish nationalism is caught alike in the harsh substance of the music and in the instrumental dress. The passion and the sorrow break through in the long stretches of beautiful writing for unaccompanied voices. This indeed is one of the most remarkable features of the work: voices alone, orchestra alone, and voices and orchestra together form three distinct forces each of which is capable of gradation and climax in its own sort. They are set over against one another and reinforce each other's effect by contrast."

With the words, "For they that wasted us required of us mirth," the orchestra enters and the mood becomes increasingly bitter and agitated. The words beginning, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning," are given to baritone solo accompanied by semi-chorus and orchestra. The double chorus soon resumes, and presently there is repetition of the music of the beginning. At "O Daughter of Babylon who art to be destroyed," the climax mounts in both the mood and the music. The end is quiet.

The interpolation, "Babylon was a great city" is then declaimed by the baritone as a recitative, rhythmically free and without presence of bar-lines, unaccompanied. The music is virile and follows closely the natural inflections of the text.

Part Two, the feast of the great king, is evidently imagined, as the Jews, rather than the Babylonians, saw, heard and felt it. Nor is Mr. Walton a neutral observer. An angry, scolding, descending arpeggio is beginning. As motive, it is frequently heard in the ensuing measures. A four-voiced chorus, of violent mood takes up the narrative. A touch of sly humor enlivens it where the words "That the king, his princes, his wives," are sung forte in strong declamation, while the immediately succeeding, "And his concubines" run in a gentle, ingratiating pianissimo! All forces join in the celebration by "cornet, flute, sackbut, psaltery." A barbarous shout where "They drank wine again" is answered by "Yea! drank from the sacred vessels." While the proclamation "And then spake the King," rings exultantly. The accompaniment is the violent arpeggio passage of protest.

The King's word's praising the God of Gold are given to the baritone, repeated sumptuously by full chorus. Appropriately enough, the praise of the God of Silver falls to the women's chorus; that of the God of Iron to men's voices; that of Wood again to women and that of Stone to men; while both join in the praise of the God of Brass. A magnificent contrapuntal chorus of praise of all the gods then follows. On an even higher scale, and repeating some of the preceding, is the development leading to the culminating, "O King, live forever." This too is followed in the orchestra with the angry motive of protest.

At once the baritone enters with another recitative, leading to the fateful "Mene, mene, tekel." Only lugubrious tremolos and deep-sounding percussion accompany it. A shrill outcry in high-pitched instruments follows. Then a male chorus translates it: "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." Tersely the recitative continues, "And in that night was Belshazzar the King slain." There is no more dramatic stroke in the whole work than the answer of the chorus with the single shouted word, "Slain." Without interruption the baritone proceeds, "and his kingdom divided." Overpowering swiftness rules it all.

With an "Allegro giocoso" mood the orchestra then sounds the prelude to the rejoicing of Part III. The angry motive of protest is now transformed to sound joyously. A chorus begins the singing of praise, continues it through many and varied phases. An "espressivo' contrast comes with the words, "While the kings of the earth lament and the merchants of the earth weep, wail and rend their raiment." Another chorus of most exultant praise, pages of antiphonal Alleluias, a final recapitulation of great strength and the thirty-five-minute work comes to an end.

Final Survey

As to the use of thematic material the note in the British Broadcasting Corporation's program-book says: "Leading themes are exceptionally plastic; so much so that quotation is difficult. The main outlines are clear enough but no one form belongs more authentically to the idea it signifies than another. The composer has made a brilliant use of this plasticity in the chorus of Babylonian praise of the heathen deities, but the same principle is observed throughout the work, and its great vitality may be largely attributed to this constant adaptation of the theme to its environment. These themes are certainly not labels.' This virtually means that instead of a set of fixed themes undergoing development and transformation we have (always excepting the one motive of protest) masses of material, each homogeneous within its own bounds, each fulfilling exactly its own purpose.

The program-book may also be quoted as to the orchestration: "It includes over and above the usual instruments of the full modern orchestra an alto saxophone, an E-flat clarinet and a piano which is treated orchestrally. The composer desires when possible to have separate brass bands to the right and left, in the manner prescribed by Berlioz for his Requiem. For the percussion corner a large equipment of furniture is required: side-drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, glockenspiel, xylophone, gong, anvil, slapstick and Chinese block."

In conclusion, two considered opinions about "Belshazzar's Feast" may be cited. Basil Maine, writing in The Spectator, has said: "Both works [the Sinfonia Concertante and the Viola Concerto] are compact, yet fully developed in form. Both are elaborate, yet crystal clear. The art of implication has in these been practised with great assurance. In 'Belshazzar's Feast' it is practised even more convincingly. But there are no problems evaded. For that reason it cannot be said to be typical of Under-Thirty Art. It is too firmly grounded. There is nothing wilfully obscure. The narrative is swift; the structure, sound; the nature organic . . .

"In view of the composer's early training in choral music, the surety of the choral writing is perhaps not surprising, but is certainly a new revelation of his art. The setting of 'By the Waters of Babylon' is surely the most poignant music that these words have evoked. As for the final hymn, it is nothing less than a tour de force in its gathering strength and building of climax upon climax. No trace of ordinary anthem praise or Anglican hymning here! Almost it seems as if the composer were vehemently protesting against these empty formulas. His singers are fierce, almost vindictive. Their praising has all the quality of religious fanaticism. And, in spite of the multitude of his forces . . . the texture is rich rather than blatant, and, as always with Mr. Walton, transparently clear."

So also, Mr. Cardus of The Manchester Guardian. At first hearing he was "overwhelmed." In a second review he wrote: "Hours after the shock of the performance, and following a sleepless night's study of the score, one's first impressions of originality of conception and swift, powerful execution remain as strong as ever. Walton's musical ideas are as convincing on paper as in performance they are overwhelming. They are charged with driving power, and while they serve the dramatic purposes of the text, they are plastic enough for the purposes of the composer's need to make his score satisfying in itself to the musical intelligence. The score indeed is not like a mere reflection of the text, but rather the mirror itself which renders the reflection possible.

"The cantata is real choralism, broad based, and rich in opportunities for all manner of massed vocalism, from the smooth, passionate melody of the 'captivity music' to the ferocity and sheer godlessness of the great scene of the invocation of the priests of Gold. Walton's touch is sharp and certain; the work plunges us into the Old Testament world by a single comprehensive stroke. The development has great impetus, and yet a thoroughly æsthetic curve of development or poise. The harmonic writing is personal and plastic; the rhythm is as imaginative as in any work of our period. From beginning to end, 'Belshazzar's Feast' is a clear case of red-hot conception instinctively finding the right and equally red-hot means of expression."

A. H. M.

For the first time in eight years Dr. Koussevitzky will return, next May, to London as conductor. He will then take over three festival-concerts in Queen's Hall with the orchestra and chorus of the British Broadcasting Corporation. His programs will include Beethoven's Fourth and Ninth symphonies; Sibelius's Seventh; Chaikovsky's Fifth; Bax's Second; Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony"; Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point." The dates are Monday, Wednesday and Friday, May 15, 17 and 19.

151 3

April

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDA

n Tenements Left Here

a permit.

Plays and

Report From The Week-End Concert-Halls

Second Performance Betters Both Loeffler and Walton, Mr. Hayes Returns

IN REPETITION at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, Mr. Loeffler's "Evocation" and Mr. Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" renewed and deepened first impressions. They gained also by more confident performance and more responsive hearers. In "Evocation" the secondary choral part was sung with surer sense of flowing line and clear texture; while out of long experience at close hand a Boston audience sits expectant before Mr. Loeffler. Any resident prophet might have foretold the warmths with which he would be called and recalled to the stage, the heightened reaction to this music of undiminished powers. More than on Friday there was reason to admire the imagination and the resource of the harmonic and instrumental coloring; the subtlety that flowers in clarity; the supple movement of the whole music once it is clear of the earthbound introductory fugue; the luminous, aerial quality that pervades the whole as though it were a thing of light, air and gentle fire. The word beauty may be confidently written of such a music, a serene beauty rare in these latter days. The listener by the new temple heard Pan, the nymphs, the Singing Stone in the beauty of the classic poets, seldom or with illusion transfused into tones.

In "Belshazzar's Feast" the chorus everywhere dominates, which is not to say that Mr. Walton uses the orchestra only as support. To the contrary, through the lament of captive Jewry it is no less plangent than the chorus; while through the narrative of the feast, the sign, the doom, it teems with delineative and dramatizing strokes instant upon the listening imagination. Only in the final chorus of triumph is it not too distinguishable part in the torrent and the tumult of the whole. Time and again Mr. Walton seems master of a music for what may be called the choral and the orchestral theater. Though the Israelitish tribe grieves "by the waters of Babylon"; yet is the tonal air lowering and menacing. The proclamation and praise of Belshazzar's deities—the gods everywhere and at all times of material wealth and power—stride and shout (especially as they were sung on Saturday) four-square with an insolent superbity. Seldom does the theater of music-drama mount so high or strike so hard. The delivery of the single word "slain" is swift, sure leap of a dramatizing imagination in tones. The declamation of the solo-voice joins a new freedom to new force. Not a phrase but is graphic. Only in the final chorus is Mr. Walton within the choral tradition—to rend it forthwith by tribal savagery and pagan frenzies. Israel's god, Jehovah, has pulled down the Babylonian gods in their city. Everywhere the voice of an individual composer; everywhere a music firm and clear because it is written in full mastery of means to ends. There is compulsion in it.

A deserved word, finally, as to Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Haydn's little symphony in E-flat. The conductor assembles a small orchestra; then keeps it in the justest balance. Never once are the strings too heavy upon the other instruments, covering woodwinds or brass. The ear not only hears but notes Haydn's skill and felicity with them. The conductor further seeks and gains an impeccable clarity. The ear, again, follows and feels every figuration. With hardly one is Haydn merely facile and filling. The lines of the whole symphony run in unbroken, unclouded, undulating flow. How fine in craftsmanship how ready in invention was this Haydn under all his suavities and simplicities and spirits. At long last a conductor faithfully reflects him.

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Two novel choral pieces adorned the twenty-first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home season (March 31-April 1). Mr. William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" was performed for the first time in America, Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for the first time in Boston. The chorus was that of the Cecilia Society, Mr. Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

"Belshazzar's Feast," in the year and a half since its production at Leeds, Eng., has been the text of a chorus of critical praise as loud as that of the score, and nearly as unanimous. The work has therefore been awaited in America with impatience, and it had a notable success at its first Boston performance.

Certainly it is an effective composition. The author of the Overture "Portsmouth Point," has had no difficulty in expressing, in rhythms, in orchestral sonorities and in instrumental colors his conception of the reign of Belshazzar, the fall of Babylon and the rejoicing of the Israelites. At the very beginning he establishes his atmosphere, with the trumpet call on a single reiterated note and in a provocative rhythm. There is tremendous force in the choruses of praise to the Babylonish gods of gold, silver, iron, stone, wood and brass, at the King's feast. There is a really distressing impact in the vocal and instrumental rejoicing of the Israelites over the fall of the city.

With Help of Reconstruction Finance

Clearly, a great deal of this effect is due to the violence of the assault on the ears; an effect of the sort which tends to wear away after the first few meetings with a score. The touch — already famous — of the handwriting on the wall also smacks of the theater. The announcement by the soloist (Mr. David Blair McClosky) that that night the King was slain, with the sudden fortissimo repetition of the word "slain" by the chorus—surely this is theatrical rather than musical.

The communication of the barbaric splendors of the Babylonians and of the barbaric triumph of the Israelites is comparable with Prokofieff's realization of the rites of the Akkadians, in "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." But after a single hearing of Mr. Walton's cantata we are doubtful about two things: the value of the musical material employed, and the form taken by the composition. We did not find affecting the melodic substance of the mourning by the waters of Babylon, for example. And the declamations of the soloist were unimpressive. This was the fault, we are convinced, as much of the composer as of the soloist. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted vigorously and secured a performance that was admirable except for a few roughnesses which no doubt will disappear with repetition of the piece.

It would be a pity if the shock of the Walton opus were to obliterate the impression made by Mr. Loeffler's composition, which was written for the dedication of Severance Hall, Cleveland, Ohio, as the permanent home of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. Going back to his favorite Greece for his inspiration, Mr. Loeffler has described in tones the building of a temple of the muses, and of the attempts of the nymphs to fetter the god Pan to their fields. The score is characteristically charming and evocative, rich and closely knit, full of lovely tints and shades, clouds and shadows, in the best impressionist style. The saxophone has been employed for its novel timbres, and a new instrument, the vibra-harp—a sort of xylophone with cylindrical resonators under the metal bars—adds to the elusive atmospheric effects. The composer was called to the stage to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

The program opened with the Symphony in E flat major (Salomon No. 10) by Haydn. It is not too much to say that this composition gave more pleasure than either of its companions on the list. To observe the endless fertility of the composer, his variety of mood, his inventiveness, his unexpected turns of phrase and modifications of rhythm, is a joy. He was lavish with his fancies, his inventions. He could afford to be, for they bubbled out of him. In one of his symphonies there is material for a dozen pretentious compositions by many a composer. The performance was exquisite.

L. A. S.

Boston Transcript · Apr. 1

Page Four

Sympho

To Both Its Finer and Its Larger Glory

From the Symphony Orchestra Pieces with Chorus by Loeffler and Walton

COUNT OUT Haydn's symphony in E-flat, (No. 99), which began the afternoon, and the Symphony Concert of Friday was per[illegible] pagan. To it, first, Mr. Loeffler contributed "Evocation," music for orchestra, women's chorus and speaking voice, briefly, distantly. It was written to be dedicatory piece, in 1931, for the new hall of the orchestra in Cleveland. No music could be further from the striding pomps, sonorous periods, luscious lyrical intermezzi, customary and machine-made on such occasions. Mr. Loeffler would "evoke" out of the murky chaos of material things the rising of a temple of music, ordered and gravely beautiful. Thither the god Pan transfers his singing pipes; while the nymphs of the reedy streams on the hillsides lament his departure. Within the walls is incorporated, or by them is laid, the singing stone on which Apollo once rested his lyre. Touched lightly, as with a pebble, ever afterward it sang.

Mr. Loeffler found these fancies written in epigrams from the Greek anthology. He wrought them into a music, once the early murk and confusion is over-passed, or rare serenity, beauty, perfection. Not a note, a phrase, a period within it that is not chiselled into place and colored into suggestion. The tonal air is as limpid, still and quietly luminous as the atmosphere of an Arcadian landscape by Poussin. The tonal images rise upon ear and mind in high relief finely carved. The lyric vein is gentle and tempered, wistful and melancholy. The pagan Loeffler of the amorous Vergilian girl made this music of evocation twenty-five years afterward, out of an imagery and a craft that a younger mind and hand might not command. Regained are the ancient calm, the ancient scruple, the pure and classic loveliness—and by modern means.

Opposed and contrasted stood, second, Mr. Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," for chorus of male and female voices, baritone briefly declaiming, full twentieth-century orchestra. The text detached, arranged and amplified from the Book of Psalms and the Book of Daniel is incisive, graphic narrative. Captive in Babylon, the tribes of Israel lament and menace; call upon their god who is Jehovah. Belshazzar, the great king, outspreads the splendor and the insolence of his palace-feast; invokes the gods of riches and of power; against Jehovah pits them. The writing upon the wall dooms him. Jewry cries its victory and its god in vindictive, savage, exultation. Mr. Sitwell is the detached recorder of these barbaric struggles of people against people, tribal pantheon against tribal deity. He strips his Biblical words to the thing that they impart.

Mr. Walton undertakes to project and intensify this narrative in choral and orchestral tones. The lament of Jewry is both plangent and morose, at high pulse. The re-counting of the feast is tonal "theater" on-rushing, instant, incandescent. The Assyrians from Delacroix's huge canvases stride and sound on the symphonic stage. Grim stroke upon sharp stroke the doom is accomplished. The tribal chorus of elation is a directed frenzy. There is nothing in modern music with which to compare it save only Florent Schmitt's setting of Psalm XLVII. another pæan of barbaric triumph. Throughout Mr. Walton's rhythms pound and drive. His musical substance vitalizes the choral narrative, the choral characterization, the tribal passion. His orchestra is surcharged with resource and significance. He raises tempests of sound but he also rides them. As at the doom he can cleave them as well. Not once does his music get out of hand, rarely and briefly does it fall away. He is master of his design, his means, his accomplishment, himself. "Belshazzar's Feast" is proclamation of young power.

On the hasty currents of the concert-hall, "Evocation" invites and rewards as close listening as may be. There is Mr. Loeffler's background of ancient verse—the choice of a literary culture and predilection, rare among composers. Unaffectedly, as one who has it in companionship, he turns back to the ancient verse. Our young men may scan for source the modernities about them. He opens once more the Greek anthology. . . . From this serene, finely [illegible] poetry he erects the scheme of his own tone-poem: the temp[illegible] out of material, but also spiritual, confusions; the music-making semi-deity that thither is attracted, therein is installed; stone that sings touched by the lyre of a very god; beyond the nymphs plaintive, regretful for their loss which is man's gain. A myth to glamour concert-halls from old fable extracted, to new purpose applied. Surely another poet in his own medium of tones has done these things.

These ancientries, as some may call them, wrought by Mr. Loeffler into the modernities of music. He labels his orchestra a "modern orchestra," for as much as he has increased its manifold voices in these nineteen-thirties with rich-toned saxophones and deep-toned, long-pulsing vibra-harp seemingly his own invention, in the usage to which he puts it for the singing stone quick and graphic on the listening ear. Of the old colorings or the new he is equally imaginative master. . . . In times past it has been plausible to refer Mr. Loeffler's harmonies to the Parisian theory and practice of his middle years. Now in a maturity that waxes in his seventies by grace of the benignant gods, they are his own and of no other in clear iridescence along winding course. . . . Again his melody, for the nymphs in particular, melancholy, wistful, sinuous, resonant often of the viola which he once played as though its voice had entered lastingly into his composing imagination. To end, the structural readiness and resource that achieves the fugue at the beginning; out of it conducts the design from which the music is to take line and light and color. By modern means in this "Evocation" the ancient serenity, beauty, perfection. For, being poet, Mr. Loeffler knows that they are deathless.

Compelled and at strain, the listener follows through "Belshazzar's Feast," grasping for whatever the directed tempest may cast up to quick perceptions. Trumpets summon and there is declamation from the prophet Isaiah. It is choral, yet surprisingly flexible and graphic. Later the baritone voice narrates, proclaims in free recitative. For declamation so vivified, so humanized there is no parallel but Musorgky's. Yet it has breadth and power—the heritage from the old oratorio modernized. . . . The lament of Jewry "by the waters of Babylon" further discloses Mr. Walton. Immediately he is the detached, objective modern composer. The tribal voice, emotion, circumstance, these only to be brought into his music. Here go savages, pagans, so only to be expressed, their woes and their threat. In the expression, form that no pedant may reproach, clarity that reveals, force that drives.

Again the puissant-pliant, tense, full-mouthed declamation of the riches of Babylon with the ironic touch—what composer of our time may forbear it?—at the end. Then the launching of the chorus upon the great king's feast. The impetus of the rhythm, the compulsion of the progress are irresistible. The ear catches at means and method, quality and achievement as they drive past.

There are long choral lines outflung, interlaced, crossing and re-crossing; swift and sudden shadings upon them; mingled fertility and compression of matter; bare and stinging progressions; impacts and weight of sonorities; surges and darts of instrumental color. There is fierce, acrid, multi-colored invocation of the Babylonian gods of wealth and power, as though their priests strode Belshazzar's hall. There are the mounting stir and tumult of the feast, heavier and heavier upon the tonal air, the undercurrent of Jewish hate and wrath.

Were Mr. Walton or any other young English composer to write an opera, who would produce it? Into choral and orchestral "theater" upon a symphonic stage he must cast it. The music turns ominous. Against a rumble of dead sound, "the writing that was written" upon the wall is declaimed—by the single voice, by the chorus of men. No dilly dallying over Assyrian soothsayers or Jewish prophet. Must we be told that the hand of Jehovah hath written? A stark silence; a shout of instant amaze across it; the great king is slain and his kingdom divided. Ever the swift, driving, objective, irreligious Walton, now at top-stroke of his tonal "theater." . . . The rest is the ferocious tribal elation of the final chorus—streams and swirls of counterpoint, sonorities piled upon sonorities, orchestral and vocal both; the slither across it of Babylon mourned; the controlled yet full-flung passion of young power. . . .

In the interest and the compulsions, wide apart as they were, of "Evocation" and "Belshazzar's Feast," the listener thought only of the performance as contributory. In a single concert Dr. Koussevitzky has seldom ranged farther than from the beauty of Loeffler to the power of Walton, from the still luminosity of the one music to the fierce incandescence of the other. Yet out of himself upon his forces he impressed both; not less upon the audience. (Once more it could hail Mr. Loeffler again and again.) The orchestra was equally pliant, equally projecting, to both pieces. Though Mr. Walton obviously wrote for larger, more strident chorus than The Cecilia might yield, after months of training by Mr. Fiedler, it outsang itself new-vitalized. The Waltonian declamation heartens and releases a singer like Mr. McClosky. . . . Such pieces produced, such a concert accomplished, are of the finer and the larger glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

157

Choral Classic at Symphony

Boston American April

By MOSES SMITH

The much-awaited American premiere of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, yesterday, proved worth awaiting. This complicated work by the brilliant young English composer, William Walton, is written for mixed chorus, orchestra, baritone soloist, and two brass bands.

The brass bands are dispensed with at the current symphony concerts, but by reliable authority they are not essential. As heard in yesterday's glamorous performance, "Belshazzar's Feast" justifies the elaborate praise it has received. The music follows fairly carefully the powerful text from Isaiah on which it is based. There is choral writing of prodigious sonority, and the orchestra is employed with masterly power. There is perhaps not enough surcease of sheer power during the course of the work. But, on the whole, it has telling effect.

Dr. Koussevitzky, leading in inspired fashion, was aided by the beautiful singing of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler; by the most musical and intelligent delivery of the baritone solo by David Blair McClosky; and by the instrumental virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work was very favorably received by the audience.

Of an entirely different kind, but quite as effective in its way, the music of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra and women's voices, heard in Boston for the first time. The local composer, who has few peers among contemporary musicians in the world, bases his work on a classical literary program, with which he is very much at home. Though the composition seemed, on first hearing, to have here and there some inconsistencies in style, the basic impression was of delicate and precise handling of the instruments and the voices, superb part-writing, and wizard-like command over atmospheric creation.

Burlesque

Another burlesque comes to the Old Howard Monday matinee. This organization is headed by Florence Naomi. The comedy is placed in the hands of Joe Freed. James Coughlin is another funmaker, and Connie Fanslau and Stella Novack are stars. Fantana, Lew White, Bob Whalen, Eddie Aitken, Floyd Hallacy and Worth, Byron and Worth are featured.

Amusements

R-K-O KEITH'S
Second Smashing Week
Breaking All Records!
KING KONG
THE EIGHTH WONDER OF THE WORLD!
—Added Featurette—
"SO THIS IS HARRIS"
Phil Harris—Walter Catlett

KEITH BOSTON
"Cohens & Kellys in Trouble"
with George Sidney-Charlie Murray
VAUDE. REVUE—6 BIG ACTS
Sam Jack KAUFMAN—16 GIRLS
Extra! 'THE VOICE OF THE VATICAN'

—TUES. EVE. at JORDAN 8:30 HALL—
AARON RICHMOND presents
ARTHUR FIEDLER
and the
BOSTON SINFONIETTA
JESUS MARIA SANROMA Assisting Artist
Tickets 75 cts. to $2.20 NOW

PLYMOUTH MAT. TODAY 2:3 TONIGHT AT 8:3
SEATS NOW FOR WEEK OF APRIL
THE PICCOL

1000 SEATS 15¢ ANY TIME
NEW GAYETY
"THE BITTER TEA OF GENERAL YEN"
5 VAUDEVILLE ACTS
REGIS TOOMEY: STRANGE ADVENTUR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

APR 1 - 1933

Noted Artists Cable Hitler Protesting Persecution

Names world famous in the field of music were signed today to a cablegram sent to Adolph Hitler, German dictator, in protest against persecution of artists in Germany because of race or religion.

Among those signing the protest was Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, who is being urged by his artistic colleagues to refuse to go to Germany to conduct the Wagnerian festival of music due to start in Bayreuth on July 20. Toscanini asked that his name be signed "at the head of the list."

Others signing were Walter Damrosch, his brother, Frank Damrosch, director of the Institute of Musical Art; Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony; Artur Bodanzky, director of the German section of the Metropolitan Opera and Harold Bauer, pianist and president of the Beethoven Association.

Also Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony and son-in-law of Mark Twain; Alfred Hertz, former conductor of the Metropolitan; Charles Martin Loeffler, Boston composer; Fritz Reiner, Hungarian conductor, and Rubin Gollmark, New York composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Toscanini Asks Curb on Nazis

Protesting the Nazis' treatment of artists, ten celebrated musicians, including Arturo Toscanini, firebrand conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony, cabled to Chancellor Hitler of Germany last night.

The cable reminded Hitler that "the artist, all over the world, is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions."

It was thought possible that Toscanini might cancel his engagement to conduct the Wagnerian festival at Bayreuth next July.

Among those who signed the cable were Walter and Frank Damrosch, Sergei Koussevitsky, Artur Bodansky, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Alfred Hertz, Charles Martin Loeffler, Fritz Reiner and Rubin Goldmark.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES SEASON HERE APRIL 11

Brahms Symphony in D Major to Be Main Presentation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit to Providence this season to give a concert in the Albee Theatre, Tuesday evening, April 11, at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with a number appropriate to Holy Week—Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, "A Russian Easter," which uses themes of the old Russian church. Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," will also be played.

Dr. Koussevitzky will close the program and the season with the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. This symphony is also appropriate since the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms is being celebrated this spring in many parts of the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 2 - 1933

TOSCANINI HEADS PROTEST TO HITLER

He and Ten Other Musicians of World Fame Ask End of Persecution of Colleagues.

LIKELY TO QUIT BAIREUTH

Gabrilowitsch Urges Him to Stay Away as Disapproval of 'Brutal' Regime.

Eleven musicians of world fame, headed by Arturo Toscanini, cabled to Chancellor Hitler of Germany yesterday in protest against the persecution of their colleagues in that country for political or religious reasons. Mr. Toscanini's name headed the list of signers at his own request.

It was learned that Mr. Toscanini is considering a withdrawal from his contract to conduct the Wagnerian festival at Baireuth, Germany, this Summer. He has been under pressure from other leaders in the world of music to take such action as a protest against Hitlerism.

The cablegram to Hitler was sent through the office of Berthold Neuer, vice president of the Knabe Piano Company, 584 Fifth Avenue. It was proposed by Artur Bodanzky.

Cablegram Sent to Hitler.

Mr. Neuer said that Mr. Bodanzky came to him on March 22 and asked that he draft a letter to the outstanding musical artists in this country inviting them to sign a cable to protest against the Hitlerite persecutions of musicians, composers and conductors. Eleven artists immediately responded to Mr. Neuer's letter and yesterday the following cablegram was sent:

Chancellor Adolf Hitler,
Berlin, Germany.
Your Excellency:

The undersigned artists who live, and execute their art, in the United States of America feel the moral obligation to appeal to your excellency to put a stop to the persecutions of their colleagues in Germany, for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artist all over the world is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instructions, and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteem Germany, until now, has been enjoying in the eyes of the whole civilized world.

Hoping that our appeal in behalf of our colleagues will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are

Respectfully yours.

Those who signed the cablegram are:

AUTURO TOSCANINI, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society.

WALTER DAMROSCH, former conductor of the New York Symphony Society.

FRANK DAMROSCH, director of the Institute of Musical Art.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony.

ARTUR BODANZKY, conductor of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

HAROLD BAUER, pianist and president of the Beethoven Association.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, conductor of the Detroit Symphony.

ALFRED HERTZ, former conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra.

CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER, composer, of Boston.

FRITZ REINER, former conductor of the Cincinnati and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras.

RUBIN GOLDMARK, New York composer.

"Put My Name at Top" of List.

In responding to Mr. Neuer's letter, Mr. Toscanini declared: "Not only can you use my name, but if there is no objection and if it is possible I would like to have my name at the head of the subscribers of this message."

Mr. Neuer also revealed that Mr. Gabrilowitsch wrote: "I am not enchanted over the idea of addressing as 'your Excellency' a man for whom I have not the slightest respect, neither do I think it quite truthful to say 'We are convinced that such persecutions are not based on your instructions,' whereas in reality I am thoroughly convinced that Hitler is personally responsible for all that is going on in Germany at the present time. I also want to make it clear that I am not in the least bit afraid to add my signature."

The Letter to Toscanini.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch also revealed that he had sent a letter directly to Mr. Toscanini urging him to lend his name to the protest.

"All these protests will remain without any appreciable results," he wrote. "They will not impress the German rulers nor the German nation. There is only one man who could protest effectively. That is you, Maestro Arturo Toscanini.

"Two years ago (1931) when you left Baireuth in disgust and anger you were reported in a newspaper interview as having expressed yourself very sharply against Hitlerism. This year (1933) you are returning to Baireuth when Hitlerism is at the climax of its triumph. Do you not think that this must be interpreted by the whole world as an expression of your approval of Hitlerism?

"It is a mistake to regard Hitlerism merely as an anti-Jewish movement. That, of course, is only one side of it. Hitlerism is a mental attitude which advocates brutal force against liberty. It is the worst side of fascism. The outrageous insults to which you were subjected in Bologna two years ago are an example of that attitude

"When the Bologna incident happened, the musicians of the whole world expressed their indignation and their sympathy for you. At that time, Koussevitzky refused to direct a concert at La Seala Theatre in Milan. That was his courageous protest. Will you, Maestro, not protest in turn against the insults to which such colleagues of yours as Walter and Busch have been subjected?

"Perhaps you will say that Baireuth is not responsible for Hitler. Maestro, it is well known that Baireuth is one of the centres of extreme German nationalism. It is generally understood that the present inhabitants of Wahnfried are personal friends and admirers of Adolf Hitler. Under those conditions, will you—Arturo Toscanini, the world's most illustrious artist—lend the glamour of your international fame to the Baireuth festival?"

Mr. Bodanzky said that only last Thursday he had received a letter from friends in Germany in which they commented on the "recent insults" upon Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch and then added that only ten days ago the German Symphony and operatic conductor, Otto Kemperer, had been assaulted by Nazi storm troops.

It was believed in music circles here that Mr. Toscanini's signing of the cable meant that he would not go to Baireuth this year. It is believed that he will either be asked by those in charge of the festival to withdraw or that he might take the first step and ask to be relieved of fulfilling his contract.

In May, 1931, Toscanini was attacked and beaten at Bologna, Italy, after he had refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in memory of the Italian composer, Martucci, on the ground that it would be entirely out of place on such an occasion.

Ford Urged to Protest.

Aaron Sapiro, the lawyer whose $1,000,000 libel suit against Henry Ford resulted in an apology by the automobile manufacturer to the Jewish people for his attacks upon them in The Dearborn Independent several years ago, telegraphed to Mr. Ford yesterday urging him to cable the German leaders and ask them to do the same as he had done in disavowing his attacks upon the Jews.

James N. Rosenberg, vice chairman of the Joint Distribution Committee, announced that the special meeting of the overseas relief agency at Temple Emanu-El this afternoon will be solely for humanitarian purposes in "amelioration of the world misery of oppressed Jews" and will not have any political purpose.

"What, if anything, we can do, in the face of the overwhelming tragedy now confronting the Jewish people in Germany," he added, "is the immediate problem which confronts us. All we can say is that the efforts of our organization, as always in the past, will be solely to relieve the suffering and despair which engulfs the world."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

R 8 - 1933

Protest Sent to Hitlerites by Musicians

Famous Conductors of Nation Sign Cable Addressed to German Leader

By DENOE LEEDY
The Press Music Editor

REPORTS from Germany telling of the maltreatment of distinguished musicians by the Nazis have resulted in the following cablegram:

Chancellor Hitler,
Berlin, Germany.
Your Excellency:

The undersigned artists, who live and execute their art in the United States of America, feel the moral obligation to appeal to your excellency to put a stop to the persecutions of their colleagues in Germany for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artist all over the world is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instructions and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteem Germany, until now, has been enjoying in the eyes of the whole civilized world.

Hoping that this, our appeal in behalf of our colleagues, will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are,

Respectfully yours,

Arturo Toscanini, Walter Damrosch, Frank Damrosch, Sergei Koussevitzky, Artur Bodanzky, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Charles Martin Loeffler, Fritz Reiner, Rubin Goldmark, Alfred Hertz.

* * *

Important Plea

IT is not the purpose of this reviewer, in printing this statement, to enter into any discussion of the present situation in Germany. But no musician can fail to react to such a plea coming from a group of superlative artists, all of whom have given ample evidence of their integrity, both as men and in the conduct of their art.

The fact that Toscanini joins in this appeal has its dramatic value. He is scheduled to conduct this coming summer at Bayreuth, the Wagnerian shrine, which in spite of all its traditions, seems particularly in need of his ministrations.

If he comes to an impasse with the authorities that be, it will not be the first time. His courage is well known. Two years ago he ran counter to the Fascists. But the Bologna incident served only to raise him anew in the eyes of the world.

At that time Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Orchestra, rallied to his support and refused to conduct a concert at the La Scala Theatre in Milan. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, in his letter beseeching the great Italian to add his name to the signers of the cablegram, recalls this incident.

Perhaps when the reckoning is made it will be seen that the great artists and the universality of the things they have dedicated their lives to, will have played an important part in the establishing of a respectable social order.

* * *

Promenade Concerts

A SPECIAL series of "promenade concerts" will be given next month in Severance Hall by members of the Cleveland Orchestra under direction of Rudolph Ringwall, assistant conductor, it was announced today.

The concert series will run from May 3 to May 30, with seats in the dress circle selling for 50 cents. The concerts will be given Wednesday and Friday nights and Sunday afternoon.

The last matinee performance of the orchestra's current symphony season will be played this afternoon at Severance Hall, when the orchestra repeats the all-Brahms program of last night. Nikolai Sokoloff will conduct the performance. Shortly after the close of the program Mr. Sokoloff leaves Cleveland for New York, where he will take charge of the plans for next year of the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Artur Rodzinski will replace Mr. Sokoloff here next year.

Thes orchestra also will play its final "twilight concert" tomorrow evening at the direction of Mr. Ringwall, assistant.

Choral Classic at Symphony

Bos American April

By MOSES SMITH

The much-awaited American premiere of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, yesterday, proved worth awaiting. This complicated work by the brilliant young English composer, William Walton, is written for mixed chorus, orchestra, baritone soloist, and two brass bands.

The brass bands are dispensed with at the current symphony concerts, but by reliable authority they are not essential. As heard in yesterday's glamorous performance, "Belshazzar's Feast" justifies the elaborate praise it has received. The music follows fairly carefully the powerful text from Isaiah on which it is based. There is choral writing of prodigious sonority, and the orchestra is employed with masterly power. There is perhaps not enough surcease of sheer power during the course of the work. But, on the whole, it has telling effect.

Dr. Koussevitzky, leading in inspired fashion, was aided by the beautiful singing of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler; by the most musical and intelligent delivery of the baritone solo by David Blair McClosky; and by the instrumental virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work was very favorably received by the audience.

Of an entirely different kind, but quite as effective in its way, the music of Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation" for orchestra and women's voices, heard in Boston for the first time. The local composer, who has few peers among contemporary musicians in the world, bases his work on a classical literary program, with which he is very much at home. Though the composition seemed, on first hearing, to have here and there some inconsistencies in style, the basic impression was of delicate and precise handling of the instruments and the voices, superb part-writing, and wizard-like command over atmospheric creation.

Burlesque

Another burlesque comes to the Old Howard Monday matinee. This organization is headed by Florence Naomi. The comedy is placed in the hands of Joe Freed. James Coughlin is another funmaker, and Connie Fanslau and Stella Novack are stars. Fantana, Lew White, Bob Whalen, Eddie Aitken, Floyd Hallacy and Worth, Byron and Worth are featured.

Amusements

R·K·O KEITH'S
Second Smashing Week
Breaking All Records!
KING KONG
THE EIGHTH WONDER OF THE WORLD!
—Added Featurette—
"SO THIS IS HARRIS"
Phil Harris—Walter Catlett

KEITH BOSTON
"Cohens & Kellys in Trouble"
with George Sidney-Charlie Murray
VAUDE. REVUE—6 BIG ACTS
Sam Jack KAUFMAN—16 GIRLS
Extra! 'THE VOICE OF THE VATICAN'

—TUES. EVE. at 8:30 JORDAN HALL—
AARON RICHMOND presents
ARTHUR FIEDLER
and the
BOSTON SINFONIETTA
JESUS MARIA SANROMA Assisting Artist
Tickets 75 cts. to $2.20 NOW

PLYMOUTH MAT. TODAY 2:3
TONIGHT AT 8:3
SEATS NOW FOR WEEK OF APRIL
THE PICCOL

NEW GAYETY
1000 SEATS 15c ANY TIME
"THE BITTER TEA OF GENERAL YEN"
5 VAUDEVILLE ACTS
REGIS TOOMEY-STRANGE ADVENTUR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

APR 1 - 1933

Noted Artists Cable Hitler Protesting Persecution

Names world famous in the field of music were signed today to a cablegram sent to Adolph Hitler, German dictator, in protest against persecution of artists in Germany because of race or religion.

Among those signing the protest was Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, who is being urged by his artistic colleagues to refuse to go to Germany to conduct the Wagnerian festival of music due to start in Bayreuth on July 20. Toscanini asked that his name be signed "at the head of the list."

Others signing were Walter Damrosch, his brother, Frank Damrosch, director of the Institute of Musical Art; Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony; Artur Bodanzky, director of the German section of the Metropolitan Opera and Harold Bauer, pianist and president of the Beethoven Association.

Also Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony and son-in-law of Mark Twain; Alfred Hertz, former conductor of the Metropolitan; Charles Martin Loeffler, Boston composer; Fritz Reiner, Hungarian conductor, and Rubin Gollmark, New York composer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Toscanini Asks Curb on Nazis

Protesting the Nazis' treatment of artists, ten celebrated musicians, including Arturo Toscanini, firebrand conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony, cabled to Chancellor Hitler of Germany last night.

The cable reminded Hitler that "the artist, all over the world, is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions."

It was thought possible that Toscanini might cancel his engagement to conduct the Wagnerian festival at Bayreuth next July.

Among those who signed the cable were Walter and Frank Damrosch, Sergei Koussevitsky, Artur Bodansky, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Alfred Hertz, Charles Martin Loeffler, Fritz Reiner and Rubin Goldmark.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES SEASON HERE APRIL 11

Brahms Symphony in D Major to Be Main Presentation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit to Providence this season to give a concert in the Albee Theatre, Tuesday evening, April 11, at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with a number appropriate to Holy Week—Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, "A Russian Easter," which uses themes of the old Russian church. Richard Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," will also be played.

Dr. Koussevitzky will close the program and the season with the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. This symphony is also appropriate since the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms is being celebrated this spring in many parts of the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 2 - 1933

TOSCANINI HEADS PROTEST TO HITLER

He and Ten Other Musicians of World Fame Ask End of Persecution of Colleagues.

LIKELY TO QUIT BAIREUTH

Gabrilowitsch Urges Him to Stay Away as Disapproval of 'Brutal' Regime.

Eleven musicians of world fame, headed by Arturo Toscanini, cabled to Chancellor Hitler of Germany yesterday in protest against the persecution of their colleagues in that country for political or religious reasons. Mr. Toscanini's name headed the list of signers at his own request.

It was learned that Mr. Toscanini is considering a withdrawal from his contract to conduct the Wagnerian festival at Baireuth, Germany, this Summer. He has been under pressure from other leaders in the world of music to take such action as a protest against Hitlerism.

The cablegram to Hitler was sent through the office of Berthold Neuer, vice president of the Knabe Piano Company, 584 Fifth Avenue. It was proposed by Artur Bodanzky.

Cablegram Sent to Hitler.

Mr. Neuer said that Mr. Bodanzky came to him on March 22 and asked that he draft a letter to the outstanding musical artists in this country inviting them to sign a cable to protest against the Hitlerite persecutions of musicians, composers and conductors. Eleven artists immediately responded to Mr. Neuer's letter and yesterday the following cablegram was sent:

Chancellor Adolf Hitler,
Berlin, Germany.
Your Excellency:

The undersigned artists who live, and execute their art, in the United States of America feel the moral obligation to appeal to your excellency to put a stop to the persecutions of their colleagues in Germany, for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artist all over the world is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instructions, and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteem Germany, until now, has been enjoying in the eyes of the whole civilized world.

Hoping that our appeal in behalf of our colleagues will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are

Respectfully yours,

Those who signed the cablegram are:

AUTURO TOSCANINI, conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society.
WALTER DAMROSCH, former conductor of the New York Symphony Society.
FRANK DAMROSCH, director of the Institute of Musical Art.
SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony.
ARTUR BODANZKY, conductor of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.
HAROLD BAUER, pianist and president of the Beethoven Association.
OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, conductor of the Detroit Symphony.
ALFRED HERTZ, former conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra.
CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER, composer, of Boston.
FRITZ REINER, former conductor of the Cincinnati and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras.
RUBIN GOLDMARK, New York composer.

"Put My Name at Top" of List.

In responding to Mr. Neuer's letter, Mr. Toscanini declared: "Not only can you use my name, but if there is no objection and if it is possible I would like to have my name at the head of the subscribers of this message."

Mr. Neuer also revealed that Mr. Gabrilowitsch wrote: "I am not enchanted over the idea of addressing as 'your Excellency' a man for whom I have not the slightest respect, neither do I think it quite truthful to say 'We are convinced that such persecutions are not based on your instructions,' whereas in reality I am thoroughly convinced that Hitler is personally responsible for all that is going on in Germany at the present time. I also want to make it clear that I am not in the least bit afraid to add my signature."

The Letter to Toscanini.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch also revealed that he had sent a letter directly to Mr. Toscanini urging him to lend his name to the protest.

"All these protests will remain without any appreciable results," he wrote. "They will not impress the German rulers nor the German nation. There is only one man who could protest effectively. That is you, Maestro Arturo Toscanini.

"Two years ago (1931) when you left Baireuth in disgust and anger you were reported in a newspaper interview as having expressed yourself very sharply against Hitlerism. This year (1933) you are returning to Baireuth when Hitlerism is at the climax of its triumph. Do you not think that this must be interpreted by the whole world as an expression of your approval of Hitlerism?

"It is a mistake to regard Hitlerism merely as an anti-Jewish movement. That, of course, is only one side of it. Hitlerism is a mental attitude which advocates brutal force against liberty. It is the worst side of fascism. The outrageous insults to which you were subjected in Bologna two years ago are an example of that attitude.

"When the Bologna incident happened, the musicians of the whole world expressed their indignation and their sympathy for you. At that time, Koussevitzky refused to direct a concert at La Seala Theatre in Milan. That was his courageous protest. Will you, Maestro, not protest in turn against the insults to which such colleagues of yours as Walter and Busch have been subjected?

"Perhaps you will say that Baireuth is not responsible for Hitler. Maestro, it is well known that Baireuth is one of the centres of extreme German nationalism. It is generally understood that the present inhabitants of Wahnfried are personal friends and admirers of Adolf Hitler. Under those conditions, will you—Arturo Toscanini, the world's most illustrious artist—lend the glamour of your international fame to the Baireuth festival?"

Mr. Bodanzky said that only last Thursday he had received a letter from friends in Germany in which they commented on the "recent insults" upon Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch and then added that only ten days ago the German Symphony and operatic conductor, Otto Kemperer, had been assaulted by Nazi storm troops.

It was believed in music circles here that Mr. Toscanini's signing of the cable meant that he would not go to Baireuth this year. It is believed that he will either be asked by those in charge of the festival to withdraw or that he might take the first step and ask to be relieved of fulfilling his contract.

In May, 1931, Toscanini was attacked and beaten at Bologna, Italy, after he had refused to play the Fascist hymn at a concert in memory of the Italian composer, Martucci, on the ground that it would be entirely out of place on such an occasion.

Ford Urged to Protest.

Aaron Sapiro, the lawyer whose $1,000,000 libel suit against Henry Ford resulted in an apology by the automobile manufacturer to the Jewish people for his attacks upon them in The Dearborn Independent several years ago, telegraphed to Mr. Ford yesterday urging him to cable the German leaders and ask them to do the same as he had done in disavowing his attacks upon the Jews.

James N. Rosenberg, vice chairman of the Joint Distribution Committee, announced that the special meeting of the overseas relief agency at Temple Emanu-El this afternoon will be solely for humanitarian purposes in "amelioration of the world misery of oppressed Jews" and will not have any political purpose.

"What, if anything, we can do, in the face of the overwhelming tragedy now confronting the Jewish people in Germany," he added, "is the immediate problem which confronts us. All we can say is that the efforts of our organization, as always in the past, will be solely to relieve the suffering and despair which engulfs the world."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

R 8 - 1933

Protest Sent to Hitlerites by Musicians

Famous Conductors of Nation Sign Cable Addressed to German Leader

By DENOE LEEDY
The Press Music Editor

REPORTS from Germany telling of the maltreatment of distinguished musicians by the Nazis have resulted in the following cablegram:

Chancellor Hitler,
Berlin, Germany.
Your Excellency:

The undersigned artists, who live and execute their art in the United States of America, feel the moral obligation to appeal to your excellency to put a stop to the persecutions of their colleagues in Germany for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artist all over the world is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instructions and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteem Germany, until now, has been enjoying in the eyes of the whole civilized world.

Hoping that this, our appeal in behalf of our colleagues, will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are,

Respectfully yours,

Arturo Toscanini, Walter Damrosch, Frank Damrosch, Sergei Koussevitzky, Artur Bodanzky, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Charles Martin Loeffler, Fritz Reiner, Rubin Goldmark, Alfred Hertz.

* * *

Important Plea

IT is not the purpose of this reviewer, in printing this statement, to enter into any discussion of the present situation in Germany. But no musician can fail to react to such a plea coming from a group of superlative artists, all of whom have given ample evidence of their integrity, both as men and in the conduct of their art.

The fact that Toscanini joins in this appeal has its dramatic value. He is scheduled to conduct this coming summer at Bayreuth, the Wagnerian shrine, which in spite of all its traditions, seems particularly in need of his ministrations.

If he comes to an impasse with the authorities that be, it will not be the first time. His courage is well known. Two years ago he ran counter to the Fascists. But the Bologna incident served only to raise him anew in the eyes of the world.

At that time Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Orchestra, rallied to his support and refused to conduct a concert at the La Scala Theatre in Milan. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, in his letter beseeching the great Italian to add his name to the signers of the cablegram, recalls this incident.

Perhaps when the reckoning is made it will be seen that the great artists and the universality of the things they have dedicated their lives to, will have played an important part in the establishing of a respectable social order.

* * *

Promenade Concerts

A SPECIAL series of "promenade concerts" will be given next month in Severance Hall by members of the Cleveland Orchestra under direction of Rudolph Ringwall, assistant conductor, it was announced today.

The concert series will run from May 3 to May 30, with seats in the dress circle selling for 50 cents. The concerts will be given Wednesday and Friday nights and Sunday afternoon.

The last matinee performance of the orchestra's current symphony season will be played this afternoon at Severance Hall, when the orchestra repeats the all-Brahms program of last night. Nikolai Sokoloff will conduct the performance. Shortly after the close of the program Mr. Sokoloff leaves Cleveland for New York, where he will take charge of the plans for next year of the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Artur Rodzinski will replace Mr. Sokoloff here next year.

Thes orchestra also will play its final "twilight concert" tomorrow evening at the direction of Mr. Ringwall, assistant.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

APR 2 - 1933

Music Leaders Here Plead for German Artists

Toscanini, Bodanzky and 9 Others Cable Hitler to Condemn Persecutions

Arturo Toscanini and ten other leading conductors and musicians sent yesterday to Chancellor Adolf Hitler a cable dispatch appealing to him to put a stop to persecutions "for political or religious reasons" of their musical colleagues in Germany.

The message was sent as a result of reports coming to this country that Otto Klemperer, Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch had been mistreated by the Nazis. On Thursday Artur Bodanzky, Wagnerian conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Association, received a letter from friends in Germany reporting that Mr. Klemperer had been beaten by Hitlerites on the night after conducting Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." Mr. Klemperer until lately has conducted the State Opera Orchestra in Berlin.

When he heard that Mr. Bodanzky, Berthold Neuer, vice-president of the William Knabe Piano Company, and other persons of prominence in the world of music were framing an appeal to Chancellor Hitler, Mr. Toscanini not only joined the move but asked that his name be put first among those signing the message.

Mr. Toscanini's letter, written from his suite at the Astor on Friday, said:

My Dear Mr. Neuer:

Not only can you use my name, but if there is no objection and if it is possible I would like to have my name at the head of the subscribers of this message. Greetings and compliments from

ARTURO TOSCANINI.

Mr. Toscanini, conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, in heading the appeal to Chancellor Hitler risks whatever political displeasure may come upon him. He is under contract to direct the Wagnerian performances at the Bayreuth Festival in July. While friends expressed fears that the invitation might be revoked as a result of the message, he told his associates that he was "glad" he had spoken with his fellow musicians.

The cablegram to Chancellor Hitler follows:

Chancellor Hitler,
Berlin, Germany,
Your Excellency:

The undersigned artists, who live and execute their art in the United States of America, feel the moral obligation to appeal to your excellency to put a stop to the persecutions of their colleagues in Germany for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artist all over the world is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instructions and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteem Germany, until now, has been enjoying in the eyes of the whole civilized world.

Hoping that this our appeal in behalf of our colleagues will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are,

Respectfully yours,
Arturo Toscanini, Walter Damrosch, Frank Damrosch, Sergei Koussevitzky, Artur Bodanzky, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Charles Martin Loeffler, Fritz Reiner, Rubin Goldmark, Alfred Hertz.

Bruno Walter's Case Cited

Mr. Neuer, friend and adviser of many of the musicians joining in the message, said last night that the appeal was not based alone on the report of indignity to Mr. Klemperer. He made public letters from Mr. Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, reporting "insults" to Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch, and appealing to Mr. Toscanini to lead a protest. The letter to Mr. Toscanini follows:

Maestro Arturo Toscanini,
Hotel Astor,
New York, N. Y.
Dear Maestro:

Everybody is reading with horror and indignation of the recent political events in Germany. As you know, protest meetings are being held everywhere. Messages are being sent to Germany daily by organizations and private individuals expressing disapproval and sharp criticism.

All these protests will remain without any appreciable results. They will not impress the German rulers nor the German nation. There is only one man who could protest effectively. That is you, Maestro Arturo Toscanini.

Two years ago (1931) when you left Bayreuth in disgust and anger, you were reported in a newspaper interview as having expressed very sharply against Hitlerism. This year (1933) you are returning to Bayreuth when Hitlerism is at the climax of its triumph. Do you not think that this must be interpreted by the whole world as an expression of your approval of Hitlerism?

It is a mistake to regard Hitlerism merely as an anti-Jewish movement. That if course is only one side of it. Hitlerism is a mental attitude which advocates brutal force against liberty. It is the worst side of Fascism. The outrageous insults to which you were subjected in Bologna two years ago are an example of that attitude.

When the Bologna incident happened, the musicians of the while world expressed their indignation and their sympathy for you. At that time Koussevitzky refused to direct a concert at La Scala Theatre in Milan. That was his courageous protest. Will you, Maestro, not protest in turn against the insults to which such colleagues of yours as Walter and Busch have been subjected?

Perhaps you will say that Bayreuth is not responsible for Hitler. Maestro, it is well known that Beyreuth is one of the centres of extreme German nationalism. It is generally understood that the present inhabitants of Wahnfried are personal friends and admirers of Adolf Hitler. Under those conditions, will you—Arturo Toscanini, the world's most illustrious artist—lend the glamour of your international fame to the Bayreuth festival?

A decisive protest from you at that time would amount to a great historic fact. The world has a right to expect this noble gesture from you.

Sincerely and admiringly yours,
OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.

The letter from Mr. Gabrilowitsch, coupled with the letter received by Mr. Bodanzky telling of the indignities reputed to have been suffered by Mr. Klemperer, led Mr. Toscanini to head the appeal. The honor of conducting the Wagnerian festival at Bayreuth is one of the highest in the world of music. While he has a contract to perform, Mr. Toscanini decided to act, although he was aware that going ahead might cost him the engagement. Mr. Toscanini refused to see reporters last night because of his concert at Carnegie Hall, but he told Mr. Neuer and other friends that he was going ahead on the theory that he would fulfill the Bayreuth engagement, in spite of the protest message.

"Mr. Toscanini has made no decision not to go to Bayreuth," Mr. Neuer said. "He intends to go, but of course he will have nothing to do with politics while he is there."

At Carnegie Hall last night, Max Smith, a friend of Mr. Toscanini, said that Mr. Toscanini fully expected to go to Bayreuth, but as the festival was still several months away there was always a possibility of something happening which might prevent his trip. It was, Mr. Smith said, "a matter of love" and not money or honor which impelled him to participate in the Wagnerian Festival and he could conceive of nothing which would be permitted to interfered with his plan.

The protest of the musicians may cause Chancellor Hitler annoying personal as well as political problems. The Chancellor is a friend of Frau Winifred Wagner, widow of Siegfried Wagner, the great composer's son. A news dispatch from Leipzig in February 12 quoted a relative of Frau Wagner as saying that the family would "not be surprised to see the couple married at some later date." It was Frau Wagner who, in 1931, persuaded Mr. Toscanini to accept the Bayreuth engagement.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch's letter stressed the importance of Mr. Toscanini's joining the protest, because of the position he holds in the hearts of music-loving Germans generally. The letter follows:

Detroit Symphony Orchestra,
Orchestra Hall, Detroit, Mich.
March 27, 1933.

Mr. Berthold Neuer,
584 Fifth Avenue,
New York, N. Y.
My dear Mr. Neuer:

I have received your letter and your request that I wire you my consent to use my signature under the message which our friend Bodanzky proposes to send jointly with several other American musicians to Adolf Hitler. I am answering you by letter and not by wire, because it is somewhat difficult to put all I have to say on the subject in a telegram.

Bodanzky discussed this plan with me already, a week or two ago when I was in New York, and I told him at that time of several reasons why I did not think that the protest would be of much avail.

Let me say to begin with that I am not particularly enchanted over the idea of addressing as "Your Excellency" a man for whom I have not the slightest respect, nor do I think it quite truthful to say, "We are convinced that such persecutions are not based on your instructions," whereas in reality I am thoroughly convinced that Hitler is personally responsible for all that is going on in Germany at the present time.

However, all this is of minor importance. What is more important is that the names of such men as Damrosch, Bodanzky, Koussevitzky, Stokowski, Reiner, Hertz, Golschman, Stock, Rodzinski, Gabrilowitsch, would mean absolutely nothing to Mr. Hitler. I am certain that most of these names he has never heard. Upon receipt of such a message he would probably turn to one of his officers and say, "Who are these people? Find out something about them." The inquiry would then divulge the fact that seven out of ten of these artists are Jews. Naturally the letter would then wander into the waste basket.

It would be all right if the letter could be published in a series of newspapers in Germany, but this, unfortunately, is not possible because of the censorship prevailing there.

Before I go any further with my remarks, I want to make it clear to you, as well as to Bodanzky, that I am not in the least bit "afraid" to add my signature. In other words, I am not prompted by considerations of expediency or cowardice. You probably remember the violent protest which I made ten years ago during the French invasion of the Ruhr district in Germany, a protest which was widely commented upon in French and German newspapers as well as in the American press. Many people thought me a Don Quixote, but I am glad and proud I did it.

Again, two years ago, when the Toscanini incident happened in Bologna, I expressed myself in an open letter to the newspapers and violently denounced Mussolini. On top of that, I took a trip from Switzerland to Milan to call on Toscanini personally and express my sympathy to him. That trip, coming on top of the publishing of my letter, might have easily resulted in my arrest and deportation from Italy, but I was again willing to take the consequences.

All this is a deviation from the main subject of my letter, but I have found it necessary to inject it so that my remarks may not be misconstrued.

I am now coming to the main point of my letter. While ten of the names which I mentioned a while ago would mean nothing to Hitler, there is one name which would mean everything. That name belongs to a man who is known, revered and respected in Germany as he is elsewhere. It is a name at the sound of which Mr. Hitler would "sit up and take notice." I mean, of course, no other than Arturo Toscanini.

There is only one thing which could impress the world at the present time, and that is if Toscanini would announce in an open letter that he refuse to direct the festival in Bayreuth next summer. Such an announcement would be like a bombshell. In fact, I do not know of anything else that could emanate from any one that would have a similar effect.

Two years ago, when Toscanini left Bayreuth, he expressed himself as disgusted with conditions there and particularly emphasized that he was not in sympathy with Hitler and Hitlerism. I remember reading about this in "The New York Times," as well as in several other papers. If Toscanini still feels that way about Hitler, now is the moment to show it. It is a well known fact that the present inhabitants of Wahnfried are close personal friends and admirers of Hitler. For Toscinini to go to Beyreuth at the present time would be equivalent to an indorsement of Hitlerism.

There is yet another reason why Toscanini should act in this matter. Two years ago, at the time when he was insulted at the hands of the Italian Fascists, virtually all the prominent orchestra conductors in Europe and America expressed their indignation publicly in some way or other. Koussevitzky even went so far as to cancel a concert engagement at the Scala in Milan—a most courageous act on the part of Koussevitzky, since he knew it would probably shut the doors of Italy to him forever.

At the same time Artur Bodanzky also went to Milan and personally presented his respects to Toscanini. This was a courageous act, as Toscanini's house was under police surveillance and every one entering it was subject to suspicion.

This and many other things were done for the sake of Toscanini two years ago. I believe that now it is his turn to do something big when other colleagues of his, such as Bruno Walter and Fritz Busch, have been insulted by the German Fascists.

"I am putting all this quite bluntly in my letter to you today because I want you to discuss it with Bodanzky. He knows Toscanini well and is in a position to speak to him freely. However, if he, for any reason, does not wish to do it single-handed, I would suggest that several of us conductors write a letter to Toscanini and present the plan to him. In that case, I will be only too glad to sign my name.

Cordially yours,
OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.

P. S. I wish to add this. If, upon presenting the facts to Toscanini, he should nevertheless decline to cancel his Bayreuth engagement, then he should at least be invited to join his signature with the other conductors included in Bodanzky's plan. With Toscanini's signature a letter to Hitler such as Bodanzky has devised may not be entirely without effect. Without Toscanini's it would be an empty shell.

Signers Frankly Puzzled

Sponsors of the cablegram of appeal were frankly puzzled at the scope of the Nazi actions, which they deemed hostile to musicians. They said that the followers of Hitler had drawn apparently not only religious but political lines in their unusual manifestations of a new nationalism. Busch, conductor of the Dresden Opera, is of Aryan stock, yet he appears to have been cordially disliked.

On March 8 Dresden dispatches reported that uniformed Nazis "booed" him down as he was conducting a performance of "Rigoletto." A petition recently was drawn by a majority of the opera personnel terming him "artistically unqualified" and requesting that he be prevented from returning to the opera. Bruno Walter's concerts were banned and he is reported now in Amsterdam, saddened by the results of reported Nazi discrimination.

Beyond the reports of these incidents concerning Busch and Walter and the banning of the concert of Mr. Klemperer at the State Opera House on March 24, previous information had been lacking concerning indignities to musicians. Mr. Bodanzky said last night that the letter he had received telling of the beating of Mr. Klemperer came from a friend who had direct information regarding the fact.

He said that for obvious reasons he could not disclose the identity of the writer, but that the letter disclosed that Mr. Klemperer had been attacked by Nazis in evening dress after he had conducted "Missa Solemnis" in a Berlin opera house.

Mr. Bodanzky said that he and other musicians had joined in the appeal in the belief that musicians should not be made to suffer needlessly from religious and political differences in Germany. The cablegram to Chancellor Hitler was filed shortly after noon yesterday, Mr. Neuer said.

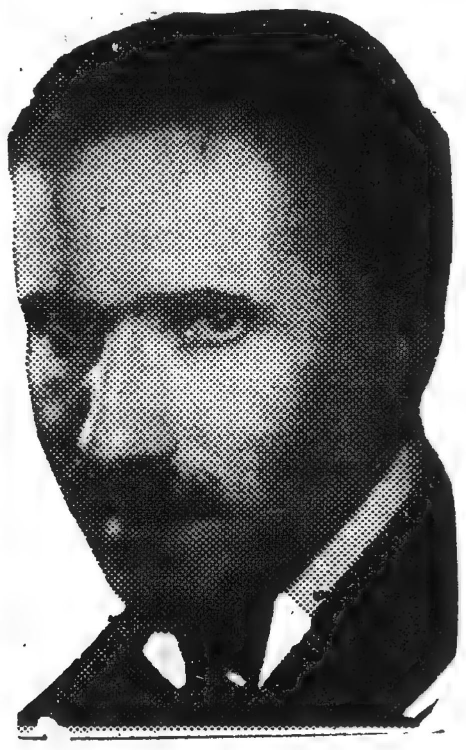
THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

APR 2 - 1933

Prominent Among Musicians Who Cabled Hitler Protest Against Nazi Persecutions

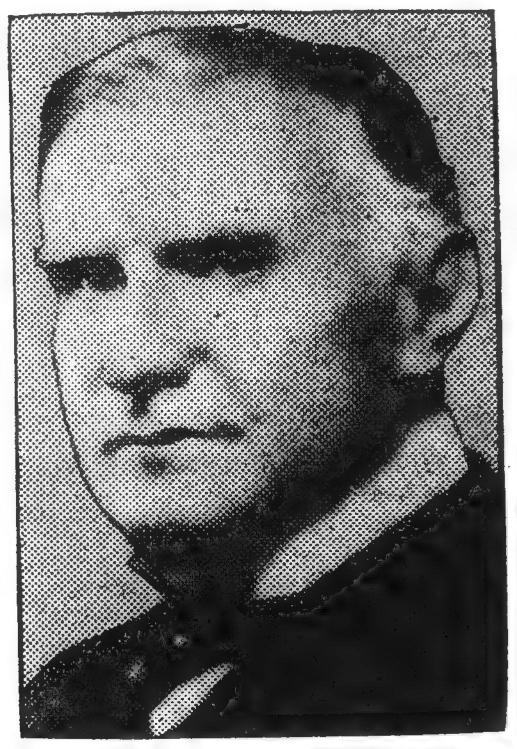
SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra



ARTURO TOSCANINI

Conductor of New York Philharmonic Orchestra



WALTER DAMROSCH

Former Director of New York Symphony Orchestra

Toscanini Joins 10 Other Famous Musicians in Protesting Nazi Treatment of Artist Colleagues

Celebrated Italian Who Was Roughly Treated For Refusing to Play Fascist National Anthem Believed Risking Cancelation of Wagner Festival Contract—Cablegram Addressed to Hitler

New York, April 1—(AP)—Arturo Toscanini, who was trounced two years ago in Italy for refusing to play the Fascist national anthem, jointed 10 other celebrted musicians tonight in cabling to Chancellor Adolf Hitler a protest of the Nazi treatment of artists in Germany.

While the cable made no reference to Toscanini's engagement to act as musical director of the Wagner festival at Baireuth, Ger., next July, correspondence between the other signers of the cable disclosed that some of them sought to have Tosranini cancel the engagement and refuse to go to Germany as a protest.

There have been published reports that the celebrated conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, who is a native of Italy and not a Jew, was considering cancelation of the date.

His friends have represented him as feeling himself duty bound to go to Baireuth, because he has signed a contract.

Tonight, however, some of them said they feared his signature on the cabled protest might lead to a cancellation in Germany of the contract.

Text of Cablegram

The cable read:—
"Chancellor Adolf Hitler,
"Berlin, Ger.,
"Your excellency:—

"The undersigned artists who live and execute their art in the United States of America feel the moral obligation to appeal to your excellency to put a stop to the persecutions of their colleagues in Germany, for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artist all over the world is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

"We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instructions and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteem Germany, until now, has been enjoying in the eyes of the whole civilized world.

(Continued From First Page)

"Hoping that this, our appeal in behalf of our colleagues, will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are,

"Respectfully yours."

The signers, besides Toscanini, were Walter Damrosch, composer and former director of the New York Symphony orchestra; Frank Damrosch, director of the Institute of Musical Art; Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Artur Bodanzky, conductor of the German section of the Metropolitan Opera company; Harold Bauer, famous pianist and president of the Beethoven association; Ossif Gabrilowitsch, famous pianist, son-in-law of Mark Twain and conductor of the Detroit Symphony; Alfred Hertz, former Metropolitan conductor; Charles Martin Loeffler, Boston composer; Fritz Reiner, former Philadelphia conductro, and Rubin Goldmark, composer.

Toscanini Case

When Toscanini was being censured in Italy for refusing to play the Fascist anthem, Gabrilowitsch refused to appear at La Scala as a gesture of protest and sympathy.

In announcing the dispatch of the cable, Berthold Neuer, representative of Bodanzky, said the decision to send it was reachced after New York musicians had received word of widespread "persecution" of artists in Germany.

Two days ago, he said, a letter was received from Germany retailing a long list of steps taken by German authorities, including the dismissal of many musicians from their posts.

The letter also related, he said, how Otto Klemperer, conductor of the Berlin Opera company, had been "beaten up by Nazis." This was the first report of bodily violence to the Germon conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 1 - 1933

Eleven Famous Musicians Ask Hitler Aid Jewish Colleagues

The volume of protest from American quarters against the aggressive measures of the Hitler government was swelled today when eleven world-famous musicians, headed by Arturo Toscanini, cabled an appeal to the German Chancellor on behalf of their colleagues in Germany.

Bodanzky.

Toscanini.

Toscanini, who incurred Fascist displeasure in Italy when he refused to play the Mussolini anthem, asked that his name head the list. Arturo Bodanzky, conductor, organized the protest. He was moved, it was said, by receipt of private advices that Otto Klemperer, conductor of the Berlin Opera Co., had been beaten by Nazi storm troopers ten days ago.

The cable, given out by Berthold Neuer, vice president of the Knabe Piano Co., 584 Fifth Ave., was signed by the following musicians apart from Toscanini and Bodanzky:—

Walter Damrosch, Frank Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Harold Bauer, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Alfred Hertz, Charles Martin Loeffler, Fritz Reimer and Rubin Goldmark.

Significance is added to the protest by the fact that Toscanini is booked to conduct at Beyreuth this July. Two years ago, on his last appearance at the Wagner shrine, he made an oral objection to National Socialist activities.

The text of the cable follows:—

"Chancellor Adolf Hitler, Berlin.

"Your Excellency:—

"The undersigned artists, who live and execute their art in the United States of America, feel the moral obligation to appeal to Your Excellency to put a stop to the persecution of their colleagues in Germany for political or religious reasons. We beg you to consider that the artists, all over the world, is estimated for his talent alone and not for his national or religious convictions.

"We are convinced that such persecutions as take place in Germany at present are not based on your instruction and that it cannot possibly be your desire to damage the high cultural esteen Germany until now has been enjoying in the eye of the whole civilized world.

"Hoping that this, our appeal in behalf of our colleagues will not be allowed to pass unheard, we are respectfully yours."

A program of relief for Jews in Germany will be devised at a conference called for tomorrow at Temple Emanu-El, Fifth Ave. and 65th St., by the Joint Distribution Committee, a Jewish organization similar to the American Red Cross.

"We hope that all right-thinking Germans will sympathize and help in this effort," said Rabbi Jonah B. Wise, of the Central Synagogue, a director.

The Communist party and the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union today announced plans for a mass meeting of protest against the Hitler government on next Wednesday night at Madison Square Garden.

The United German Societies of New York, in answer to a cable to Chancellor Adolf Hitler, received from a spokesman:—

"German Jews will be treated like all other nationals in accordance with their attitude to the national government."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 2 - 1933

THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Its Espousal of Classic Music Under Dr. Davison Really a Return to Traditions of Its Founders.

The Harvard Glee Club is celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary this Spring. Under the direction of Dr. Archibald T. Davison in the past two decades it has achieved especial distinction. The following excerpts from an article by Keith Martin, a former manager of the Harvard Glee Club, are of interest on this occasion.

By KEITH MARTIN.

FOURTEEN years ago the Harvard Glee Club announced to the world that it preferred to sing Brahms instead of barber-shop ballads; Palestrina in place of flat-car songs, and Bach before "The Bull Frog on the Bank." The world would not believe its eyes, and said so. In the first place, said the world, it is impossible for college men to sing high-brow music, and in the second place young men would not stand for such an unnatural breach of traditions. What traditions?

Perhaps it is well to point out that this same glee club which is accused of falling from collegiate grace was founded seventy-five years ago this Spring, for the avowed purpose of "acquainting the college with good choral music." B. W. Crowninshield, president of the Pierian Sodality of 1808 (the Harvard orchestra), was the prime mover in the enterprise.

* * *

In 1911 Dr. Archibald T. Davison was appointed faculty adviser for the glee club. Dr. Davison had been graduated from Harvard in music in 1906 and obtained his doctor's degree in 1908 and followed this training with study abroad. In 1909 he entered the college faculty and became conductor of the college chapel choir in 1910. The fact that many members of the glee club were also singers in the choir made it easy for Dr. Davison to help the entire club in gaining the knowledge and experience in fine music which resulted in 1919 in the complete divorce of the glee club from popular music.

Thus, for the men singing in the glee club in 1919, the decision to sing only the best choral music was a matter of emphasis, not of innovation. And it would be unfair to the founders of the glee club not to reiterate that their purpose in the Spring of 1858 was to promote "a taste for music in the college," and that Mozart, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, and other valuable composers found important places on even the earliest programs. Mayo Shattuck, Carlton Fuller and Howard Hinners, the officers who led the club into its present policy, were truer to a tried tradition, the tradition of great music, than to the passing predilections of a generation of college men who are the fathers of today.

* * *

As early as November, 1919, before the club had become an accepted fact in the musical world, interest in a trip abroad for it had been awakened by friends of music in Harvard. Within a year the idea crystallized and invitations from the French and Italian Governments had been received. By June, 1921, the financial problems involved in the undertaking were solved by the generosity of interested circles abroad and in the United States. The club left New York on June 11 and began a tour which included twenty-three concerts in thirteen cities of France and Italy. The value of the widespread approval of the club's performances in Europe need not be dwelt upon here. The club sang the greatest choral music in its source and came away with great credit.

Before 1925 the club's series in Symphony Hall had become major events of the Boston musical season and the tours were a marked success. The club frequently sang with such soloists as Pablo Casals, Fritz Kreisler, Frieda Hempel, Louise Homer and many other artists of equal stature. But achievement in male choral singing, the proof that college men could and would sing good music well, did not satisfy either the members or Dr. Davison. Gradually more and more cooperation and combined singing with the Radcliffe College Choral Society opened for the Harvard men grander pages of choral music. The next step was logical—union with the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of major works for chorus and orchestra. Though the first combined performance of the three organizations took place in 1917 in a presentation of Beethoven's Ninth symphony under the direction of Karl Muck, such collaboration did not become a regular feature of the season until 1924. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, since then, has made frequent use of the two groups of young singers. In the last eight years the Harvard Glee Club has appeared more than thirty-five times in conjunction with the Boston Orchestra, and in 1931 came to New York to sing Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" under Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra for the League of Composers. Though the club has sung works of Beethoven, Brahms, Stravinsky, Holst and others, perhaps its crowning achievement came in the performances in 1931 and 1932 of Bach's great and difficult Mass in B minor. Of these events H. T. Parker wrote: "It was choral singing unsurpassed at Symphony Hall in this generation, unmatched in these days in America in any performance of the B minor Mass."

* * *

Yet with all its excursions into these fields, the Harvard Glee Club has not given up its first principle, the principle most dear to the hearts of its members and its conductor—that is, to sing for the sake of singing, because there is enjoyment, solace and relaxation in song. Thus, the three rehearsals each week are the most important club activities. At the beginning of each year the director personally tests the voice of each candidate for range and quality. Usually from 100 to 150 newcomers appear for these trials. Seldom are more than one or two refused further opportunity. Those men whose voices are suitable—and nearly any true voice is welcome—are notified that they may appear at the regular practices of the entire club and they are joined with the veteran members. For a period of five or six weeks in the Fall the older singers and the candidates rehearse together the program for the season. The new singers are instructed and drilled in the technique of choral singing. After a month the candidates form quartets and perform two or three numbers before the executive committee and the director. Thus, each man must demonstrate his mastery of the necessary technique, his ability to follow the conductor and his surety of pitch without the aid of other men singing his part. A ranking grade is given each candidate, and those who fail to obtain a certain degree of competence are refused admission for the season, but are given advice and help with another trial in view. Another group, slightly more successful, is placed on a probationary list and is permitted to join in the practices but is not allowed to sing in concert until after the condition has been removed. The unconditioned men are then admitted to singing membership in the club and at the close of the season are made elected members if they have participated sufficiently in the club's activities.

* * *

In Dr. Davison himself is found the spirit of the Harvard Glee Club. He is not a master who has led his charges by force. Rather has he attracted them along the paths which they themselves chose and which he as a consummate musician and an uncompromising artist knows so well. There is a great deal of love for music among Harvard men. That may be because of the Harvard Glee Club in a measure. Certainly the proximity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other attractions of Symphony Hall are great elements in this "phenomenon." Each year Dr. Davison has a fertile field—sometimes as many as two hundred and fifty men in which to sow the best music under such conditions.

When the glee club closes its season with a banquet, in place of speakers it calls on "Doc" Davison to lead them in singing. Never does music speak more meetly on the tongues of men than when these young men pause, before breaking up years of association together, to pay to their unity in song a final tribute in song.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 3 - 1933

Bettoney Funeral.

Funeral services for Fred Bettoney, member of Boston Symphony orchestra, were held from the Universalist church Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Relatives and friends and a delegation from the Boston Symphony orchestra were present. Rev. Luther Morris, pastor of the Universalist church, officiated, and Reuben L. Willis presided at the organ. Burial was in Evergreen cemetery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 4 1933

Music Notes

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra later in the month will sponsor a series of concerts in Boston in observance of the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms. A feature of the celebration will be the appearance of Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist in the two-piano concertos.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 6 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky Assist Mr. Downes in the Last of His Lecture Recitals . . on the Enjoyment of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussewitsky, assisted Mr. Olin Downes at the Academy of Music last night in his concluding lecture recital (or concert, to draw a distinction proper in this case) on "The Enjoyment of Music." The program announced the topic of the evening as "The Modern Orchestra and the Evolution of the Symphony," but actually what Mr. Downes in his remarks and the orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky in their musical illustrations attempted to do was to sketch the evolution of the orchestra and orchestral forms, the symphony excepted, from the time of Gluck to that of Richard Strauss. Naturally, they succeeded in their purpose only after a fashion, though that they succeeded at all is perhaps the wonderful thing, considering the magnitude and scope of their undertaking.

Mr. Downes opened the season with a tribute to the Boston orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky. Thereafter, dispensing with detail, he brushed in the background of his subject, spoke of the orchestra as one of the supreme achievements of a man's creative imagination and ingenuity, and concluded with brief historical and descriptive comments on each of the works appearing on the first half of the musical program—the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," employing a relatively small orchestra, an instrument crude and undeveloped in comparison with that which later composers found ready at hand, yet achieving a maximum clarity and poignancy of expression; Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusic" for strings, in which Mr. Downes suggested that his listeners might discern the embryo of the symphony; Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, representing a step forward in the development of orchestral resource and of the form of the symphonic poem, which Beethoven anticipated by epitomizing the drama of "Fidelio," outlining its argument, so to speak, in this prelude to it.

Later, jumping forward the better part of a century, Mr. Downes spoke of Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" as an example of the modern symphonic poem, extolled the grandure of Strauss' Nietzschean conception and the genius with which he realized it in music which combines elemental sweep and power with a high degree of intellectual and emotional complexity and subtlety. A final estimate of the composer's achievement in this score has yet to be made, Mr. Downes informed his audience—with the implication, however, that when arrived at it will place "Zarathustra" among the great masterpieces of the modern period. Less essential to the listener's enlightenment was Mr. Downes' rather lengthy literary and musical analysis of what might be called the plot of the tone-poem, for this the program notes also supplied, to be read at leisure during the intermission.

Mr. Downes' tribute to the Boston orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky was amply justified by the performances which they gave during the evening. The orchestra is, indeed, a fine one—musician for musician, as Mr. Downes remarked, the peer of any in the world today—and Mr. Koussewitsky's abilities, or more correctly, talents, are not to be minimized. Their collaboration last evening was must successful in the Gluck overture and the Mozart suite, least so in the Beethoven and Strauss, which tempted the conductor to exaggerations and eccentricities of tempo and accent and phrasing. The Gluck, however, was beautifully played, paced and spaced with dignity and a classic sense of proportion and style and a deep feeling for the implications of the music. As for Mozart's serenade, in the performance of this the audience took special delight, as well it might, for it was the epitome of grace and elegance, of eighteenth century refinement in line and hue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

APR 6 - 1933

Boston Symphony Heard In Olin Downes Series

Serge Koussevitzky Directs in Brooklyn Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, began its last New York visit of the season with a concert last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music as the last event in Olin Downes's "Enjoyment of Music" course of lecture-concerts. The program, illustrating Mr. Downes's remarks on "The Modern Orchestra and the Evolution of the Symphony," included Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Mozart's serenade, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The mellowness and sonority of tone evoked by the Bostonian strings in the still verdant Gluck overture was one delectable feature of the concert; another was the opportunity to hear "Zarathustra," one of the less often played of Strauss's tone poems. This has had only two Manhattan hearings since 1929, one at the Stadium in the summer of 1930 and the other in a philadelphia Orchestra concert under Fritz Reiner in January of last year.

"Zarathustra" has its unevennesses in potency of inspiration, but yet includes some of the most vivid and imposing music ever penned by Strauss, such as the memorable portrayal of the sunrise in the opening measures. The well executed performance under Mr. Koussevitzky did ample justice to this epic exordium. One might have preferred a more heaven-storming climax for the dance song, although the corresponding Nietzsche excerpt quoted by Philip Hale makes this a relatively intimate affair—still, there is something to be said for a dance rising to virtually cosmic proportions before the Night Wanderer's Song heralds the close.

The Boston Symphony will close its regular Brooklyn series tomorrow night. In 1933-'34, it will give a Brooklyn series of five concerts on dates corresponding to this season's, and also reappear in Mr. Downes's course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 6 - 1933

Music Notes

Igor Markevitch, whose "Rebus" is introduced to us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this evening, is one of the youngest of the Russian composers. He was born at Kiev, July 27, 1912. He lived for a time in Switzerland, at Vevey, but now makes his home in Paris.

The late Serge de Diaghilev ordered a ballet from him. If "Rebus" was originally intended for Diaghilev, it now bears the sub-title "An Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra." The composer conducted in Paris the first performance anywhere December 15, 1931.

* * *

Saturday afternoon a suite by the French composer Albert Roussel will be performed for us in the same hall by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians. This suite, consisting of a prelude, a sarabande and a gigue, is a modern restatement of classical forms.

It was composed in 1926 and brought out at Boston January 21, 1927. It is said that while writing this work the composer had no literary program in mind, that it is "pure music." The score is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky.

L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 2 - 1933

THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Its Espousal of Classic Music Under Dr. Davison Really a Return to Traditions of Its Founders.

The Harvard Glee Club is celebrating its seventy-fifth anniversary this Spring. Under the direction of Dr. Archibald T. Davison in the past two decades it has achieved especial distinction. The following excerpts from an article by Keith Martin, a former manager of the Harvard Glee Club, are of interest on this occasion.

By KEITH MARTIN.

FOURTEEN years ago the Harvard Glee Club announced to the world that it preferred to sing Brahms instead of barber-shop ballads; Palestrina in place of flat-car songs, and Bach before "The Bull Frog on the Bank." The world would not believe its eyes, and said so. In the first place, said the world, it is impossible for college men to sing high-brow music, and in the second place young men would not stand for such an unnatural breach of traditions. What traditions?

Perhaps it is well to point out that this same glee club which is accused of falling from collegiate grace was founded seventy-five years ago this Spring, for the avowed purpose of "acquainting the college with good choral music." B. W. Crowninshield, president of the Pierian Sodality of 1808 (the Harvard orchestra), was the prime mover in the enterprise.

* * *

In 1911 Dr. Archibald T. Davison was appointed faculty adviser for the glee club. Dr. Davison had been graduated from Harvard in music in 1906 and obtained his doctor's degree in 1908 and followed this training with study abroad. In 1909 he entered the college faculty and became conductor of the college chapel choir in 1910. The fact that many members of the glee club were also singers in the choir made it easy for Dr. Davison to help the entire club in gaining the knowledge and experience in fine music which resulted in 1919 in the complete divorce of the glee club from popular music.

Thus, for the men singing in the glee club in 1919, the decision to sing only the best choral music was a matter of emphasis, not of innovation. And it would be unfair to the founders of the glee club not to reiterate that their purpose in the Spring of 1858 was to promote "a taste for music in the college," and that Mozart, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, and other valuable composers found important places on even the earliest programs. Mayo Shattuck, Carlton Fuller and Howard Hinners, the officers who led the club into its present policy, were truer to a tried tradition, the tradition of great music, than to the passing predilections of a generation of college men who are the fathers of today.

* * *

As early as November, 1919, before the club had become an accepted fact in the musical world, interest in a trip abroad for it had been awakened by friends of music in Harvard. Within a year the idea crystallized and invitations from the French and Italian Governments had been received. By June, 1921, the financial problems involved in the undertaking were solved by the generosity of interested circles abroad and in the United States. The club left New York on June 11 and began a tour which included twenty-three concerts in thirteen cities of France and Italy. The value of the widespread approval of the club's performances in Europe need not be dwelt upon here. The club sang the greatest choral music in its source and came away with great credit.

Before 1925 the club's series in Symphony Hall had become major events of the Boston musical season and the tours were a marked success. The club frequently sang with such soloists as Pablo Casals, Fritz Kreisler, Frieda Hempel, Louise Homer and many other artists of equal stature. But achievement in male choral singing, the proof that college men could and would sing good music well, did not satisfy either the members or Dr. Davison. Gradually more and more cooperation and combined singing with the Radcliffe College Choral Society opened for the Harvard men grander pages of choral music. The next step was logical—union with the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of major works for chorus and orchestra. Though the first combined performance of the three organizations took place in 1917 in a presentation of Beethoven's Ninth symphony under the direction of Karl Muck, such collaboration did not become a regular feature of the season until 1924. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, since then, has made frequent use of the two groups of young singers. In the last eight years the Harvard Glee Club has appeared more than thirty-five times in conjunction with the Boston Orchestra, and in 1931 came to New York to sing Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" under Stokowski with the Philadelphia Orchestra for the League of Composers. Though the club has sung works of Beethoven, Brahms, Stravinsky, Holst and others, perhaps its crowning achievement came in the performances in 1931 and 1932 of Bach's great and difficult Mass in B minor. Of these events H. T. Parker wrote: "It was choral singing unsurpassed at Symphony Hall in this generation, unmatched in these days in America in any performance of the B minor Mass."

* * *

Yet with all its excursions into these fields, the Harvard Glee Club has not given up its first principle, the principle most dear to the hearts of its members and its conductor—that is, to sing for the sake of singing, because there is enjoyment, solace and relaxation in song. Thus, the three rehearsals each week are the most important club activities. At the beginning of each year the director personally tests the voice of each candidate for range and quality. Usually from 100 to 150 newcomers appear for these trials. Seldom are more than one or two refused further opportunity. Those men whose voices are suitable—and nearly any true voice is welcome—are notified that they may appear at the regular practices of the entire club and they are joined with the veteran members. For a period of five or six weeks in the Fall the older singers and the candidates rehearse together the program for the season. The new singers are instructed and drilled in the technique of choral singing. After a month the candidates form quartets and perform two or three numbers before the executive committee and the director. Thus, each man must demonstrate his mastery of the necessary technique, his ability to follow the conductor and his surety of pitch without the aid of other men singing his part. A ranking grade is given each candidate, and those who fail to obtain a certain degree of competence are refused admission for the season, but are given advice and help with another trial in view. Another group, slightly more successful, is placed on a probationary list and is permitted to join in the practices but is not allowed to sing in concert until after the condition has been removed. The unconditioned men are then admitted to singing membership in the club and at the close of the season are made elected members if they have participated sufficiently in the club's activities.

* * *

In Dr. Davison himself is found the spirit of the Harvard Glee Club. He is not a master who has led his charges by force. Rather has he attracted them along the paths which they themselves chose and which he as a consummate musician and an uncompromising artist knows so well. There is a great deal of love for music among Harvard men. That may be because of the Harvard Glee Club in a measure. Certainly the proximity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other attractions of Symphony Hall are great elements in this "phenomenon." Each year Dr. Davison has a fertile field—sometimes as many as two hundred and fifty men in which to sow the best music under such conditions.

When the glee club closes its season with a banquet, in place of speakers it calls on "Doc" Davison to lead them in singing. Never does music speak more meetly on the tongues of men than when these young men pause, before breaking up years of association together, to pay to their unity in song a final tribute in song.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 3 - 1933

Bettoney Funeral.

Funeral services for Fred Bettoney, member of Boston Symphony orchestra, were held from the Universalist church Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Relatives and friends and a delegation from the Boston Symphony orchestra were present. Rev. Luther Morris, pastor of the Universalist church, officiated, and Reuben L. Willis presided at the organ. Burial was in Evergreen cemetery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 4 1933

Music Notes

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra later in the month will sponsor a series of concerts in Boston in observance of the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms. A feature of the celebration will be the appearance of Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist in the two-piano concertos.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 6 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky Assist Mr. Downes in the Last of His Lecture Recitals . . on the Enjoyment of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussewitsky, assisted Mr. Olin Downes at the Academy of Music last night in his concluding lecture recital (or concert, to draw a distinction proper in this case) on "The Enjoyment of Music." The program announced the topic of the evening as "The Modern Orchestra and the Evolution of the Symphony," but actually what Mr. Downes in his remarks and the orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky in their musical illustrations attempted to do was to sketch the evolution of the orchestra and orchestral forms, the symphony excepted, from the time of Gluck to that of Richard Strauss. Naturally, they succeeded in their purpose only after a fashion, though that they succeeded at all is perhaps the wonderful thing, considering the magnitude and scope of their undertaking.

Mr. Downes opened the season with a tribute to the Boston orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky. Thereafter, dispensing with detail, he brushed in the background of his subject, spoke of the orchestra as one of the supreme achievements of a man's creative imagination and ingenuity, and concluded with brief historical and descriptive comments on each of the works appearing on the first half of the musical program—the overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," employing a relatively small orchestra, an instrument crude and undeveloped in comparison with that which later composers found ready at hand, yet achieving a maximum clarity and poignancy of expression; Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusic" for strings, in which Mr. Downes suggested that his listeners might discern the embryo of the symphony; Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, representing a step forward in the development of orchestral resource and of the form of the symphonic poem, which Beethoven anticipated by epitomizing the drama of "Fidelio," outlining its argument, so to speak, in this prelude to it.

Later, jumping forward the better part of a century, Mr. Downes spoke of Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" as an example of the modern symphonic poem, extolled the grandure of Strauss' Nietzschean conception and the genius with which he realized it in music which combines elemental sweep and power with a high degree of intellectual and emotional complexity and subtlety. A final estimate of the composer's achievement in this score has yet to be made, Mr. Downes informed his audience—with the implication, however, that when arrived at it will place "Zarathustra" among the great masterpieces of the modern period. Less essential to the listener's enlightenment was Mr. Downes' rather lengthy literary and musical analysis of what might be called the plot of the tone-poem, for this the program notes also supplied, to be read at leisure during the intermission.

Mr. Downes' tribute to the Boston orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky was amply justified by the performances which they gave during the evening. The orchestra is, indeed, a fine one—musician for musician, as Mr. Downes remarked, the peer of any in the world today—and Mr. Koussewitsky's abilities, or more correctly, talents, are not to be minimized. Their collaboration last evening was must successful in the Gluck overture and the Mozart suite, least so in the Beethoven and Strauss, which tempted the conductor to exaggerations and eccentricities of tempo and accent and phrasing. The Gluck, however, was beautifully played, paced and spaced with dignity and a classic sense of proportion and style and a deep feeling for the implications of the music. As for Mozart's serenade, in the performance of this the audience took special delight, as well it might, for it was the epitome of grace and elegance, of eighteenth century refinement in line and hue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

APR 6 - 1933

Boston Symphony Heard In Olin Downes Series

Serge Koussevitzky Directs in Brooklyn Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, began its last New York visit of the season with a concert last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music as the last event in Olin Downes's "Enjoyment of Music" course of lecture-concerts. The program, illustrating Mr. Downes's remarks on "The Modern Orchestra and the Evolution of the Symphony," included Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Mozart's serenade, "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The mellowness and sonority of tone evoked by the Bostonian strings in the still verdant Gluck overture was one delectable feature of the concert; another was the opportunity to hear "Zarathustra," one of the less often played of Strauss's tone poems. This has had only two Manhattan hearings since 1929, one at the Stadium in the summer of 1930 and the other in a philadelphia Orchestra concert under Fritz Reiner in January of last year.

"Zarathustra" has its unevennesses in potency of inspiration, but yet includes some of the most vivid and imposing music ever penned by Strauss, such as the memorable portrayal of the sunrise in the opening measures. The well executed performance under Mr. Koussevitzky did ample justice to this epic exordium. One might have preferred a more heaven-storming climax for the dance song, although the corresponding Nietzsche excerpt quoted by Philip Hale makes this a relatively intimate affair—still, there is something to be said for a dance rising to virtually cosmic proportions before the Night Wanderer's Song heralds the close.

The Boston Symphony will close its regular Brooklyn series tomorrow night. In 1933-'34, it will give a Brooklyn series of five concerts on dates corresponding to this season's, and also reappear in Mr. Downes's course.

—E. D. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 6 - 1933

Music Notes

Igor Markevitch, whose "Rebus" is introduced to us by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this evening, is one of the youngest of the Russian composers. He was born at Kiev, July 27, 1912. He lived for a time in Switzerland, at Vevey, but now makes his home in Paris.

The late Serge de Diaghilev ordered a ballet from him. If "Rebus" was originally intended for Diaghilev, it now bears the sub-title "An Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra." The composer conducted in Paris the first performance anywhere December 15, 1931.

* * *

Saturday afternoon a suite by the French composer Albert Roussel will be performed for us in the same hall by Mr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians. This suite, consisting of a prelude, a sarabande and a gigue, is a modern restatement of classical forms.

It was composed in 1926 and brought out at Boston January 21, 1927. It is said that while writing this work the composer had no literary program in mind, that it is "pure music." The score is dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky.

L. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 2 - 1933

IGOR MARKEVITCH'S "REBUS."

Igor Markevitch's "Rebus," which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky will play for the first time anywhere at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, is the work of one of the most gifted of the younger Russian composers. Markevitch resides in Paris. He is 19 years old. He wrote a piano concerto for Diaghileff four years ago which he now considers "immature and derivative" (as, at the mature age of 15, it might excusably be). There followed a concerto grosso and a partita for piano and orchestra.

The "Rebus" was conceived originally as a ballet suite. A commentator familiar with the score remarked of it: "Certainly it is fortunate that the ballet idea disappeared, for no ballet suite could have been written with the formal architecture and close logical development which characterizes this child's music. "The work consists of about half a dozen movements. It is said to develop rhythmically, the original rhythmical germ (stated in the introductory piece) "sprouting and evolving in many different rhythmical shapes," and contrapuntally, with "astonishing boldness, certainty and resource."

Its tonal language is described as a very modern tongue, "but one which uses polytonality and polyharmony as naturally as one would use three-syllable words, and never with a forgetfulness or negation of tonality."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 7 - 1933

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Plays New Suite.

BY OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, opened its concert last night in Carnegie Hall with the first American performance of the ballet music of Igor Markevitch, "Rebus." Markevitch is a young Parisianized Russian. He is close to the literary arriviste, Jean Cocteau. The late Serge Diaghileff ordered of him a ballet, a fact in itself signified Markevitch's arrival in the Parisian artistic world. He was last Summer interested in a ballet for the Russian dancer Lifar. No doubt the Princess de Polignac has included him among her lions. The suite, "Rebus," has the accent, the atmosphere, of musical Paris of the present day.

The audience received this music very well. It is a very clever piece of writing and no question about it. This commentator had the privilege of hearing Mr. Markevitch play his music, as badly as only a composer can, last Spring in Paris, and he was impressed. The rhythmic skeleton of the piece seemed very strong and clear, of cumulative action and interest. The orchestration, on score paper, looked very promising.

Some of these impressions were confirmed last night. Others were altered by the superb orchestral performance. Under these circumstances the composition was heard for the first time as a unit, with its details given their light and shade and their actual perspective.

And this just perspective was not unconditionally to the advantage of the composition. It has considerable "go" and youthful animation and temperament. It is entirely a study in rhythms. There is no musical nugget. We are presented with the somewhat mathematical proposition of the "Rebus," and we behold the composer's ingenious and dexterous solution.

As far as it goes, the treatment is effective. It is also derivative. Honegger's locomotive and fragments of Stravinsky percolate through many measures. When all is said and done, the piece is very empty. It is in a mode that has already gone stale, which is the cruelest thing that can be said of a young Parisian composer.

Has Markevitch more than a quick head, a facile pen, an imitative faculty? If music is more than an exercise in the development of rhythms, then it is necessary to wait till this precocious youth of 21 finds in himself something that he wants to say and also a melodic manner of saying it. As it stands, the "Rebus" is "amusing," that is to say, smart, and as hard and hollow as paste diamonds.

The great music that came later threw this rather self-evident fact into the stronger relief. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on the old theme of Thomas Tallis is one of the most original and beautiful pieces of music which have come from modern England or, indeed, from any contemporaneous school of composition, and it served to set forth the glories of the string choir of the orchestra. The climax of the concert was the Brahms symphony.

symphony before in New York, and so have other conductors. His reading last night was nobly proportioned, exalted and heroic in spirit. If personal impressions are reliable, it has grown in architectural proportion and in great classic line. Or it may be that a listener has grown in his perception of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation. At any event, the performance of last night revealed the great symphony at its full stature, and in manifold details it presented a unity and plasticity of conception that had irresistible eloquence.

Also conspicuous was the beauty of the orchestral coloring, which showed again that it was not Brahms's orchestration but many conductors' misunderstanding of that orchestration which originated the cry that Brahms was cold, thick, colorless in his scoring. At the end of the performance the audience burst into applause and cheers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 7 - 1933

Rebus Ballet Triumphs In Debut Here

Carnegie Hall Cheers Composition in U. S. Premiere.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IT isn't often that one of the ultramodernists of music stirs a local symphony concert audience not only to applause but likewise to cheers; yet just that happened in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony introduced Igor Markevitch and his "Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra" entitled "Rebus" to America. The novelty by this Russian of 19 promptly captured the crowded house, and loud and long was the rejoicing.

Sweeping Power in Music.

There was such an acid cleanness to the music, such transparency and balance to the orchestration, such a keen feeling for instrumental timbre, and such a glorious stampede of interlocking rhythms that the most obdurate listener must have been carried away in spite of himself. One had a childlike joy in the chirping of crickets, in the cat's meow, in the vastly swelling chatter of the climax, also in the lryic intervals. And the "Fugue of the Vices" was a gorgeous affair.

Markevitch seems originally to have intended this work for the Diaghilev Ballets Russes, but it is no more in need of visual realization than is Schumann's "Carnaval" or that supreme "apotheosis of the dance," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The youthful composer has provided our imaginations with all the material they need.

Solution in French Proverb.

The ballet is in six sections—"Prelude," "Dance of Poverty," "Jig of the Noses," "Variations of the Steps," "Fugue of the Vices" and "Parade." The solution of the rebus is found in the French proverb "Poverty is not a vice," which in these piping times is one more reason for taking to the work. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a splendid account of it.

The program offered further Vaughan Williams' beautiful modal "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for String Orchestra," which, expressively read, displayed the richness of the Bostonian strings, and, finally, the C minor symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE

APR 7 - 1933

SWEET MUSIC.

Bituminous—Why, black boy, when our bugler blows "taps" you would think the Boston Symphony orchestra was playing.

Anthracite—H'm, dat ain't nothin'. When our bugler blows "chow" I looks at dem beans on mah plate and says, "Strawberries stop making that fus, you is kicking all the whipped cream off mah plate."—West Virginia Mountaineer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

APR 7 - 1933

In the World of Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First American Performance of Markevitch's "Rebus" Ballet

SOMEBODY'S solitary hiss in Carnegie Hall last night was swiftly swept into inaudibility by a prolonged outburst of applause at the end of the first American performance of "Rebus: an Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra," by Igor Markevitch, who is a Russian composer of twenty now living at Paris, where he has become a darling of the salon and a favorite among those sophisticated groups which find amusement in the discovery of composers that are different.

It is a safe guess that the volume of applause was not a true expression of opinion on the composition as music. Those who applauded at all applauded with gusto and their hands sounded larger than the average. A great many did not applaud at all. They just waited, dolefully smiling. The old-timers, who keep on attending concerts because of their attachment to music which has outlasted the composer, have about ceased to hope that any new compositions will delight their ears and hearts as the older ones do. They are resigned. They just wait until the novelties are done with, taking comfort in the belief that "first performance" also may mean "only performance."

For some time the jig-saw puzzle makers have been reproducing paintings. The work of many an artist appears in pieces within a box. Now Mr. Markevitch has put the rebus into music and given concert audiences the problem of why he did it and what it means. A key, using the word in relation to puzzles rather than music, is provided in the titles of the movements. Put them together and they make the French proverb, "Poverty is not a vice." And this provides opportunity for sarcasm at the expense of young Mr. Markevitch. For poverty of ideas and of spiritual conceptions is certainly a vice in a composer, or at any rate a serious shortcoming.

In general this "Rebus" is another display of energy, of mean, sterile themes driven impetuously through machine rhythms which hold the attention by intensity of motion, not by any inner grace or reason. The composition has the fierce monotony of a machine shop and the composer has placed himself alongside those composers who put forth tonal impressions of iron foundries and raging locomotives.

The performance of "Rebus" is quite another matter. It represented an astonishing waste of industry, musicianship and interpretive care. Much of the applause, no doubt, was for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, and in this fact there is excuse for pointing out an interesting reversal of the relationship of composer and orchestra.

In Beethoven's time the orchestras were so bad that audiences could not tell how good the composer's work was. Nowadays orchestras are so good that audiences cannot tell how bad the composer's work is. Ernest Newman points out that the first Beethoven audiences must be forgiven for caring little for his symphonies because they never really heard them. Perhaps audiences should be forgiven for applauding some current compositions because they hear so much more than the compositions themselves.

The ugliness of "Rebus" last night was partly mitigated by the beauty of the Boston strings—instruments created to produce agreeable sounds and not to join in such a riot of dissonance.

Also evidence in support of this attitude concerning the purposes of orchestral instruments was given abundantly in Ralph Vaughan Williams's fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. This composition is in keeping with the older definition of music. The pious Thomas Tallis, however, musing in the Chapel Royal that Henry VIII visited, might have dreamed of hearing such celestial playing in heaven, but he scarcely would have supposed that ever in an earthly concert hall men could know such an exuberance of orchestral splendor and richness as the Boston orchestra displayed last night.

It would be a pleasure to praise at length the performance of the First Symphony of Brahms. It was superb, but this is not news, therefore words are superfluous. Authoritative and unified and highly developed performances of such major works are usual with the Boston orchestra.

Reverting to "Rebus," it seems safe to assume that the present generation of concertgoers will not care for it much. If in days to come it is ranked as important music, well and good. It was so with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. One faction saw in it only "an untamed striving for singularity...strange modulations and violent transitions." Reviewers of his day are remembered now principally because they predicted oblivion for Beethoven's symphonies. Therefore, if the reviewer today expresses disdain for this "Rebus," it may be assumed that he has the sly hope that by so doing his name will be mentioned by some commentator of the distant future!

HENRY BECKETT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

PR 7 - 1933

Festivals Further Afield.

MUSICIANS with time and funds to travel yet farther than Cincinnati to feast their ears may take note of the Boston orchestra's celebration of the centenary of the birth of Johannes Brahms, which happy event befell on May 7, 1833.

Unable to coincide exactly with the centenary, Dr. Koussevitzky is devoting five concerts in the final week of April to that composer. The first, second and fourth symphonies are to be presented, the Haydn variations, the Academic Festival overture, the double concerto for violin and cello, the B-flat piano concerto, sundry chamber works. Soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McCloskey, baritone; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; various members of the orchestra.

Incidentally the program containing the overture, the piano concerto and the first symphony, is to be broadcast on the evening of April 29.

* * *

ALLURING pamphlets come to hand with dates and details of the Vienna Festival, May 28 to June 18, and of the Salzburg Festival, July 28 to Aug. 31.

Great works and great performers are listed by the score, but dates and places are both so distant from this metropolis that it seems vain to devote newspaper space here and now to their repetition.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. JOURNAL

APR 7 - 1933

Music

Koussevitzky Plays 'Rebus'

By Irving Weil

For the past two years or so Paris, which takes so fondly to sensations in its musical life, has been adulating a Russian youngster of 19 or 20 as a new Mozart, a new Schubert. He is Igor Markevitch, but his reputation abroad has not penetrated these States. Last night at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, ever a pioneer as well as a friend of the young men, introduced some of the Russian's music.

The piece presented was a ballet suite called "Rebus," not because it is a musical puzzle to the listener—although there is enough to make him wonder a bit at this green fruit—but because the key-words of its central four movements hold the solution in the French proverb, "Pauvrete n'est pas vice" ("Poverty is not a vice.")

The remarkable part about Markevitch's career—if one can call the brief activities of a youngster like him a career—is that all his friends who are influential and many, and include that discoverer of genius around every corner, Henry Prunieres, are so sure about his supreme talent that they haven't bothered much to consider his meagre output of music.

Scarcely Mozartish

All one knows about is the piece, "Rebus"; a piano concerto; a "cantata" for soprano, male choir and orchestra; a concerto grosso for orchestra, a serenade for violin, clarinet and bassoon (very indifferently played here at the new school about a year ago); a suite for piano and small orchestra and a galop for piano and wind instruments. Incipient Mozarts usually do better than that by the time they are twenty.

The ballet "Rebus" is probably the young man's most ambitious work to date, with its six movements, including a set of variations and a respectable fugue. We have said that the music is green fruit and it is, but absorbent of the neighboring sun of riper matters. One traces the influence of the young composer's Russian forbears, such as Moussorgsky, and of some of his contemporaries such as Stravinsky. The French of the present generation also contribute their bit.

With Grain of Salt

But of course, if this were not so in the case of a composer of twenty, he would not be a genius, he would simply be a freak. As to his being a genius, the word and its significance are much badgered in these days and it doesn't seem to take very much to plaster any one with it. On the basis of "Rebus," we believe the Paris encomiums may be salted a considerable bit.

The rest of Mr. Koussevitsky's evening was taken up with a splendid performance of Ralph Vaughan-Williams's beautiful "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" for strings, and the Brahms C-minor symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

APR 7 - 1933

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Little Igor Comes to America, Introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky

Fifth New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Markevitch.
   "Rebus: An Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra."
   Prélude
   Danse de Pauvreté
   Gigue des Nez
   Variations des Pas
   Fugue des Vices
   Parade
   (First performance in America)
2. Vaughan Williams
   Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for String Orchestra
   Intermission
3. Brahms
   Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor

LAST night at Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky, who never lets any tonal grass grow under his feet, introduced to New York—nay, as Mr. Coward would put it, to America—a brand new genius out of Russia, in the form of a composition by Mr. Igor Markevitch.

Mr. Markevitch is twenty years old, which is young these days for a genius—although Mozart was a genius long before that age. Mr. Markevitch began life at Kiev, but seems to have left there as soon as possible. He went to Switzerland, and thence to Paris; took music lessons of Nadia Boulanger (as all young musical geniuses do to-day); was discovered by Diaghilev, and, almost before you could say "Jean Cocteau," became enormously fashionable in the smartest musical salons of the capital.

* * *

In his eighteenth year he made his debut at a concert in the Théatre Pigalle which was described by that accurate observer, Mr. Virgil Thomson, as "a most elegant occasion." There was high excitement among the esthetic élite. "Everybody," wrote Mr. Thomson, "turned out, from the smartest and most aged Princesses to the youngest Tail-Coat." The Théatre Pigalle, "looking like something between a frigidaire and a humidor, set off to perfection the then-new long dresses. . . . One half expected that before the evening was over, we would all be given boxes of dragées to take home with the name of little Igor painted on the toys in blue."

* * *

As simply and swiftly as that, Igor Markevitch became a genius; and when the inimitable Monsieur Henry Prunières proclaimed ecstatically that little Igor was another Mozart, another Schubert, we all sat up very straight and awaited Igor's inevitable exhibition here by Mr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

The composition by Mr. Markevitch which we heard last night is called "Rebus: An Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra." But that is only little Igor's joke. It is really just a symphonic suite for orchestra in half a dozen movements. There is a "Prelude," then come a "Danse de Pauvreté," a "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices," and a final "Parade." The titles are another joke of Igor's. For if you run together the last words of the second, third, fourth and fifth titles, they become, with a little Russian dressing, the French proverb: "Pauvreté n'est pas vice."

* * *

The music is like that, only not so funny. It was, one understands, conceived as a ballet for Massine, "though never"—as Mr. Thompson unkindly puts it—"actually executed." The score, as we heard it last evening, is almost surgically sterile. It is not infected by even the germ of a musical idea—with the exception of a few cultures taken by little Igor from the obliging throat of Igor the Great, and others yielded by Honegger's long-suffering locomotive.

But all that, of course, is old stuff. Indeed, the most striking characteristic of "Rebus" is its staleness and its triteness. It is a congeries of ancient tricks and outworn clichés: rhythms that had become obvious and banal long before little Igor stopped (or even began) reading about fairies; tonal patterns that sound today as stereotyped as the Alberti bass of our grandparents.

* * *

No, no, Igor—this will never do. The same thing, one remembers, was said to another genius, in another day, by another critic. Perhaps, like that other genius, you can prove your judges to be deaf and dull. Or is it your genius, and not your ballet, that is imaginary?

* * *

The remainder of the program consisted of music that will probably sound new when little Igor sounds even older than he does now. So we may disregard it for the moment. It will be there when we return to it again.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

APR 7 - 1933

Koussevitsky Offers Novelty

Markevitch's 'Rebus' Is Included in Boston Symphony Orchestra Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Sergei Koussevitzky was a merciful man last night. At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall he placed his novelty first on the program and then passed on to better things. This new thing under the sun came out of Russia by the well worn path of Paris.

It was entitled "Rebus," an imaginary ballet for orchestra, and was composed by Igor Markevitch, born in Kiev in 1912 and now living in the French capital. The rebus is solved by some of the titles of movements in the work. There is a French proverb, "Pauvrete n'est pas vice." After a prelude there is a "Danse de Pauvrete," "Gigue de Nez" (n'est), "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices" and a final "Parade." The music is modernist, as it is dubbed, and of the crassest type. The young man of twenty-one writes with boldness, even with audacity, with a precocious orchestral technic and occasionally with vigorous musical invention.

His fugue sounded like a trumpeted proclamation of defiance to Bach Even the subject bore a strange resemblance to a phrase of the ancient. But Markevitch's development rambled into regions of tonality and atonality never suspected by the fathers of the art. If the rest of the ballet had possessed as much as one-quarter of the substance of the fugue, there might have been something to say today. But there was only another Parisian disquisition on theories propounded by Stravinsky.

There were the same screaming instrumentation, the same persistence of pounding rhythm and the same sameness which long ago wore itself out. Markevitch had an immense orchestra at his command. These progressives always need large or curious collections of instruments. But a single bass drum, honestly beaten, can produce as much effect as Mr. Markevitch got in his "Parade."

For effects of this kind we prefer the open confession of William Russell's fugue for eight percussion instruments, or one of Prokofieff's pitiless castigations of the keyboard. The performance of the Markevitch ballet was a magnificent feat of virtuosity by the orchestra. The score bristles with formidable difficulties which were disposed of by the Bostonians with unerring accuracy and exciting brilliancy. The audience rewarded the achievement with long and loud applause.

Mr. Koussevitzky, having done his duty by the rising but expatriated youth of his native land, bestowed a celestial benison upon the assembly with Vaughan Williams's fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis. There is nothing new in this composition except that which is always new, namely, the song of beauty.

To put the soul of the English cathedral into an orchestra of strings is a transcription of which any master can be proud. Vaughan Williams has sung the glory of the Anglican chant in new tones and with an opulence of orchestral beauty rarely surpassed. Mr. Koussevitzky faithfully obeyed the injunction of the composer in regard to the selection and placing of the small orchestra with which Mr. Williams produced such captivating antiphonal effects.

The chief solo parts were admirably played by Mr. Burgin, leading violinist, and Mr. Lefranc, principal violist. The communication of the work had noble sonority, a flawless finish and a profoundly felt spirit. The concert came to its end with the first symphony of Brahms. Throughout the evening the listeners must have been impressed by the splendor and luminous transparence of the tone of the great Boston organization. Merely to bathe in such an ocean of glorious musical sound is in itself an experience that no music lover is likely to forget.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK MIRROR

APR 7 - 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

A Ballet and Brahms.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting. Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.

THE PROGRAM.

"Rebus," an imaginary ballet ...... Igor Markevitvh
Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis......Ralph Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 1 in C minor (Opus 68).........Johannes Brahms

One hesitates either to condemn in smug disdain or to praise with an equally fallacious enthusiasm the first American performance of this score by one of Russia s younger neophytes in the cause of ribald dissonance. I for one would prefer a second and a third display before being called upon to separate the gold from the dross.

I suspect, though, that it is compounded, like so much of this stuff, of clever twaddle and the germ of an idea. Mr. Markèvitch grows very frantic indeed in his search for just one healing drop of inspiration. And he writhes, and thumps, and twists in a frenzy of aversion to anything approaching melodious logic. His syncopations and cross-rhythms, apt and adroit in themselves, seem to me to conceal a rather sad sterility. But then I am game enough to want to hear it again and once again, a sincere desire to learn of musical progress from Mr. Markevitch. I fear, though, that there will be no reward in these repetitions.

The dignified, sonorous grace of Dr. Williams' score gave the famous strings of Mr. Koussevitzky's band a delicious opportunity to display their golden tone. The orchestra wove a glowing, filmlike pattern of tone, which tended thankfully to soothe those raw abrasions inflicted by Mr. Markevitch. I hold a Victorian notion that some degree of beauty and illusion should attach to music.

And hence the pure genius of Brahms' middle-aged symphony was the more alluring. I have not always been able to condone the way of Mr. Koussevitsky with Brahms, but now I may cast the Winter garment of my repentance in due obeisance. For Mr. Koussevitzky gave us a splendid reading last night. I did think that he dragged the adagio a trifle, and that momentous opening, wherein the spirit mounts imperiously to the clouds, fell somewhat short of true majesty. But in the third movement Mr. Koussevitsky gave us an allegretto and not an andante, for which we should be thankful.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 7 1933

Music

Koussewitsky Introduces Markewitch's 'Rebus' to New York

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At Carnegie Hall last night. The program: Markewitch, "Rebus"; Vaughan Williams, Fantasy on a Theme by Thomas Tallis; Brahms, First Symphony.

Mr. Koussewitsky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced a ballet by one of the younger generation of Russian composers at their Carnegie Hall concert last evening. Igor Markewitch is the young man's name, 21 his age, and Paris his present place of domicile. The discovery of his talent is credited by Philip Hale, to Alfred Cortot, its training to Nadia Boulanger and Dukas, and its encouragement to the late Serge Diaghilew, who commissioned the composition of the work performed last night. The title of this work, "Rebus," is explained by reference to the titles of its several movements in which is hidden, anagramwise, the proverb "Poverty is not a vice" (Pauvrete n'est pas vice). The movements succeed one another as follows: Prelude; Danse de Pauvrete; Gigue des Nez; Variations des Pas; Fugue des Vices; Parade. Their performance proceeded last night without pause.

Markewitch's music is animated, ebullient, at times good fun, though the composer, having pondered one proverb and built a ballet upon it, might give thought to another—Brevity is the soul of wit—before turning out his next score. His music is reasonably free of reminiscence of other composers, dead or living, though it does not follow that it possesses any great originality of its own. Markewitch employs most of the favorite devices of the modernists: dissonant counterpoint, rhythmic and melodic ostinatos. His climaxes are effected by a variety of stretto familiarized by members of the post-war Franco-Russian school: the insistent repetition of a melodic phrase on rising degrees of the scale. His orchestral technique is well-developed and it is here perhaps that he most clearly exhibits originality. There are coloristic effects in "Rebus" of which imitations may confidently be awaited.

The ballet is, however, entirely a product of ingenuity in exploiting the raw materials of music without reference to their potentialities as means of expression. Its significance lies entirely upon its surface, is readily grasped and assimilated and found to contain no nourishment for either the mind or the spirit. Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston orchestra gave a brilliant exposition of the work, which the audience received with a spontaneous, protracted demonstration of approval, in which cheers mingled with applause.

The program of the concert continued through Vaughan Williams' string fantasy on a theme by Thomas Tallis and, after the intermission, Brahms' C minor symphony.

E. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 7 - 1933

Boston Symphony Plays Markevitch ‘Rebus

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, and his Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to Carnegie Hall last evening the American premiere of a composition by Igor Markevitch called "Rebus." The interest of the production was heightened by the fact that the 21-year-old creator, a young Russian living in Paris, has been writing for orchestra since his fifteenth year.

Of course, precociousness in the field of composition is nothing new. The other evening we heard Toscanini lead a symphony from the pen of the nine-year-old Mozart. When he was eleven, Mendelssohn began his creational fertility, and at the age of seventeen wrote his immortal overture to Shapespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Closer to our own time there is, too, Erich Korngold (born 1897), the Vienna wonder whose thirteenth year saw the production of his pantomime, "The Snowman," at the Vienna Royal Opera (1910); while a season later the great Nikisch conducted a Korngold overture in Leipsic.

Markevitch, his boyhood spent during the "modernistic" fad in music, of course writes in the modes of contemporaries like Prokofieff, Honegger, Milhaud, Stravinsky and Hindemith.

"Rebus" was conceived by Markevitch, so we are told, originally as a ballet suite, but then evolved into its present form a series of connected movements, originally unified by deriving from, and developing variously, a definite rhythmical motif stated at the beginning of the opus.

The motif, a poor shred of thing, is twisted and torture into all sorts of metered reiterations; mostly percussive; sometimes in fugue treatment; seldom lyrical; and generally unappealing and, if the truth must be told, unimportant. The instruments, incessantly propulsive, are made to sound as though they were doing their daily dozen over and over. The orchestration is not noisy, and one must be thankful for that.

Rebus means puzzle. The puzzlement in this case is why Markevitch wrote his piece and why it should be listened to by concert-goers in search of music. A few years ago Antheil's "Ballet Mecanique" was hissed at Carnegie Hall. Have we grown tolerant or discouraged?

Last Summer, on the Riviera, Markevitch kissed his own hand, and said:

"I adore myself; I am a genius."

One feels like being vulgar, and saying: "Yeah?"

Koussevitzky opened his concert with Vaughan Williams's "Variations on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," broadly and lusciously intoned by the excellent players from Boston.

As a closing number there was the abidingly popular First Symphony, in C minor, by Brahms. The Koussevitzky interpretation of that masterpiece is well known to concert-going New Yorkers, but loses none of its appeal through repetition. Incisive but flexible rhythm, gracious lyrical curve and a keen sense of dramatic values are the main elements of Koussevitzky's reading.

The orchestra distinguished itself especially through the lovely playing of the strings in the slow movement and the power and brilliancy of the jubilant finale.

ATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1933.

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Plays New Suite.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, opened its concert last night in Carnegie Hall with the first American performance of the ballet music of Igor Markevitch, "Rebus." Markevitch is a young Parisianized Russian. He is close to the literary arriviste, Jean Cocteau. The late Serge Diaghileff ordered of him a ballet, a fact in itself signified Markevitch's arrival in the Parisian artistic world. He was last Summer interested in a ballet for the Russian dancer Lifar. No doubt the Princess de Polignac has included him among her lions. The suite, "Rebus," has the accent, the atmosphere, of musical Paris of the present day.

The audience received this music very well. It is a very clever piece of writing and no question about it. This commentator had the privilege of hearing Mr. Markevitch play his music, as badly as only a composer can, last Spring in Paris, and he was impressed. The rhythmic skeleton of the piece seemed very strong and clear, of cumulative action and interest. The orchestration, on score paper, looked very promising.

Some of these impressions were confirmed last night. Others were altered by the superb orchestral performance. Under these circumstances the composition was heard for the first time as a unit, with its details given their light and shade and their actual perspective.

And this just perspective was not unconditionally to the advantage of the composition. It has considerable "go" and youthful animation and temperament. It is entirely a study in rhythms. There is no musical nugget. We are presented with the somewhat mathematical proposition of the "Rebus," and we behold the composer's ingenious and dexterous solution.

As far as it goes, the treatment is effective. It is also derivative. Honegger's locomotive and fragments of Stravinsky percolate through many measures. When all is said and done, the piece is very empty. It is in a mode that has [illegible] stale, which is the cruelest thing that can be said of a young Parisian composer.

Has Markevitch more than a quick head, a facile pen, an imitative faculty? If music is more than an exercise in the development of rhythms, then it is necessary to wait till this precocious youth of 21 finds in himself something that he wants to say and also a melodic manner of saying it. As it stands, the "Rebus" is "amusing," that is to say, smart, and as hard and hollow as paste diamonds.

The great music that came later threw this rather self-evident fact into the stronger relief. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on the old theme of Thomas Tallis is one of the most original and beautiful pieces of music which have come from modern England or, indeed, from any contemporaneous school of composition, and it served to set forth the glories of the string choir of the orchestra. The climax of the concert was the Brahms symphony.

symphony before in New York, and so have other conductors. His reading last night was nobly proportioned, exalted and heroic in spirit. If personal impressions are reliable, it has grown in architectural proportion and in great classic line. Or it may be that a listener has grown in his perception of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation. At any event, the performance of last night revealed the great symphony at its full stature, and in manifold details it presented a unity and plasticity of conception that had irresistible eloquence.

Also conspicuous was the beauty of the orchestral coloring, which showed again that it was not Brahms's orchestration but many conductors' misunderstanding of that orchestration which originated the cry that Brahms was cold, thick, colorless in his scoring. At the end of the performance the audience burst into applause and cheers.

Stevens Students in Annual Play.

The first of two performances of the annual production of the Dramatic Society of Stevens Institute of Technology was presented last night at the institute. The performance will be repeated tonight. The title of this year's production is a "Pipe Fitter's Fancy, or Virtue Rewarded." John L. Buckley, undergraduate of Tenafly, N. J., was one of the largest contributors to the script and several members of the cast had more than one rôle to play in a complex presentation.

In the World of Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First American Performance of Markevitch's "Rebus" Ballet

SOMEBODY'S solitary hiss in Carnegie Hall last night was swiftly swept into inaudibility by a prolonged outburst of applause at the end of the first American performance of "Rebus: an Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra," by Igor Markevitch, who is a Russian composer of twenty now living at Paris, where he has become a darling of the salon and a favorite among those sophisticated groups which find amusement in the discovery of composers that are different.

It is a safe guess that the volume of applause was not a true expression of opinion on the composition as music. Those who applauded at all applauded with gusto and their hands sounded larger than the average. A great many did not applaud at all. They just waited, dolefully smiling. The old-timers, who keep on attending concerts because of their attachment to music which has outlasted the composer, have about ceased to hope that any new compositions will delight their ears and hearts as the older ones do. They are resigned. They just wait until the novelties are done with, taking comfort in the belief that "first performance" also may mean "only performance."

For some time the jig-saw puzzle makers have been reproducing paintings. The work of many an artist appears in pieces within a box. Now Mr. Markevitch has put the rebus into music and given concert audiences the problem of why he did it and what it means. A key, using the word in relation to puzzles rather than music, is provided in the titles of the movements. Put them together and they make the French proverb, "Poverty is not a vice." And this provides opportunity for sarcasm at the expense of young Mr. Markevitch. For poverty of ideas and of spiritual conceptions is certainly a vice in a composer, or at any rate a serious shortcoming.

In general this "Rebus" is another display of energy, of mean, sterile themes driven impetuously through machine rhythms which hold the attention by intensity of motion, not by any inner grace or reason. The composition has the fierce monotony of a machine shop and the composer has placed himself alongside those composers who put forth tonal impressions of iron foundries and raging locomotives.

The performance of "Rebus" is quite another matter. It represented an astonishing waste of industry, musicianship and interpretive care. Much of the applause, no doubt, was for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, and in this fact there is excuse for pointing out an interesting reversal of the relationship of composer and orchestra.

In Beethoven's time the orchestras were so bad that audiences could not tell how good the composer's work was. Nowadays orchestras are so good that audiences cannot tell how bad the composer's work is. Ernest Newman points out that the first Beethoven audiences must be forgiven for caring little for his symphonies because they never really heard them. Perhaps audiences should be forgiven for applauding some current compositions because they hear so much more than the compositions themselves.

The ugliness of "Rebus" last night was partly mitigated by the beauty of the Boston strings—instruments created to produce agreeable sounds and not to join in such a riot of dissonance.

Also evidence in support of this attitude concerning the purposes of orchestral instruments was given abundantly in Ralph Vaughan Williams's fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. This composition is in keeping with the older definition of music. The pious Thomas Tallis, however, musing in the Chapel Royal that Henry VIII visited, might have dreamed of hearing such celestial playing in heaven, but he scarcely would have supposed that ever in an earthly concert hall men could know such an exuberance of orchestral splendor and richness as the Boston orchestra displayed last night.

It would be a pleasure to praise at length the performance of the First Symphony of Brahms. It was superb, but this is not news, therefore words are superfluous. Authoritative and unified and highly developed performances of such major works are usual with the Boston orchestra.

Reverting to "Rebus," it seems safe to assume that the present generation of concertgoers will not care for it much. If in days to come it is ranked as important music, well and good. It was so with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. One faction saw in it only "an untamed striving for singularity...strange modulations and violent transitions." Reviewers of his day are remembered now principally because they predicted oblivion for Beethoven's symphonies. Therefore, if the reviewer today expresses disdain for this "Rebus," it may be assumed that he has the sly hope that by so doing his name will be mentioned by some commentator of the distant future!

HENRY BECKETT.

Philharmonic Season of Thirty Weeks Opens October 5

Thirty weeks will constitute the season of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for 1933-1934, beginning October 5 and closing April 29, all being given in Carnegie Hall. This is one week longer than usual. Bruno Walter will conduct the opening part of the season and Arturo Toscanini the last half, the intervening time being taken by Hans Lange. The two series of thirteen Thursday evenings and the two series of thirteen Friday afternoons have been increased to fifteen concerts. The two series of nine Saturday evening students' concerts have both been expanded to ten concerts each. There will be three series on Sunday afternoons, the usual odd and even series and in addition a new series of nine concerts arranged to take care of former subscribers to the Brooklyn Academy of Music and Metropolitan Opera House concerts. The concerts for children and young people, directed by Ernest Schelling, will be six in number instead of twelve.

Among the soloists who will appear with the orchestra during 1933-34 are the following: The pianists, Harold Bauer, Vladimir Horowitz, Jose Iturbi Josef Lhevinne, Poldi Mildner, Guiomar Novaes, Carl Friedberg, Myra Hess and Mischa Levitzki; the violinists Jascha Heifetz, Albert Spalding Yehudi Menuhin, Nathan Milstein and Joseph Szigeti; the 'cellist, Grego Piatigorsky; and the specialists in music for two pianos, Ethel Bartlet and Rae Robertson.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE 1933.

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

Little Igor Comes to America, Introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor

Fifth New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Markevitch.
   "Rebus: An Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra."
   Prélude
   Danse de Pauvreté
   Gigue des Nez
   Variations des Pas
   Fugue des Vices
   Parade
   (First performance in America)
2. Vaughan Williams
   Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for String Orchestra
   Intermission
3. Brahms
   Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68

THURSDAY night at Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky, who never lets any tonal grass grow under his feet, introduced to New York—nay, as Mr. Coward would put it, to America—a brand new genius out of Russia, in the form of a composition by Mr. Igor Markevitch.

Mr. Markevitch is twenty years old, which is young these days for a genius—although Mozart was a genius long before that age. Mr. Markevitch began life at Kiev, but seems to have left there as soon as possible. He went to Switzerland, and thence to Paris; took music lessons of Nadia Boulanger (as all young musical geniuses do to-day); was discovered by Diaghilev, and, almost before you could say "Jean Cocteau," became enormously fashionable in the smartest musical salons of the capital.

* * *

In his eighteenth year he made his debut at a concert in the Théatre Pigalle which was described by that accurate observer, Mr. Virgil Thomson, as "a most elegant occasion." There was high excitement among the esthetic élite. "Everybody," wrote Mr. Thomson, "turned out, from the smartest and most aged Princesses to the youngest Tail-Coat." The Théatre Pigalle, "looking like something between a frigidaire and a humidor, set off to perfection the then-new long dresses. . . . One half expected that before the evening was over, we would all be given boxes of dragées to take home with the name of little Igor painted on the toys in blue."

* * *

As simply and swiftly as that, Igor Markevitch became a genius; and when the inimitable Monsieur Henry Prunières proclaimed ecstatically that little Igor was another Mozart, another Schubert, we all sat up very straight and awaited Igor's inevitable exhibition here by Mr. Koussevitzky.

* * *

The composition by Mr. Markevitch which we heard Thursday night is called "Rebus: An Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra." But that is only little Igor's joke. It is really just a symphonic suite for orchestra in half a dozen movements. There is a "Prelude," then come a "Danse de Pauvreté," a "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices," and a final "Parade." The titles are another joke of Igor's. For if you run together the last words of the second, third, fourth and fifth titles, they become, with a little Russian dressing, the French proverb: "Pauvreté n'est pas vice."

* * *

The music is like that, only not so funny. It was, one understands, conceived as a ballet for Massine, "though never"—as Mr. Thompson unkindly puts it—"actually executed." The score, as we heard it Thursday evening, is almost surgically sterile. It is not infected by even the germ of a musical idea—with the exception of a few cultures taken by little Igor from the obliging throat of Igor the Great, and others yielded by Honegger's long-suffering locomotive.

But all that, of course, is old stuff. Indeed, the most striking characteristic of "Rebus" is its staleness and its triteness. It is a congeries of ancient tricks and outworn clichés: rhythms that had become obvious and banal long before little Igor stopped (or even began) reading about fairies; tonal patterns that sound today as stereotyped as the Alberti bass of our grandparents.

* * *

No, no, Igor—this will never do. The same thing, one remembers, was said to another genius, in another day, by another critic. Perhaps, like that other genius, you can prove your judges to be deaf and dull. Or is it your genius, and not your ballet, that is imaginary?

* * *

The remainder of the program consisted of music that will probably sound new when little Igor sounds even older than he does now. So we may disregard it for the moment. It will be there when we return to it again.

Koussevitsky Offers Novelty

Markevitch's 'Rebus' Is Included in Boston Symphony Orchestra Program.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Sergei Koussevitzky was a merciful man last night. At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall he placed his novelty first on the program and then passed on to better things. This new thing under the sun came out of Russia by the well worn path of Paris.

It was entitled "Rebus," an imaginary ballet for orchestra, and was composed by Igor Markevitch, born in Kiev in 1912 and now living in the French capital. The rebus is solved by some of the titles of movements in the work. There is a French proverb, "Pauvrete n'est pas vice." After a prelude there is a "Danse de Pauvrete," "Gigue de Nez" (n'est), "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices" and a final "Parade." The music is modernist, as it is dubbed, and of the crassest type. The young man of twenty-one writes with boldness, even with audacity, with a precocious orchestral technic and occasionally with vigorous musical invention.

His fugue sounded like a trumpeted proclamation of defiance to Bach. Even the subject bore a strange resemblance to a phrase of the ancient. But Markevitch's development rambled into regions of tonality and atonality never suspected by the fathers of the art. If the rest of the ballet had possessed as much as one-quarter of the substance of the fugue, there might have been something to say today. But there was only another Parisian disquisition on theories propounded by Stravinsky.

There were the same screaming instrumentation, the same persistence of pounding rhythm and the same sameness which long ago wore itself out. Markevitch had an immense orchestra at his command. These progressives always need large or curious collections of instruments. But a single bass drum, honestly beaten, can produce as much effect as Mr. Markevitch got in his "Parade."

For effects of this kind we prefer the open confession of William Russell's fugue for eight percussion instruments, or one of Prokofieff's pitiless castigations of the keyboard. The performance of the Markevitch ballet was a magnificent feat of virtuosity by the orchestra. The score bristles with formidable difficulties which were disposed of by the Bostonians with unerring accuracy and exciting brilliancy. The audience rewarded the achievement with long and loud applause.

Mr. Koussevitzky, having done his duty by the rising but expatriated youth of his native land, bestowed a celestial benison upon the assembly with Vaughan Williams's fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis. There is nothing new in this composition except that which is always new, namely, the song of beauty.

To put the soul of the English cathedral into an orchestra of strings is a transcription of which any master can be proud. Vaughan Williams has sung the glory of the Anglican chant in new tones and with an opulence of orchestral beauty rarely surpassed. Mr. Koussevitzky faithfully obeyed the injunction of the composer in regard to the selection and placing of the small orchestra with which Mr. Williams produced such captivating antiphonal effects.

The chief solo parts were admirably played by Mr. Burgin, leading violinist, and Mr. Lefranc, principal violist. The communication of the work had noble sonority, a flawless finish and a profoundly felt spirit. The concert came to its end with the first symphony of Brahms. Throughout the evening the listeners must have been impressed by the splendor and luminous transparence of the tone of the great Boston organization. Merely to bathe in such an ocean of glorious musical sound is in itself an experience that no music lover is likely to forget.

'Hilda Cassidy.'

Harold Stone and Boris Kaplan will present their production of "Hilda Cassidy" at the Martin Beck Theater on Wednesday eve-

---

8, 1933

Koussevitzky Given Ovation

American Premiere of Markevitch Ballet, "Rebus," Well Received.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his musicianly Boston Symphony Orchestra opened their final Carnegie Hall concerts for the season Thursday night with one of the most enchanting and satisfying performances here.

As is customary with the noted conductor, he gave us a goodly taste of the modern with the American premiere of Igor Markevitch's "Rebus" ballet. Markevitch is a young Russian, now only 21 years of age, who wrote a piano concert for Diaghilev when he was 17, which was performed at Covent Garden. He also has a number of other works to his credit.

Markedly Modern

His "Rebus" is markedly modern, and has all the accoutrements of the "ultra" type, with its opening on a shrill whistle, nearly half of the first violins tapping on the backs of their fiddles with their bows, part of the cellos beating their strings and a measured plucking from the other strings to a low thumping from the bass drum. The score rises and falls in accented dissonances and moves from a wild nightmare that may be a fevered brain to soft naturalness of feeling and then back again, with intermediaries of a mournful and whiny solo from the flutes. Interspersed is the sullen drum. But even the bass viols had solo parts.

Yet the work has a definite form and objective and is duly colorful and energetic to the nth degree. It is one of the most interesting and studious example of the moderns the noted conductor has given us this season.

The "Rebus" opened the program and it was followed by Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for string orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky gave this work earlier in the season at his Saturday afternoon concert, January 7.

Father of Cathedral Music

Thomas Tallis was organist of the Chapel Royal from his appointment in the reign of Henry the Eighth up to his death, some forty years later, in the reign of Elizabeth. He was called "The Father of English Cathedral Music." Vaughan Williams is an Englishman, and it is not odd that in his Fantasia, he imitates the sonority and richness of the organ. He has caught the picture completely, even to a conception of the venerable Tallis as his "fingers wandered idly over the ivory keys" improvising on and developing his theme.

Brahms' immortal First Symphony in C minor, composed the second half of the program. Brahms was 43 when he finished it, the work is his sixty-eighth, and he had spent ten years in its preparation. It is impressive and elaborate. Its style although sometimes abstruse has enough spontaneity in it to keep it from going entirely into only the understanding of the gods.

Dr. Koussevitzky, it is needless to say, gave a flawless performance, as did his men. He was given a tremendous ovation at the close of the performance.

IL 7, 1933.

Rebus Ballet Triumphs In Debut Here

Carnegie Hall Cheers Composition in U. S. Premiere.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IT isn't often that one of the ultramodernists of music stirs a local symphony concert audience not only to applause but likewise to cheers; yet just that happened in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony introduced Igor Markevitch and his "Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra" entitled "Rebus" to America. The novelty by this Russian of 19 promptly captured the crowded house, and loud and long was the rejoicing.

Sweeping Power in Music.

There was such an acid cleanness to the music, such transparency and balance to the orchestration, such a keen feeling for instrumental timbre, and such a glorious stampede of interlocking rhythms that the most obdurate listener must have been carried away in spite of himself. One had a childlike joy in the chirping of crickets, in the cat's meow, in the vastly swelling chatter of the climax, also in the lryic intervals. And the "Fugue of the Vices" was a gorgeous affair.

Markevitch seems originally to have intended this work for the Diaghilev Ballets Russes, but it is no more in need of visual realization than is Schumann's "Carnaval" or that supreme "apotheosis of the dance," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The youthful composer has provided our imaginations with all the material they need.

Solution in French Proverb.

The ballet is in six sections—"Prelude," "Dance of Poverty," "Jig of the Noses," "Variations of the Steps," "Fugue of the Vices" and "Parade." The solution of the rebus is found in the French proverb "Poverty is not a vice," which in these piping times is one more reason for taking to the work. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a splendid account of it.

The program offered further Vaughan Williams' beautiful modal "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for String Orchestra," which, expressively read, displayed the richness of the Bostonian strings, and, finally, the C minor symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 8 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE TUESDAY NIGHT

Concert at Albee Will Be last for This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in this city at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program appropriately with Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, "The Russian Easter," based on rotual themes of the old orthodox Russian Church. Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," also will be played. The symphony which will close the concert will be the Second of Brahms in D-major. This symphony has been selected in honor of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms, which will be celebrated throughout the musical world this spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 8 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussewitsky Conclude Their Brooklyn Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky concluded their Brooklyn season with a concert at the Academy of Music last night, playing music by Vaughan-Williams, Rimsky-Korsakow and Brahms. The first named was represented by his fantasy on a theme by Thomas Tallis, a work of which Mr. Koussewitsky vidently fond, since it appears frequently on his programs. Scored for strings, it improvises freely on the third of eight hymn-tunes which Tallis, one of the great Elizabethans, contributed to Archbishop Parker's metrical psalter in 1567. Basses and 'cellos hint the melody, pizzicato; it is then stated by the upper strings and freely developed.

The choice of the theme and the manner of its treatment are characteristic of Vaughan-Williams, whose music in general reflects the profound influence upon his imagination of the early English masters. Without effort, it seems, and, at the same time, without sacrifice of his own individuality, he can adopt their way of thinking, see life from their point of view, yet preserve a personal response to it. The fantasy is the product of this process; it is an interpretation of and homage to the genius of Tallis, and, at the same time, an individual expression of experience and belief, thus possessing historical and critical, as well as philosophic and esthetic, implications. For this reason it is, in a sense, less representative of Vaughan-Williams than such works as the "London" and "Pastoral" symphonies, one or both of which Mr. Koussewitsky should be urged to perform.

To th ecclesiastical austerity and serenity of the Vaughan-Williams fantasy the suite from Rimsky's "Tale of the Tsar Saltan" posed as effective contrast. Brilliant and bizarre, the music charmed the audience and evoked outbursts of applause between movements, when even the inducement of a pause was lacking for such demonstrations. The "Tsar Saltan" excerpts are heard less often than they might be, given proof of public approval; the opera itself, upon the evidence of these fragments from the score, and the synopsis of the tale upon which it is based provided in Philip Hale's notes on last night's program, might be something for the Metropolitan to produce one of these days. Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra contrived a parti-colored, scintillant perjormance of the suite.

* * *

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last night, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THE PROGAM

Fantasy on a Theme by Thomas Tallis	Vaughan-Williams
Suite from "The Tsar Saltan,"	Rimsky-Korsakow
Second Symphony	Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

PR 8 - 1933

MUSIC

Bostonians End Season

The news that Brooklyn is not to be without an orchestral concert series during the 1933-34 season was heard last night by a large audience which attended the final performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music.

Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn committee, announced during the intermission that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Bostonians would be back in the fall. When Dr. Koussevitzky appeared immediately afterward to conduct the Brahms Second Symphony, which closed the program, the entire house rose and paid him a generous tribute of applause.

The program presented an agreeable contrast in moods. In the opening number, a fantasia by Vaughan Williams for strings upon a theme by Thomas Tallis, composer and conductor, combined to preserve and emphasize the delicate medieval spirit of the original, the work of a man whose genius has been, perhaps, overlooked.

A suite from the opera, "The Fairy Tale of the Tsar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, replete with the composer's usual Slav-Oriental color, followed, in which was included the celebrated "Flight of the Bumble-Bee." Dr. Koussevitzky demonstrated again that the latter work represents one of the highest points in orchestral virtuosity that has been achieved.

Of the four great symphonies written by Johannes Brahms, it has always seemed to this reviewer that the one last heard was the greatest of all. Last night was no exception.

Although the visitors from Boston occasionally turn in a performance which is not up to standard, no one can assert that there is a better orchestra on this continent (and that probably means the world) or deny that Dr. Koussevitzky, at his best, is the equal of any of our present-day conductors.

T. M.

Music

Monitor Apr 8

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK—Sound of a rare sort characterized the flute-playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last concert of the season but one, given under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall on the evening of April 6. The tone of what is, without doubt, the oldest of musical instruments and the most difficult of mastery had, for a brief moment in a solo passage of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, a fullness and a richness seldom, indeed, heard. Those notes sufficed, we may in all decency say to give the whole occasion glamour and acclaim. That instant of technical victory was enough, we may assure ourselves, to confirm the faith of fond B. S. O. subscribers in their institution and to persuade them to stand by it for another winter.

Could it have been, though, instead of an artistic matter, a case of conscience, rather, on the part of the performer concerned? Once upon a time, does not French tradition tell us, a Breton, or somebody, kept a caché of gold in a hollow stick, which he let slip out and scatter before all eyes, upon being judicially questioned regarding his possession of it?

To ignore sentiment, however, and to take the measure of the evening from the standpoint of excitement, a new work, Markevitch's "Rébus" Ballet, in six connected movements entitled "Prélude," "Danse de Pauvreté," "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices" and "Parade"—take the last words of the second, third, fourth and fifth numbers and you get in misspelled form a proverb, which solves the rebus. It's an excellently contrived piece of music, supposing we admit, in these days, the element of noise into our notion of music, because the interest grows gradually from the beginning and reaches a lively culmination toward the close; develops, that is to say, from mild stridency into ecstatic din. The fugue, to specify, is an extraordinary study in what modern composers call counterpoint, whether properly or not. The techniques of all the European schools of composing, the Continental ones, at least, seem to be consolidated here, such as Schönberg, Stravinsky and Ravel represent.

By listening respectfully and tolerantly to harsh agglomerations of instrumental timbres, we may presume that we show our manners. In all truth, we display our patience in so doing. Perhaps we had better make sure we are not merely trying to save our faces thereby with generations to come. For posterity, we may be sure, will laugh at us for what we foolishly accept, no less than for what we undiscerningly reject.

W. P. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

APR 8 - 1933

Koussevitzky Given Ovation

American Premiere of Markevitch Ballet, "Rebus," Well Received.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his musicianly Boston Symphony Orchestra opened their final Carnegie Hall concerts for the season Thursday night with one of the most enchanting and satisfying performances here.

As is customary with the noted conductor, he gave us a goodly taste of the modern with the American premiere of Igor Markevitch's "Rebus" ballet. Markevitch is a young Russian, now only 21 years of age, who wrote a piano concert for Diaghilev when he was 17, which was performed at Covent Garden. He also has a number of other works to his credit.

Markedly Modern

His "Rebus" is markedly modern, and has aii the accoutrements of the "ultra" type, with its opening on a shrill whistle, nearly half of the first violins tapping on the backs of their fiddles with their bows, part of the cellos beating their strings and a measured plucking from the other strings to a low thumping from the bass drum. The score rises and falls in accented dissonances and moves from a wild nightmare that may be a fevered brain to soft naturalness of feeling and then back again, with intermediaries of a mournful and whiny solo from the flutes. Interspersed is the sullen drum. But even the bass viols had solo parts.

Yet the work has a definite form and objective and is duly colorful and energetic to the nth degree. It is one of the most interesting and studious example of the moderns the noted conductor has given us this season.

The "Rebus" opened the program and it was followed by Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for string orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky gave this work earlier in the season at his Saturday afternoon concert, January 7.

Father of Cathedral Music

Thomas Tallis was organist of the Chapel Royal from his appointment in the reign of Henry the Eighth up to his death, some forty years later, in the reign of Elizabeth. He was called "The Father of English Cathedral Music." Vaughan Williams is an Englishman, and it is not odd that in his Fantasia, he imitates the sonority and richness of the organ. He has caught the picture completely, even to a conception of the venerable Tallis as his "fingers wandered idly over the ivory keys" improvising on and developing his theme.

Brahms' immortal First Symphony in C minor, composed the second half of the program. Brahms was 43 when he finished it, the work is his sixty-eighth, and he had spent ten years in its preparation. It is impressive and elaborate. Its style although sometimes abstruse has enough spontaneity in it to keep it from going entirely into oniy the understanding of the gods.

Dr. Koussevitzky, it is needless to say, gave a flawless performance, as did his men. He was given a tremendous ovation at the close of the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 8 - 1933

ENDS BROOKLYN SEASON.

Boston Symphony Will Return to Academy of Music in 1933-34.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, closed its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music last night before a large and enthusiastic audience. The program included Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite from the opera "The Faiiy Tale of Tsar Saltan" and Brahms's Second Symphony.

At the end of the intermission Adrian Van Sinderen announced that the concerts by the orchestra were assured for next season in Brooklyn. And when Mr. Koussevitzky came out to lead the Brahms symphony the audience stood up and applauded.

The orchestra will end its Manhattan season at Carnegie Hall this afternoon when the program will take in Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fifth and a Suite by the French composer, Albert Roussel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 8 - 1933

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Is Season's Last

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last [illegible] in Providence. [illegible] will open [illegible] appropriately [illegible] overture [illegible] based on [illegible] orthodox R[illegible] Richard Strauss' tone poem [illegible] will [illegible]. The symphony which [illegible] the season will be the [illegible] of Brahms in D [illegible] since [illegible] anniversary of the birth of Brahms will be celebrated in all [illegible] world this Spring.

IL 7, 1933.

Rebus Ballet Triumphs In Debut Here

Carnegie Hall Cheers Composition in U.S. Premiere.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IT isn't often that one of the ultramodernists of music stirs a local symphony concert audience not only to applause but likewise to cheers; yet just that happened in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony introduced Igor Markevitch and his "Imaginary Ballet for Orchestra" entitled "Rebus" to America. The novelty by this Russian of 19 promptly captured the crowded house, and loud and long was the rejoicing.

Sweeping Power in Music.

There was such an acid cleanness to the music, such transparency and balance to the orchestration, such a keen feeling for instrumental timbre, and such a glorious stampede of interlocking rhythms that the most obdurate listener must have been carried away in spite of himself. One had a childlike joy in the chirping of crickets, in the cat's meow, in the vastly swelling chatter of the climax, also in the lryic intervals. And the "Fugue of the Vices" was a gorgeous affair.

Markevitch seems originally to have intended this work for the Diaghilev Ballets Russes, but it is no more in need of visual realization than is Schumann's "Carnaval" or that supreme "apotheosis of the dance," Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The youthful composer has provided our imaginations with all the material they need.

Solution in French Proverb.

The ballet is in six sections—"Prelude," "Dance of Poverty," "Jig of the Noses," "Variations of the Steps," "Fugue of the Vices" and "Parade." The solution of the rebus is found in the French proverb "Poverty is not a vice," which in these piping times is one more reason for taking to the work. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave a splendid account of it.

The program offered further Vaughan Williams' beautiful modal "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for String Orchestra," which, expressively read, displayed the richness of the Bostonian strings, and, finally, the C minor symphony of Brahms.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 8 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY HERE TUESDAY NIGHT

Concert at Albee Will Be last for This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season in this city at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program appropriately with Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, "The Russian Easter," based on rotual themes of the old orthodox Russian Church. Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," also will be played. The symphony which will close the concert will be the Second of Brahms in D-major. This symphony has been selected in honor of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms, which will be celebrated throughout the musical world this spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 8 - 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussewitsky Conclude Their Brooklyn Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussewitsky concluded their Brooklyn season with a concert at the Academy of Music last night, playing music by Vaughan-Williams, Rimsky-Korsakow and Brahms. The first named was represented by his fantasy on a theme by Thomas Tallis, a work of which Mr. Koussewitsky [illegible]vidently fond, since it appears frequently on his programs. Scored for strings, it improvises freely on the third of eight hymn-tunes which Tallis, one of the great Elizabethans, contributed to Archbishop Parker's metrical psalter in 1567. Basses and 'cellos hint the melody, pizzicato; it is then stated by the upper strings and freely developed.

The choice of the theme and the manner of its treatment are characteristic of Vaughan-Williams, whose music in general reflects the profound influence upon his imagination of the early English masters. Without effort, it seems, and, at the same time, without sacrifice of his own individuality, he can adopt their way of thinking, see life from their point of view, yet preserve a personal response to it. The fantasy is the product of this process; it is an interpretation of and homage to the genius of Tallis, and, at the same time, an individual expression of experience and belief, thus possessing historical and critical, as well as philosophic and esthetic, implications. For this reason it is, in a sense, less representative of Vaughan-Williams than such works as the "London" and "Pastoral" symphonies, one or both of which Mr. Koussewitsky should be urged to perform.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last night, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

THE PROGAM

Fantasy on a Theme by Thomas Tallis .... Vaughan-Williams
Suite from "The Tsar Saltan," Rimsky-Korsakow
Second Symphony .... Brahms

To th ecclesiastical austerity and serenity of the Vaughan-Williams fantasy the suite from Rimsky's "Tale of the Tsar Saltan" posed as effective contrast. Brilliant and bizarre, the music charmed the audience and evoked outbursts of applause between movements, when even the inducement of a pause was lacking for such demonstrations. The "Tsar Saltan" excerpts are heard less often than they might be, given proof of public approval; the opera itself, upon the evidence of these fragments from the score, and the synopsis of the tale upon which it is based provided in Philip Hale's notes on last night's program, might be something for the Metropolitan to produce one of these days. Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra contrived a parti-colored, scintillant perjormance of the suite.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn Times Union

APR 8 - 1933

MUSIC

Bostonians End Season

The news that Brooklyn is not to be without an orchestral concert series during the 1933-34 season was heard last night by a large audience which attended the final performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music.

Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn committee, announced during the intermission that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Bostonians would be back in the fall. When Dr. Koussevitzky appeared immediately afterward to conduct the Brahms Second Symphony, which closed the program, the entire house rose and paid him a generous tribute of applause.

The program presented an agreeable contrast in moods. In the opening number, a fantasia by Vaughan Williams for strings upon a theme by Thomas Tallis, composer and conductor, combined to preserve and emphasize the delicate medieval spirit of the original, the work of a man whose genius has been, perhaps, overlooked.

A suite from the opera, "The Fairy Tale of the Tsar Saltan," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, replete with the composer's usual Slav-Oriental color, followed, in which was included the celebrated "Flight of the Bumble-Bee." Dr. Koussevitzky demonstrated again that the latter work represents one of the highest points in orchestral virtuosity that has been achieved.

Of the four great symphonies written by Johannes Brahms, it has always seemed to this reviewer that the one last heard was the greatest of all. Last night was no exception.

Although the visitors from Boston occasionally turn in a performance which is not up to standard, no one can assert that there is a better orchestra on this continent (and that probably means the world) or deny that Dr. Koussevitzky, at his best, is the equal of any of our present-day conductors.

T. M.

Music

Monitor Apr 8

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK — Sound of a rare sort characterized the flute-playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last concert of the season but one, given under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall on the evening of April 6. The tone of what is, without doubt, the oldest of musical instruments and the most difficult of mastery had, for a brief moment in a solo passage of the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, a fullness and a richness seldom, indeed, heard. Those notes sufficed, we may in all decency say to give the whole occasion glamour and acclaim. That instant of technical victory was enough, we may assure ourselves, to confirm the faith of fond B. S. O. subscribers in their institution and to persuade them to stand by it for another winter.

Could it have been, though, instead of an artistic matter, a case of conscience, rather, on the part of the performer concerned? Once upon a time, does not French tradition tell us, a Breton, or somebody, kept a caché of gold in a hollow stick, which he let slip out and scatter before all eyes, upon being judicially questioned regarding his possession of it?

To ignore sentiment, however, and to take the measure of the evening from the standpoint of excitement, a new work, Markevitch's "Rébus" Ballet, in six connected movements entitled "Prélude," "Danse de Pauvreté," "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices" and "Parade"—take the last words of the second, third, fourth and fifth numbers and you get in misspelled form a proverb, which solves the rebus. It's an excellently contrived piece of music, supposing we admit, in these days, the element of noise into our notion of music, because the interest grows gradually from the beginning and reaches a lively culmination toward the close; develops, that is to say, from mild stridency into ecstatic din. The fugue, to specify, is an extraordinary study in what modern composers call counterpoint, whether properly or not. The techniques of all the European schools of composing, the Continental ones, at least, seem to be consolidated here, such as Schönberg, Stravinsky and Ravel represent.

By listening respectfully and tolerantly to harsh agglomerations of instrumental timbres, we may presume that we show our manners. In all truth, we display our patience in so doing. Perhaps we had better make sure we are not merely trying to save our faces thereby with generations to come. For posterity, we may be sure, will laugh at us for what we foolishly accept, no less than for what we undiscerningly reject.

W. P. T.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

APR 8 - 1933

Koussevitzky Given Ovation

American Premiere of Markevitch Ballet, "Rebus," Well Received.

by Walter D. Shackleton

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his musicianly Boston Symphony Orchestra opened their final Carnegie Hall concerts for the season Thursday night with one of the most enchanting and satisfying performances here.

As is customary with the noted conductor, he gave us a goodly taste of the modern with the American premiere of Igor Markevitch's "Rebus" ballet. Markevitch is a young Russian, now only 21 years of age, who wrote a piano concert for Diaghilev when he was 17, which was performed at Covent Garden. He also has a number of other works to his credit.

Markedly Modern

His "Rebus" is markedly modern, and has all the accoutrements of the "ultra" type, with its opening on a shrill whistle, nearly half of the first violins tapping on the backs of their fiddles with their bows, part of the cellos beating their strings and a measured plucking from the other strings to a low thumping from the bass drum. The score rises and falls in accented dissonances and moves from a wild nightmare that may be a fevered brain to soft naturalness of feeling and then back again, with intermediaries of a mournful and whiny solo from the flutes. Interspersed is the sullen drum. But even the bass viols had solo parts.

Yet the work has a definite form and objective and is duly colorful and energetic to the nth degree. It is one of the most interesting and studious example of the moderns the noted conductor has given us this season.

The "Rebus" opened the program and it was followed by Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for string orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky gave this work earlier in the season at his Saturday afternoon concert, January 7.

Father of Cathedral Music

Thomas Tallis was organist of the Chapel Royal from his appointment in the reign of Henry the Eighth up to his death, some forty years later, in the reign of Elizabeth. He was called "The Father of English Cathedral Music." Vaughan Williams is an Englishman, and it is not odd that in his Fantasia, he imitates the sonority and richness of the organ. He has caught the picture completely, even to a conception of the venerable Tallis as his "fingers wandered idly over the ivory keys" improvising on and developing his theme.

Brahms' immortal First Symphony in C minor, composed the second half of the program. Brahms was 43 when he finished it, the work is his sixty-eighth, and he had spent ten years in its preparation. It is impressive and elaborate. Its style although sometimes abstruse has enough spontaneity in it to keep it from going entirely into only the understanding of the gods.

Dr. Koussevitzky, it is needless to say, gave a flawless performance, as did his men. He was given a tremendous ovation at the close of the performance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 8 - 1933

ENDS BROOKLYN SEASON.

Boston Symphony Will Return to Academy of Music in 1933-34.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, closed its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music last night before a large and enthusiastic audience. The program included Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite from the opera "The Fairy Tale of Tsar Saltan" and Brahms's Second Symphony.

At the end of the intermission Adrian Van Sinderen announced that the concerts by the orchestra were assured for next season in Brooklyn. And when Mr. Koussevitzky came out to lead the Brahms symphony the audience stood up and applauded.

The orchestra will end its Manhattan season at Carnegie Hall this afternoon when the program will take in Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fifth and a Suite by the French composer, Albert Roussel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 8 - 1933

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday Is Season's Last

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert in Providence.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will open the programme appropriately with Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture "The Russian Easter", based on ritual themes of the old orthodox Russian church. Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" will also be played. The Symphony which will close both the concert and the season will be the Second of Brahms in D major. This is also timely since the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms will be celebrated in all parts of the musical world this Spring.

Of Such Were The Habits of Herr Johannes

From Brahms's Daily Life, Homely Anecdotage, Plainly Told

Trans. Apr. 8

IN enjoying that exquisite flower of civilization and culture, the music of Johannes Brahms, it startles one to realize suddenly the sort of earth from which this flower grew. Brahms's ancestors were the rough folk who lived close to the soil of the Dithmarsch, a low region of fen and moor near the mouths of the Elbe and Weser Rivers.

Never for a moment was he ashamed of these good people. In 1884, when he had long been an affluent celebrity, he registered with the authorities of Mürzzuschlag as "itinerant musician." This nonsense held in solution as much sense as most of his flippant utterances. It was in the nature of a salute to his stout-hearted sire, Johann Jacob Brahms, and conjured up a vision of that small-town lad setting out from his disapproving birthplace, Heide, double-bass on back, to become a strolling scraper in the dives and narrow courtyards of Hamburg, until good luck made him bass-fiddler in a pass-around-the-hat orchestra on the Alster Basin.

Before he was ten, Johannes Jr., suffered many of the hardships of itinerancy. Often he was awakened to pound the piano all night in the lowest sort of sailors' dance halls. Later in life he reacted against this irregular existence very much as the typical small-town or country person usually reacts against bohemia-with-a-small-b. His unconscious mind harked back of his father's Eichendorffianly adventurous generation, to the stand-patness of his more remote and solid, rural ancestors.

This stand-patness is neatly represented in Brahms's anxiety for an official position as conductor or director, long after reaching a point where he had not the slightest need of the salary, and even recognized that such duties must injure his creative work. For a safe, assured position of authority is, to the peasant's type of mind, the loftiest thing in the world; whereas the unattached man, the bohemian, connotes that most contemptible of creatures, the vagabond, who is likely to come begging for a cup of his valuable coffee, or even to steal his chickens. In the country, every unfettered artist is frowned upon as a frivolous ne'er-do-weel.

Clothes and the Man

Brahms on Holiday

Snapshot at Ischl, September, 1893

(By Courtesy of the Voss ne Zeitung)

Two barely reconcilable characters struggled forever within him. They are well described in the title of the best-known work of von Suppé, whose proudest distinction it is to have his tomb near that of Brahms—the Poet and Peasant. In this duality our hero was consistently loyal to his heritage; for the Dithmarscher is the most poetic and musical of all German peasants.

In the matter of clothes, Brahms was true to the people from whom he sprang His hat would have been a wind-fall for a comedian playing the country cousin. Highly proletarian were his favorite, cuffless, flannel shirts and the frequent absence of collar and tie, more or less masked by his splendid beard.

The court pianist of the Duke of Cumberland at Gmüden remembers how the duke once invited Brahms over from Ischl for a visit. Aggravated by a characteristic love of contradiction, the master's democratic instincts led him to indulge in the fiction that he could not come because he had no dress coat. Through a lady-in-waiting, the duke wrote back that it was Brahms they wanted, not his clothes, and to come in whatever he had on.

This was taken au pied de la lettre, and the celebrity actually appeared in a flannel shirt without a necktie, and in the faded alpaca coat which is now in the Gmüden Museum. An English lady who was then staying at the castle, has told me how, before Brahms's next visit there, "we were afraid he would come again in that awful, collarless shirt. So I hurried into town and bought a wide selection of white collars and a bow tie which I thought suitable for an artist. Sure enough! Brahms turned up in his Jaeger shirt. We finally cajoled him into putting on a turn-down white collar and the tie. But he wasn't very amiable at the duke's.

"When it was all over, and I was seeing him off at the station, he suddenly longed for a glass of beer. I recall with what boyish gusto he tore the nice, white tablecloth from the little restaurant table and cast it on the ground, then ripped off the collar and tie with a huge snort of relief and hurled them after the tablecloth."

Brahms's outer garments were informed with his homespun personality. Everyone who inspects those clothes of his in the Gmüden Museum, notices their homely, rural quality. His industry and Spartan economy are shown by the patches and mends on the right elbow of the alpaca coat, dressed in which he created so much beauty. Here and there it is faded, from dark gray almost to light yellow. The shoulders are so small and narrow that Widmann's reference to his "herculean shoulders" must have been poetic exaggeration—or else the master's very bones must have shrunk extraordinarily during his last illness. But the waist-band bears witness that he was what the garment industry so elegantly terms "full-fashioned." The black trousers have an enormous brown patch on the seat and a black patch in front.

Like the trousers of a true countryman, his own were always hitched up to ankle height. Bodenscheu, ground-shy, the Austrians call such garments. When the tailor, egged on by certain Brahmins, was bold enough to make them the proper length in defiance of orders, Brahms attacked the Gordian pants with his paper shears and simply cut them down to ankle length.

Continued on Following Page

Of Such Were The Habits of Herr Johannes

Continued from Preceding Page

Sometimes he sheared and slashed without overmuch regard for the laws of symmetry. An American who spent his summers in Ischl as a lad, tells me that "while both Brahmsian pants legs were shy of the ground, one was decidedly shyer than the other. We urchins once mailed him a piece of cloth with directions for piecing out the shorter leg."

Perhaps if these boys had realized how helpless and hopeless their victim was in the matter of tailoring, they would have relented. Sir George Henschel recalls that one day Brahms tore from his shirt the button which fastened the collar. "He was sadly embarrassed, so I helped him out. We went to my room. I took my sewing kit and sewed the button on, which awakened memories of his youth: 'Yes, as I first set out from home on my adventures, mother packed a sewing kit in my bag, and showed me how it should be used. But I still recall quite well that when my pants tore I stuck them together with sealing wax. The only trouble was, they didn't hold very long. . . .'"

There was a touch of peasant uncouthness about Brahms's squat body, about his vigorous and somewhat ungainly walk—the way he slightly toed in with his right foot, the startling texture of his hands which, as the late Frau Gottinger-Wilt assured me, "were always very rough—hard and rough as files"—owing perhaps to economy in gloves.

But when one looked above the homespun body to the admirable head with the superb brow, the great, blue eyes, the aristocratic modeling of the nose, the sensitive yet virile mouth—one almost saw a sort of noble radiance about him. There the poet began—the tone-poet of genius.

The Italians who, as a race, are highly sensitive to visual impressions, often recognized at sight the human superiority of this queerly-dressed little figure. Widmann tells how, more than once, when the master had fallen asleep in a corner of the railway carriage, he overheard his fellow travelers confiding to one another in whispers that yonder must be "un uomo di genio," a man of genius.

In his boyhood he had to put up with uncomfortable and primitive housing conditions. A member of the Viennese Philharmonic Orchestra who once made a pilgrimage to the master's birth-house, asked the elder Brahms how on earth he had managed to squeeze his double-bass up those exclusive stairs; for such was their narrowness that even coffins had to be lowered from the windows. Even in his last Vienna apartment, however, the standard of comfort was curiously low. It had no bathroom and was hard to heat, though to him this was comparative luxury; for he had moved there from a room which could not be heated at all. The living quarters could be reached only through the bed-chamber. Though the furniture was ugly and uncomfortable, he resolutely frustrated the housekeeper's efforts to replace it with anything better.

That this was the sort of simplicity of which his rustic throwback heartily approved, is shown by his letter to Clara about Menzel, the painter. "It gives me special pleasure that he is the only one of our famous men who lives in the most modest and frugal way. His rooms are not half as large and lofty as yours, and you've never seen so ultra-simple a studio."

Frau Gottinger-Wilt assured me that Brahms took small pride in his environment, and that his visitors had a hard time finding a place to sit down, because all the chairs were usually full of books and music. Photographs of his library show volumes piled on volumes in apparent disorder. But, according to his housekeeper, "he knew by heart the position of every single book; and, on his travels, would write me to send him, for example, the fifth from the left on the second shelf from the top."

Many of his habits, too, told of his humble ancestry and early surroundings. The gross sounds of moaning, sighing, grunting, puffing, snorting, groaning, etc., that issued from him at the keyboard were somewhat reminiscent of noises made by robust peasants in sleeping, or eating, or during violent exertion.

He was less a slave of the clock than most city folks. "In order to know when it is time to sleep," he often declared, "I never look at my watch. I do that only mornings, to find out when it is time to get up." That time was early enough to dismay the city-bred. Like any plough-boy, he was always up at dawn, and did the greater part of his creative work before breakfast, pacing the woods and meadows.

In a homely, personal way he used to interest himself in his own food supply. Frau Professor Engelmann has told me how, when he was her guest in Holland, he liked to go marketing with her. He gloated especially over the contents of those fish-halls for which Holland is famous. And he loudly demanded whitebait, which had been the favorite food of poor folks like the Brahmses when he was a slum boy in Hamburg.

In Vienna he had a particular weakness for the delicacies purveyed by the Kalbecks, whose daughter writes me: "In my mind's eye I see a well-stocked table full of variegated glasses and bottles. Father walks about it and keeps on filling the guests's glasses. My brother and I see all this through the open door. There at the head of the table sits the 'uncle' with the long, white-flowing beard. The laughter with which he signs receipts for jokes, roars its way out to us. Yes, Uncle Brahms can drink and eat! Mother would have a big herring salad made for him and he would spoon the whole dish empty, because he loved it so. Indeed, we once went with our nurse to his home in the Karlsgasse to carry him a gigantic portion of this same salad."

He was especially attached to that coarse, proletarian dish, Rindspilaw (beef-pilaf). One summer at the Hotel Post in Ischl, when certain too-elegant visitors had deprived him of this for days, he ordered three portions of it, and dispatched them one after the other, thus vindicating his native Hamburg's reputation as the mother of doughty trenchermen.

When it came to financial affairs, Brahms was atavistically disinclined to invest his money. If let alone he would doubtless have buried his savings in the traditional peasant's stocking.

In nearly everything which had to do with expenditure on himself he was as close-fisted as a countryman. Once he refused three manuscript cantatas by his patron saint, J. S. Bach, which an intimate friend had taken pains to secure for him at a tremendous bargain, and which he dearly coveted. And he viewed with apprehension the least sums spent on him by friends. In 1881, famous and well-off, he wrote Clara: "My best thanks for your friendly idea of buying me a traveling bag. What I have in that line really ought to do me. Truly I am a person so far from spoiled and sophisticated that such a gift would be sheer waste."

It is touching to read the modest, frugal, monotonous entries in the little account book, now in my possession, which the Spring family kept of their expenditures for Brahms in 1887, the second summer he passed under their roof in Thun, Switzerland. It reveals that his one personal extravagance was nothing more high-flown than shoe-leather.

When it came to spending money on others, however, all peasantry ceased. Avarice went to the winds, and he became the most generous of men. That is, with two exceptions. We all have our pet stinginesses. Both of his were homespun: a reluctance to put enough stamps on his letters and to pay duty on what he smoked.

He was always asking his foreign friends, when they visited Austria, to smuggle tobacco across the frontier. Once he himself turned contrabandist, but with disastrous results. Kalbeck tells how Brahms hid a large quantity of his favorite Turkish mixture in his bag, with, as he fondly supposed, an imaginative cunning calculated to deceive the ablest of customs sleuths. But at the frontier, to his unspeakable dismay, the revenue officers unerringly and promptly drew forth a thing that looked like an amputated leg. The master had stuffed a stocking full, not of savings but of tobacco, under the naive impression that no official would bother with such a thing. This whimsy cost the composer loud cries of rage and anguish, the amputated leg and a fine of seventy gulden.

ROBERT HAVEN SCHAUFFLER

[Reprinted with many omissions from The Musical Quarterly. The article forms part of Mr. Schauffler's forthcoming book "The Unknown Brahms, A Revaluation of His Life, Character and Works, Based on New Material," to be published by Dodd, Mead & Co.]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 9 - 1933

As Music Goes

By Dr. W. Louis Chapman

Concerning the Boston Symphony's Final Program Tuesday Night.—"Russian Easter" an Example of Genuine Nationalism in Music

Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings its season to a close with a concert of distinctly Russian and German music. Nationalism in music is at best a secondary consideration. The first should be of the merits of the music itself and unelss the thought of nationalism is introduced for some purpose its genesis may be disregarded. When it is considered, however, one must be sure that its nationalism is evident and genuine.

There can be no doubt of this in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture. We are plainly told that it is Russian in its character and that the music points directly to that most solemn season of the Christian year. We know but little of the Russian Church in this country. Occasional visiting choirs, touring for concert purposes, bring us at rare intervals music that is strongly rhythmic, expression that is almost frenzied in its impassioned utterance, deep-voiced basses and tenors that use the high falsetto voice far more than any other class of musicians. We tolerate in a chorus what we would not allow for a moment in a soloist. The gargling basses we have learned to associate with Russian cathedrals because they are found nowhere else in the world.

Inseparable from the Russian cathedral are the bells. They are pealed, they are swung without any attempt at tone, time or unity. The effect is unlike the chimes of England, the carillons of Belgium or America or the hymn-tune-singing chimes of this country. There is a barbaric wildness in such bell ringing, the infusion of the Tartar element into the religious which makes the music individual and unique.

The bell motive enters very largely into this "Russian Easter" overture and persists throughout the work. We do not know the genesis of the liturgic chants which the trombones announce in the earlier parts of the overture. They are not Gregorian and seem to be from a far earlier and less cultured period than the sixth century. At all events the effect is inspiring and magnetic. In structure the overture is much more simple than most compositions of Rimsky; in material and in development his musical figures are quite elementary, sonority taking the place of his usual richness of orchestration.

Great Tone Poem

"Death and Transfiguration" is one of the really great tone poems of Richard Strauss. This is not a common subject for musical delineation. Occasionally a "funeral march" is found as in Chopin's sonata, opus 34, or as in Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Grieg put it to us very plainly in his "Death of Aase" in his "Peer Gynt" Suite, which was looked upon with much favor at the time of its composition. But it has remained for composers of far greater technical resources to create ampler atmosphere and elucidation.

It is not enough for a composer to create a few minor chords, punctuated by the solemn note of the kettledrum to provoke meditation upon the great mysteries of life, or by resounding chords to glorify the doctrine of transfiguration. In these days of light and life we admit the greatness of Strauss, who exercises orchestral abstraction against the far less effective methods of other ocmposers who are concrete in their expositions and tell a simple story or tale rather than a many hued tone poem, rich in orchestral color and suggestive in mobility of musical thought.

The poem begins with muted strings in thirds which serve as a basis for upbuilding with horns, bassoons and that most noble of all reeds, the bass clarinet. To this threnodic chord the weavings of the elegiac harp are soon added. The pace becomes more rapid and the music is agitated, even tumultuous; the scoring is more involved, leading up to a tremendous chord of D-flat by the entire orchestra, with the fullest voices of trombones and the tuba.

Spiritual unrest is suggested by characteristic Straussian figures of ascending chromatic thirds with punctuation by the harp and rhythmic violin figures which lead to what we may call the theme of redemptoin. This is announced very softly by the entire orchestra, predominated by the harps. It is a figure of musical speech of surpassingly noble beauty and has become accepted as the most worthy exposition of this sublime religious thought yet accomplished in music. Its repetition in various keys in the latter part of the work only makes it more convincing and its solemnity more profound. This tone poem is one of the great compositions in contemporaneous music, it is music of all time and its performance in this city is a distinctly notable event.

Brahm's Symphony

Following this colossal work comes the beautiful Second Symphony of Brahms. Acknowledged by all as one of the most beautiful of all symphonies it is dearer to some than any other symphony of any period. To this symphony Brahms brought some of the most choice musical material of his entire career. Melodies which are imperishable, moments of sprightly vivacity that are unsurpassed by any writer and opportunities for orchestral coloration which impress, intrigue and captivate. No other symphony of Brahms is like it, none are worthy of more frequent repetition.

One may many times allude to the common chord in the analysis of this work, yet no composer has honored this humble and much overworked musical element with more gorgeous musical vesture or adorned it with more colorful habiliments. Many at this concert will recall familiar parts and musical figures because of a former hearing this very season by the Cleveland Orchestra in the Community Concert series.

This writer would offer no objection and would be pleased to attend each concert, were this symphony played weekly during the season, so satisfying is its musical material, so beautiful its themes and musical thoughts. From the first soft notes, deep in the bass, to the last carillon-like allegro of the final movement there is a series of delicious surprises and kaleidoscopic changes which give almost unlimited variety of musical thoughts, each worthy of separate consideration and familiarity. If the eloquent solemnities of "Tod and Verklarung" have depressed, the glowing beauties of this symphony will cheer; if one has taken to himself profound sentiments the more free and motile versatilities of Brahms will compensate, and one will leave with mingled feelings of pleasure and refreshment.

It is quite safe to guarantee these reactions and to promise happy uplift from this music which contains no suggestion of the superficial or the ordinary, yet is so simple in its complex artistic perfection and in the beauty of its architecture that it cannot fail to impress and please. Did Brahms write but this symphony, his would be a place in the sun and in the empyrean.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final Providence concert for the season Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 9 - 1933

Fourth of Boston Symphony Concerts Tuesday Evening

Orchestra to Close Providence Season With Program Presenting Works by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss and Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closes its season of Providence concerts with its fourth program Tuesday night in the Albee Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen an appropriate work with which to open his program in Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "A Russian Easter," which is based on ritual themes of the old orthodox Russion church. Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," will follow and, finally, Brahms's Second Symphony, in D-major.

This afternoon at 4 o'clock Dr. W. Louis Chapman will conclude his series of talks on the Boston Symphony programs in the Providence Public Library. Large audiences at these lectures have proved the appreciation of students and music lovers in taking advantage of the opportunity to become better acquainted with the symphony selections, and it has become necessary to limit the number of seats, due to the size of the hall, and to provide ushers. The lectures are given under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and are free to the public. Their popularity this season has assured their establishment in this city.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 9 - 1933

Boston Symphony Music at Library

Books in Connection With Tuesday's Program Are Also Available

The music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday, will be found in the music collection at the Providence Public Library in the following arrangements: Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture on themes of the Russian church, arranged for a piano duet; Strauss's "Tod und Verklarung," for piano solo, and Brahm's Second Symphony, for piano solo, piano duet and miniature orchestral score.

Books of interest in connection with this program that will be found helpful because of their descriptive notes or other critical material on the music to be played have been assembled in the music department. Among these may be mentioned "Symphonic Broadcasts" by Downes; "Symphonies and Their Meaning," by Goepp; "Concert-Goer's Library of Descriptive Notes," by Newmarch; "Standard Concert Guide," and "Standard Concert Repertory," by Upton.

Among other books throwing light on the works and the lives of these composers which may be read with profit are Rimsky-Korsakoff's autobiography, "My Musical Life," and "Richard Strauss, the Man and His Works," by H. T. Finck, which contains Ritter's poem in the original German, in the form adopted by Strauss for his score. The English prose translation is also given. Also Paul Rosenfeld's "Musical Portraits," which interprets the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff and of Strauss. In addition, concerning Strauss, there are "Musical Studies" by Newman; "Musicans of Today," by Rolland; "Contemporary Composers," by Mason; "Modern Music and Musicians," by Streatfield, and "Three Great Epoch-Makers in Music," by Fransworth.

For Brahms and his music there are biographies by May, Pulver and Specht, and a critical essay on Brahms by Cecil Gray in "The Heritage of Music."

"Score Reading," a musical manual by Martin Bernstein, just received, should aid students who wish to master this difficult art. It consists of musical exerpts from classical masterpieces so arranged and graded as to present systematically the various elements of score-reading.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

APR 11 1933

Orchestra Plans Brahms Festival

In commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Johannes Brahms, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Kousevitsky, will give a Brahms festival in Boston from April 26 to April 30. This is to consist of six concerts, five of them to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, and other on April 27, in Sanders Theatre, at Harvard University.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanroma, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, as well as a group of the orchestra's string players will be the soloists.

Among the works to be presented at the festival are the First, Second and Fourth Symphonies; the German Requiem which the Trenton Choral Art Society sang here last night, concertos, overtures and songs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW YORK MIRROI

APR 9 - 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

The matinee enterprise of Mr. Koussevitzky and his band in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon brought us two items of moment, Sibelius's seventh symphony and a suite in F by Roussel. The Sibelius, not particularly concerned with the customary murmuring pines and hemlocks, is a more intimate and compact work than any of the others. As for the other—well, it is Roussel, and there you are. A particularly brilliant performance of Tchaikowsky's fifth preserved the balance of excellence ...And the young men of the Harvard Glee Club sang in the Town Hall.

* * *

ning, Mr. Toscanini will conduct

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 9 - 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programs for Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening in Boston appropriately include Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Russian Easter," the Transformation Music and Grail scene from Act I of "Parsifal," as well as Arnold Bax's Second symphony. The Harvard Glee Club, under Dr. Archibald T. Davison, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, will participate. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

163

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 9 - 1933

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Sibelius, the Solitary Dreamer of the North, Newly Revealed in a Koussevitzky Interpretation.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra~~ gave their final New York concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The Albert Roussel suite in F major opened this concert. It is a vigorous and clean-cut piece of writing. A few years ago it might have been thought that Mr. Roussel was a little dry. Yesterday he was warmth and temperament personified, after the "Rebus" of the youthful and precociously gifted Markeivitch heard at the Boston Symphony concert of two evenings previous.

The Roussel suite is extremely well written, with modern harmonic and polyphonic ideas. The prelude makes a brave opening after the old style, but the old style infused with later idioms. The slow movement maintains this pitch of excellence in a different vein. For his finale Roussel has taken a theme in the manner of a French country dance, and while the movement is the least substantial part of the work, it, too, has esprit, as it has appropriate brevity.

The Seventh symphony of Sibelius came next. This is one of the late Sibelius symphonies which leave the epic quality of the earlier symphonies behind and become the voice of the solitary dreamer of the North—the man himself, who finds nature more important and more sincere than men, and echoes the communications of the natural world in his music. The form of the symphony, written in a single movement, is very close-knit and concentrated, but also very supple—in such a way that it permits the composer entirely unhampered freedom and individuality of expression.

Sibelius has kept entirely free of the influence of any school or clique of composers, yet has anticipated rather than followed the modern idea which dispenses with excessive coloring and emphasizes line, simplicity and transparency of style. Before "The Six" and Stravinsky of the aftermath of "Sacre du printemps," or Prokofieff, or very much of Hindemith or the late Schoenberg—before all these apostles of austerity and linear development had impressed their ideas on the public, Sibelius had written his Fourth symphony That symphony, as also the Sixth and the Seventh, are works still ahead of their time. They are the purest, the most absolute kind of symphonic music written today.

The music is the more profound for that fact. The writer of it must needs be very solitary, for he has little to do with the traffic or the march of events about him. There is a higher and more enduring place, and a more enduring message than the lower slopes of a composer's development make possible. The Seventh symphony is one of the triumphs of a composer who has always kept aloof from the marts and the crowd, and lived for the things of the spirit.

The concert ended with Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony was again a sophisticated audience was stirred beyond itself by this very emotional and sincere music. With Mr. Koussevitzky no detail lost its significance, and the performance was one of cumulative eloquence and power. The audience remained some time at the end of the concert to applaud and "bravo."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SANTA BARBARA, CAL.
PRESS

A Revelation

ONE OF the stories which come along occasionally and touch us in a manner that brings a glow to some of the little lights that have blown out along the way is this: Olin Downes, formerly of Boston, and now the musical critic on the staff of the New York Times, went abroad last year with Lawrence Tibbett.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony had asked Mr. Downes to do him a favor. Would he call upon Sibelius in the high peaks of old Tyrol and find out whether or not the grand old man of contemporary symphonic genius had started his new orchestration? Downes scaled the steep path to the rock garden, and found Sibelius. Eagerly he asked him about the new symphony. The intellectual and musical giant answered him quite calmly—"It is finished." Downes' emotion was prodigious. Sibelius, conceded to be the greatest of all moderns, had completed another work. Visions of seeing it, even of perhaps taking it back to Boston for another glorious premiere almost choked him. "Oh, how magnificent. Could I see it?"

"But," answered the master, "you see, the hands, they are not quite steady any more, and the eyes, they become dimmer. The symphony is finished, but I have been unable as yet to write it down." That was all. Think of it. An entire symphony completed in that massive brain, awaiting the will of the aged eye and hand to write it down.

What a commentary upon the present day carpentry in composition. What a revelation of the really great as compared to the modern musical plagiarist who snatches here and there in a desperate effort to pad a melodic theme. A great work is finished, and carried alive within a single mind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 9 1933

Boston Symphony Offers Program of Modern Music

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its farewell concert for the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, offered a program of modern music. The usual capacity audience was present and by its interested reception and enthusiastic response manifested approval and admiration of the conducting of Serge Kousswitzky and the performance ~~of his~~ men.

The concert began with Roussel's F major suite whose three movements were dedicated by the composer to yesterday's conductor. Its message reflected the harmonic manner of musical invention free from the obsessions of the modernists who insist upon discovering "effects" definitely divorced from the classic rules of composition. The work was performed with the earnestness and purpose that communicated its essence and revealed the magnificent tone quality of the instruments.

SYMPHONY OFFERED.

Sibelus' seventh symphony, presented as a single movement, was the second number on the list. The symphony was composed eight years ago as a contribution to an English Music Festival. Yesterday marked its sixth presentation in the United States. A composition of stupendous appeal, richly embellished with tonal arabesques of varied design—suggesting a magnificent and artfully woven and tinted tapestry—it was read with a rare blending of the orchestral choirs, its changeful moods eloquently indicated by the director and revealed by his sensitive interpreters.

The cosmopolitan collection followed the French and Finnish numbers with the Russian Tscaikovsky's fifth symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

APR 9 - 1933

Koussevitzky Ends New York Concert Series

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Sibelius's 7th at Carnegie Hall Matinee

Performs Roussel Suite

Toscanini Conducts Philharmonic in the Evening

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, ended its forty-seventh season of New York concerts yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, where the notable Russian leader devoted the first half of his program to music of the last decade, Albert Roussel's suite in F and Jan Sibelius's seventh symphony, and then gave Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony for the Bostonian swan song of 1932-'33.

Both of the modern works on the list had been introduced to us by Mr. Koussevitzky in 1927, the symphony in January and the suite in April. Five days after its first New York hearing, the symphony was repeated by the New York Symphony under Fritz Busch, and was again offered by the Bostonians two years later. The Philharmonic has played the Roussel suite here in November, 1927, under Willem Mengelberg, and December, 1931, under Vladimir Golschmann.

Performance Wins Praise

Time was when Sibelius was regarded as a rather neglected genius, as far as performances of his works by American orchestras was concerned, but in the last year or two he has been getting no little attention from conductors of our major Eastern symphonic organizations, if not more than he deserves. For his Boston audiences, Mr. Koussevitzky has given all seven symphonies in their order; Sibelius has also been represented this season in Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestra programs.

Whether all or some of the seven symphonies or other major works of the Finnish composer will gain a place in the standard repertoire in the near or remoter future is a question to be answered by prophets more discerning than this writer, but most of the later symphonies bear repetition well, revealing an eloquence and emotional depth not to be exhausted in one or two hearings. The dark hued, not obvious, but richly expressive seventh symphony was admirably played yesterday by an orchestra and a conductor that have done notable work in making this composer's music known to concert-goers.

Roussell's Suite Gets Seventh Hearing

Roussel's suite, played yesterday for the seventh time, is music of a far different character: pleasant, spirited, vividly and variously colored, adroitly constructed and effectively scored. It remains, indeed, on the surface, with few emotional revelations or implications. Some of us may have begun to feel that clever music of this kind, combining eighteenth century forms with harmonies of the 1920s, has become all too fashionable among composers of the day, but Roussel's work remains one of the most likeable examples of this style.

The Tchaikovsky symphony was brilliantly, communicatively played, although this admirer of Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra found the first movement over-interpreted, what with the many and accentuated changes of pace in a highly individual reading. There was ardent applause at the close, and several recalls for the conductor before the subscribers were willing to bid farewell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 9 - 1933

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Sibelius, the Solitary Dreamer of the North, Newly Revealed in a Koussevitzky Interpretation.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Sergei Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra~~ gave their final New York concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The Albert Roussel suite in F major opened this concert. It is a vigorous and clean-cut piece of writing. A few years ago it might have been thought that Mr. Roussel was a little dry. Yesterday he was warmth and temperament personified, after the "Rebus" of the youthful and precociously gifted Markeivitch heard at the Boston Symphony concert of two evenings previous.

The Roussel suite is extremely well written, with modern harmonic and polyphonic ideas. The prelude makes a brave opening after the old style, but the old style infused with later idioms. The slow movement maintains this pitch of excellence in a different vein. For his finale Roussel has taken a theme in the manner of a French country dance, and while the movement is the least substantial part of the work, it, too, has esprit, as it has appropriate brevity.

The Seventh symphony of Sibelius came next. This is one of the late Sibelius symphonies which leave the epic quality of the earlier symphonies behind and become the voice of the solitary dreamer of the North—the man himself, who finds nature more important and more sincere than men, and echoes the communications of the natural world in his music. The form of the symphony, written in a single movement, is very close-knit and concentrated, but also very supple—in such a way that it permits the composer entirely unhampered freedom and individuality of expression.

Sibelius has kept entirely free of the influence of any school or clique of composers, yet has anticipated rather than followed the modern idea which dispenses with excessive coloring and emphasizes line, simplicity and transparency of style. Before "The Six" and Stravinsky of the aftermath of "Sacre du printemps," or Prokofieff, or very much of Hindemith or the late Schoenberg—before all these apostles of austerity and linear development had impressed their ideas on the public, Sibelius had written his Fourth symphony That symphony, as also the Sixth and the Seventh, are works still ahead of their time. They are the purest, the most absolute kind of symphonic music written today.

The music is the more profound for that fact. The writer of it must needs be very solitary, for he has little to do with the traffic or the march of events about him. There is a higher and more enduring place, and a more enduring message than the lower slopes of a composer's development make possible. The Seventh symphony is one of the triumphs of a composer who has always kept aloof from the marts and the crowd, and lived for the things of the spirit.

The concert ended with Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony was again a sophisticated audience was stirred beyond itself by this very emotional and sincere music. With Mr. Koussevitzky no detail lost its significance, and the performance was one of cumulative eloquence and power. The audience remained some time at the end of the concert to applaud and "bravo."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SANTA BARBARA, CAL.
PRESS

APR 9 1933

A Revelation

ONE OF the stories which come along occasionally and touch us in a manner that brings a glow to some of the little lights that have blown out along the way is this: Olin Downes, formerly of Boston, and now the musical critic on the staff of the New York Times, went abroad last year with Lawrence Tibbett.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony had asked Mr. Downes to do him a favor. Would he call upon Sibelius in the high peaks of old Tyrol and find out whether or not the grand old man of contemporary symphonic genius had started his new orchestration? Downes scaled the steep path to the rock garden, and found Sibelius. Eagerly he asked him about the new symphony. The intellectual and musical giant answered him quite calmly—"It is finished." Downes' emotion was prodigious. Sibelius, conceded to be the greatest of all moderns, had completed another work. Visions of seeing it, even of perhaps taking it back to Boston for another glorious premiere almost choked him. "Oh, how magnificent. Could I see it?"

"But," answered the master, "you see, the hands, they are not quite steady any more, and the eyes, they become dimmer. The symphony is finished, but I have been unable as yet to write it down." That was all. Think of it. An entire symphony completed in that massive brain, awaiting the will of the aged eye and hand to write it down.

What a commentary upon the present day carpentry in composition. What a revelation of the really great as compared to the modern musical plagiarist who snatches here and there in a desperate effort to pad a melodic theme. A great work is finished, and carried alive within a single mind.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. AMERICAN

APR 9 1933

Boston Symphony Offers Program of Modern Music

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its farewell concert for the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, offered a program of modern music. The usual capacity audience was present and by its interested reception and enthusiastic response manifested approval and admiration of the conducting of Serge Kousswitzky and the performance ~~of his~~ men.

The concert began with Roussel's F major suite whose three movements were dedicated by the composer to yesterday's conductor. Its message reflected the harmonic manner of musical invention free from the obsessions of the modernists who insist upon discovering "effects" definitely divorced from the classic rules of composition. The work was performed with the earnestness and purpose that communicated its essence and revealed the magnificent tone quality of the instruments.

SYMPHONY OFFERED.

Sibelus' seventh symphony, presented as a single movement, was the second number on the list. The symphony was composed eight years ago as a contribution to an English Music Festival. Yesterday marked its sixth presentation in the United States. A composition of stupendous appeal, richly embellished with tonal arabesques of varied design—suggesting a magnificent and artfully woven and tinted tapestry—it was read with a rare blending of the orchestral choirs, its changeful moods eloquently indicated by the director and revealed by his sensitive interpreters.

The cosmopolitan collection followed the French and Finnish numbers with the Russian Tscaikovsky's fifth symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

APR 9 - 1933

Koussevitzky Ends New York Concert Series

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Sibelius's 7th at Carnegie Hall Matinee

Performs Roussel Suite

Toscanini Conducts Philharmonic in the Evening

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, ended its forty-seventh season of New York concerts yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, where the notable Russian leader devoted the first half of his program to music of the last decade, Albert Roussel's suite in F and Jan Sibelius's seventh symphony, and then gave Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony for the Bostonian swan song of 1932-'33.

Both of the modern works on the list had been introduced to us by Mr. Koussevitzky in 1927, the symphony in January and the suite in April. Five days after its first New York hearing, the symphony was repeated by the New York Symphony under Fritz Busch, and was again offered by the Bostonians two years later. The Philharmonic has played the Roussel suite here in November, 1927, under Willem Mengelberg, and December, 1931, under Vladimir Golschmann.

Performance Wins Praise

Time was when Sibelius was regarded as a rather neglected genius, as far as performances of his works by American orchestras was concerned, but in the last year or two he has been getting no little attention from conductors of our major Eastern symphonic organizations, if not more than he deserves. For his Boston audiences, Mr. Koussevitzky has given all seven symphonies in their order; Sibelius has also been represented this season in Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestra programs.

Whether all or some of the seven symphonies or other major works of the Finnish composer will gain a place in the standard repertoire in the near or remoter future is a question to be answered by prophets more discerning than this writer, but most of the later symphonies bear repetition well, revealing an eloquence and emotional depth not to be exhausted in one or two hearings. The dark hued, not obvious, but richly expressive seventh symphony was admirably played yesterday by an orchestra and a conductor that have done notable work in making this composer's music known to concertgoers.

Roussell's Suite Gets Seventh Hearing

Roussel's suite, played yesterday for the seventh time, is music of a far different character; pleasant, spirited, vividly and variously colored, adroitly constructed and effectively scored. It remains, indeed, on the surface, with few emotional revelations or implications. Some of us may have begun to feel that clever music of this kind, combining eighteenth century forms with harmonies of the 1920s, has become all too fashionable among composers of the day, but Roussel's work remains one of the most likeable examples of this style.

The Tchaikovsky symphony was brilliantly, communicatively played, although this admirer of Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra found the first movement over-interpreted, what with the many and accentuated changes of pace in a highly individual reading. There was ardent applause at the close, and several recalls for the conductor before the subscribers were willing to bid farewell.

164

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

APR 9 - 1933

Ends Season Here

Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the equally noted Boston Symphony Orchestra, which closed its New York series of concerts yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 9 - 1933

BOSTON, CINCINNATI FESTIVALS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has made public in Boston his plans for the Brahms festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in that city from April 26 to 30 in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth. Of six concerts, five will be in Symphony Hall, Boston, and one, on April 27, in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University.

Assisting artists are Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanromá, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club, under Dr. Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, and a group of the orchestra's string players, including Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc, Jean Cauhapé and Jean Bedetti.

Following are the programs selected from Brahms's works:

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 26.
Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 4, E minor.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 27.
Sonata, A major, violin and piano.
Soprano songs.
"Liebeslieder" waltzes for chorus.
String quintet in G major.

THURSDAY EVENING (SANDERS THEATRE).
"Academic Festival" overture.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 2, D major.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AND SATURDAY EVENING.
"Academic Festival" overture.
Piano concerto No. 2, B flat.
Symphony No. 1, C minor.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30.
"A German Requiem."

* * *

CINCINNATI'S thirtieth biennial May festival takes place in the Music Hall of that city this Spring, with six concerts scheduled from May 2 to 6, including two matinees. Eugene Goossens, despite his recent illness, has for some time been announced as musical director of the festival, following his service as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The Festival Chorus, as well as a special children's choir assisting in the Bach Mass, has been prepared by Alfred Hartzel, chorus master since 1908.

Works to be sung and assisting artists are as follows:

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 2.
Handel's "Samson," with Mmes. Matzenauer, Kathryn Meisle and Emily Roosevelt; Messrs. Robert Steel, Ezio Pinza, Herbert Gould and Joseph Schenke.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 3.
Bach's Mass in B minor, with Mmes. Grete Stueckgold and Margaret Matzenauer, Messrs. Richard Crooks and Ezio Pinza.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 4.
Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," serenade for wind instruments and three arias, sung by Mme. Stueckgold, violin obbligato by Emil Heerman.
Brahms's rhapsody for male chorus, with Miss Meisle, contralto, and the First symphony of Brahms.

FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 5.
Wagner's "Mastersingers," six excerpts, with Miss Roosevelt, Messrs. Crooks, Dan Beddoe and Gould.
William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a cantata, with Mr. Gould as soloist.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 6.
Beethoven's symphony No. 1, the song "Adelaide," sung by Mr. Beddoe, and the Ninth symphony, with Mmes. Roosevelt and Meisle, Messrs. Beddoe and Pinza.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 6.
Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," with Mme. Matzenauer, Messrs. Steel, Gould and Robert J. Thuman.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. JOURNAL

APR 10 1933

Music

More Sibelius By Bostonians

—By Irving Weil—

For his farewell of the season at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky, directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented his audience with one of the best balanced and most interestingly chosen programs that New York has listened to since last Fall. None of the music performed was new but the greater part of it was the sort that demands—and so seldom gets—renewal of acquaintance.

Mr. Koussevitzky began his afternoon with the Suite in F by Albert Roussel, the French composer who so completely changed his style of writing after the war. This is music with a modern bite to it and yet not "modernistic." It was followed by the Finn, Jan Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, a strangely arresting work in a single movement. Following the intermission came the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky—for, after all, if one is going to play Tchaikovsky, let it be the real Tchaikovsky and not merely the odds and ends.

Music Today

Musicians Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Schelling conducting Ignace Paderewski's B-minor Symphony and Mr. Paderewski appearing as piano soloist in the Schumann Concerto—Metropolitan Opera House, 8:30 p. m.

From Recent Output

Bostonians, through the current season, have been having a course of the symphonies of Sibelius, but Mr. Koussevitzky of necessity has been able to present only several here. This Seventh Symphony is the Sibelius of the more recent years of composition and represents the growing subjectiveness of his intent.

There is what almost amounts to a conspiracy among writers about Sibelius—except his fellow Finns—to make him and his music seem to fulfill a kind of Byronic tradition of the North. Finland, the land of a thousand lakes, of black forests, is supposed to be the inspiration of all his music. Up to the Third Symphony this was largely true, but with the Fourth a change in significance appeared and has been growing immensely stronger ever since.

Roussel Suite

Sibelius, although he lives a comparatively secluded life in Helsingfors and nearby, has never been out of touch with the world. He has quietly visited these States several times for performances of his music. He has seemingly absorbed all the discoveries of the modernists but adapted them completely to his own purposes, his own uses. So that this Seventh Symphony strikes one most forcibly by its individuality and by its power of expression.

Hearing the Roussel Suite again after a few years. confirmed one's previous judgment that it is excellent music of its period — our own time. The quirks of the modernists are flung away and Roussel, like Sibelius, employs what he thinks good of these latter-day discoveries. The suite is remarkably cogent, well knit music and gives one a touch of the true Gallic spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK SUN

APR 10 1933

Boston Symphony Ends Season

Koussevitsky Includes Albert Roussel's Suite in Concert Program in Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its local season with the concert of Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of strictly orchestral music, a suite and two symphonies, none thrusting problems upon the minds of the auditors.

The suite, which began the concert, was that in F major, opus 33, of Albert Roussel, composed expressly for the Boston organization, and played by it for the first time anywhere January 21, 1927. Mr. Koussevitzky made New York acquainted with it at the concert of April 7 of the same year. M. Roussel is a good musician, who lives in Paris and does not believe in atonality.

The first movement of his suite is the most arresting. It is also the one in which the composer employs the most noticeable discords. But the movement has some musical meat and is well prepared. The sarabande is conspicuous chiefly for good instrumentation and the final gigue for good humor and candid melody. But the composition, as a whole, is of no great moment. It is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, which recalls a story. A Viennese musician went in a state of exaltation of the spirit to call on Wilhelm Gericke. "Oh, Mr. Gericke," he exclaimed in ecstasy, "Ravel has dedicated his latest work to me." "Serves you right," replied Mr. Gericke.

The second number of Saturday's list was the seventh symphony of Sibelius. This is a condensed work without pause between movements. It is the fashion just now to engage in vivacious and sometimes acriminous dispute about the music of Sibelius. Some declare that it is overrated and point fingers of scorn at Cecil Gray, who wrote an eulogistic book about it. Others stoutly assert that it is underrated, and that, when other musicians now occupying the attention of the philosophers on Mars Hill have been gathered to the unread pages of musical history and the shelves of unvisited libraries, Sibelius will be sitting beside the immortals.

There is no need of acerbity. The seventh symphony is good music, well made. Perhaps it is not "one of the miracles of modern music," as Mr. Gray has told us, but it will suffice. It has sound thematic material, masterly ability in development, and, above all, virile emotion. One cannot again go with Mr. Gray as far as his verdict that its Olympian serenity and repose are unique in modern music and belong to a different age and civilization. It is distinctly music of Sibelius's own mood and manner and equally it belongs to his contemporaneous view of his own world. The individuality of the composition is not that of a time or a place, but of a personality. The music speaks the familiar language of Sibelius and is, therefore, withdrawn from the turmoils and strident shouts of the market place. It is the lyric speech of a thinker who dwells much in his own land, and still more in the privacy of his own meditation. It is not the most imposing of the compositions of Sibelius, but it is a work which claims a prominent position among the creations of the last twenty years.

The concert was brought to its end with the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky. The old work—it is already called old—bears its years well when it is well performed. It was so played yesterday. True, the exceptionally rich slow movement got a rather bad start owing to uncertainties of embouchure in the horn solo. But it came out triumphant. Purists must have shaken their heads at Mr. Kousevitzky's languishing ritardando in the sobbing cantabile of the first movement. Tschaikowsky made much trouble for conductors with that episode in his score. If it is played as it should be, it sounds almost lachrymose. Tschaikowsky was a person of hysterical tendencies and his music sometimes betrays this. If a conductor tries to temper the passage by speeding up the tempo, he robs the music of all that recommends it to notice. Mr. Koussevitzky's plan was to linger lamentingly on the last phrase of the first section and then accelerate the tempo to take the sting out of the sorrow.

However, small matters should not occupy too much space in a comment. The performance in its entirety seemed to communicate to the audience the full content of the symphony, and beyond that no conductor or orchestra can be expected to go. The audience was enthusiastic and remained to bestow long continued applause on the players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NEWS

APR 10 1933

Perhaps for the first time in history a chorus rehearsed a new and difficult score without singing a single note. The score was the "Belshazzar's Feast" of William Walton, which is to be sung in public performance next month by the University of Michigan Choral union.

The first American broadcast of the Walton opus was presented recently over an NBC-WJZ network by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Cecilia Society chorus. It was heard by the Ann Arbor group through loud speakers placed on the stage in the auditorium. Members of the chorus followed the broadcast performance closely, scores in hand.

The general verdict was that numerous rehearsals would not have given so clear a conception of this complex work as the single brilliant performance by Boston Symphony and the Cecilia chorus.

After the concert Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, received from Earl V. Moore, director of the school of music at the University of Michigan, the following telegram:—

"University Choral union join me in extending congratulations on your brilliant reading of 'Belshazzar's Feast' as received during our special rehearsal tonight. Our performance will occur May 18th and your American premiere of this work gave us pleasure and inspiration. Regards best wishes to orchestra chorus and soloist."

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.

SUN

APR 12 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY BRAHMS CONCERTS

Serge Koussevitzky has made public in Boston his plans for the Brahms festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in that city from April 26 to 30 in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth. Of six concerts, five will be in Symphony Hall, Boston, and one, on April 27, in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University.

Assisting artists are Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanroma, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club, under Dr. Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, and a group of the orchestra's string players, including Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc, Jean Cauhape and Jean Bedetti.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 12 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concludes Season at Albee

Critic Enjoys Last Aesthetic Revel in "Delicate Configurations" and "Lustrous Contrapunal Weavings".—Program Is One of "Magnificent Classics".

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its season at the Albee Theatre last night in a program of magnificent classics. The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Russian Easter" overture and Brahms's symphony were particularly appropriate, the "Easter Overture" being seasonable and the 100th anniversary of the birth of Brahms being about to be celebrated.

The "overture," far less elaborate in orchestral detail than "Scherezade" and other works of this brillilant writer, is no less massive in its grandeur. It is tremendously effective and suggestive. It varies in its tonalities from simple priestly utterances to the fullest powers of the orchestra augmented by bells which suggest the clanging sonorities of Russian cathedrals. The composer's predilection for brilliant bravura cadenza-like solo passages is not forsworn but is not shown as frequently as in his other works, perhaps because of the unmistakably religious aspect of the composition.

Do any visiting celebrities bring to us more delectable tone and glittering floritura than does Mr. Burgin? Perhaps in this work he recalls his happy student days in St. Petersburg and the interruption of his practice hours by clanging of great bells.

Surely no visiting artist brings more noble 'cello tone than Mr. Bedetti or any flautist a more richly pervasive voice than Mr. Laurent.

Dr. Koussevitzsky is not averse to Russian tonal immensities or the orchestral possibilities of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Tschaikowsky. His magnetic personality and sympathy with his native music found immediate response in his men, with resulting stimulus which made for a very exalted plane of orchetral artistry throughout the concert.

The opening strings of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" with their soft suggestiveness contrasted sharply with the great tonal spaces of "The Russian Easter" and carried one abruptly from paeans of rejoicing into an atmosphere of deeply solemn suggestiveness, reflections upon the most serious things of life offered us in music. These contained but little concrete directness but through orchestral colorings hardly surpassed in this or the last generation was most potent in poetic musical speech. This work must be considered one of the finest of all illustrations of what may be termed the indirect discourse of music, where delicate musical configurations crowd the senses in wondrous orchestral workmanship, in preparation and anticipation of musical climaxes of gigantic proportions and supreme dignity.

Those who are familiar with Struass's genius of orchestration, his marvellous powers of the development of musical material of the most thoughtful type, must have taken keen delight in Dr. Koussevitsky's unfolding of this superb tone poem. All must have admired the limpid purity of Mr. Laurent's flute, the perfection of ensemble of the strings and the rich sonority of the brass section in what must be considered one of the great utterances of orchestral music.

Notable, too, was Dr. Koussevitzsky's control over his forces, together with his artistic interpretative conceptions, which brought salient musical thoughts into high relief against contrapuntal tapestries and embroideries, making a musical texture of the finest orchestral finish and richness. No small part of this magnificent coloring was accomplished by the perfection of the wood wind choir and the sweeping arpeggios of the two harps, which mean so much in this work.

Then we turned to calmer moments, less exacting and harrowing to the musical senses, to music which tells no great lesson, depicts no tremendous spiritual cataclysm or exacts no self-searching, to a symphony so replete with charming and graceful melodies that it contains enough thematic material for half a dozen symphonic poems and which must be considered one of the most beautiful of all symphonies. The constant association of this conductor and orchestra during the past few years with Brahms has made their work quite authoritative. This symphony is pure music; it has no program. At the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky and his men it was a joy and a delight. To the performers as well as to the genius of the composer must be ascribed the success of this symphony, now offered as an expression of tribute to the memory of one of the greatest composers of all time.

One noted the exquisite beauty of tone of the 'cello section, the perfection of the entire ensemble of the orchestra in the rapid figurations, the lustrous contrapuntal weavings and interplay of strings and wood wind in the graceful "andante" and in the vivacious "allegro" of the finale. If one was reminded of Beethoven and Cherubini, so much the better for both, and for us, for they make very good and kindly friends.

And so the orchestra departed in glory, after one of the best concerts it has ever given in this city. Any community which has enjoyed four concerts from this unrivalled orchestra in a season is rich indeed, yet it is one of the indisputable characterizations of the wealthy to desire more and even more wealth. It is with such commendable longing that this season closes, leaving one even at this time in the pleasurable anticipation of the return of this orchestra next season and hoping for a larger allotment of concerts.

The program:

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"The Russian Easter," Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36.
Strauss—
"Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguration") Tone Poem, Op. 24.
Brahms.. Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazio, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 12 1933

IN TERMS OF MUSIC,
Comment in Season

Boston Symphony Ends Season at Albee; Critic Enjoys Last Aesthetic Revel in "Delicate Configurations" and "Lustrous Contrapuntal Weavings"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its season at the Albee Theatre last night in a program of magnificent classics. The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Russian Easter" overture and Brahms's symphony were particularly appropriate, the "Easter Overture" being seasonable and the 100th anniversary of the birth of Brahms being about to be celebrated.

The "overture," far less elaborate in orchestral detail than "Scherezade" and other works of this brilliant writer, is no less massive in its grandeur. It is tremendously effective and suggestive. It varies in its tonalities from simple priestly utterances to the fullest powers of the orchestra augmented by bells which suggest the clanging sonorities of Russian cathedrals. The composer's predilection for brilliant bravura cadenza-like solo passages is not forsworn but is not shown as frequently as in his other works, perhaps because of the unmistakably religious aspect of the composition.

Do any visiting celebrities bring to us more delectable tone and glittering floritura than does Mr. Burgin? Perhaps in this work he recalls his happy student days in St. Petersburg and the interruption of his practice hours by clanging of great bells.

Surely no visiting artist brings more noble 'cello tone than Mr. Bedetti or any flautist a more richly pervasive voice than Mr. Laurent.

Dr. Koussevitzsky is not averse to Russian tonal immensities or the orchestral possibilities of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Tschaikowsky. His magnetic personality and sympathy with his native music found immediate response in his men, with resulting stimulus which made for a very exalted plane of orchetral artistry throughout the concert.

The opening strings of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" with their soft suggestiveness contrasted sharply with the great tonal spaces of "The Russian Easter" and carried one abruptly from paeans of rejoicing into an atmosphere of deeply solemn suggestiveness, reflections upon the most serious things of life offered us in music. These contained but little concrete directness but through orchestral colorings hardly surpassed in this or the last generation was most potent in poetic musical speech. This work must be considered one of the finest of all illustrations of what may be termed the indirect discourse of music where delicate musical configurations crowd the senses in wondrous orchestral workmanship, in preparation and anticipation of musical climaxes of gigantic proportions and supreme dignity.

Those who are familiar with Struass's genius of orchestration, his marvellous powers of the development of musical material of the most thoughtful type, must have taken keen delight in Dr. Koussevitsky's unfolding of this superb tone poem. All must have admired the limpid purity of Mr. Laurent's flute, the perfection of ensemble of the strings and the rich sonority of the brass section in what must be considered one of the great utterances of orchestral music.

Notable, too, was Dr. Koussevitzsky's control over his forces, together with his artistic interpretative conceptions, which brought salient musical thoughts into high relief against contrapuntal tapestries and embroideries, making a musical texture of the finest orchestral finish and richness. No small part of this magnificent coloring was accomplished by the perfection of the wood wind choir and the sweeping arpeggios of the two harps, which mean so much in this work.

Then we turned to calmer moments, less exacting and harrowing to the musical senses, to music which tells no great lesson, depicts no tremendous spiritual cataclysm or exacts no self-searching, to a symphony so replete with charming and graceful melodies that it contains enough thematic material for half a dozen symphonic poems and which must be considered one of the most beautiful of all symphonies. The constant association of this conductor and orchestra during the past few years with Brahms has made their work quite authoritative. This symphony is pure music; it has no program. At the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky and his men it was a joy and a delight. To the performers as well as to the genius of the composer must be ascribed the success of this symphony, now offered as an expression of tribute to the memory of one of the greatest composers of all time.

One noted the exquisite beauty of tone of the 'cello section, the perfection of the entire ensemble of the orchestra in the rapid figurations, the lustrous contrapuntal weavings and interplay of strings and wood wind in the graceful "andante" and in the vivacious "allegro" of the finale. If one was reminded of Beethoven and Cherubini, so much the better for both, and for us, for they make very good and kindly friends.

And so the orchestra departed in glory, after one of the best concerts it has ever given in this city. Any community which has enjoyed four concerts from this unrivalled orchestra in a season is rich indeed, yet it is one of the indisputable characterizations of the wealthy to desire more and even more wealth. It is with such commendable longing that this season closes, leaving one even at this time in the pleasurable anticipation of the return of this orchestra next season and hoping for a larger allotment of concerts.

The program:

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"The Russian Easter," Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36.
Strauss—
"Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguration") Tone Poem, Op. 24
Brahms.. Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazio, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

DR. W. LOUIS CHAPMAN.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

APR 12 1933

MOMENTS
By SIDNEY

To Whom Announcements and Matters May Be Addre

ON THE CALENDAR

The Brahms Festival.

It is a notable series of programs which Dr. Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged in commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Brahms. Those who remember the previous Brahms festival not so long ago in Symphony hall will know what to expect. Five of the six concerts will be given in Symphony hall, two of them in the regular subscription course, although some seats are available for both. The concerts of Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon are open only by invitation to subscribers to the symphony concerts. That on Sunday afternoon is for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, with seats on sale to all comers up to the capacity of the hall. The series opens on Wednesday evening, April 26, and continues through the following Sunday afternoon.

Assisting artists are Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanroma, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club, under Dr. Archibald T. Davidson; the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, and a group of the orchestra's string players, including Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefanc, Jean Cauhape and Jean Bedetti.

Following are the programs selected from Brahm's works:

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 26
Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 4, E minor.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 27.
Sonata, A major, violin and piano.
Soprano songs.
"Liebeslieder" waltzes for chorus.
String quartet in G major.

THURSDAY EVENING (SANDERS THEATRE).
"Academic Festival" overture.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 2, D major.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AND SATURDAY EVENING.
"Academic Festival" overture.
Piano concerto No. 2, B flat.
Symphony No. 1, C minor.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30.
"A German Requiem."

The judges of the annual competition for the award of a Mason & Hamlin grand piano at the New England Conservatory this afternoon will be Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Ernest Schelling and Carl Friedberg. Each contestant will play one piece of a personal choice and the following prescribed selections: Bach, a prelude and fugue, or the equivalent, and Beethoven, one movement of a Sonata. Last year the winner of the contest was Gladys Heathcock of this city.

Markevitch's "Rebus."

In New York last week among other numbers the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time in America the ballet music "Rebus" of Igor Markevitch, a young Russian living in Paris. Boston, presumably will hear it later. Olin Downes of the Times had the following comment on piece and performance:

> The audience received this music very well. It is a very clever piece of writing and no question about it. This commentator had the privilege of hearing Mr. Markevitch play his music, as badly as only a composer can, last spring in Paris, and he was impressed. The rhythmic skeleton of the piece seemed very strong and clear, of cumulative action and interest. The orchestration, on score paper, looked very promising.
>
> Some of these impressions were confirmed last night. Others were altered by the superb orchestral performance. Under these circumstances the composition was heard for the first time as a unit, with its details given their light and shade and their actual perspective.
>
> And this just perspective was not unconditionally to the advantage of the composition. It has considerable "go" and youthful animation and temperament. It is entirely a study in rhythms. There is no musical nugget. We are presented with the somewhat mathematical proposition of the "Rebus," and we behold the composer's ingenious and dexterous solution.

Supplementing other efforts to add to the fund for the maintenance of the Metropolitan Opera will be a grand ball in the opera house on April 28. Nothing of the kind on such an elaborate scale has been staged in the opera house since 1889 when the brilliant Centennial ball was given as a reception to President Benjamin Harrison.

Maria Jeritza, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, is soon to begin work on her first motion picture in Vienna. This film will be supplied with both German and English sound slips. The singer will appear with the Vienna Opera in June and will return here for a concert tour next season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

APR 12 1933

-:- MUSIC -:-

THE FINAL CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky and his great aggregation of musicians played their last concert of the season at the Albee Theatre last night and left us to carry on for many a month with the memory of performances which, though somewhat uneven, included many a moment of rare beauty.

There was a novelty last night so far as Providence is concerned. It was "The Russian Easter" Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, the composer being Rimsky-Korsakov. So suitable is this music to the season that it was played a few days ago in Philadelphia by Mr. Stokowski and his orchestra, and is being played probably elsewhere this week. In it is all the pomp and sonority of the Russian church, all the color of its ritual and the sincerity of its devotion. Here we have the tonal version of the greatest of all tragedies and the greatest of all triumphs as the Slav imagination has conceived them. It is music that might seem to come strangely from such a master of phantasy as Rimsky was, yet on examination that strangeness is only on the surface. In reality we have here much the same sort of childlike love of glamor which inspires the secular compositions of the master, the love of wonderful lights, of gorgeous investiture, of great crowds bent on a common purpose of loveliness.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky can understand such music far better than one not born in a Slav country can. To us it seemed at times far too elaborate to be entirely devotional, but we have no right to judge. When it comes to works of the imagination, that which we cannot wholly understand we must try to take on faith if we are to see its real beauty. We must adapt ourselves to idioms unfamiliar to us, and that is hardly possible at a first hearing. What there is no doubt about is the beauty of tone which was produced last night and of the fascination which an obviously inspired leadership produced.

* * *

About the "Tod und Verklaerung"—the Death and Transfiguration—by Richard Strauss which followed, and which, also, was appropriate to the week through which we are living, we need say only that Mr. Koussevitzky played it as beautifully, with all the same certainty of purpose and accuracy of achievement, as he has played it here before. This is a work behind which is not only the inspiration of the poet but profound philosophic thought. The "Death" section was deeply reflective, the "Transfiguration" section profoundly ecstatic. Difficult, indeed, is it to find in any music a greater sense of regeneration than soars out of its last chords. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed as he played it to be as "one leading a regiment of the Lord," a regiment singularly blessed with the gift of praiseful vision which was given to David — lucid, strong, vigorous praise in which the soul of man triumphing over all obstacles wins to its eternal significance.

* * *

The concert concluded with the second Brahms symphony played, no doubt, in honor of the composer's centennial. At times its lovely sweep was wholly satisfying; at times Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to forget the wood for the trees, to neglect the whole for the part, to indulge himself in that virtuosity of which he is such a brilliant master but which sometimes shatters the integrity of his imaginative concepts.

* * *

It would not be fitting to conclude without a word in praise of the beautiful playing of individual passages throughout the evening by the concertmaster, Mr. Burgin, by the leader of the 'cellists, Mr. Bedetti, one of the finest as well as one of the most charming of artists, and by Mr. Laurent whose flute can summon stars out of the darkness or make a thread of lovely light from earth unto the heavens.

Alas! the season is over. 'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true.

CHRONOS.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

APR 10 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky, Brilliantly Concludes Its Series of New York Concerts

IN CONCLUDING for the season the Boston Symphony's series of concerts in New York, Serge Koussevitzky regaled his Carnegie Hall audience on Saturday afternoon with a program adroitly constructed and brilliantly played. In the order named, this program embraced Roussel's Suite in F major, a product of 1926; the seventh of the Sibelius symphonies, of a year or two earlier; and Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 5, in E minor, which dates back to the late eighteen-eighties.

As Mr. Koussevitzky has been something of a specialist in the symphonies of Tchaikovsky, the demonstration evoked by a white-hot performance of the E minor: bordering at times on the frenetic, was another of history's repetitions. But he is known also as a specialist in the symphonies of Sibelius and this year has played for his Boston audiences all seven of the Finnish master's works in this form. In New York he has played during the season the First, Fifth and Seventh (the Second he gave us a year ago), along with the Tone-Poem, "Tappiola" and the "Swanwhite" Suite. Other conductors during the season have contributed performances of the Fourth Symphony, "En Saga," some incidental music to the "Tempest," and—lest we forget—"Findlandia." The violin concerto is on tomorrow night's Philadelphia Orchestra program.

FROM this it will scarcely be concluded that Sibelius, today, is for Manhattan a neglected composer. The Seventh remains the last of the Sibelius symphonies, so far as public performance is concerned; its long-awaited successor apparently being still in course of preparation. Spokesmen for the man of Tavastehus and Jarvenpaa assure us, however, that the Eighth is no myth. It was the Seventh which drew from Cecil Gray his most extravagant statement in his recent book on Sibelius; the contention that not only is Sibelius the greatest symphonist since Beethoven, but there can be doubt if Beethoven himself surpassed or equaled the Sibelius Seventh. We can admire this symphony without granting it any such place. The two Beethoven symphonies which figured on Arturo Toscanini's Philharmonic program yesterday afternoon are in no danger of an eclipse. There is lovely and at times lofty melodic utterance in the Sibelius Seventh, and its form—that of a single movement with sections of varying pace and character skillfully knit into an organic whole—bespeaks an artist of a high order. It is a work aloof, but tender; compact, but of a freedom of motion that suggests even the rhapsodic, compounded as it is of many fragmentary motives and a few songful expansions. Clearly, it is exceptionally good music and music that may grow steadily with rehearings. But as yet it is in no position to challenge Schubert or Brahms. The performance was one clear and eloquent.

The Roussel Suite is the music of an able craftsman with ideas that are better than middling and still not distinguished or individual enough to give his work other than the transient interest of pleasant conversation glibly and racily turned.

"Let Their Celestial Concerts All U

Other Musi

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

PR 11 1933

Koussevitzky Ends Season

Boston Symphony Given Ovation at Final Concert at Carnegie Hall.

by Muriel Williams

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave its fifth and last concert of its New York season Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The program comprised, for the first half, a Suite in F major, opus 33, in three movements — Prelude, Sarabande, and Gigue—by Albert Charles Paul Roussel, and Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, op. 105, and, for the second half, Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, op. 64.

The Roussel Suite, composed in 1926, was originally written for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. As the composer indicates, it is not programmatic, but conceived merely as "de la musique pure," which description well applies to the finished score. The "Prelude," with its feeling of lightness and laughter, its vivace tempo, typifies Spring, and the "Sarabande," with its pathos and palatable undertone of according discords, its moderate tempo, the Fall. The last movement, "Gigue," is a subtle combining of the two moods. There is marked unity of thematic material and development throughout.

Of the Sibelius magnificent Seventh Symphony little need be said beyond reiterating praise of its oft-referred to grandeur and majestic beauty of its content. In this masterpiece there is no doubt that the composer shows himself at the zenith of his creative ability and, needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra gave a powerfully stirring interpretation of this noble work.

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, composed eleven years later than his Fourth, always awakens a renewed sense of the composer's tremendous spiritual development in that interim. His vastly enlarged concepts of melody, increased firmness of structure, depth and warmth of feeling, and the overwhelming dignity of the finished work make its performance by such an unrivalled and sympathetic musician as Dr. Koussevitzky a well-nigh perfect experience for the music lover.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were accorded enthusiastic acclaim at the close of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 12 1933

Symphony Season Reaches Its Close

Boston Organization Attracts Large Audience to Albee Theatre

To close the season's series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Providence ~~last evening~~ Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the inspired leader of this great organization, chose a Brahms symphony. With it on the programme were a Strauss tone poem and a work by Rimsky-Korsakov, an overture on themes of the Russian church bearing the timely title "The Russian Easter." It was a list of numbers calculated to appeal to the discriminating tastes of the audiences which attend these concerts although somewhat less inspiring to the senses, less exciting, than many other programs which have been presented by the same orchestra in Providence in this and past seasons.

The program has been given here in reverse order, which seems to be the order in which the several numbers appealed to the audience.

The symphony, of course, is a beautiful work of the highest rank of major compositions, although lacking in the tremendous appeal which many other symphonies carry. The Russian number also has a lesser attraction than others produced by the same composer. Rimsky-Korsakov is invariably one of the notable attractions of any symphony season but others of his compositions have been heard which bear, ot least, a more clearly understood message.

Perhaps neither of these two, the Brahms symphony or the Rimsky-Korsakov overture, made such a profound appeal to the large audience that crowded the Albee Theatre as did the Strauss tone poem, abounding in majestic passages which fairly thrilled the hearer. A glorious thing, marvelously played, it aroused the complete enthusiasm of the audience and its rendition fully merited the ovation which the entire orchestra received at the close.

As usual on the closing evening of these concerts, an appeal was made in behalf of the series to be given next season. Dr. Clarence Barbour, president of Brown University, made a brief address in which he expressed appreciation of the splendid concerts and exhorted all interested in symphony music to subscribe for the next course of concerts well in advance. A fund of $4,500 is needed for this purpose, and doubtless this sum will be subscribed in order to insure the repetition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits. Last evening's program follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov—
"The Russian Easter," Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36.
Strauss—
"Tod und Verklarung" ("Death and Transfiguration") Tone Poem, Op. 24.
Brahms . . . Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazio, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. World-Telegram

APR 10 1933

Big Tribute Paid to Boston Band

Concert Patrons Shout Their Admiration.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Musically the week-end was distinguished by one of the most important concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given in the forty-seven years of its visits to New York. This concert evoked tumultuous applause and shouts of "Bravo!" from a large audience in Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, when it brought forward once more the F major suite of Albert Roussel, the seventh symphony of Jan Sibelius and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony.

The Roussel and the Sibelius pieces had been introduced to New York by the Bostonians under the leadership of Mr. Koussevitzky six years ago this month ~~and six~~ years ago January, respectively. There have been subsequent performances here. Still, Saturday one felt that each was expounded for us with something bordering on finality.

More Sibelius Music Needed.

The suite, consisting orthodoxly enough of prelude, carabande and gigue, is, in the time-honored phrase, a pouring of new wine into old bottles. The workmanship of the bottles displays the excellent craft that we expect from so skilled an artificer as its composer.

As for the vintage, that is distinctly synthetic—a little of a good many things, from Puccini to Stravinsky, but of anything identifiable as Roussel hardly a trace. This suite was disposed of in so thorough a manner on Saturday that no need exists for calling it up again.

On the other hand, the Sibelius symphony should be heard again and again. The belief is gaining ground that Sibelius ranks among the most important of symphonists. Yet, though his symphonies are being performed with increasing frequency, they nevertheless are not given often enough.

The single movement of the seventh, despite memories of "Tristan," of "Richard Strauss," and even of "Madama Butterfly," is preponderantly Sibelius — the northern dreamer of moorland, woods and lakes.

Tschaikowsky Fifth Acclaimed.

However, in spite of Saturday, our public is not yet sufficiently familiar with this symphony. On Saturday it was placed before us with impressive sweep and power as well as tonal splendor.

Another outstanding feature of the concert, strange as it may seem, was that hard-worked composition, the Tschaikowsky fifth. Perhaps it is a specialty of Mr. Koussevitzky's. In any event, he and his men set forth the familiar music with a completeness of emotional and sensuous expression seldom equalled. No wonder the hearers stayed on to clap their hands and shout!

Sibelius, Beethoven, And Nature

Note on the Two Composers As the Sibelian Cycle Draws to End

IN his recent biography of Jan Sibelius, Mr. Cecil Gray compares the compositions of this great symphonist with those of Beethoven himself. He discusses the nature and confines of symphonic material as opposed to form, which is arbitrary and subject to the composer's needs and temperament, and thereon bases his distinction betwen the symphony and other forms of instrumental literature, such as the symphonic or tone poem. Subsequently, Mr. Gray exhibits no hesitation in placing Sibelius side by side with Beethoven as second to none in the ranks of symphonic creators. His argument is careful and strongly presented. The symphonies of Berlioz and Brahms he considers as impure specimens of the being and substance of symphonic art, though he does not pretend to minimize their virtues in other respects. However extreme or exaggerated his readers may judge such conclusions, they will readily admit that according to the norms which he has established, no nineteenth or twentieth century symphonist more assuredly deserves to be regarded as Beethoven's successor than the Finnish composer.

Yet the comparison, and the force of the whole argument seem to be based on externals (not that they are superficial or without considerable weight on that account). A real and insurmountable aspect of the two men is contemplated, examined, analyzed and the conclusions drawn cannot be rejected or altered if their premises are granted. But another phase, sparingly treated by the biographer since it is not necessarily within the province of his subject and aim, penetrates more pervasively the character of the two composers and accounts, in part, for the perfectly obvious dissimilarity, the essential incompatibility of their respective symphonies. The restless creative spirits of the two geniuses, finding their mode of expression in the same medium, adhere to polar extremities separated by the antipathies of human nature.

The incongruity of their approaches to an identical art is not dissolved by attempts to compare their three more or less corresponding stages of development. With the maturity of both, as with most great artistic creators, the tendency to universalize the substance of their creative spirits by means of their art became more and more pronounced; but their development followed divergent paths. Beethoven was ever self-sufficient. He was a veritable superman of music whose personal feelings became symbols of universalized human emotions. They sprang, however, from an internal source; the inspiration of Beethoven, to whatever extent influenced or guided by external, worldly events, by the grandeur or intimacy of nature, by the occurrence of social and political upheavals, originated inevitably from within, although ultimate expression in music transcends the mortality of isolated sentiments and individual passions. The warmth of humanity pervades all his music.

The northern temperament of Sibelius evades this closeness, this familiarity, this sympathetic bond which connects the objectivity of music heard with the receptivity of the hearer. Sibelius the composer is essentially an extrovert. Not that he is unwilling or unable to express in the medium of sound his own feelings; what composer has endeavored or wished to do otherwise? But these feelings appear to be the direct reflection of something external, something irresistible and completely autonomous—a cold, awful nature which remains unapproachable, remote, foreign to the throbs of human passion, yet ever the source of inspiration, the object of a dreadful wonder. The romantic intimacy with nature is alien to such an attitude. Sibelius is the uncommon genius who stands aloof, devoid of human combativeness against the forces of nature, passively receptive and coldly responsive. His music is completely untainted by the intrusion and admixture of the personal element which colors nature in the eyes of human spectators.

Of course this isolation does not preclude response of some sort, reactions involving a disturbance of the composer's mental faculties. But nature seems to stimulate reason rather than become an object of mere contemplation and understanding; reason is applied with no sense of its superiority, but with the recognition of its own insufficiency and inadequacy. Nature is something utterly and hopelessly beyond the sphere of human reason to cope within any degree of completeness—it becomes an object of awful reverence, of submissive bewilderment. The beautiful in nature surrenders to the sublime, and it is this feeling of sublimity which distinguishes Sibelius's music from all that preceded it.

Nature-inspired music had always submitted to the romantic approach and outlook, which find sometimes a contrast, sometimes a reciprocal source of interplay between external phenomena and internal, emotionally vitalized human activity. Poets imagine their own poetic thoughts to be reflected in a sympathetic, innocent universe. Or nature is devitalized, appearing tempered and pacified through the eyes of cultivated humanity. The "pastoral" is not nature in the nude. Or it is represented in music by attempts to imitate sounds and incorporate the sentiments which it arouses or reflects in a dutifully polished and artistic composition. Sibelius, even though his expressive possibilities are confined by his own self-imposed classical predispositions, is able to disclose nature in its bare, brute realism, unadorned and uncontamniated.

The symphonies of Sibelius, in which lie his greater power for startling expressiveness, do not manifest the inventiveness, the adventurous display, the new and amazing discoveries which appeared in the music-dramas of Wagner, the dramatic symphonies of Berlioz, or the tone-poems of Strauss. His ingenuity lies in the exhaustive exploitation of more or less familiar musical devices, by the use of which he is able to produce entirely novel effects truly without precedent in the history of instrumental music. Brahms, for instance, did not hesitate to utilize combinations of low-pitched sonorous instruments to yield complex timbres which stir up confused, clouded sensations. Sibelius seized these means, explored their expressive possibilities, isolated their occurrence from high tonal regions, and achieved daring sections of bleak, cold sounds, utterly devoid of color and richness, gray layers of varying shades, piled up one on another. Sometimes scores of such measures occur, building a firm, continuous background, a bed-rock foundation, against which is set abrupt and animated sections of swirling violins, or poignant, fragmentary snatches from the woodwinds. There is something primitive, unregenerated, direly and cruelly destitute about these passages. Yet it is by means of his apparent poverty of material, music deprived of its potential wealth of harmonic and instrumental color, that Sibelius is able to establish and maintain these resistant barriers of sound—skeletonized music, firm, puissant, irresistible.

Again, short figures, fragments of potential themes, appear, disappear, appear once more, are thrown about from one group of instruments to another, expanded, become modified, truncated, grow again, and finally blossom out into a full-fledged theme; the choir of brass gently breaks through an indefinite mass of moving sound, and with a sudden dynamic crescendo it radiates a white illumination, a dazzling brilliance; or thematic and harmonic material is presented, its volume gradually and steadily augmented, more instruments joining to increase harmonic richness, the progressions driven further and further, surging on, unrequited, mercilessly, the listener feels, till the climax comes like some catastrophic blast to terminate the deluge. The passions are aroused, heightened, cloyed, but they are not the passions of warm-blooded humanity; they are the striving feelings of mortals toward something utterly beyond them, void, infinite, incomprehensible. Nature is reflected in the music of Sibelius as in that of no other composer; it is unimpeded by human vehemence, released from personal sympathy, exempt from religious fervor. JAMES H. FASSETT

3rd BIG WEEK
MUSSOLINI SPEAKS
A COLUMBIA ROAD SHOW PICTURE
TWICE DAILY 2:30 and 8:20 P.M.
MATS. 40¢ to 68¢ EVES. 50¢ to $1
Plus Tax
Tel. HAN. 1175
TREMONT

ORK
Chelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 14 1933

VARIATIONS

By WILLARD M. CLARK

The time of spring music festivals is almost upon us. There are fewer festivals this year but those that are to be given will be of exceptional caliber if one can judge from advance announcements. There are rumors that the Springfield Festival will be revived, perhaps next year, and we know more than one conductor is looking with longing eyes toward Springfield and that one in particular feels that now is the time to lay the groundwork. Be that as it may Springfield will have no festival this year.

The best Springfield music lovers can do is to journey to Boston for the Brahms Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in that city from April 26 to 30 in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth. Of the six concerts, five will be in Symphony Hall and one, on April 27, in Sanders Theater, Harvard University.

Assisting artists are: Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanroma, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McCloskey, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club under Dr. Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe Choral Society under G. Wallace Woodworth and a group of the orchestra's string players including Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc, Jean Cauhape and Jean Bedetti.

Following are the programs selected from Brahms' works:

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 26.
Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 4, E minor.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, April 27.
Sonata, A major, violin and piano.
Soprano songs.
"Liebeslieder" waltzes for chorus.
String quintet in G major.

THURSDAY EVENING (SANDERS THEATER).
"Academic Festival" overture.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 2, D major.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AND SATURDAY EVENING.
"Academic Festival" overture.
Piano concerto No. 2, B flat.
Symphony No. 1, C minor.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30.
"A German Requiem."

There are two outstanding spring festivals in the country, namely the Cincinnati biennial May Festival and the annual festival at Ann Arbor, maintained by the Musical Society of the University of Michigan.

Cincinnati's 30th biennial festival will be held May 2-6, with six concerts scheduled including two matinees. Eugene Goosens will direct in spite of a serious illness. Among the eminent artists are Margaret Matzenaur, contralto; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; Emily Roosevelt, soprano; Robert Steel and Richard Crooks, tenors, and Ezio Pinza and Herbert Gould, basses. Others to be heard include the veteran tenor, Dan Beddoe, Grete Stueckgold, soprano, and Joseph Schenke, basso.

The programs and those taking part in them are as follows:

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 2.
Handel's "Samson," with Mmes. Matzenauer, Kathryn Meisle and Emily Roosevelt; Messrs. Robert Steel, Ezio Pinza, Herbert Gould and Joseph Schenke.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 3.
Bach's Mass in B minor, with Mmes. Grete Stueckgold and Margaret Matzenauer, Messrs. Richard Crooks and Ezio Pinza.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, May 4.
Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," serenade for wind instruments and three arias, sung by Mme. Stueckgold, violin obbligato by Emil Heerman.
Brahms' rhapsody for male chorus, with Miss Meisle, contralto, and the First symphony of Brahms.

FRIDAY EVENING, May 5.
Wagner's "Mastersingers," six excerpts, with Miss Roosevelt, Messrs. Crooks, Dan Beddo and Gould.
William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a cantata, with Mr. Gould as soloist.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 6.
Beethoven's symphony No. 1, the song "Adelaide," sung by Mr. Beddoe, and the Ninth symphony, with Mmes. Roosevelt and Meisle, Messrs. Beddoe and Pinza.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 6.
Berlioz "Damnation of Faust," with Mme. Matzenauer, Messrs. Steel, Gould and Robert J. Thuman.

The Ann A

BALTIMORE,
POST

APR 14 1933

SEEK REACTION TO PROPOSED CONCERTS

A preliminary canvass to determine whether or not Baltimore music lovers desire a series of concerts at the Lyric next season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is being conducted by means of a circular letter signed by Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, the orchestra's Baltimore counselor.

The desirability of having the Boston Symphony return for a group of engagements has been under consideration for some time. It has been paying annual visits since 1884, but during the last decade or so they have been limited to one a season. It is now in its fifty-second season and its director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has served longer than any other of its conductors.

167

Sibelius, Beethoven, And Nature

Note on the Two Composers As the Sibelian Cycle Draws to End

15

IN his recent biography of Jan Sibelius, Mr. Cecil Gray compares the compositions of this great symphonist with those of Beethoven himself. He discusses the nature and confines of symphonic material as opposed to form, which is arbitrary and subject to the composer's needs and temperament, and thereon bases his distinction betwen the symphony and other forms of instrumental literature, such as the symphonic or tone poem. Subsequently, Mr. Gray exhibits no hesitation in placing Sibelius side by side with Beethoven as second to none in the ranks of symphonic creators. His argument is careful and strongly presented. The symphonies of Berlioz and Brahms he considers as impure specimens of the being and substance of symphonic art, though he does not pretend to minimize their virtues in other respects. However extreme or exaggerated his readers may judge such conclusions, they will readily admit that according to the norms which he has established, no nineteenth or twentieth century symphonist more assuredly deserves to be regarded as Beethoven's successor than the Finnish composer.

Yet the comparison, and the force of the whole argument seem to be based on externals (not that they are superficial or without considerable weight on that account). A real and insurmountable aspect of the two men is contemplated, examined, analyzed and the conclusions drawn cannot be rejected or altered if their premises are granted. But another phase, sparingly treated by the biographer since it is not necessarily within the province of his subject and aim, penetrates more pervasively the character of the two composers and accounts, in part, for the perfectly obvious dissimilarity, the essential incompatibility of their respective symphonies. The restless creative spirits of the two geniuses, finding their mode of expression in the same medium, adhere to polar extremities separated by the antipathies of human nature.

The incongruity of their approaches to an identical art is not dissolved by attempts to compare their three more or less corresponding stages of development. With the maturity of both, as with most great artistic creators, the tendency to universalize the substance of their creative spirits by means of their art became more and more pronounced; but their development followed divergent paths. Beethoven was ever self-sufficient. He was a veritable superman of music whose personal feelings became symbols of universalized human emotions. They sprang, however, from an internal source; the inspiration of Beethoven, to whatever extent influenced or guided by external, worldly events, by the grandeur or intimacy of nature, by the occurrence of social and political upheavals, originated inevitably from within, although ultimate expression in music transcends the mortality of isolated sentiments and individual passions. The warmth of humanity pervades all his music.

The northern temperament of Sibelius evades this closeness, this familiarity, this sympathetic bond which connects the objectivity of music heard with the receptivity of the hearer. Sibelius the composer is essentially an extrovert. Not that he is unwilling or unable to express in the medium of sound his own feelings; what composer has endeavored or wished to do otherwise? But these feelings appear to be the direct reflection of something external, something irresistible and completely autonomous—a cold, awful nature which remains unapproachable, remote, foreign to the throbs of human passion, yet ever the source of inspiration, the object of a dreadful wonder. The romantic intimacy with nature is alien to such an attitude. Sibelius is the uncommon genius who stands aloof, devoid of human combativeness against the forces of nature, passively receptive and coldly responsive. His music is completely untainted by the intrusion and admixture of the personal element which colors nature in the eyes of human spectators.

Of course this isolation does not preclude response of some sort, reactions involving a disturbance of the composer's mental faculties. But nature seems to stimulate reason rather than become an object of mere contemplation and understanding; reason is applied with no sense of its superiority, but with the recognition of its own insufficiency and inadequacy. Nature is something utterly and hopelessly beyond the sphere of human reason to cope within any degree of completeness—it becomes an object of awful reverence, of submissive bewilderment. The beautiful in nature surrenders to the sublime, and it is this feeling of sublimity which distinguishes Sibelius's music from all that preceded it.

Nature-inspired music had always submitted to the romantic approach and outlook, which find sometimes a contrast, sometimes a reciprocal source of interplay between external phenomena and internal, emotionally vitalized human activity. Poets imagine their own poetic thoughts to be reflected in a sympathetic, innocent universe. Or nature is devitalized, appearing tempered and pacified through the eyes of cultivated humanity. The "pastoral" is not nature in the nude. Or it is represented in music by attempts to imitate sounds and incorporate the sentiments which it arouses or reflects in a dutifully polished and artistic composition. Sibelius, even though his expressive possibilities are confined by his own self-imposed classical predispositions, is able to disclose nature in its bare, brute realism, unadorned and uncontamniated.

The symphonies of Sibelius, in which lie his greater power for startling expressiveness, do not manifest the inventiveness, the adventurous display, the new and amazing discoveries which appeared in the music-dramas of Wagner, the dramatic symphonies of Berlioz, or the tone-poems of Strauss. His ingenuity lies in the exhaustive exploitation of more or less familiar musical devices, by the use of which he is able to produce entirely novel effects truly without precedent in the history of instrumental music. Brahms, for instance, did not hesitate to utilize combinations of low-pitched sonorous instruments to yield complex timbres which stir up confused, clouded sensations. Sibelius seized these means, explored their expressive possibilities, isolated their occurrence from high tonal regions, and achieved daring sections of bleak, cold sounds, utterly devoid of color and richness, gray layers of varying shades, piled up one on another. Sometimes scores of such measures occur, building a firm, continuous background, a bed-rock foundation, against which is set abrupt and animated sections of swirling violins, or poignant, fragmentary snatches from the woodwinds. There is something primitive, unregenerated, direly and cruelly destitute about these passages. Yet it is by means of his apparent poverty of material, music deprived of its potential wealth of harmonic and instrumental color, that Sibelius is able to establish and maintain these resistant barriers of sound—skeletonized music, firm, puissant, irresistible.

Again, short figures, fragments of potential themes, appear, disappear, appear once more, are thrown about from one group of instruments to another, expanded, become modified, truncated, grow again, and finally blossom out into a full-fledged theme; the choir of brass gently breaks through an indefinite mass of moving sound, and with a sudden dynamic crescendo it radiates a white illumination, a dazzling brilliance; or thematic and harmonic material is presented, its volume gradually and steadily augmented, more instruments joining to increase harmonic richness, the progressions driven further and further, surging on, unrequited, mercilessly, the listener feels, till the climax comes like some catastrophic blast to terminate the deluge. The passions are aroused, heightened, cloyed, but they are not the passions of warm-blooded humanity; they are the striving feelings of mortals toward something utterly beyond them, void, infinite, incomprehensible. Nature is reflected in the music of Sibelius as in that of no other composer; it is unimpeded by human vehemence, released from personal sympathy, exempt from religious fervor.

JAMES H. FASSETT

3rd BIG WEEK
"MUSSOLINI SPEAKS"
A COLUMBIA ROAD SHOW PICTURE
TWICE DAILY 2:30 and 8:20 P.M.
MATS. 40¢ to 68¢ EVES. 50¢ to $1
Plus Tax
Tel. HAN. 1175
TREMONT

13t(R) ap 8

ORK
Chelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

APR 14 1933

VARIATIONS

By WILLARD M. CLARK

The time of spring music festivals is almost upon us. There are fewer festivals this year but those that are to be given will be of exceptional caliber if one can judge from advance announcements. There are rumors that the Springfield Festival will be revived, perhaps next year, and we know more than one conductor is looking with longing eyes toward Springfield and that one in particular feels that now is the time to lay the groundwork. Be that as it may Springfield will have no festival this year.

The best Springfield music lovers can do is to journey to Boston for the Brahms Festival which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in that city from April 26 to 30 in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth. Of the six concerts, five will be in Symphony Hall and one, on April 27, in Sanders Theater, Harvard University.

Assisting artists are: Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanroma, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McCloskey, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club under Dr. Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe Choral Society under G. Wallace Woodworth and a group of the orchestra's string players including Richard Burgin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc, Jean Cauhape and Jean Bedetti.

Following are the programs selected from Brahms' works:

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 26.
Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 4, E minor.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, April 27.
Sonata, A major, violin and piano.
Soprano songs.
"Liebeslieder" waltzes for chorus.
String quintet in G major.

THURSDAY EVENING (SANDERS THEATER).
"Academic Festival" overture.
Concerto, A minor, violin and 'cello.
Symphony No. 2, D major.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON AND SATURDAY EVENING.
"Academic Festival" overture.
Piano concerto No. 2, B flat.
Symphony No. 1, C minor.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30.
"A German Requiem."

There are two outstanding spring festivals in the country, namely the Cincinnati biennial May Festival and the annual festival at Ann Arbor, maintained by the Musical Society of the University of Michigan.

Cincinnati's 30th biennial festival will be held May 2-6, with six concerts scheduled including two matinees. Eugene Goosens will direct in spite of a serious illness. Among the eminent artists are Margaret Matzenaur, contralto; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; Emily Roosevelt, soprano; Robert Steel and Richard Crooks, tenors, and Ezio Pinza and Herbert Gould, basses. Others to be heard include the veteran tenor, Dan Beddoe, Grete Stueckgold, soprano, and Joseph seph Schenke, basso.

The programs and those taking part in them are as follows:

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 2.
Handel's "Samson," with Mmes. Matzenauer, Kathryn Meisle and Emily Roosevelt; Messrs. Robert Steel, Ezio Pinza, Herbert Gould and Joseph Schenke.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 3.
Bach's Mass in B minor, with Mmes. Grete Stueckgold and Margaret Matzenauer, Messrs. Richard Crooks and Ezio Pinza.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, May 4.
Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," screnade for wind instruments and three arias, sung by Mme. Stueckgold, violin obbligato by Emil Heerman.

Brahms' rhapsody for male chorus, with Miss Meisle, contralto, and the First symphony of Brahms.

FRIDAY EVENING, May 5.
Wagner's "Mastersingers," six excerpts, with Miss Roosevelt, Messrs. Crooks, Dan Beddo and Gould.

William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," a cantata, with Mr. Gould as soloist.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 6.
Beethoven's symphony No. 1, the song "Adelaide," sung by Mr. Beddoe, and the Ninth symphony, with Mmes. Roosevelt and Meisle, Messrs. Beddoe and Pinza.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 6.
Berlioz "Damnation of Faust," with Mme. Matzenauer, Messrs. Steel, Gould and Robert J. Thuman.

The Ann Arb

THIS CLIPPING
BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

APR 14 1933

SEEK REACTION TO PROPOSED CONCERTS

A preliminary canvass to determine whether or not Baltimore music lovers desire a series of concerts at the Lyric next season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is being conducted by means of a circular letter signed by Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, the orchestra's Baltimore counselor.

The desirability of having the Boston Symphony return for a group of engagements has been under consideration for some time. It has been paying annual visits since 1884, but during the last decade or so they have been limited to one a season. It is now in its fifty-second season and its director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has served longer than any other of its conductors.

Washington Star

APRIL 16, 1933—PART THREE. SOCIE

Boston Symphony Finds Patrons for Concerts

Headed by Mr. William Phillips, Undersecretary of State, a committee of fourteen prominent Washingtonians has been formed to handle the sale of boxes for a contemplated series of three concerts to be given at Constitution Hall next Winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, provided public interest in the series is evidenced.

Mr. Phillips, himself a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was requested to form a Washington committee for boxes and acceptances have been received from Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. William H. Woodin, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, for a number of seasons chairman of the Washington committee for the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, which has discontinued its concerts in Washington; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, sponsor of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the music division of the Library of Congress; Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. Frederic A. Keep, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller and Mr. John Ellerton Lodge.

The Boston Symphony authorities, in asking Mr. Phillips to head a Washington committee for boxes, made it clear that the plan for a Washington series is tentative and depends, in large measure, on the results of a canvass being made of local music lovers by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, its representative in the Capital.

The Boston Symphony has been coming to Washington since 1884, and until 12 years ago it gave an annual series here. Many requests have reached the orchestra's headquarters in Boston for a resumption of the series and tentative dates have been selected for concerts Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4, in Constitution Hall. Reservations for seats and boxes may be placed with Mrs. Dorsey in Droop's, at 1300 G street.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 16 1933

Orchestras In Musical Spotlight

Two Concerts By Boston Symphony Played In New York Conducted By Koussevitzky

Zimbalist Appears As Soloist On Stokowski Program—Paderewski With Musicians' Group

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

ORCHESTRAS now hold first place in the scale of importance, and, it must be said, are holding their own with considerable tenacity.

First among the visiting bodies was the Boston Symphony, which closed out its season with two fine concerts. At the first of these Mr. Koussevitzky offered the Vaughan-William Variations on a theme by Thomas Tallys, the suite from Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tsar Saltan, and the Second Brahms Symphony. At his Saturday matinee concert he gave Roussel's F Major Suite, the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony.

"OF HIGH INTEREST"

Both of these concerts were of high interest in spite of the rather tiresome opening works in each case. Mr. Vaughan-Williams is one of the typical contemporary British composers and his variations are like all variations, interesting in spots but mostly very dull. The playing of the lacelike Brahms was somewhat matter-of-fact, but finely proportioned and interesting.

Of all the numbers at the two concerts, the Sibelius symphony was, perhaps, the most arresting. Much is being said and written at the present time about the neglect of this composer's work, and most of the major orchestras have played a number of his works this season. It is hard to say, however, whether Sibelius looms as large as his admirers would have us believe.

DIFFICULT TO GRASP

The Seventh Symphony is difficult to grasp, but we must not let ourselves be deceived, à la Bunthorne, into believing that what is difficult to understand must, of necessity, be deep. Some one has said that owls are silent not because they are wise but because they are stupid. It is not always easy to distinguish.

Sibelius is, perhaps, the only contemporary composer of the first rank who has refused to let himself be led aside by any of the "movements" which have enslaved music since the turn of the century. Not for him the augmented triads or whole-tone scales of Debussy, the amorphous things of Schönberg or the atonalities of Berg. One feels the complete sincerity of the man. He never strives for effect. And by just that much is he justified.

The present work is in one movement; that is, three sections telescoped. Harmonically and from the point of view of instrumentation, it is rich and highly colored. Thematically—well, it needs to be heard a lot of times. There is certainly little or no thematic development, and, though two themes are discernible, they are restated and bandied about rather than developed. The work leaves one with a curious sense of admiration of its beauties while conscious of a complete lack of conception of what and where and how. After this, the Tchaikovsky, which had a well-rounded performance, sounded as consecutive as the alphabet!

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 16 1933

Boston Symphony Finds Patrons for Concerts

Headed by Mr. William Phillips, Undersecretary of State, a committee of fourteen prominent Washingtonians has been formed to handle the sale of boxes for a contemplated series of three concerts to be given at Constitution Hall next Winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, provided public interest in the series is evidenced.

Mr. Phillips, himself a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was requested to form a Washington committee for boxes and acceptances have been received from Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. William H. Woodin, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, for a number of seasons chairman of the Washington committee for the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, which has discontinued its concerts in Washington; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, sponsor of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the music division of the Library of Congress; Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. Frederic A. Keep, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller and Mr. John Ellerton Lodge.

The Boston Symphony authorities, in asking Mr. Phillips to head a Washington committee for boxes, made it clear that the plan for a Washington series is tentative and depends, in large measure, on the results of a canvass being made of local music lovers by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, its representative in the Capital.

The Boston Symphony has been coming to Washington since 1884, and until 12 years ago it gave an annual series here. Many requests have reached the orchestra's headquarters in Boston for a resumption of the series and tentative dates have been selected for concerts Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4, in Constitution Hall. Reservations for seats and boxes may be placed with Mrs. Dorsey in Droop's, at 1300 G street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES

APR 16 1933

Serge Koussevitzky and Adrian Boult will be the conductors of the London Music Festival, to be held at Queen's Hall from May 8 to 19. Mr. Boult's three concerts will be devoted exclusively to Brahms, and Mr. Koussevitzky's three will be devoted to Prokofieff's "Classic" symphony, Sibelius's Seventh, Tchaikovsky's Fifth, Beethoven's Fourth and Ninth, Bax's Second, Walton's "Portsmouth Point" overture and excerpts from Wagner's operas. The orchestra will be that of the British Broadcasting Corporation, as will the chorus. The festival has been organized by the B. B. C.

New York Herald-Tribune

6 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, announces its usual New York series of five concerts each at Carnegie Hall for its fifty-third season, 1933-'34. The evening concerts will be given on Thursdays, November 16, January 4; Friday, February 2, and Thursdays, March 1 and April 5; the afternoon concerts on Saturdays, November 18, January 6, February 3, March 3 and April 7. The usual evening series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be held on Fridays, November 17 and January 5; Thursday, February 1, and Fridays, March 2 and April 6. The orchestra wil also give a concert at the Academy in Olin Downes's lecture-concert course, "The Enjoyment of Music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

APR 16 1933

Headed by Mr. William Phillips, Undersecretary of State, a committee of fourteen prominent Washingtonians has been formed to handle the sale of boxes for a contemplated series of three concerts to be given at Constitution Hall next winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, provided public interest in the series is evidenced.

Mr. Phillips, himself a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was requested to form a Washington committee for boxes and acceptances have been received from Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, for a number of seasons chairman of the Washington committee of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which has now withdrawn from the local field; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, sponsor of the famous Library of Congress chamber music concerts; Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. Frederic A. Keep, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan F. Stone and Mrs. William H. Woodin.

The Boston Symphony authorities, in asking Mr. Phillips to head a Washington committee for boxes, made it clear that the plan for a Washington series is tentative and depends, in large measure, on the results of a canvas being made of local music lovers by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, its representative in the Capital.

The results of this canvass are expected to be made public shortly and in the meantime, the committee on boxes is proceeding with its task, most members of the committee having agreed, it is understood, to take boxes in the event the series is given.

The Boston Symphony has been coming to Washington since 1884 and up until 12 years ago, it gave an annual series here. Many requests have reached the orchestra's headquarters in Boston for a resumption of the series and tentative dates have been selected at Constitution Hall for concerts on Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

APR 16 1933

Boston Orchestra Sounds Sentiment Regarding Series

A series of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall, may be one of the musical treats in store for Washington next winter, according to an announcement by Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra, with headquarters at Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

During the past week, Mrs. Dorsey made a preliminary canvass of thousands of Washington music-lovers in an effort to ascertain their reaction to the plan to bring the Boston Symphony here next winter. In addition, she reported to Dr. Koussevitzky that a committee of fourteen Washingtonians, headed by Undersecretary of State Phillips, had voluntarily undertaken the work of subscribing for the 52 available boxes in the big D. A. R. auditorium.

This committee, incidentally, includes such prominent Washington women as Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, for a number of seasons chairman of the Washington committee of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, sponsor of the famous chamber of music concerts at the Library of Congress; Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. Frederick A. Keep, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan F. Stone and Mrs. William H. Woodin.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who comes to Washington on Monday evening, April 24, to conduct a portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the performances of the annual Library of Congress chamber music festival, has tentatively reserved Constitution Hall for Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4. He plans to start his concerts at 4:40 p. m., and a price scale of $3, $4, $5, $7 and $9 has been adopted, with boxes at $50. No Government tax will be charged on these seats.

The Boston Symphony's local representative, Mrs. Dorsey, made it clear in her announcement that while the Boston Symphony is desirous of including a Washington series in its 1933-34 itinerary, the contemplated series depends entirely upon the amount of advance subscriptions received during the current month, though payment on such subscriptions need not be made before October 1. Already, ten of the Constitution Hall boxes have been subscribed.

ATLANTA, GA.
AMERICAN
APR 16 1933

From Fields Afar

Serge Koussevitzky has announced his plans for the Brahms festival, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Boston from April 26 to 30 in commemoration of the centenary of the composer's birth.

The assisting artists are Ossip Gabrilowitsch and J. M. Sanroma, pianists; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; the Harvard Glee Club, under Archibald T. Davison; the Radcliffe Choral Society, under G. Wallace Woodworth, and a group of the orchestra's string players, including Richard Brugin, Robert Gunderson, Jean Lefranc, Jean Cauhape and Jean Bedetti.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

APR 18 1933

Music

Brahms Centenary Festival by Boston Symphony Orchestra In That City

The centenary of the birth of Brahms will be celebrated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, next week in that city by a festival of five days beginning Wednesday, with an orchestral program consisting of Variations on a theme by Haydn, Concerto for violin and 'cello, with Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti as soloists, and the Fourth Symphony.

Thursday afternoon the program will be the Quintet for clarinet and strings in B minor, with Victor Polatschek as soloist, songs by Jeannette Vreeland, Liebes lieder waltzes by a mixed chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe colleges, and Quartet for piano and strings in G minor with Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist. In the evening in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge the orchestra will play the violin and 'cello Concerto, "Academic Festival" overture, and Second Symphony.

The Second Symphony will be played Friday afternoon with the "Tragic" overture, and the Concerto for piano in D minor with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as soloist. Saturday evening the program will be the First Symphony, "Academic Festival" overture and Concerto for piano in B flat, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as soloist. Sunday afternoon the "German Requiem" will be given by the orchestra and chorus with Miss Vreeland and David Blair McClosky as soloists.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 16 1933

Three Matinee Concerts

A SERIES of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall, may be one of the musical treats in store for Washington next Winter, according to an announcement by Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra, with headquarters at Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

During the past week Mrs. Dorsey made a preliminary canvass of thousands of Washington music lovers in an effort to ascertain their reaction to the plan to bring the Boston Symphony here next Winter. In addition, she reported to Dr. Koussevitzky that a committee of 14 Washingtonians, headed by Undersecretary of State Phillips, had voluntarily undertaken the work of subscribing for the 52 available boxes in the big D. A. R. auditorium.

This committee, incidentally, includes such prominent Washington women as Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, for a number of seasons chairman of the Washington Committee of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, sponsor of the famous chamber music concerts at the Library of Congress; Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. Frederick A. Keep, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan F. Stone and Mrs. William H. Woodin.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who comes to Washington on Monday evening, April 24, to conduct a portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the performances of the annual Library of Congress chamber music festival, has tentatively reserved Constitution Hall for Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4. He plans to start his concerts at 4:40 p.m.

The Boston Symphony's local representative, Mrs. Dorsey, made it clear in her announcement that while the Boston Symphony is desirous of including a Washington series in its 1933-34 itinerary, the contemplated series depends entirely upon the amount of advance subscriptions received during the current month, though payment on such subscriptions need not be made before October 1. Already, 10 of the Constitution Hall boxes have been subscribed, it is stated, through the activities of the committee for boxes.

Although the Boston Symphony has been coming to Washington since 1884, and for many years gave a series of concerts here, its visits have been limited for the past 12 years. In view, however, of numerous requests for a renewal of its series, the orchestra is now attempting to ascertain public sentiment and it is accordingly requested that all those interested in the plan communicate with Mrs. Dorsey at once at her concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 22 1933

ANOTHER POPS CONCERT SEASON ROLLS AROUND

With the close of the regular Boston Symphony orchestra's regular concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the perennial "Pops" will again hold forth. The coming season, which will begin on Wednesday evening, May 3, will be more auspicious than any since prohibition "ran its course." In the old days liquid refreshments were at the disposal of frequenters of the "Pops" and the management announces that the widely heralded 3.2 brand will be on sale. Perhaps there will be survivals of the exciting Harvard nights that old-timers tell about. But for those who go for the music alone, Arthur Fiedler will again wield his baton over some 80 regular symphony players and there are no better players anywhere than in the Boston Symphony's ranks. The program will be the usual blend of the classic and popular—but not too popular.

Watertown Sun
Apr. 20

MORE THAN SCORE OF LOCAL PEOPLE ATTEND SYMPHONY

A compilation from the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to the finest music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The great Orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to other New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston.

From Watertown alone more than a score of music devotees are regular suscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series. Among the subscribers for 1933 are:

Miss Harriette F. Abbott, Miss Marguerite L. Barnes, Miss Louise I. Bowen, Mrs. George F. Butler, Mrs. W. R. Champney, Miss Hester Champney, Mr. Philip F. Clapp, Mr. Henry H. Drew, Miss Evelyn Ford, Mrs. Anna B. Flagg.

Mrs. Robert A. Gunderson, Mr. William A. Hill, Mrs. J. A. Hinsdale, Mrs. Mabel Tucker Hirtz, Mrs. James R. Jack, Mrs. William H. Jones, Mr. John H. Joyce, Miss Susan E. Morse.

Perkins Institution, Mr. Herbert E. Millard, Mrs. John D. Thomas, Miss Beatrice F. Smith, Mr. William H. Weed, Mrs. Fred E. Whitney, Mrs. B. R. Wilson Jr., Madam Hermine Yervant.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 22 1933

Centenary of Brahms' Birth to Be Observed by Boston Symphony.

A festival devoted to the music and the memory of Johannes Brahms, born 100 years ago next month, will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra's 52nd season to a close.

The festival, including both regular subscription and additional concerts, will be given on Wednesday evening, April 26; Thursday afternoon, April 27; Friday afternoon, April 28; Saturday evening, April 29, and Sunday afternoon, April 30; also a concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, April 27. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor and the Radcliffe Choral society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; Richard Burgin, violin; Jean Bedetti, 'cello; and other musicians from the orchestra in chamber music. The concerts on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon will be by invitation and open to Symphony subscribers only. The expenses of these concerts will be privately assumed. The concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and on Thursday evening in Cambridge, are in the regular subscription series. The concert on Sunday afternoon, April 30, will be given for the orchestra's pension fund. At this time, the "German Requiem" will be performed, culminating both the festival and the Symphony season.

The programs are as follows:

Wednesday evening, April 26, at 8:15 "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," double concerto for violin and 'cello (Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti), Symphony No. 4.

Thursday afternoon, April 27, at 2:30: A program of music in other forms than orchestral, including the Sonata for violin and piano in A-major (Richard Burgin and Jesus Maria Sanroma). Songs with pianoforte(Jeannette Vreeland). "Liebeslieder" waltzes by small mixed chorus. Quintet for strings.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 28 and 29: "Academic" Overture, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Ossip Gabrilowitsch). Symphony No. 1.

Sunday afternoon, April 30, at 3:30: "A German Requiem," with chorus and soloists.

The Cambridge concert, Thursday evening, April 27, will include the "Academic" overture. The Double Concerto and the Second Symphony.

JANESVILLE, WIS.
GAZETTE
APR 22

RADIOTORIAL

by Albert Ford

Very casually—very, very casually—we were glancing through a printed program of a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra—IN BOSTON—it was an old program. We were trying to find the story of a bit of music we intended using in a broadcast program. Found it—and just became interested in turning the leaves of the program. Here's the way the matter read—about Von Weber's "Euranthe" overture:—

> ". . . As life was to her then worthless, she took poison from a ring and was thereby . . ."
>
> "The funds of the Bond Investment Trust are invested in seventy-five different bond issues . . . " etc.

Again on another page in a discussion of the life of Robert Schumann in connection with the Schumann D minor symphony, we find—

> ". . . On the thirteenth of the month, his wife's birthday, Marie was baptized, and . . ."
>
> "The separate coat . . . the evening gown . . . the tailored daytime frock, having the delightful fascination of original styling, quality . . ." etc.

On another page, in connection with a composition of Rimsky Karsakow:

> ". . . the date given is in Belaiev's catalogue? One or two musical lexicons give..."
>
> "I have had skin treatments all my life, and all over the world, but I never had one like that before . . ." etc.

Just one more of these casual glances at a Boston Symphony Orchestra program. In the description of the same Rimsky Karsakow selection we find:

> ". . . She sings a song in praise of all living creatures and welcomes as her friends a bear and birds . . . "
>
> "Bachrach portraits — easily solve the Christmas gift problem . . ." etc.

Now — of course — what we've been doing is quoting from the program notes—just where they break off and go to another page—and then the advertising in display form right beneath them. And perhaps we're just a bit unfair in doing that because all of the advertising in the Boston Symphony program is so plainly display advertising and people who read the program notes do not need to read the advertisements but can go on through the little booklet and just continue reading program notes. That is true—even though The Bond Investment Trust, and the women's outfitter, and Mr. Bachrach the photographer, were inveigled into putting their advertisements "next to pure reading matter" in the hope some reader's eye would wander and look over the ad. Of course it also may be that the Bond Investment Trust and the woman's outfitter and Mr. Bachrach are philanthropists and simply contributed their money for the support of Col. Higginson's—we meant to say—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We know Mr. Bachrach personally and know him to be a lover of music and the arts—and a rather good business man too. But that is all beside the point.

The point is that the people who have supported symphony orchestras with their advertising are—in a large measure—the same people who are supporting radio with their advertising. And the program notes of a radio concert are just the same as the program notes of a symphony concert—only there isn't quite so much advertising connected with a radio program as there is in the printed symphony program. In the 40 page booklet program of the Boston Symphony orchestra we counted 46 advertisements. We do not believe there is any radio program for an entire evening that will present as many advertisers as that—as many advertisers as hoped—and were sold advertising space by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promoters and supporters IN THE HOPE—that attention would be called from Schumann and Rimsky Karsakow and von Weber long enough to read about investment bonds, women's wear, cures for skin diseases, coffee, pianos, cafes, books, photographers, hotels, steamships, undies, etc.

The facts are—that broadcasting programs — GOOD broadcasting programs with symphony orchestras and opera—as well as dance tunes and comedians—are made possible to the American public by exactly the same people who make possible symphony concerts and operatic performances—the advertiser. We do not pretend that the advertising in the program comes anywhere near supporting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The public is called on to pay for these programs—pay to hear them. It isn't called on to pay for the radio programs. It isn't even called on to dress up in its uncomfortable best and go to hear radio concerts. It isn't even called on to HEAR any radio concerts save those it wants to hear. But:—

The public knows that wherever it tunes will be the very best that can be provided of its kind—because there is the keenest kind of competition among the advertisers who sponsor these programs to have the finest symphony orchestras—like the Boston and the Philadelphia and the Detroit and the other great organizations — and they have the best of the dance bands—and they have the most laughable of the comedians. And because the public knows this it can tune what it wants when it wants it.

22, 1933 Globe

April 22

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston had a first hearing yesterday of the music of Igor Markevitch, the Parisianized young Russian who for two years has been the French capital's anointed prophet of the new musical gospel. "Rebus," the piece in question, is designated an "imaginary ballet," but is really a sort of orchestral suite, divided into six movements: Prelude, "Danse de Pauvrete," "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices," and "Parade." It bears its unusual name because the last words in the titles of four of the movements, when strung together, produce the proverb "Poverty Is Not Vice." This esoteric work was first played in the United States by the Boston Symphony in New York early this month.

Markevitch, born in Kiev and soon taken to Switzerland, ultimately took root in Paris, where he studied with Nadia Boulanger. There he grew to his present artistic stature and his present age of 20. "Rebus" was written when he was 17 or 18. Upon the premiere of this work, the enlightened modernist elite of Paris took him to its bosom.

"Rebus" is predominantly contrapuntal, as most contemporary pieces are apt to be. There is, indeed, a fugue, the opening measures of which, paradoxically, faintly suggest the style of Johann Sebastian Bach. Evidently Markevitch studied Rossini of "Il Signor Bruschino," for in the prelude of "Rebus," as in the Italian master's opera, some of the violins tap with the backs of their bows upon their instruments.

Few will deprecate Markevitch's precocious grasp of linear counterpoint, his skill, to a certain degree, of writing in conflicting keys; his adeptness at light and glittering instrumentation, and at obtaining subtle rhythmic effects. "Rebus" is, moreover, amusing. But no skill at counterpoint and rhythm can makeup for the appalling lack of imaginative power, emotion, and of substantial ideas. For all its superficial cleverness, "Rebus" is pathetically barren.

This was followed by Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, a masterpiece by one who may prove to have been the greatest composer of our time. Unlike "Rebus," this Seventh Symphony has that sense of belonging to all time that surrounds every masterpiece. Those who like to label music categorically would be justified in calling this Sibelius' "lyrical" Symphony, for it is throughout a noble, exalted song. No other contemporary music within memory, save only the same composer's Fourth Symphony, is so moving.

Not hesitating to use certain 19th century technical devices, but disdaining to be a faddist, Sibelius calmly followed his own inclination in writing this symphony, as he did in the other six. Composed in 1925, the work has none of the characteristics of ultramodernism, but it is not reactionary. He found means to express himself in partially diatonic, smoothly flowing melody. The peculiarly vivid but spare instrumentation and the rather modal harmony could have come only from him. Sibelius, as a man, belongs both to the present and the past. As a composer, at the age of 68, he is in the full of his powers. He has yet to repeat himself.

In mood this symphony is unlike any of the six which preceded. Yet one unconsciously associates it with the Fourth, to the extent that both seem to have been inspired from within. You can find in the others, more or less successfully, a slight indication that the composer was moved by external forces; Nature, for example. The Seventh, to one listener, is Sibelius speaking most eloquently and intensely out of his soul.

The remaining number was Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, made resplendent in one of Dr Koussevitzky's inimitable interpretations.

The Friday and Saturday concerts next week will be part of the Brahms Festival, the first program of which will be played Wednesday evening. With this festival, the season ends.

C. W. D.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 16 1933

Three Matinee Concerts

A SERIES of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall, may be one of the musical treats in store for Washington next Winter, according to an announcement by Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra, with headquarters at Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

During the past week Mrs. Dorsey made a preliminary canvass of thousands of Washington music lovers in an effort to ascertain their reaction to the plan to bring the Boston Symphony here next Winter. In addition, she reported to Dr. Koussevitzky that a committee of 14 Washingtonians, headed by Undersecretary of State Phillips, had voluntarily undertaken the work of subscribing for the 52 available boxes in the big D. A. R. auditorium.

This committee, incidentally, includes such prominent Washington women as Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, for a number of seasons chairman of the Washington Committee of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, sponsor of the famous chamber music concerts at the Library of Congress; Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. F. A. Delano, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. Frederick A. Keep, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan F. Stone and Mrs. William H. Woodin.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who comes to Washington on Monday evening, April 24, to conduct a portion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at one of the performances of the annual Library of Congress chamber music festival, has tentatively reserved Constitution Hall for Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4. He plans to start his concerts at 4:40 p.m.

The Boston Symphony's local representative, Mrs. Dorsey, made it clear in her announcement that while the Boston Symphony is desirous of including a Washington series in its 1933-34 itinerary, the contemplated series depends entirely upon the amount of advance subscriptions received during the current month, though payment on such subscriptions need not be made before October 1. Already, 10 of the Constitution Hall boxes have been subscribed, it is stated, through the activities of the committee for boxes.

Although the Boston Symphony has been coming to Washington since 1884, and for many years gave a series of concerts here, its visits have been limited for the past 12 years. In view, however, of numerous requests for a renewal of its series, the orchestra is now attempting to ascertain public sentiment and it is accordingly requested that all those interested in the plan communicate with Mrs. Dorsey at once at her concert bureau in Droop's, 1300 G street northwest.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 22 1933

ANOTHER POPS CONCERT SEASON ROLLS AROUND

With the close of the regular Boston Symphony orchestra's regular concerts at Symphony hall, Boston, the perennial "Pops" will again hold forth. The coming season, which will begin on Wednesday evening, May 3, will be more auspicious than any since prohibition "ran its course." In the old days liquid refreshments were at the disposal of frequenters of the "Pops" and the management announces that the widely heralded 3.2 brand will be on sale. Perhaps there will be survivals of the exciting Harvard nights that old-timers tell about. But for those who go for the music alone, Arthur Fiedler will again wield his baton over some 80 regular symphony players and there are no better players anywhere than in the Boston Symphony's ranks. The program will be the usual blend of the classic and popular—but not too popular.

Watertown Sun
Apr. 20

MORE THAN SCORE OF LOCAL PEOPLE ATTEND SYMPHONY

A compilation from the records at Symphony Hall, Boston, reveals that a surprisingly large number of people are drawn by their interest in the finest music to attend regularly the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall. Although Boston is far more accessible by rail, bus or motor than it used to be, it is certainly an indication of a true devotion to the finest music that so many will make this effort to attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its own city.

The great Orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, its conductor, has raised to new heights in this, its 52nd season, has been forced to curtail visits to other New England cities by the pressure of concerts in Boston.

From Watertown alone more than a score of music devotees are regular suscribers to Boston Symphony concerts, either in the Friday afternoon or Saturday evening series of 24, or the shorter Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series. Among the subscribers for 1933 are:

Miss Harriette F. Abbott, Miss Marguerite L. Barnes, Miss Louise I. Bowen, Mrs. George F. Butler, Mrs. W. R. Champney, Miss Hester Champney, Mr. Philip F. Clapp, Mr. Henry H. Drew, Miss Evelyn Ford, Mrs. Anna B. Flagg.

Mrs. Robert A. Gunderson, Mr. William A. Hill, Mrs. J. A. Hinsdale, Mrs. Mabel Tucker Hirtz, Mrs. James R. Jack, Mrs. William H. Jones, Mr. John H. Joyce, Miss Susan E. Morse.

Perkins Institution, Mr. Herbert E. Millard, Mrs. John D. Thomas, Miss Beatrice F. Smith, Mr. William H. Weed, Mrs. Fred E. Whitney, Mrs. B. R. Wilson Jr., Madam Hermine Yervant.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 22 1933

Centenary of Brahms' Birth to Be Observed by Boston Symphony.

A festival devoted to the music and the memory of Johannes Brahms, born 100 years ago next month, will bring the Boston Symphony orchestra's 52nd season to a close.

The festival, including both regular subscription and additional concerts, will be given on Wednesday evening, April 26; Thursday afternoon, April 27; Friday afternoon, April 28; Saturday evening, April 29, and Sunday afternoon, April 30; also a concert in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, April 27. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor and the Radcliffe Choral society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; Richard Burgin, violin; Jean Bedetti, 'cello; and other musicians from the orchestra in chamber music. The concerts on Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon will be by invitation and open to Symphony subscribers only. The expenses of these concerts will be privately assumed. The concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and on Thursday evening in Cambridge, are in the regular subscription series. The concert on Sunday afternoon, April 30, will be given for the orchestra's pension fund. At this time, the "German Requiem" will be performed, culminating both the festival and the Symphony season.

The programs are as follows:

Wednesday evening, April 26, at 8:15 "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," double concerto for violin and 'cello (Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti), Symphony No. 4.

Thursday afternoon, April 27, at 2:30: A program of music in other forms than orchestral, including the Sonata for violin and piano in A-major (Richard Burgin and Jesus Maria Sanroma). Songs with pianoforte(Jeannette Vreeland). "Liebeslieder" waltzes by small mixed chorus. Quintet for strings.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 28 and 29: "Academic" Overture, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Ossip Gabrilowitsch). Symphony No. 1.

Sunday afternoon, April 30, at 3:30: "A German Requiem," with chorus and soloists.

The Cambridge concert, Thursday evening, April 27, will include the "Academic" overture. The Double Concerto and the Second Symphony.

JANESVILLE, WIS.
GAZETTE

APR 22 1933

RADIOTORIAL

by Albert Ford

Very casually—very, very casually—we were glancing through a printed program of a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra—IN BOSTON—it was an old program. We were trying to find the story of a bit of music we intended using in a broadcast program. Found it—and just became interested in turning the leaves of the program. Here's the way the matter read—about Von Weber's "Euranthe" overture:—

> ". . . As life was to her then worthless, she took poison from a ring and was thereby . . ."
>
> "The funds of the Bond Investment Trust are invested in seventy-five different bond issues . . ." etc.

Again on another page in a discussion of the life of Robert Schumann in connection with the Schumann D minor symphony, we find—

> ". . . On the thirteenth of the month, his wife's birthday, Marie was baptized, and . . ."
>
> "The separate coat . . . the evening gown . . . the tailored daytime frock, having the delightful fascination of original styling, quality . . ." etc.

On another page, in connection with a composition of Rimsky Karsakow:

> ". . . the date given is in Belaiev's catalogue? One or two musical lexicons give..."
>
> "I have had skin treatments all my life, and all over the world, but I never had one like that before . . ." etc.

Just one more of these casual glances at a Boston Symphony Orchestra program. In the description of the same Rimsky Karsakow selection we find:

> ". . . She sings a song in praise of all living creatures and welcomes as her friends a bear and birds . . ."
>
> "Bachrach portraits — easily solve the Christmas gift problem . . ." etc.

Now — of course — what we've been doing is quoting from the program notes—just where they break off and go to another page—and then the advertising in display form right beneath them. And perhaps we're just a bit unfair in doing that because all of the advertising in the Boston Symphony program is so plainly display advertising and people who read the program notes do not need to read the advertisements but can go on through the little booklet and just continue reading program notes. That is true—even though The Bond Investment Trust, and the women's outfitter, and Mr. Bachrach the photographer, were inveigled into putting their advertisements "next to pure reading matter" in the hope some reader's eye would wander and look over the ad. Of course it also may be that the Bond Investment Trust and the woman's outfitter and Mr. Bachrach are philanthropists and simply contributed their money for the support of Col. Higginson's—we meant to say—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We know Mr. Bachrach personally and know him to be a lover of music and the arts—and a rather good business man too. But that is all beside the point.

The point is that the people who have supported symphony orchestras with their advertising are—in a large measure—the same people who are supporting radio with their advertising. And the program notes of a radio concert are just the same as the program notes of a symphony concert—only there isn't quite so much advertising connected with a radio program as there is in the printed symphony program. In the 40 page booklet program of the Boston Symphony orchestra we counted 46 advertisements. We do not believe there is any radio program for an entire evening that will present as many advertisers as that—as many advertisers as hoped—and were sold advertising space by the Boston Symphony Orchestra promoters and supporters IN THE HOPE—that attention would be called from Schumann and Rimsky Karsakow and von Weber long enough to read about investment bonds, women's wear, cures for skin diseases, coffee, pianos, cafes, books, photographers, hotels, steamships, undies, etc.

The facts are—that broadcasting programs — GOOD broadcasting programs with symphony orchestras and opera—as well as dance tunes and comedians—are made possible to the American public by exactly the same people who make possible symphony concerts and operatic performances—the advertiser. We do not pretend that the advertising in the program comes anywhere near supporting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The public is called on to pay for these programs—pay to hear them. It isn't called on to pay for the radio programs. It isn't even called on to dress up in its uncomfortable best and go to hear radio concerts. It isn't even called on to HEAR any radio concerts save those it wants to hear. But:—

The public knows that wherever it tunes will be the very best that can be provided of its kind—because there is the keenest kind of competition among the advertisers who sponsor these programs to have the finest symphony orchestras—like the Boston and the Philadelphia and the Detroit and the other great organizations — and they have the best of the dance bands—and they have the most laughable of the comedians. And because the public knows this it can tune what it wants when it wants it.

22, 1933 Globe

April 22

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston had a first hearing yesterday of the music of Igor Markevitch, the Parisianized young Russian who for two years has been the French capital's anointed prophet of the new musical gospel. "Rebus," the piece in question, is designated an "imaginary ballet," but is really a sort of orchestral suite, divided into six movements: Prelude, "Danse de Pauvrete," "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices," and "Parade." It bears its unusual name because the last words in the titles of four of the movements, when strung together, produce the proverb "Poverty Is Not Vice." This esoteric work was first played in the United States by the Boston Symphony in New York early this month.

Markevitch, born in Kiev and soon taken to Switzerland, ultimately took root in Paris, where he studied with Nadia Boulanger. There he grew to his present artistic stature and his present age of 20. "Rebus" was written when he was 17 or 18. Upon the premiere of this work, the enlightened modernist elite of Paris took him to its bosom.

"Rebus" is predominantly contrapuntal, as most contemporary pieces are apt to be. There is, indeed, a fugue, the opening measures of which, paradoxically, faintly suggest the style of Johann Sebastian Bach. Evidently Markevitch studied Rossini of "Il Signor Bruschino," for in the prelude of "Rebus," as in the Italian master's opera, some of the violins tap with the backs of their bows upon their instruments.

Few will deprecate Markevitch's precocious grasp of linear counterpoint, his skill, to a certain degree, of writing in conflicting keys; his adeptness at light and glittering instrumentation, and at obtaining subtle rhythmic effects. "Rebus" is, moreover, amusing. But no skill at counterpoint and rhythm can makeup for the appalling lack of imaginative power, emotion, and of substantial ideas. For all its superficial cleverness, "Rebus" is pathetically barren.

This was followed by Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, a masterpiece by one who may prove to have been the greatest composer of our time. Unlike "Rebus," this Seventh Symphony has that sense of belonging to all time that surrounds every masterpiece. Those who like to label music categorically would be justified in calling this Sibelius' "lyrical" Symphony, for it is throughout a noble, exalted song. No other contemporary music within memory, save only the same composer's Fourth Symphony, is so moving.

Not hesitating to use certain 19th century technical devices, but disdaining to be a faddist, Sibelius calmly followed his own inclination in writing this symphony, as he did in the other six. Composed in 1925, the work has none of the characteristics of ultramodernism, but it is not reactionary. He found means to express himself in partially diatonic, smoothly flowing melody. The peculiarly vivid but spare instrumentation and the rather modal harmony could have come only from him. Sibelius, as a man, belongs both to the present and the past. As a composer, at the age of 68, he is in the full of his powers. He has yet to repeat himself.

In mood this symphony is unlike any of the six which preceded. Yet one unconsciously associates it with the Fourth, to the extent that both seem to have been inspired from within. You can find in the others, more or less successfully, a slight indication that the composer was moved by external forces; Nature, for example. The Seventh, to one listener, is Sibelius speaking most eloquently and intensely out of his soul.

The remaining number was Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, made resplendent in one of Dr Koussevitzky's inimitable interpretations.

The Friday and Saturday concerts next week will be part of the Brahms Festival, the first program of which will be played Wednesday evening. With this festival, the season ends.

C. W. D.

J., has been announced.

Herald

MUSIC

Apr 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 23d concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised "Rebus, an imaginary Ballet" by Ivor Markevitch (first time in Boston); Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

Ivor Markevitch is a Russian who was educated musically in Russia and is now living there. He was born in 1912 and is not old enough to write music that is tolerable, or that even gives much promise of better things to come. It is true we have heard only this "Rebus" but "Rebus" is one of his more "mature" works. It is a suite in six movements. There is rhythm but there are few recognizable ideas; when they are recognizable, they are hardly worth even a bowing acquaintance.

For some unaccountable reason he is a pet of Parisian musical snobs; who hail him as a young Mozart. Princesses pat him on the head and attend his concerts, ready to swoon in ecstasy. High-born dames and the males described by Lorrain soon after the appearance of Debussy's opara, "Pileastres," give him patronage, but Thackeray reminded his readers that George the First liked train oil in his salads and gave an enlightened patronage to bad oysters. It was not pleasant to think of the superb Boston orchestra's time being wasted on so undeserving a work.

Sibelius's Seventh Symphony may not be all that Cecil Gray, his biographer, his elephanteer, his self appointed trumpeter, says it is, but it is a noble work masterly from a purely technical and inventive point of view; in the composer's refusal to set applause traps for the unthinking; in its pronounced individuality. For this reason the Symphony will probably never be so popular as the earlier ones with expected and sonorously appearing. Hurrah-Boys-Whoop-her-up finales. Now that Dr. Koussevitzy has shown his enthusiastic appreciation of the Symphonies by Sibelius, it is to be hoped that in another season he may bring out some of the tone poems of this great man—one is tempted to write the word "genius"—tone poems as yet unknown here, but well worth the hearing; works not to "national," though illustrative of Finland's epic poem.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave a highly dramatic reading of Tchaikovsky's Symphony, a reading that was at times theatrical—the only way to treat the later Symphonies of this self torturer. He was in doleful dumps while he was at work on the fifth; he was afraid that his bolt was shot. No wonder that Brahms did not like the Symphony; no wonder also, that he took the trouble to tell Tchaikovsky so. They were of different natures, personally and musically. Tchaikovsky did not like the music of Brahms which was to him as corned beef and cabbage. To Brahms the passion of the Russian which at times is frenzy was abhorrent.

Ernest Newman believes, and not without reason, that this Symphony had a fixed program in the composer's mind. Newman speaks of the "Gloomy, mysterious" opening theme that suggests the "leaden, deliberate tread of fate"; the theme that appears several times later. To others it might be known as the Death Theme.

For Tchaikovsky was obsessed by the thought of death. This obsession is disclosed in his letters and, in the reminiscences of his friends. He could have cried out with Brachiano in John Webster's tragedy:

> "On pain of death, let no man name > death to me.
> It is a word infinitely terrible."

And as Tchaikovsky was wildly shaken by the thought, so in this fifth symphony, as in the fourth and sixth, he shakes the souls of others.

The concerts of next Friday and Saturday will be included in the Brahms festival: Friday afternoon "Tragic" overture; Piano Concerto No. 1. (Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Symphony No. 2. Saturday evening: Academic Festival overture; Piano Concerto No. 2 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Symphony No. 1.

ETHEL HUTCHINSON

At Season's End For the "Tuesdays"

Apr 19 Trans

THE last concert of the Tuesday series of Symphony Concerts yesterday assembled a program of pieces from composers who for want of a better designation are still generally labelled "modern"; call them modern classics and let it go at that. The list was Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Ravel, "Mother Goose" suite; Stravinsky, suite from "Petrouchka"; Sibelius, Second Symphony in D major. Here was indeed a feast for those who wanted the best out of the last thirty or forty years of musical development.

With such a marvel of sensitiveness as "Clouds" Debussy added more to the progress of the art of music than had been added in many a year. And perhaps it is even more of a marvel that the same sensitive attitude was maintained in the more difficult subject of "Festivals." For these "Festivals" of Debussy, despite all their clangors, never touch vulgarity, remain the product of the fastidious mind. With Ravel's pieces it is the same. The French Mother Goose (one can never entirely repress a smile at the literal translation—"Ma Mère l'Oye": "My Mother the Goose") tells her stories with a charm that is often absent from the English Mother Goose jingles. Ravel catches the spirit of it, translates it first into piano "duets," then, conscious of its suitability for orchestral treatment, turns it into one of the masterpieces of the musical literature. Thus we hear the stories of Sleeping Beauty, of Hop o' My Thumb, of Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodes, inimitably of Beauty and the Beast, and perhaps best of all, of the Fairy Garden.

History turns forward a few pages. Another tale which children like (but also with a strong undercurrent of deeper significance) unfolds itself in musical tones in the story of the love and disappointment of the dull-witted puppet Petrouchka. Again a masterpiece. If ever folk dance has been elevated to the heights it is the Russian dance in this ballet. If ever a rôle has received perfect characterization, it is that of Petrouchka. And if ever a considerable body of people, a crowd just milling around (for after all it is the crowd passing from side-show to side-show that is the real hero of "Petrouchka") has been perfectly painted in music, it is the crowd which moves along from the beginning to the end of this ballet.

Lastly, a great modern symphony, the second of Sibelius. Hearing its elemental surges of power, one is inclined to agree with Cecil Grey, that their equal have not been penned since Beethoven. Listening to its lyrical melodies of beauty, one adds that they can be matched only in the symphonies of Brahms. This music one does not date. Like the symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, it is music of and for all time. As to performance—it is something at which one can only marvel. Know the music as well as one may, such performance is still revelation. And it is revelation afresh, every time one hears it.

It was announced at the beginning of the year that this was to be the "historical" series of symphony concerts. How well has the promise been kept? We have had concertos by Bach and by Handel. Passing to the Viennese classicists, we have had symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven. From the earlier romanticists we have had symphonies by Schubert and Schumann and an overture by Mendelssohn; from the more advanced romanticists, works by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner. The later symphonists, Brahms and Chaikovsky, have been represented. The programmist Strauss had his day. And of the latest schools, we heard yesterday from Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky, Sibelius. Not the most painstaking historian could have planned a better series. Not a name has been omitted of the importance of those listed. Not a work of mere secondary importance has been included among those played. Each work has been representative, in the best sense, of its composer.

What has been said of the performance of yesterday's concert can also be said of the standard of performance of the series. Thinking through the concerts in retrospect, one can not recall one in which it slumped. When one asks for the secret of it all, one comes to the answer in Dr. Koussevitzky. A. H. M.

NEW YORK SUN

APR 22 1933

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

* * *

The Orchestral Situation.

ELSEWHERE will be found some statistics of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's season. It has not been easy going for the organization. Orchestras never travel on smooth roads, and the past winter was—well, no one needs to be told what it was. However, it may not be amiss for music lovers to take stock of the situation. For years the support of orchestras has fallen upon the shoulders of a few rich men. These men are no longer rich. Some of them are downright poor. The vast majority of music lovers is even poorer. It is composed of people to whom orchestral concerts are luxuries to be considered perhaps once in a whole winter. But even if there were enough music lovers of substance to fill the entire auditorium at every concert, the orchestral enterprises could not be self-supporting.

They might perhaps be made so if music lovers could be induced to attend concerts directed by common mortals and not by world-famous maestri commanding equally famous salaries. But the music lovers will not do this. They even write letters to newspapers threatening to withdraw their subscriptions if the famous conductor is relieved for part of the season by one not famous. Just what is to come out of the jumble of conflicting conditions no one seems able to tell. But it is evident that orchestral concerts will have to be supported by the general public in some way, because the few wealthy men who backed them so long cannot do so.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a list of guarantors filling several pages of its program book. That looks like a possible solution of the problem. Many persons contributing moderate amounts must take the places of the few giving large sums. Let it be candidly confessed and without any sentimental reservations that the offering of orchestral concerts to the public is not a business enterprise. It cannot in its very nature be one. It must be viewed as an artistic gift and planned with a view to the blessings of benefits bestowed. And perhaps it might be possible to get conductors to accept salaries not quite so imperial—say, merely princely. All the rest of us have had to come down. Why not the wizards of the baton—and even those without batons?

Post

RDAY, APRIL 22, 1933

SYMPHONY GIVES WORK OF BOY OF 19

Markevitch's "Rebus" Full of Humor and Charm

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In an order that reversed their proper chronology, Dr. Koussevitzky at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon presented compositions by Tchaikovsky, Sibelius and the 20-year-old Igor Markevitch.

HAS CHARM AND FANCY

This youngster of Russian birth, Swiss upbringing and Parisian residence, has set his present fellow-townsmen by the ears. And well he might. For his "Rebus," an imaginary ballet for orchestra, as yesterday's performance disclosed it, is the work of an accomplished technician who has ideas, a pretty humor and an exhilarating freshness of utterance.

This freshness is, as might be expected, more the matter of a new approach to familiar problems than of actual novelty of idiom. Any youth of 19 must perforce imitate his predecessors and the young Markevitch, a true child of his time, writes in a manner that recalls Stravinsky. Like the elder Igor, and like many another modern composer, the young Igor writes an intellectual, not an emotional music. But although there is nothing of what we are pleased to call sentiment in his "Rebus" there is, nevertheless, both charm and fancy.

Work Well Received

Of the six moments the most captivating at first hearing are the ingenious and stimulating Fugue and the amusing if perhaps too extended "Parade." The Rebus, by the way, is to be found by taking the final word of the titles of each of the four central divisions: "Danse de Pauvrete," "Gigue des Nez," "Variations des Pas," "Fugue des Vices." In other words, Pauvrete n'est pas vice (Poverty is no vice), a Russian and also a French proverb.

Considering its dissonant character, "Rebus" was yesterday well received and the performance was a brilliant one. Naturally the applause was warmer for Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, and warmer still for the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have long excelled.

Completes Sibelius Cycle

With the Seventh the season's cycle of Sibelius' symphonies came to its conclusion, since the promised Eighth is not ready for performance. In retrospect this Symphony, with the Second and the Fourth, seems the high point of the mighty heptad.

Lacking the directness and breadth of appeal of the one, the fascination and poignancy of the other, the Seventh is yet, as Cecil Gray has well said, a work of "great expressive beauty, of a lofty grandeur and dignity, a truly Olympian serenity and repose."

A Festival for Brahms, Century-old Romanticist

Adv. By Moses Smith Apr. 23

Music Editor

THE APPROACHING Brahms Festival at Symphony Hall, which is noted in another column of this section, is too elaborate to be construed as a mere passing tribute to the memory of a composer who was born 100 years ago—on May 7, 1833. Rather this Festival is reminder of the widespread popularity which Brahms' music enjoys today, and of this music's persistent vitality in the face of all the attacks on it during more than half a century.

It may seem paradoxical that an age of speed and jazz, of disillusionment and cynicism, an age in which the typical novelty in music is a harsh, barbaric opus of Stravinsky or Prokofieff—that such an age should witness the greatest popularity of Brahms, who was essentially a romantic. Yet this but repeats the history of music and art generally; the popular taste almost invariably trails that of the connoisseur; and the great artist is usually "ahead" of his time.

* * *

AT THE HANDS of the modernist and the novelty-hunter, of course, Brahms receives very shabby treatment. I do not question the sincerity of some of the advance guard. But scratch a cynic and find a sentimentalist. I have engaged in conversations with persons of lofty brow, who profess unbounded admiration for the latest product from Hindemith or Aaron Copland, yet in an unguarded moment wax enthusiastic over Brahms' chamber music.

The point is that there is no need of this sneaking attitude, as though it were a vice to listen to a Brahms quartet when all your admiration should be reserved for Schonberg. Music changes as institutions and culture change. A composer writing music today of a Brahmsian cast would inevitably be writing feeble music. What is important is the composer's conviction behind his music and, of course, the force of his ideas and how he treats them.

The quality of greatness is thus almost a guarantee of immortality. Because Brahms was great his romantic music lives into a time when romanticism is ridiculous and it will similarly live beyond our time. Granted that the forms in which Brahms develops his ideas, and many of his tricks of expression, are outmoded. The same is true of Bach and Beethoven, and of Sophocles and Shakespeare.

* * *

WHAT would have happened to these great ones if the circumstances of their lives and environment had been different? The question is old and debatable. In the case of Brahms it is interesting to note that his career is often considered to have pivoted about a single circumstance. As a youthful pianist, unknown despite his portfolio of manuscripts, he accompanied the Hungarian violinist, Remenyi, on a concert tour. At Gottigen it was discovered that the piano was a half-tone below concert pitch.

For the purposes of homemade music a violinist would unbend, of course, and tune his violin down, which is readily done. But the result is unsatisfactory to a musician carrying the true pitch in his head, And so Brahms, about to play the "Kreutzer" sonata of Beethoven, which is difficult enough in the original key of A minor, performed the colossal feat of transposing the piona part from memory into the key of B flat!

It happened that the great violinist Joachim was in the audience and realized what Brahms was doing and what his extraordinary feat implied. He sought Brahms out at once and struck up a friendship which was to last for life, and which resulted in Brahms' introduction to such musical notables as Schumann and Liszt.

Schumann, who had none of the proverbial professional jealousy, heard this awkward boy play, and read his compositions. In characteristic fashion he wrote for the magazine of which he was editor an article entitled "New Paths," in which Brahms, an unknown, mind you, was hailed as "the great composer of the future." And so Brahms was "made."

EILEEN CROWE in her role in "Juno and the Paycock," Irish play at Hollis.

New York Herald-Tribune

APR 23 1933

Gabrilowitsch To Be Soloist

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, concert pianist and symphonic conductor, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, when the final broadcast concert in the Brahms Festival series commemorating the centennary of the birth of Johannes Brahms is presented over WJZ Saturday at 8:15 p. m. The program will open with the "Academic" overture, which Brahms wrote as a tribute of gratitude to the University of Breslau for conferring upon him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. The Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, No. 2, will be featured by Gabrilowitsch, and the Symphony in C minor, No. 1, will be played in conclusion.

NEW YORK TIMES

APR 23 1933

BOSTON CONCERT—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Russian pianist, performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor. The broadcast opens with the "Academic Overture," which Brahms wrote as a tribute to the University of Breslau. The work featuring Mr. Gabrilowitsch is the Brahms Concerto in B flat, No. 2. The C minor symphony, No. 1, ends the program: WJZ, 8:15 P. M.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle

PR 23 1933

Out of a Blue Sky

By JO RANSON

ARTHUR JUDSON, manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, is quoted as saying that "the signal success of the Philharmonic's current Beethoven Cycle stands as incontrovertible evidence that the music-loving public refuses to accept any substitute for performances 'in the flesh'" and that his organization has "been forced to hang out the S. R. O. signs on the Sundays of the cycle's duration."

Does Mr. Judson really believe this?

I am one of those souls who loves the radio because I can hear the Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras on certain days of the week, although not always at convenient hours, and, therefore, I'm inclined to disagree with Mr. Judson.

I like my musicians "in the flesh," but it is rather expensive to attend all concerts and therefore radio is my only friend.

I can hear the music and pay nothing, except a small sum to the public utility for the use of electricity.

I know dozens of folks who insist on stay home when the aforementioned orchestras appear on the airlanes. And I'm sure that if Toscanini, Stokowski and Koussewitsky were not to broadcast my friends as well as yours truly would scrape up pennies to attend the concerts. We wouldn't hesitate for a minute to go, but, thanks to radio, we can always have a front row seat at the concerts and furthermore no one can step on our toes.

"Radio," Mr. Judson is quoted further as saying, "is an adjunct to the concert field, it is a mistake to consider it in any sense a competitor."

Mebbe Mr. Judson is right. I think he's wrong.

For Mr. Wynn

I think the best story of the week concerns Howard Petrie, the NBC announcer, who was married last Friday to Alice Wood, a hostess at the NBC studios in Manhattan.

After visiting the Municipal Building they went to the minister, who is a friend of the Woods family.

"Isn't there something we can do for you?" they queried the clergyman after the ceremony.

"Yes," he said in an anxious voice, "I'd like a couple of tickets for the Ed Wynn broadcast."

He got the tickets.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

PR 23 1933

Music

By

E. Yolande Gilbert

* * *

A Boston Miss who sang soprano in the chorus under the mighty baton of Koussevitsky when he conducted Parsifal last week, writes the following backstage report: "We sang our little piece of Parsifal Thursday and the only singers on the stage were basses and tenors being knights of the Grail, while the altos, sopranos and five little tenors were hidden in the symphony men's locker room, howling at the partly closed door, onto the stage. "Woody" (G. Wallace Woodworth, director of the Bach Cantata Club) stood on a table and peeked through a crack at Koussevitsky, waving his arms unseeingly at us. It was perfectly mad—people kept barging through our room and slamming doors so that we couldn't hear the orchestra, and when we were singing, we couldn't hear it at all, so that it was just the mercy of God that we stayed on key. But the family, listening on the radio said that it was swell. Pfui, I'm glad that's over!" Thus are the pacific and mystic strains of Parsifal generated!

New York Herald-Tribune

APR 23 1933

Orchestras

The National Orchestral Association will close its third season tomorrow night in Carnegie Hall, where Ossip Gabrilowitsch will play Beethoven's third piano concerto, in C minor, with the training orchestra under Leon Barzin's direction.

Henry Hadley will conduct the Musicians Symphony Orchestra in its last concert but one of the season on Tuesday evening, May 2, at the Metropolitan Opera House. John Charles Thomas, barytone, will sing Joseph Marx's "Der Ton," Brahm's "O liebliche Wangen" and "Eri tu" from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," and Henri Deering, pianist, will be soloist in Franck's Symphonic Variations. Mr. Hadley's other numbers will be his suite, "Streets of Pekin;" Humperdinck's overture to "Königskinder," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

The last concert of the Musicians Symphony, and the last of the orchestral season of 1932-'33, will be held on Tuesday night, May 9.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold a Brahms festival, commemorating the hundredth anniversary of the composer's birth (May 7), from next Wednesday to Sunday, April 26 to 30, in Symphony Hall, Boston. Wednesday night's program includes the Haydn Variations, the double concerto, with Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti as the solo violinist and cellist, and the fourth symphony.

On Thursday a non-orchestral program offers the clarinet quintet in B minor, songs sung by Jeannette Vreeland, the Liebeslieder waltzes, sung by a mixed chorus, and the piano quartet in G minor. On Friday afternoon the Tragic overture, second symphony and D minor piano concerto will be heard: on Saturday night the Academic overture, first symphony and piano concerto in B flat. Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be soloist in both concertos. Next Sunday afternoon the German Requiem will be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, with Miss Vreeland and David Blair McClosky as the soloists.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestral and choral programs. The Wednesday night and Thursday afternoon concerts are open by invitation to subscribers only; those of Friday and Saturday are in the regular subscription series. Next Sunday's concert will be for the orchestra's pension fund.

A Brahms program, including the second symphony, Academic overture and double concerto, will be played Thursday night in the regular subscription series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

APR 23 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY WILL RETURN

Lovers of symphony music will be pleased with the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will return to Pittsburgh early next fall to open the series of visiting orchestra concerts, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, May Beegle, manager.

Mr. Koussevitzky

Aside from its season in Boston and a matinee and evening series in New York City, the orchestra makes only one brief tour of a week. The Boston Orchestra will open the symphony season October 27.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., is president of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association Board. Other members include Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. J. Hanson Rose, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. George L. Collord, Horace Forbes Baker, R. D. Campbell, Harmar Denny, Jr., Moorhead B. Holland, Leon Falk, Jr., James E. MacCloskey, Jr., Matthew T. Mellon, William L. Monro, Arthur Rosenbloom, John C. Slack and Frederic Schaefer.

N. Y. EVENING POST

APR 22 1933

CELEBRATING the 100th anniversary of the birth of Brahms, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a festival of his works in Boston beginning Wednesday evening, in which assisting artists will be the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, piano; Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone; Richard Burgin, violin; Jean Bedetti, 'cello; Robert Gundersen, violin; Jean Lefranc, viola; Victor Polatschek, clarinet, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, piano. The opening program will be variations on a theme by Haydn, Fourth Symphony, and concerto for violin and 'cello with Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti as soloists.

Thursday afternoon will come the quintet for clarinet and strings with Mr. Polatschek as soloist, songs by Miss Vreeland, "Liebeslieder" Waltzes by mixed chorus and quartet for piano and strings, Mr. Sanroma, soloist. Friday afternoon the orchestra will play the Second Symphony, "Tragic" Overture and Concerto in D minor for piano with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as soloist. Saturday evening the program will be the "Academic" Festival Overture, First Symphony and Concerto for piano in B flat with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as soloist. Sunday afternoon the German Requiem will be given with soloists, chorus and orchestra.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be the soloist at the last concert of the season of the National Orchestral Society, Leon Barzin conductor, Monday evening in Carnegie Hall, playing Beethoven's Concerto for Piano in C minor. The orchestra will also be heard in Bach's Overture in D major, Suite No. 3, and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

Bach's B minor mass will be sung in its entirety by the Oratorio Society of New York May 2 in Carnegie Hall, with the assistance of the New York University Glee Club and the following soloists: Rose Bampton, contralto; Louise Lerch, soprano; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Frederic Baer, basso. Albert Stoessel will direct.

172

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

APR 23 1933

18 BOXES SOLD FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

WORD COMES from William Phillips, Undersecretary of State and chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local committee for boxes, that no less than 18 of the 51 boxes at Constitution Hall have already been subscribed for as a result of the activities of his committee, which is vigorously promoting a series of three matinee concerts here next winter.

Although the orchestra's plans for a Washington series remain tentative and depend wholly upon the response of Washington music lovers, it is freely predicted that the Boston Symphony's series, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be one of the outstanding musical attractions of the Capital next season.

Mr. Phillips' committee for boxes reports the following subscribers: Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. Henry Leonard, John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, William Phillips, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, George Weckel and Mrs. C. C. Williams.

* * *

THE COMMITTEE on boxes, headed by Mr. Phillips, includes Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, until recently chairman of the Washington committee of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra;; Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, the sponsor of the famous chamber music concerts at the Library of Congress; Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Cordell Hull, Mrs. F. A. Keep, John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone and Mrs. William H. Woodin.

The Boston Symphony series of three concerts, if given, will all be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. The dates selected tentatively are Wednesday afternoon, November 15; Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey is local representative of the orchestra, at Droop's, 1300 G St.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

APR 25 1933

MUSIC

Festival Takes on Modern Touch With Boston Players

Unusual Chamber Works of Past 20 Years Feature Third Concert; Busch Quartet a Sensation

By RUTH HOWELL

ASSORTED samples of what has been done in the way of chamber music, exclusive of quartets, in the last 20 years, were offered at the third festival concert at the Library of Congress last night. There were those, who, when the evening was over, still preferred pre-20th Century chamber music; there were those who had been highly entertained; and those who were enthusiastic about the modern devices of musical expression. But there was a hall full of people who were wildly enthusiastic about the expert conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, and the playing of the picked group from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A strange program. There was Bach to start with, to show the ever-beautiful classic inspiration for chamber music ensembles. Then the program leaped into the most startling of modern compositions, as if to show just to what lengths composers would go, or as if to give people what they were presumed to be looking for in modern music. Many of them had enough before the program was half over.

Some looked hopefully into Stravinsky, only to be disappointed in everything but the virtuosity of the wind instrument players. It was a dull piece, not even amusing. It can be said for Aaron Copland's Theater Music that he had fun writing it, certainly an orchestra would have fun playing it; and it was riotously amusing to hear. Copland, in the audience, thought so, too. Hindemith's "Kammermusik" almost matched it for hilarity and imaginative instrumentation.

And Ravel, as usual, led all the rest, for beauty and mood and the modern touch used with restraint. His piece for harp, string quartet, flute and clarinet brought the big applause of the evening, not a little of which was for Harp Player Zighera. Needless to say, the Bach was lovely.

Two concerts today conclude the festival.

* * *

ENTHUSIASTIC applause and cheering broke thru the customary dignified appreciation of the distinguished audience at the second concert of the Chamber Music Festival at the Library of Congress yesterday morning.

It was a triumph for sheer musicianship. Adolf Busch, the fine violinist who played here a year ago with the Philharmonic, brought his string quartet to the Library for its first appearance in America. The four musicians—Busch and Gosta Andreasson, violins; Karl Doktor, viola, and Hermann Busch, cello—make a superb ensemble.

Seldom is such unified precision combined with such fine, glowing tone. They gave Pizzetti's "Quartet in D" its first performance—a rather long-winded piece, interspersed with passages of great beauty and a brilliant scherzo movement. Busch's own composition, "Nine Pieces," was played for the first time in America; this is the sort of music expected from a performer's pen, with nine soundly developed themes providing the gamut of musical expression. The swift, light "Prestissimo" was particularly favored yesterday.

Then came a giant work—Beethoven's "Quartet in E Flat," written three years before his death. Here the group gave conclusive proof of their mature control as individual musicians and as an organization.

HELEN BUCHALTER.

MEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

APR 25 1933

TO GIVE BRAHMS' REQUIEM

The choirs of the Malden First Baptist Church announce the presentation of Brahms' Requiem, Monday evening, May 1, at eight o'clock in the auditorium. The Requiem, one of the masterpieces of the world, was written by the composer in memory of his mother. It is given at this time in connection with the Brahms Centenary celebration. Director Albion Metcalf will conduct the production, and special soloists are: Miss Frances Foskett, Miss Maybelle Trask, William Hicks, and John Jenkins, William Weigle will be guest soloist of the evening, and Simon Sternberg of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will assist on the tympani. Today, a special rehearsal will be open to the public at eight in the church.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

APR 25 1933

FESTIVAL OF MUSIC HEARS BUSCH GROUP

Famous String Quartet and Boston Symphony Men Play at Library.

Enthusiasm prevailed at both concerts held yesterday in the Library of Congress as part of the Chamber Music Festival under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation now in progress there.

Yesterday morning those present were privileged to witness the first appearance in America of the Adolf Busch String Quartet of Vienna with its celebrated musicians in a concert rarely equaled in this city for pure musical achievement. The artists who made up the quartet were Adolph Busch, first violin; Gosta Andreasson, second violin; Karl Doktor, viola, and Hermann Busch, violoncello.

Storms of applause greeted the Quartet in D by Ildebrando Pizzetti, with which the program was opened. Its four movements brought into splendid relief both the excellent ensemble tone and the outstanding beauty of the individual instrumental voices of the quartet. There was a unity of attack, a delicacy of phrasing and a melodious coordination of the instrumental values that explains why this quartet has gained such a wide reputation throughout Europe.

A pleasing feature of the program was the playing of nine pieces by Adolf Busch, founder of the quartet which bears his name. These are excellent chamber music material and were well-handled by the men. Beethoven's Quartet in E-flat with its fascinating four movements, the lovely Adagio and entrancing "Scherzando vivace" ending the program.

The night concert was a special treat by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in a program of compositions by Bach, Copland, Stravinsky, Ravel and Hindesmith made a profound impression upon the Nation's leading musicians and critics. His dynamic personality and leadership was as effective in this chamber music auditorium as it is when he is leading the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in a vast hall. It was the soul of music produced through the magic of his baton, especially in the Bach Suite in B Minor, played by flute and strings with the dainty haunting music of the harpischord leading the audience back into another musical age and in Stravinsky's Octuor, in which the wind instruments had their moments of glory.

The concluding concerts of the festival today will include the morning one, with the String Sextet by Bohuslav Martinu, which won the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Prize in 1932, played for the first time in public, and the final concert tonight when Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin will give a sonata recital for violin and piano.

The Sonata in G, by J. S. Bach, one of the big features of this concert, will be played after the original manuscript which is cherished in the State Library at Berlin.

ELISABETH E. POE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

APR 25 1933

Chamber Music Festival Presents Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony, led a chamber orchestra group in a group of amazing compositions last night, at the chamber music festival presented at the Library of Congress by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation. The audience overflowed the hall, sitting on the steps and in the little antechamber.

Suite in B minor, with its tinkling harpsichord, strings and flute, enchanted as opening number. Raval's Introduction et Allegro, for harp, strings, flute and clarinet, provided a peaceful musical lull between the ranting, nervous storms of sound aroused by Aaron Coplands "Music for the Theater," Igor Stravinsky's "Octuor," for wind instruments, and the finale, "Kammermusik No. 1," by Paul Hindemith. Both Copland (who was present and bowed from the stage) and Hindemith brought barn-yard, zoo and circus to mind with the varied noises woven into their patterns. Stravinsky's work had more subtle undertones.

The Adolf Busch String Quartet made its American bow yesterday morning. A Quartet in D written by Pizzetti, dated 1933, had its first appearance in public and won general approval for the third movement, a scherzo. Mr. Busch's own "Nine Pieces" were musical thumb-nail sketches—fragments like those of a gaily-colored quilt. The Beethoven Quartet in E Flat, opus 127 was given brisk, rugged reading

Plays and Players --- Music and Musician

Full Evening Of Bostonians At Washington

Koussevitzky Brings Chamber Orchestra and Modernist Composers

Washington, Tuesday

A LITTLE belatedly comes the turn of the Boston Orchestra at the festivals of chamber music in the Library of Congress. A contingent from the Chicago Orchestra, with Mr. Stock conducting, assisted (if memory serves) at the dedication of the present auditorium. On one and another occasion two or three score of Mr. Stokowski's virtuosi were summoned from Philadelphia, with or without their ardent conductor. Not until arrangements for the current festival were afoot did an invitation descend upon Symphony Hall. It was, of course, accepted; but it could hardly have fallen at a more difficult hour. Conductor and orchestra are in full tide of preparation for a taxing Centenary Festival to mark the birth of Brahms. It begins in the evening on which this article appears; stretches forward through six concerts, until next Sunday.

Nevertheless, on Monday evening Dr. Koussevitzky and thirty-odd members of the orchestra filled a whole concert at the Congressional Library. To do so, they travelled disagreeably from Boston to Washington through Sunday night; spent Monday afternoon in rehearsal on the spot. The concert ended, they took night train to New York; caught a connecting train, as timetables persuasively phrase it; arrived in Boston in time for rehearsal at Symphony Hall late this, Wednesday, afternoon. There was no occasion for surprise when Dr. Koussevitzky, coming to his place on the festival stage, suggested a tired man, whom the excitements of a notable concert soon warmed into usual readiness.

To the organizing powers and the anticipating audience the conductor was apostle of modernist music and of the composing generation that writes it. Hence an agreed program assembling such pieces. It began, by way of introductory classic, with Bach's Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings, remembered item in the repertory at Symphony Hall, now played with Mr. Laurent for the flute, Mr. Sanromá at the harpsichord, and a semi-circle of only ten strings. Next followed Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theater," unheard in Boston since the original performances seven years ago, now returning in the version for small orchestra. To it succeeded, through the second part of the concert, Stravinsky's Octuor for Flute, Clarinet, Two Bassoons, Two Trumpets, Two Trombones, never included in the Symphony Concerts; Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for Harp, with string quartet (doubled) flute and clarinet; Hindemith's "Chamber Music, No. 1," dated 1922, to the best of recollection, also unknown to Symphony Hall. There were Bostonians in the house quick to say that it and Mr. Copland's Suite should next season find place there.

A notable audience, assembled from capitals of music in the East and the Middle West, as well as from Washington itself, received conductor, orchestra and most of the chosen numbers with unremitting applause. It was long, as such pauses go, before Dr. Koussevitzky could lift his stick for the first measures of Bach's Suite. At the end, the whole company had evidently discovered in Mr. Laurent a master-flutist of these days, remarkable above most for the full body and the rich flow of his tone. It heaped plaudits on his head; while conductor and string choir sat in a modest background. . . . In turn, Mr. Bernard Zighera, who played the harp-part in Ravel's piece like an inspired prophet—and master—of his instrument, was similarly rewarded. In fact, for the Washingtonian contingent, still rather elementary in experience of concerts, this "harp-piece" seemed the event of the evening. . . . Bostonians will recall how Mr. Zighera's tone clothes Ravel's skeleton with magnificent flesh.

For the composers, the audience heard Stravinsky's time-creased "Octuor" with patient attention; answered with courteous applause; renewed it more warmly when the eight virtuosi and the conductor from Boston became the objectives. . . . Hindemith, as usual, excited the audience, what with the wild beginnings of this "Chamber Music," the rhythmic life that spurs it, the slow, deep-voiced song for wind quartet; the whirling frenzy of the finale . . . Better than either of his more illustrious compeers fared Mr. Copland. His "Music for the Theater" belongs to the days in which he was cultivating the sonorities and the idioms of "symphonic jazz"—or more truly of jazz as it ran in our urban streets and was not so symphonic. As often as it recurred—the more obviously the better—the house rose to it. Mr. Copland's gentler and more musing pages gave hardly less pleasure. The quick reactions were waves of applause for an orchestra and a conductor long excelling in such music. Forthwith Dr. Koussevitzky diverted them toward the composer who happened to be in presence. The "conservative" public of Symphony Hall may think despitefully of Mr. Copland; may even have been at some pains to show him as much. Elsewhere, and with much reason, he is justly admired American composer.

The surprise of the concert was the impression from Stravinsky's piece. Have the years so gnawed, all unobserved, at some of the handiwork of the illustrious Igor? The Octuor dates back no farther than 1923; while there are twenty years and more upon the still living and still potent "Petrushka" and "The Rite of Spring." In such points of time the "Octuor" belongs to the post-war period in which a Stravinsky, not quite clear in his own mind, busied himself with experiments. In those days he was all for a music that should be emotionless and expressionless, that should have no existence outside a pattern, a logic and an interest of sonorities. His ears were also receiving—at second hand—his first impressions of American jazz, and they were troubling. As relief and as experiment, as testimony to a temporary theory and practice, he may have made this "Octuor."

Perhaps in some respects it was agreeable to the time that first heard it. Resurrected in 1933, it seems no more than a self-conscious, calculated, persistently barren exercise in the sonorities of a small wind and brass choir, logically patterned, well or ill-conditioned for the playing instruments, streaked here and there with the memories of American jazz, from first measure to last a relentlessly arid and cerebrated music. Only Stravinsky's instinct for rhythm and command of it—however much he may dull himself with theory and gospelling—keep the "Octuor" in motion and faint show of life. Perhaps its only interest nowadays is its broad hint of a Stravinsky who, if he happened to choose, could be self-willed pedant.

A program-book, paranthetical with dates, was reminder that Hindemith now nears his fortieth year. After their manner, elapsing time and changing circumstance have subdued his younger temper. Eleven years ago he was a wilder spirit—a spirit, moreover, at the height of disillusion and derision with the post-war period on the Continent of Europe. By the evidence of the "Octuor," Stravinsky, under those corroding years, retreated into pedantry; whereas Hindemith flung out only the more fiercely. The first division of his "Chamber-Music, No. I" is born of a world lashing itself into an endless but impotent restlessness. The second, sharply and insistently rhythmed, cries aloud for motion and yet more motion, the incessant beat of feet without direction or goal. The third—the quartet for wind instruments—would find refuge and solace in the contemplative moods of another time. The fourth, a frenzy of hateful and derisive sound, is recoil from that post-war epoch and all that therein was. Even now, when those days are only fading scornful memory, Hindemith's music still blasts.

Throughout a music written not only from mind to mind, but also from heart to heart—though with far-different significance from that usually attached to Beethoven's phrase; music, outside the slow song, that seethes with an insatiable bitterness. In that song, moreover, Hindemith sounds heights and depths unusual with him. He is putting to music-paper no echoes of German romanticism, releasing no unescapable racial instinct. As truly as any of the hallowed forefathers, he is writing a music that remembers; that, remembering, craves both light and peace. Throughout this "Chamber-Music," again, the Hindemithian fertility of means, the Hindemithian drive through measure after measure, become potent address to the listening imagination.

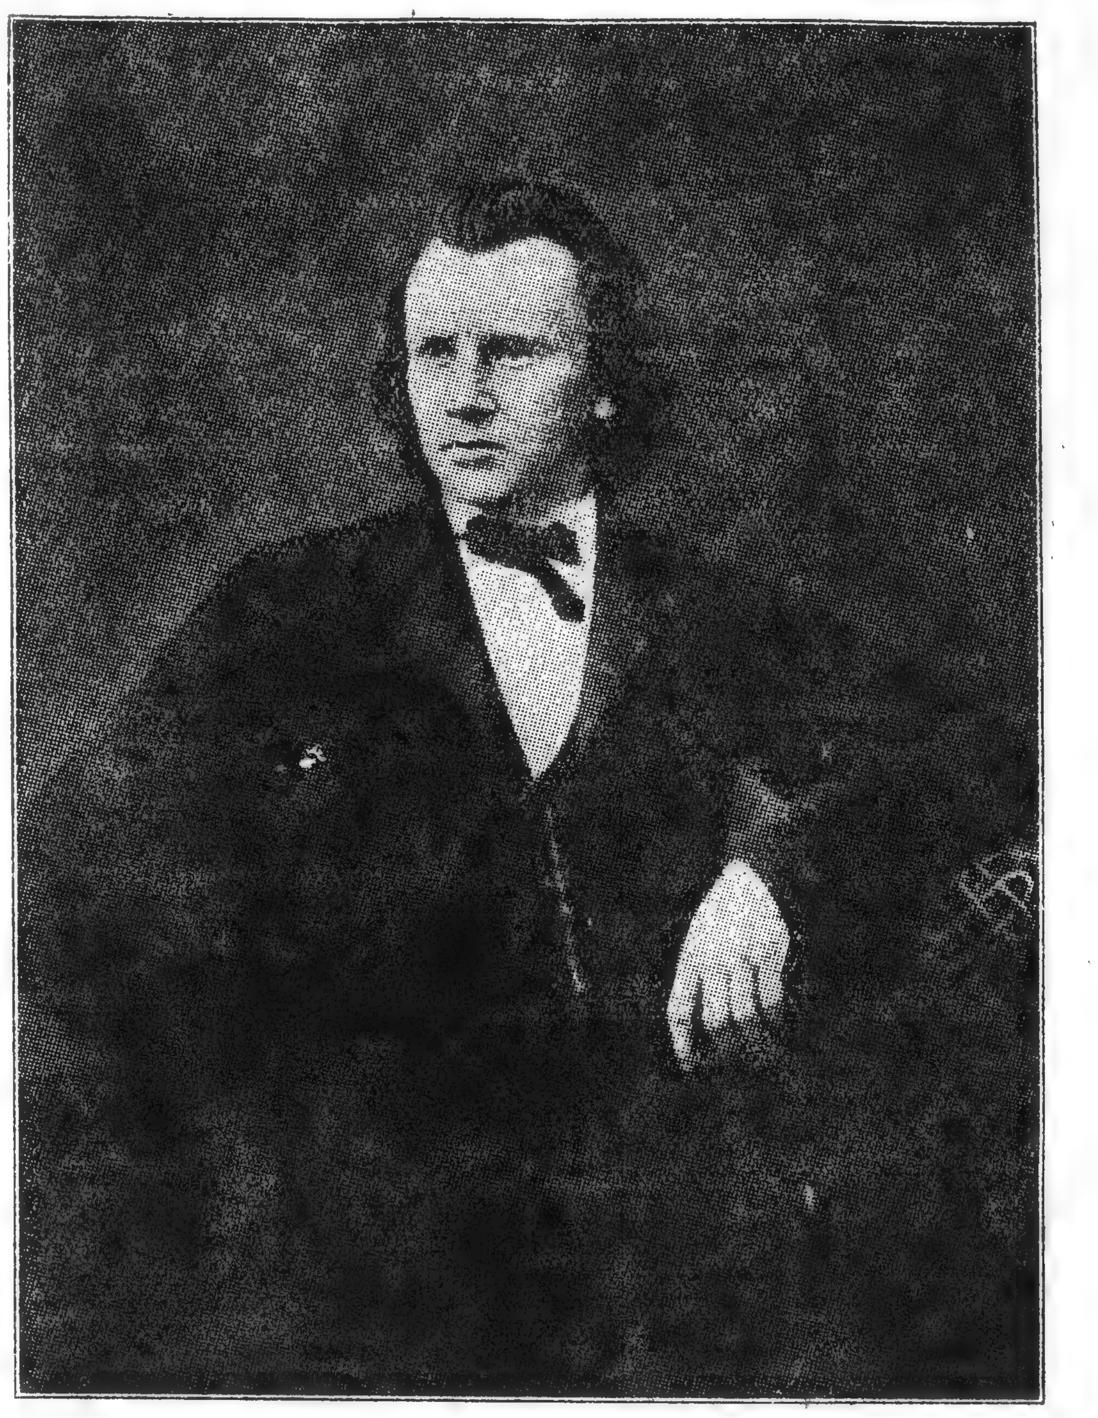
As for Mr. Copland, he professes to have put by his days of apostolic jazz, to have dropped into the plaything box the "Music for the Theater" and the once berated Piano-Concerto as so many outgrown toys. Beyond a point, he discovered, reasonably enough, symphonic jazz could feed neither his mind nor his imagination. Hence the turn into such composition for orchestra as the "Symphonic Ode," or for piano as the set of variations. By all means he has the right to his own paths, but the first impression from this "Music for the Theater" heard after seven years, was of a music born spontaneously, irresistibly, from which there was but one relief for the composer—to write. The "Symphonic Ode" is, of course, music of larger design, ampler means, deeper implication, but it smells of the study beside the will and desire kindling into this "Music for the Theater."

Moreover, out of it sounds jazz that has become symphonic yet keeps its true and original tang. How pale and unrealistic in comparison seem the efforts of our other composers to make this transfer to the symphonic concert-hall! They boggle and attenuate. Willy-nilly, the genteel tradition haunts them; whereas Mr. Copland flings out free and sturdy. Both naturally and artfully, a faint nostalgic note, as of this jazz remembered and by memory caressed, tinges the lyric interludes in Mr. Copland's Suite. None the less they open a poetizing vein hardly to be noted in his later and more hardened work. He muses, sings, translates into tones the gentle melancholy of recollection. For this "Music for the Theater" on both its realistic and its poetizing pages, is work of imagination. In it transfused into tones is our sense of the theater—the house that releases our dreams and breeds more; yet gratifies our lust for ruder entertainment. Of late there have been revivals in more than one concert-hall. There should be more.

A postscript remains to be written. Mr. Laurent, Mr. Gillet, Mr. Polatschek and Mr. Laus of the wind choir of the Boston Orchestra tarried over night in Washington, to be joined this morning by their colleague, Mr. Boettcher. Together they played, for the first time in public, a Quintet for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon and Horn, written by Mr. Gustav Strube, now Director of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore, within long memory violinist in the Boston Orchestra, conductor at its Pop Concerts, frequent composer of music that then had its little day. Regretfully, the Quintet is one of those pieces that slip into festival programs, and no lay hearer can guess the reason why. Mr. Strube, conductor though he was, shows little understanding and less imagination for the individualized or contrasted timbres of his five instruments. En masse he insists upon using them. This Quintet lacks altogether the light hand, the quick fancy that composition for wind instruments should invite. In substance and style it is as pedestrian as it is through going. It belongs, quite unconditionally, to a closed musical past. . . . We Bostonians were hoping for a music that should disclose the virtuosity and the musicianship of the five eminences from Symphony Hall. Instead, we heard one that merely proved their fidelity to a thankless job.

H. T. P.

His Beardless Youth



(Courtesy of the Vossische Zeitung)

Brahms in His Early Years

The Composer, Whose Centenary Will Be Observed in the Festival Beginning This Evening at Symphony Hall

---

CHESTER, PA.
TIMES

APR 27 1933

A CHIEL AND HIS "NOTES"

By Henry C. Vedder

:—o—:

So when Mr. Koussevitzky (I hope I have spelled that right) led the Boston Symphony Orchestra lately in ~~playing "The~~ Rebus," by a Russian composer whose name I will not even attempt to spell, I confess that if that was entitled to be considered music I am totally lacking in capacity to appreciate it. To me it was a mere medley of sound, or rather of noise. If every player had been playing a different composition, the result could hardly have been worse, so far as I am concerned. I had as lief listen to Chinese "music".

:—o—:

Brahms Festival === Irish Players === S

To Brahms As Present Taste Will Have Him

TheLyric,Romantic,Composer In Overture, Concerto, And Symphony

THE Symphony Orchestra fused yesterday the third concert of the Brahms Centenary Festival with the final matinée of the symphonic year. On the Brahmsian side, the audience heard the seldom played "Tragic Overture"; the familiar Second Symphony, in D major; the less familiar Piano-Concerto in B-flat major. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was the pianist, absent these fifteen years from the Symphony Concerts, since, in 1918, he shared in this same Concerto. . . . In regular course the audience took leave, until autumn, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. At his first entrance it affirmed its regard for him by a partial rising in its place, by a general clapping of hands. When the orchestra had risen—unanimously—and the conductor faced the house with his usual deprecating gesture, the applause waxed long and loud. It was renewed in tumult and torrent at the end of the Concerto; but then Mr. Gabrilowitsch divided it with Dr. Koussevitzky; while both were at pains, like the audience, to include the orchestra in these excitements.

Bostonwise, elect ladies stamped their feet. Young voices cried approving shouts. The din was persistent and elated. It may pass as the first farewelling of the symphonic year. For, were an archangel in full panoply, trumpet in hand, to alight on the stage of Symphony Hall at half-past four on a Friday afternoon, it is within belief that the matinée audience, pressing resolutely onward to the next thing, might hardly linger to observe him. Perfunctory, as usual, labor of love by a few enthusiasts, were the recalls that ended a concert already two hours and ten minutes long. They order these things better of a Saturday night.

Through that time, the audience listened to the romantical Brahms; in these days there is, indeed, no other; outside the "Tragic Overture" to the comfortable Brahms, before whom one and all may sit back and enjoy. For this Johannes, who came into the world a hundred years ago, was no composer to surge, like Beethoven, into an occasional fierce democracy. No more was he the aristocrat that, musically and by instinct, Mozart often is. By temperament, by habit of life, by frequent exercise of the composing mind and spirit, Brahms was a bourgeois, like most of us, high, middle or low, who foregather on these Friday afternoons in Symphony Hall from October as far as May. By such token, and as the wind of musical fashion now sits, we hear him gladly in such pieces as the Piano-Concerto in B-flat or the Second Symphony.

Perhaps for that reason the "Tragic Overture" has now become occasional number in well-ordered symphony concerts. Only once before in ten years had it returned to Symphony Hall. It harks back to the vanished legend of a cold, austere, abtruse, harsh-voiced, Brahms, addressing the mind rather than any other seat of musical sensation, receiving the mental benediction of those fortunate enough to understand. As the spring sun melted the snow-maiden in Rimsky-Korsakov's folk-opera, that notion long since dissolved before the romantical, the lyrical Brahms that every conductor nowadays "presents," that every practised audience equally expects. Hence a new treatment of this "Tragic Overture," that is neither grim, nor bleak, nor forbidding. Hardly for a moment did it sound as such from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Rather we heard the music of a romantic hero, by fate oppressed and overruled, which is their frequent lot. He aspires in tonal contemplation; he struggles in tonal action; but the walls of tonal destiny shut only the closer upon him. Not by thought, nor yet by will, may he prevail against the inexorable. There is hint of releasing death, of funeral rites, of impenetrable dark rather than of final illumination. Likely enough, Brahms believed himself consciously and resolutely tragic as he wrote of a soul beset and doomed and conquered. As the conductors now read the overture, the disembodied hero has become romantical, Hamlet-like. "Speak me fair in death." For the time-spirit—to say nothing of the musical fashion—will read every classic and semi-classic by its own light.

Similarly with the Piano-Concerto in B-flat major. Was there not a time when we curious youngsters were told that it was a work of prodigious, wearying length; that it was a symphony for which Brahms had embedded a piano in his orchestra; that the piano-part was thick, opaque, at moments plodding? True, it is a concerto four symphonic movements long. True again, the music often wavers between symphonic design and concerto-like course. True once more, there are pages on which the pianist must begin where Brahms ends; so set free the composer's thought and feeling. Yet in this spring of 1933 who, for a moment, suspects that he is sitting before a once forbidding music?

Instead, we settle back to the enjoyment of the singing violoncello and the singing clarinet in the slow movement, to its advance from gentle fervor into mild exaltation, middle-age at its musing. Or take our pleasure in the liveliness and the lightness of the finale, Hungarian accents and the genial rest. Though middle age sit at home in its arm-chair, mentally, tonally, it may still go a-gambolling. Or rejoice in the rush of energy through the rougher texture of the Allegro Appassionato, as though for the while Brahms were harking back to the other Piano-Concerto, which we shall hear this evening, of his fiery and strenuous youth. Even in the first movement, which spares nothing in the working and the co-ordination of the musical ideas, which abounds in a sort of mental-musical exercise for the exercise's sake, there are relieving moments when the light of Brahms, the tone-poet, shines out of Brahms the thoroughgoing composer.

Above the rest, on Friday, was the pleasure of the pianist. These twenty years Mr. Gabrilowitsch has known studied and played this Concerto in B-flat major. He has tested his every re-action; clarified his every impression; chosen and polished his imparting ways and means. Correcting himself at every turn, he has arrived at last at a finality of purpose and accomplishment. His technical resource is unfailing. The play by himself, or beside the orchestra, with the themes and the figures of the finale is the proof. A light hand summons a light tone, keeps it ever in clear and graceful motion. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's mind grasps the gentle fervors of the Andante, his own heart answers to them. And lo! a stream of semi-sentimental, semi-voluptuous music—the bourgeois Brahms a-musing—becomes also a stream of beauty and emotion. More than the composer, the pianist poetizes; with a manly tenderness suffuses the whole. There is fire to strike out of the disguised scherzo and Mr. Gabrilowitsch strikes it. Nor does he forget that however dense, however rough-coated, the musical texture, the Brahmsian tone-poetry may at any moment come sounding through.

It is this perception, this imagination, that make Mr. Gabrilowitsch's version of the first movement more tolerable than that of most pianists. He declines to run along in mere imitation of the orchestra or response to it; discovers for himself a passing euphony, an instant contrast, a turn of phrase, a heightening of accent or transition, an alert staying or speeding of the pace—and again there is a glimpse of a beauty and a poetry that Brahms had locked too close within. Seldom has maturity of every transmitting faculty done more perfect work upon a piece of music than did Mr. Gabrilowitsch's upon this Second Concerto. His own richness and ripeness stirred the Brahmsian quiet; loosed the Brahmsian reticence; relaxed the Brahmsian thoroughness, gilded even the Brahmsian plodding. Quick to the purpose of the pianist, Dr. Koussevitzky, a master above any of his predecessors with concertos, was at one with him as three years ago he had been at one with the very different Schnabel. With both pianist and conductor, the orchestra was partnering third. There was reason for the applausive din.

The time-spirit, again, gets its way with the Second Symphony, as well as with the other music of Brahms. Once it was his "Pastoral"; but who now thinks of it as such, save only when the oboe sings its simple melody above the plucked violoncellos of the Allegretto Grazioso? Once it was Brahms's "sunlit idyll." Sunlit seems hardly the word for the melancholy that persistently shadows the slow movement. Nor is "idyll" precise and characterizing designation for the driving exultation of the finale, as though to dispel that haunting sadness. (The Brahms of wistful resignation was to come with the Third Symphony). The present Brahmsian gospel does not isolate this Second Symphony from the companion three. Along with the other Brahmsian scherzi, more lyrical than high-rhythmed and high-humored, goes the Allegretto Grazioso. The Adagio is again the musing and the brooding Brahms, the mind turned inward, the eyes aloof from the living scene. The finale joins itself to the finale of the First Symphony in joyous, confident mood. The swinging, buoyant motion of the first movement is no new thing with the symphonic Brahms.

This time-spirit touches Dr. Koussevitzky as it touches the rest of us; while his own re-creating temperament invites him to the current view of the Second Symphony. Hence a first movement that weaves its matter into richer and richer tonal texture; that proceeds from warmth to warmth; that fades into a golden afterglow. An Adagio with melancholy tinged, and deepened, and finally drooping; the simplicity of the Allegretto; the breadth, the spirit, the sparkle of the Finale. A long way beyond and above Mendelssohn is this so-called Mendelssohnian symphony. . . . So tonight to the Brahms of power.

H. T. P.

Years That Line and Years That Ripen

Koussevitzky

From a Photograph Taken This Spring

(Faitzer—New York)

Week-End Films

Ol' Debbil Depression

LIKE the determined old lady who said she might be right or she might be wrong but at least she would do something, the movies are beginning to take up the problems of the depression. In "Gabriel Over the White House" all of the vexatious matters that trouble the nation were solved at one swoop. In "Looking Forward" at the State this week the scale is somewhat less ambitious. All that is concerned is a single department store in London.

Its troubles perhaps are sufficient for one movie. Like everybody and every-

Continued on Following Page

Gabrilowitsch

Pianist at the Brahms Festival

s Festival === Irish Players === S

Years That Line and Years That Ripen

Koussevitzky (Faltzer—New York)

From a Photograph Taken This Spring

BLANK PAGE

Globe Apr 27 THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Brahms Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening the series of five concerts devoted to the music of Johannes Brahms, in observance of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. This Brahms' festival brings the 52d season of the Boston Symphony to conclusion. Inasmuch as Brahms was born in Hamburg on May 7, 1833, this observance must of necessity anticipate the actual birthday by about two weeks.

The program last evening was purely orchestral, comprising the variations on a theme by Haydn, the double concerto for violin and cello, with Mr Burgin and Mr Bedetti as soloists, and the fourth Symphony in E minor.

Tickets for last evening's concert and for that of today were distributed among the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts. The expenses of these two concerts are to be paid by unnamed individuals. Let this opportunity be taken to thank them, whoever they may be, for so munificently contributing, in a time of economic stress, to the pleasure of the Boston musical public and to honoring the memory of one of the greatest composers who ever lived. The audience virtually taxed the capacity of Symphony Hall and applauded Dr Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra vociferously throughout the evening.

It ought not to be overlooked at this time that Boston is fortunate in harboring a conducted who is very fond of Brahms' music; so fond, indeed, that he not only has placed it upon his programs frequently during his nine years' tenure, but carried through the brilliant Brahms Festival of three years ago.

The three compositions last evening provided analytical listeners opportunity for comparing the cerebral Brahms with the Brahms who, in spite of himself, occasionally broke through his austerity to write emotional music truly heroic in breadth and mood.

The Haydn Variations and the Double Concerto, for all their momentary flights of lyricism, are intellectual music. They display Brahms as a consummately skillful master of the science of composition. He rearranged and enlarged upon Haydn's theme ingeniously. There is variety in his treatment which, in spite of its indisputably Brahmsian character, never wholly obliterates the style of Haydn. In this respect these variations differ considerably from those which Brahms built upon a fragment by Handel, an earlier work wherein the Handelian manner is soon buried beneath the overwhelming mass of Brahms' piano style.

However capricious Brahms may have been in his Double Concerto, one is almost never—save in the slow movement—permitted to forget the composer's structural skill. There are, indeed, some perversities of musical thought; interludes when embryonic songs, just beginning to be formed in the violin, cello or orchestral parts, are deliberately broken off and Brahms becomes the scholarly, pattern-tracing musician, loath to let his feelings get the best of him. But in the slow movement there are several quiet, mysterious, deeply moving pages that seem to come straight from the heart.

In the E minor Symphony, on the other hand, mastery of structure and emotional intensity are about evenly distributed, to put it coldly and analytically. Here, too, the instrumentation is for the most part more colorful and transparent—if that adjective can be applied—than in either the Double Concerto or the Haydn Variations.

Needless to say, Dr Koussevitzky's interpretations were brilliant. Some find them too brilliant, excessively Slavic for the solid, North German Brahms. However, that may be, it cannot be denied that they make their effect; they do not distort the music. Within certain limits, directions in a score can be followed faithfully; beyond those limits it is a matter of individual temperament and perception. Mr Burgin and Mr Bedetti played their parts beautifully, as one would expect from two first desk men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert this afternoon will be devoted to songs, chamber music and the "Liebeslieder" waltzes.

C. W. D.

BOS

SYMPHONY IN HONOR OF BRAHMS

First Concert of Festival Given to Subscribers

Post Apr 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

On the 7th of next month will come the 100th anniversary of the birth of Johannes Brahms. In honor of that occasion the Symphony Orchestra is closing this, its 52d season, with a Brahms festival, the opening concert of which took place at Symphony Hall last evening. This concert and the one this afternoon were open by invitation to subscribers to the four series of Symphony concerts. Last evening's audience virtually filled the hall, and many were in their places at an early hour since no seats were reserved.

VIOLIN AND CELLO CONCERTO

For this initial programme Dr. Koussevitzky selected the genial variations on a theme by Haydn, the very rarely heard concerto for violin and violoncello, and the Fourth Symphony. The soloists in the Double Concerto were Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti, the orchestra's concertmaster and the leader of the 'cello section respectively. Both of these admirable virtuosi applied themselves diligently to the not too graceful task before them, for in this concerto the solo parts do not stand out to good advantage. Indeed, the work as a whole seems labored, almost perfunctory, as though Brahms had embarked upon an uncongenial task but having once started was bound to see the matter through. Nevertheless, last evening's performance was applauded to the echo. And there was much applause again for Dr. Koussevitzky's pervadingly energetic reading of the symphony.

The centenary of the birth of Brahms finds that composer's music, which was once received with incomprehension and even with disfavor, actually popular in the more restricted sense of that term. Last evening's enthusiasm is certain to be repeated in the concerts that follow. It is only those who are by nature skeptical who would presume to question how long the present popularity of Brahms will endure, whether he will continue to hold the place beside Bach and Beethoven which Hans von Buelow, with his famous remark anent the three B's assigned to him.

MUSIC

Herald Apr 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Brahms Festival, a series of eight concerts of the composer's works being given in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of his birth, on May 7, 1833, was opened last night with the following program:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Concerto for Violin and violoncello with orchestra, in A Minor, op. 102
Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98.

When a composer has become so warmly a part of musical life that festivals in honor of his birth may be given, generally the time has long gone past when it was germane to comment at length on his works, unless the festival be in celebration of some such prodigious producer as Bach. Certainly the Brahms works played last night are familiar, and to most of the audience, dear,—except the concerto, which is not so often heard.

As the concerto was played last night, with shimmering tone and grace by Richard Burgin, and with richness and good taste by Jean Bedetti, it won many admirers, despite the sterility of some of the musical material used in it, and despite the occasional cliches in the manipulation of the orchestra and the use of it with the solo voices of the instruments. Certainly the cadenzas are undistinguished, but possibly the blame for that can be laid to the original soloists for whom Brahms wrote the piece.

It was good to hear the lovely variations on the little Haydn choral. They were beautifully played, with finesse, and with charming subtlety. Such ingenious skill, combined with genuine emotion and expressiveness is not often to be found in even the most celebrated "variations."

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Fourth Symphony, always interesting, was less impetuous than usual last night. In its restraint it emphasized the Teutonic dreaminess of Brahms rather than his occasional moods of gypsyish violence.

An audience which had crowded the hall 10 minutes before starting time was tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky's enterprise in planning the festival and was warmly appreciative of the excellent performance given.

E. B.

MUSIC

Globe Apr 28

SYMPHONY HALL

Brahms Festival

The second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brahms Festival series yesterday afternoon, was given over to music in the smaller forms. There were two chamber pieces, the Quintet for clarinet and strings, played by Messrs Burgin and Gundersen, violins; Mr LeFranc, viola; Mr Bedetti, cello, and Mr Polatschek, clarinet, and the G minor Piano Quartet, with Mr Sanroma at the piano.

Despite its inordinate length, the piano quartet was a product of genuine inspiration. It teems with ideas, and melody flows freely throughout. The clarinet quintet, on the other hand, although written late in Brahms' life, seems not infrequently forced and crabbed.

To one listener, the most interesting thing about it is the manner in which Brahms explored, and very successfully, the tonal and expressive resources of the clarinet.

A small chorus from the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, and from the Harvard Glee Club, trained by Dr Archibald T. Davison, was heard in a group of the "Liebeslieder" waltzes. Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth played the piano accompaniments. These delectable miniatures are likewise the result of lyric inspiration, and are some of the most beautiful of Brahms' smaller compositions.

The Radcliffe young women and the Harvard singers performed them well, achieving some of the most subtle choral singing one has heard in a long while. From a second balcony seat in the rear of Symphony Hall it was impossible to pick any flaws. The tone was smooth and deep, and nothing in the way of nuance and expressive phrasing seemed to escape them.

Miss Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, who will be heard in the "German Requiem" on Sunday, offered five songs: "Liebestreu," "Das Madchen Spricht," "Sir Wandelten," "so Willst du des Armen" and "der Schnied." Miss Vreeland's singing possessed its customary beauty of tone and a certain degree of interpretive skill. The hearty emotion of "der Schmied" made that song the most effective of the five, although the nostalgic "wir Wandelten" was enjoyable.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be soloist this afternoon in the Second Piano Concerto, in B-flat major, which, apparently, has been transferred from the Saturday evening program. The D minor concerto, which Mr Gabrilowitsch was to have played today, will, instead, be heard tomorow. The remaining items for this afternoon, the concluding Friday concert of the season, are the "Tragic" overture and the D major symphony.

C. W. D.

JORDAN HALL

Boston Civic Symphony

The season's fifth concert of the Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra, presented last night in Jordan Hall, had for its soloist Marie Murray, contralto. Mrs Murray sang the vocal score of Elgar's "Sea Pictures." Schubert's "Romantic Overture," the Beethoven Second Symphony, and

---

...gram proceeding logically from Tully, Gluck and Purcell through German lieder to modern songs, but not when so little stylistic difference is made between one group and another. Mr. Tripp as accompanist at the piano was both competent and sympathetic.

A. W. W.

BRAHMS FESTIVAL, ETC.

The program for this Thursday afternoon will be of a miscellaneous nature. Clarinet Quintet in B minor (Victor Polatschek, clarinet; Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, Lefranc and Bedetti, strings.) Songs to be sung by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano (Liebestreu, Das Maedchen Spricht, Wir Wandelten, and Der Schmied); Liebeslieder Waltzes (mixed chorus). Piano Quartet (Mr. Sanroma, pianist).

At Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, 8 P. M. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor: Academic Festival Overture; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello (Messrs. Burgin and Eedetti); Symphony No. 2, D major.

At Jordan hall, 8:15 P. M., the Boston Civic Symphony orchestra, Joseph F. Wagner, conductor, will give a concert. Schubert-Kelley, Romantic Overture (first time in Boston). Beethoven, Symphony in D major; Elgar, A Cycle of Songs for contralto (Marie Murray and orchestra); Massenet, Scenes Picturesques.

Friday afternoon the Boston Symphony orchestra at 2:30 o'clock will give these works by Brahms: Tragic Overture; Piano Concerto in D minor No. 1 (Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Symphony D major, No. 2.

There will be a different program for the concert on Saturday night at 8:15 o'clock: Academic Festival Overture; Piano Concerto in B flat No. 2 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist); Symphony in C minor No. 1.

The 110th anniversary of Chickering & Sons will be celebrated by a concert in Chickering hall Friday evening. A concert will be given by Isabel French, Felix Fox, pianist, and Jean Bedetti, violoncellist. Mrs. French will sing songs by Handel, Brahms, Strauss, Laparra and Duparc. Messrs. Fox and Bedetti will play sonatas for piano and violoncello by Brahms and Rachmaninoff.

Next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 o'clock Brahms's "A German Requiem" will be performed, bringing an end to the Brahms festival and the 32d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct. Boston Symphony orchestra, Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, Jeanette Vreehand, soprano; David Blair McClosky, baritone. This concert will be in aid of the pension fund of the orchestra.

SECOND BRAHMS FESTIVAL DAY

Chamber Music and Songs at Symphony Hall

Post Apr. 28

Yesterday afternoon the Brahms festival was continued at Symphony Hall with a second "invitation" concert, this time devoted to the chamber music and songs of the composer, the centenary of whose birth we are now commemorating. To the casual eye there seemed not a dozen unoccupied seats in the auditorium, and the obvious enjoyment and enthusiasm of the audience continued almost unabated through a concert two hours and a quarter long. Surely the setting of Brahms' sun is not yet.

The programme began yesterday with the Quintet for clarinet and strings, Opus 115, a work rarely heard in these days of scarcity of chamber music hereabouts. Messrs. Polatschek, Burgin, Gunderson, Lefranc and Bedetti gave it careful, intelligent performance and lent it warmth and beauty of tone; if for one or another hearer the music itself seemed neither stirring nor eloquent the fault lay not with the playing of it, and the majority heard it eagerly.

The Quintet was followed by five songs from various periods of Brahms' composing years, sung expressively and in musicianly fashion by Jeannette Vreeland to the accompaniments of Helen Ernsberger, and, after an intermission, by the "Liebeslieder Waltzes," for pianoforte duet and four vocal parts. In these waltzes the pianists were Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, directors, respectively, of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and from those choruses came the small group of singers. All concerned brought both skill and the appropriate spirit to the music in hand, and again there was marked appreciation on the part of the audience.

The concert closed with a performance by Messrs. Sanroma, Burgin, Lefranc and Bedetti of the G minor Quartet for piano and strings, Opus 25, a performance by four virtuosi playing as one, a performance of suavity and of musical finesse that yet for some could not quite breathe the breath of life into this music born seventy-seven years ago.

RDAY, APRIL 29,

SYMPHONY IN TRIBUTE TO BRAHMS

Gabrilowitsch at Piano in B Flat Major Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The third concert of the Brahms Festival now in progress at Symphony Hall in commemoration of the centenary of that composer's birth made yesterday afternoon the final matinee of the current Symphony season. As has become the custom, Dr. Koussevitzky was welcomed to the stage by a standing orchestra and audience.

GABRILOWITSCH SOLOIST

By exception this evening's concert will offer a different programme, though Ossip Gabrilowitsch, whose performance of the Second Pianoforte Concerto provoked an unusual demonstration of enthusiasm yesterday, will again be the soloist, offering this time its predecessor in D minor.

Before the Concerto yesterday came the Tragic Overture, neglected in Dr. Koussevitzky's Brahms Festival of three years ago, and after it the Second Symphony, already heard this season. The Tragic Overture begins impressively, but the initial sombre, almost gloomy mood is not too well sustained. Indeed the first word in the title of its companion-piece, the Academy Festival Overture, might almost apply to this work, much of which savors less of the theatre than of the study lamp.

Cheers for Pianist

Nor is the Pianoforte Concerto in B-flat major one of Brahms' more inspired works, despite the poetic beauty of much of the third movement and the pleasing Hungarian note that enlivens the finale. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's performance was characterized by elegance and suavity, by fine musicianship and discreet bravura. He was happiest when the composer himself was happiest.

As an old friend long absent, the audience, as noted above, received the distinguished pianist with rare and heartening warmth. After each movement came the applause in increasing degree, until at the end cheers and shouts of approval were added to the smiting of palms and the stamping of feet. With characteristic modesty Mr. Gabrilowitsch forbore to take these plaudits wholly to himself, conspicuously displaying his own appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzky and the players, and in particular of Mr. Bedetti, who had played so eloquently the phrases for solo violoncello in the third movement.

The Second Symphony

After the lesser Brahms of Overture and Concerto it was good to hear the greater Brahms of the Second Symphony. And hearing that work so superbly interpreted and played yesterday, it was almost impossible to agree with Felix Weingartner who, in his "The Symphony Since Beethoven," unhesitatingly sets it above the other three.

In any case, certain austere and cryptic measures of the Adagio aside, it may be pronounced the most lovable of all symphonies.

ap 21 5

Plays and Players -- Music and Musicians

Fresh Pieces For Beginning With Brahms

The Double Concerto Revived, Haydn Variations Anew, Unusual Audience

Trans Apr 8

NOT to be behindhand, the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. returned thanks last week for the audience that on Wednesday evening awaited the first concert of the Brahms Centenary Festival. A note inserted in the program-book then said:

> The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are much gratified at the interst in the Brahms Festival to be given next week in Symphony Hall, and only regret that it has been impossible to fill some of the applications from subscribers for tickets for the Wednesday evening and Thursday-afternoon concerts.
>
> A full attendance for every concert of the Festival is now assured—a confirmation of the loyal support of the Orchestra's subscribers, which is of course essential to its existence. The Conductor and the Orchestra welcome the opportunity to give the additional concerts of the Brahms Festival to the subscribers as an expression of gratitude and appreciation.

The actual method was the dispatch of invitations to subscribers along with the cards for renewal of subscriptions. As fast as acceptances were received the allotment of tickets was made. They assured only entrance into the concert-hall. For the rest, first come, first seated. To the casual eye subscribers to the supplementary Mondays and the semi-classic Tuesdays had come in numbers. For once, moreover, if they arrived in good time, they might take the places of their own choosing. Consequently an audience strange to frequenters of symphonic Fridays and Symphonic Saturdays; also an audience curiously distributed. It was a cynic of the "socially significant" Fridays who, casting an eye around quoted sotto voce Gilbert's lines:

To this conclusion we agree—
When everyone is somebodee.
Then no one's anybody.

To which there is only to rejoin that this new-made audience listened as one absorbed into the occasion and stirred by it; applauded eagerly but intelligently; was lavish to Dr. Koussevitzky, directing, and to Messrs Burgin and Bedetti playing the solo-parts in the Double Concerto; finally proved its birthright to the Symphony Concerts by clapping the standing orchestra beyond even conductor and soloists.

As it was, this first festival-concert repaired two breaches in the current Brahmsian repertory. By chance rather than design, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn have not been played for six seasons through the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts. Nor was there room for them in the Brahms festival of 1930. Now, in better fortune, they began the Centenary Festival of 1933. Brahms wrote no more ingratiating or characteristic orchestral piece. The theme, sung twice at the outset, arrests the ear and lingers in easy recollection. Without obvious effort on the composer's or the hearer's part, it is informing presence in every variation. Though Haydn shaped and sang it, Brahms-like is its mingling of homeliness and charm.

The eight variations never flag. Brahms of the structural mind and the craftsman's hand shaped them. The Brahms who was also tone-poet filled and colored them. Above custom, he employs a full orchestra, choir by choir, almost instrument by instrument, with feeling, imagination and effect. He is as apt and abundant in composing fancy. Each variation has not only its own musical shape, and content, but its own atmosphere and suggestion. They muse or are melancholy; slip past gray and ghostly; ring firm, stride free. Nowhere in his orchestral pieces is Brahms readier with means, richer and more diversified in imagination. To end, an expansive, upbuilt finale, reiterating the theme, but best remembered for orchestral intensity and luster. Variations on the grand scale, so proclaimed and diversified by the conductor; variations as well that ask and usually received the finesse and warmth of a virtuoso orchestra. Perhaps it was only a twist of personal predilection for a cherished piece that sometimes craved lighter toned performance. One remembered it, or fancied one did, from Dr. Koussevitky's earliest years in Boston.

The other fresh-coming piece—the Double Concerto in A minor for violin, violoncello and orchestra—has receded from precarious place in the active Brahmsian repertory to securer position in the ceremonial rites of Brahmsian festivals. The composer confessed to a measure of pride in his work. It was his experiment toward a modernization of the eighteenth-century Concerto Grosso; his step in advance from the Triple Concerto, for piano, violin and violoncello, that now passes for minor Beethoven. By the same token the Double Concerto is becoming secondary Brahms. Too evidently to sustain the hearers' interest or quicken him to pleasure, the first and the third movements are work of a composing mind and will bent upon a self-imposed task. Calculation oftener than creation puts them to music-paper. Technical feats of composition strew the course, as though in them Brahms found means and also relief.

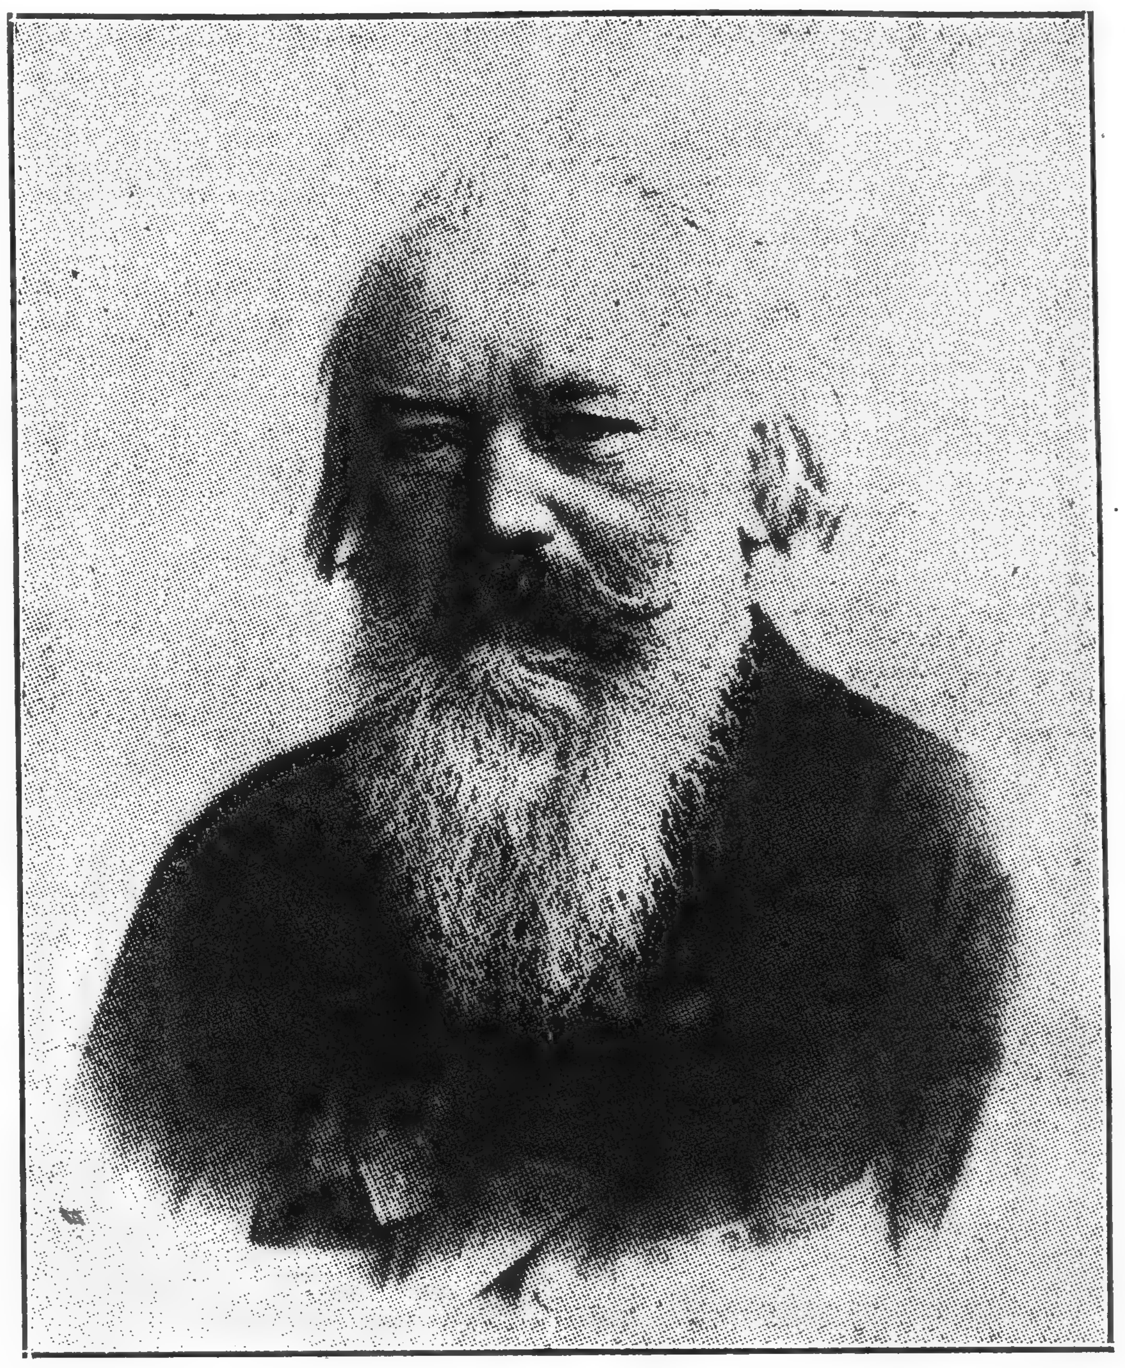
Thought and counterpoint finally compass the end; while solo-instruments and orchestra remain the tools in a laboring hand. The intervening slow movement brings warmth, if not rapture, to the patient ear. The Brahmsianer, who balk at nothing, say that it is ballad-like and "darkly glowing." Maybe, but we can all agree that it is more congenial to the solo instruments. Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti, playing them, did their best for a music that never sets either violin or violoncello in high relief. Their best—probably any pair's—was not enough. Brahms insisted upon soloists long accustomed to each other's ways. They at least met that test.

To conclude, Dr. Koussevitzky's heroical-romantic version of Brahms's Symphony in E minor, familiar since his first season in Boston, losing nothing from the more puissant and also truer-balanced conductor that he has now become. Again there was occasion to take the pleasure, and renew the praise, of the gusto and drive of the homely scherzo; of the shifting harmonic traceries around the melody of the Andante that are light and shadow upon its beauty; of the romantic accent and color upon the first movement; of the upreared finale until it towers into one of the summits of music. Nine years ago the conductor re-fashioned this Fourth Symphony upon ears and minds that heard with wonder. Now, accustomed, for most of us, there might be no other. Fortunate they that still hear for the first time. For them the thrust and thrill; for us others only the calm assurance of expectation.

H. T. P.

The Brahms Centenary, 1833-1933

Festival Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in Both Boston and Cambridge



Johannes Brahms

From a Photograph Taken toward the End of his Life

ARRANGEMENTS may now be announced for the celebration at Symphony Hall, and incidentally at Sanders Theater in Cambridge, of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Brahms. He was born at Hamburg in Germany, on May 7, 1833—a date that would bring the exact centenary a week beyond the close, this spring, of the Symphony Concerts. The next best thing was to set apart the final days of the season for a Brahms Festival. Out of nine years' experience the public of Symphony Hall knows Dr. Koussevitzky's zest for anniversaries, his zeal for the organization and the direction of festivals. Whatever the times, he was resolved that the Boston Orchestra should fittingly mark an occasion to be observed generally in European and American capitals of music. (In some, indeed, anniversary concerts have already begun.) As he proceeded with plans he found ready coöperation from the trustees and the management of the orchestra, from private persons interested in its welfare and prestige. Though Brahms is now an established, even a popular composer, there are devoted Brahmsites still among us.

Programs

Consequently, a Brahms Festival in Boston and in Cambridge five days long, excelling any other arranged in this part of the world, doing becoming honor to the composer, ranging through his orchestral, choral and chamber music. There will be six concerts in all as hereunder:

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 26
(Symphony Hall: 8.15)

Variations on a Theme of Haydn in B-flat major (Chorale St. Antoni) Op. 56A.
Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello with Orchestra, Op. 102.
Symphony, No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 27
(Symphony Hall: 2.30)

Sonata for Violin and Piano in A major, Op. 100.
Songs with Piano.
Liebeslieder Waltzes for Four-part Voices and Piano-Duet from Op. 52 and Op. 65.
Quintet in G major for Two Violins, Two Violas and Violoncello, Op. 111.

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 27
(Sanders Theater)

Academic Festival Overture in C minor, Op. 80.
Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello with Orchestra, Op. 102.
Symphony, No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 28
(Symphony Hall: 2.30)

Academic Festival Overture in C minor, Op. 80.
Concerto, No. 2, in B-flat major for Piano with Orchestra, Op. 83.
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 29
(Symphony Hall: 8.15)

A repetition of the concert on Friday.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 30
(Symphony Hall: 3.30)

A German Requiem to Words from the Holy Scriptures for Solo-Voices, Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 45.

Performers

At the orchestral and the choral concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct. . . . The orchestra will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the chorus, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. . . . Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti of the Symphony Orchestra will be the violinist and the violoncellist in the Double Concerto. . . . In the Piano-Concerto, Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play the solo-part. . . . For the Requiem the solo-singers will be Miss Jeannette Vreeland and Mr. David Blair McClosky. . . . In the chamber concert, Miss Vreeland will sing the songs; Mr. Burgin and Mr. Sanromá will play the sonata; a small choir of picked voices from Harvard and Radcliffe will sing the waltzes: Messrs. Burgin, Gundersen, Lefranc, Cauhapé and Bedetti from the string choir of the orchestra will play the quintet.

Details to be noted are the inclusion in the festival of the Double Concerto unheard for nine years in Boston, and of the St. Antoni Variations overlooked in the festival of 1930; the repetition of the Requiem for the first time in three years; the return, after long absence, of Mr. Gabrilowitsch in a Concerto in which he excels. Only two of Brahms's four symphonies have place in the Boston concerts, because the other two—the second and the third—have already been played this season in ordinary course.

Tickets

Finally, as to tickets and other terms:

The orchestral concert of Wednesday evening and the chamber concert of Thursday afternoon are open only by invitation to subscribers for the Symphony Concerts. "The expenses of both are privately assumed."

The concert at Cambridge on Thursday evening is the final concert in the University series, under the usual conditions.

The concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall are concerts in the subscription series; but seats may be bought for both, with a wider choice on Saturday.

The choral concert on Sunday afternoon is a concert for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, free from any subscription, with seats on sale to all comers.

The New Y

THE ESSENTIAL BACH

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IF THAT vigorous and eminent objector, Lord Brougham, were still living, and if he cared as much for musical verities as for literary and political ones, he might be tempted to protest that a fundamental part of our thinking today on the subject of Johann Sebastian Bach has taken the shape of a "wild and guilty fantasy" concerning the music of that master. I am thinking of the seemingly ineradicable belief that Bach was essentially a composer of what is called "absolute" music—that is to say, music which does not depend upon any expressional relationship, but makes its effect wholly through its qualities as a pattern of organized sound. Lord Brougham would have called this belief, I think, a "wild and guilty fantasy" for two excellent reasons: it is wild, because it betrays a reckless want of accuracy and judgment; and it is guilty, because it misrepresents the artistic character of Bach and the nature of his typical achievement.

The prevalence of this fallacy is scarcely in need of demonstration. It is as common among musicians, music-lovers, and critics as several other mischievous fallacies—for example, that Wagner was essentially "a musician of the footlights," and that Debussy—whose masterpiece is a five-act musical tragedy of fathomless profundity and extraordinary imaginative range—was a "miniaturist." I shall content myself with mentioning a single recent voicing of the hoary Bachian fallacy which I am discussing. It was uttered by an eminent musical educator whose teachings are said to enter the minds of innumerable susceptible listeners. He is quoted as having declared that Bach "represents the ideal of absolute music."

* * *

Patterns or a Language?

ONE would expect to find that a composer who respesents "the ideal of absolute music" is one who devoted the larger and more important part of his writing to music that is "absolute" in kind. But what do we find in Bach's case? Any intelligent student who takes the trouble to go through the Complete Edition of the Bach Gesellschaft and classify the music that is gathered in that monumental pile will discover that more than two-thirds of Bach's work is not "absolute" music at all, but music of an obviously expressional character—music whose meaning is intimately related to an imaginative concept, either a verbal text or an underlying poetic program.

This is not a matter of opinion, but a matter of fact. Our educator would have stated the truth if he had said the opposite of what he is quoted as having said. He would have made a valuable, a corrective, and a striking contribution to the sum of the general musical intelligence if he had asserted that Bach "represents the ideal of music as an art of expression": that those of his works in which he employs music as a heightened form of speech—as, in other words, a language—are more than twice as numerous as those works which are essentially essays in tonal structure and design. As regards the comparative importance of the works in the two categories, it is perhaps only necessary to remark that the two masterpieces which are generally viewed as Bach's supreme utterances, the B minor Mass and the St. Matthew Passion, are not only sublime examples of music in its aspect as an art of transfigured tonal speech, but that they represent the loftiest summits of an exalted terrain of feeling and expression on which Bach's imagination sustained itself throughout his creative life.

To single out as a representative of the ideal of absolute music a composer the larger and more important part of whose works are deliberately and incomparably expressional—to choose as the ideal example of the musical abstractionist a writer whose Cantatas, Passions, Masses, Chorale-Preludes, and other church music stand toward his clavier pieces, his instrumental chamber music, and his abstract organ works in the proportion of two to one, seems (to put it mildly) a remarkable instance of misplaced emphasis.

* * *

A Travesty of Bach

I SHOULD like to recommend to those who share the view of our eminent educator that they lose no time in obtaining and studying Professor Charles Sanford Terry's new book, "The Music of Bach: An Introduction"*—that newest demonstration of the scholarship, the insight, and the devout apostleship of the foremost living authority on Bach. Professor Terry not only knows everything that is to be known concerning Bach and his works, but he is an exceptionally penetrating and sympathetic interpreter of Bach the artist. Together with men like Schweitzer, Newman, Pirro, and Grace, he represents the enlightened attitude of modern critical scholarship toward the music of Bach, as opposed to the often mistaken and obscurantist traditionalism of an earlier generation of Bachian specialists.

Professor Terry is among the most persuasive of those present-day students of Johann Sebastian who are aware that the picture of Bach the composer that has long hung on the walls of the academics is a preposterously distorting portrait of the original.

"It is a comedy of contradiction," writes Professor Terry, "that a man emotional in every fibre should have been, almost until our own generation, regarded as a cold mathematical precisian. The portrait is a travesty, and its persistence due, in no small measure, to ignorance of Bach's musical language. In his Cantatas it can be studied over a wide field of observation, and may be described as one of realistic symbolism, expressing particular moods and signifying particular actions by melodic or rhythmic figures. And the idioms never vary. For Bach's language, developed to its fullest in the Cantatas, is employed in almost the earliest of his compositions, especially in the "Orgelbüchlein [Bach's first collection of Chorale-Preludes] planned at Weimar. It is, indeed, the most consistent musical idiom known to us, and also the most precise. For though Bach's mature experience devised shadings and inflexions, the root symbols are constant in his usage, and dissipate at a breath the false notion of him as a cold formalist."

* * *

Bach's Symbols

IT CANNOT be too often insisted upon that Bach, throughout those two-thirds of his compositions which most fully and characteristically reveal him, used music fundamentally as a language rather than as material for tonal patterns and arrangements. This language, as Terry reminds us (and as Schweitzer and Pirro have elaborately demonstrated) "is one of realistic symbolism, and the 'Orgelbüchlein' is its pocket lexicon. Bach was not its originator; for the method was typically German. But it came to maturity with him, and in his usage of it he was consistent from earliest youth to mature old age. As his art developed, his symbols acquired manifold shadings and inflexions. But the master-symbols themselves do not exceed some twenty-five or thirty in number. Some are directional, denoting ascent or descent, height or depth, width, distance, and so forth. The act of hastening or running, and, conversely, the idea of rest or fatigue, are indicated by appropriate symbolic formulas. The moods, again, are distinguished by themes diatonic or chromatic to express joy or sorrow. The thought of laughter, of tumult, of terror, and the forces of nature, the winds, waves, clouds, and thunder have their indicative symbols, which do not vary."

* * *

A Faithful Mirror

THIS music, says Professor Terry (he is speaking particularly of the Cantatas), "reveals the deeps of his character, the high purpose to which he dedicated his genius. Already as a schoolboy he was serious beyond his years, and throughout his life, religion was his staff and comfort. With what vivid literalness he read his Bible is evident in the music with which he clothed its text. And of the Lutheran hymn-book his exposition is so intimate that, even in his Chorale-Preludes, which lack words, we cannot seldom detect in his music the stanza that was in his thoughts and guided his pen.

"Thus, the music of the Cantatas is a faithful mirror in which the mind of their composer is revealed. They disclose the fact that his astonishing fecundity was controlled by searching and frequent pondering of the texts he set. They reveal the keeness and clarity with which he visualized Bible scenes and characters. How consistent and devotional, for instance, is his portrayal of the Saviour's gracious dignity! And, after hearing the several Michaelmas Cantatas, who can doubt that Bach pictured Satan, not as Isaiah's Lucifer, the Day Star, the Son of the Morning, but as the malignant and cumbrous Serpent of Genesis, the Great Dragon of Revelation? For always Bach depicts his rolling gait in writhing themes, which outline his motion as clearly as an etcher's pen. With what tender touches he points the scene of the Nativity! And with what poignant emotion he follows the Saviour's footsteps to Calvary!

"With truth, therefore, Schweitzer observes that the Cantatas are the most reliable indicators of Bach's genius and character. For their range is so wide, they reflect him from so many angles, and express him in so many moods, that they reveal his personality no less than his art. . . . Bach was one of the tenderest and most emotional of men, with the eye of a painter and the soul of a poet. But the fact is fully revealed only to those who are at the pains to translate him."

* * *

Bach the Tone Poet

THE essential Bach, beyond doubt or question, was Bach the tone-poet. We may not welcome this truth. Some of us may prefer to think that the essential Bach was Bach the abstract pattern-weaver, whose music, as a contemporary writer chooses to call it, is "mathematics made visible, . . . logic overheard." But the evidence is all against the view that Bach the "absolutist" was the typical Bach. There is overwhelming proof, supplied by all that we know of him and of his work as a whole, that in the Cantatas, the Chorale-Preludes, the Passions, and the rest of the church music, we come closest to his mind and his imagination.

"The Music of Bach: An Introduction," by Charles Sanford Terry. London: Oxford University Press, 1933.

SYMPHONY ENDS WITH REQUIEM

Season and Brahms' Festival Closes With Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a performance of the German Requiem the Symphony Orchestra's 52d season and its Brahms festival, in honor of the centenary of that composer's birth, came concurrently to an end yesterday afternoon.

TWO GOOD SOLOISTS

This performance of the Requiem was given in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, making, exceptionally, a third Pension Fund Concert within one season. The chorus yesterday, as in recent performances of this work in Symphony Hall under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, came from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, who had been heard in songs of Brahms at the concert of last Thursday afternoon, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, who had already been soloist with the orchestra this season in the three performances of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast." Mr. McClosky was particularly successful yesterday in the first of his two solos; to his music he brought a seriousness that was happily without a suggestion of the sanctimonious and a richness of tone that set his measures in a good light.

Closes the Festival

The Requiem brought an obvious and at the same time an appropriate end to the Festival. It would have been still more impressive had Brahms been able to sustain through the seven numbers of the Requiem the inspiration or, if you prefer, the inventiveness that marks the first four. There is nothing in choral music more solemnly beautiful than the opening section, and the fourth division, the chorus, "How lovely is thy dwelling place," is possessed of an unfading charm.

It has been urged that these collegiate singers lack the body of tone essential for choral music of this type and such criticism is, of course, well founded.

With Beauty of Tone

Yet there were compensations yesterday, as there have been in the past. Dr. Koussevitzky's youthful singers answered him with a raptness and an elation, a devotion to and enthusiasm for their task that their elders might scarcely summon. And there was besides this, particularly in the women's chorus, a frequent beauty of tone that owed not a little to the freshness of the voices.

The scenes of enthusiasm that marked the last two Symphony Concerts were repeated yesterday, and among those who shared deservedly in the plaudits were Dr. Davidson and Mr. Woodworth, who had trained respectively the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses. The audience completely filled the hall.

Apr 30 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Brahms Festival

Inasmuch as last evning's Symphony concert—the final one in the Saturday series—was also the last purely orchestral concert in the Brahms Festival, an entirely different program was played. Ossip Gabrilowitsch was soloist, this time taking part in the D minor piano concerto—that towering, rather formidable work that came near being made into a Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky likewise conducted the genial "Academic Festival" overture and the First Symphony in C minor.

It was not entirely Mr Gabrilowitsch's fault, probably, that the piano virtually roared during parts of the concerto. Brahms, in a youthful zeal for sonority and imposing effects, demanded that the instrument roar. Although this work achievs moments of grandeur, it is rather solid stuff, at times stony and harsh. On the whole, howevr, Mr Gabrilowitsch's performance was less of force and more an intellectual and poetical interpretation than some which have been heard. The slow movement was eminently pleasurable.

Dr Koussevitzky summoned all the intensity and beauty of tone possible for his inimitable readings of overture and Symphony. The C minor Symphony, indeed, is somewhat better suited to his temperamental idiosyncrasies than that in D major heard on Friday afternoon. But, as proof that he is a conductor of exceptional capacity, structural outlines received quite as much attention as emotional expression.

The Saturday evening audience, always more demonstrative than that which attends on Friday, stamped and cheered considerably. Dr Koussevitzky was much pleased with a gift of a laurel wreath which had been placed against the podium before the program began.

The Brahms Festival will be concluded with this afternoon's performance of the "German Requiem."

C. W. D.

Brahms Festival Is Notable Success

By MOSES SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, closed the Brahms Festival and the season as a whole in a blaze of glory with the presentation of Brahms' "German" Requiem in Symphony Hall yesterday. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, participated in the concert, which was for the benefit of the Pension Fund and which was heard by an audience that filled the hall.

The performance gained in beauty and momentum as it went along, so that the second half was far more exciting than the first. Dr. Koussevitzky, after an arduous season and an especially trying final week, must have been a very tired man when he came on stage at the beginning. But by some miracle he had so overcome any lassitude after the lapse of a couple of sections of the Requiem that he seemed as fresh as ever.

It is unnecessary to go into details of the performance which, on the whole, was splendid. Miss Vreeland was in better voice than in the lieder group on Thursday, but still not at her best. Mr. McClosky, a local singer, justified by his musical and artistic performance his choice for an important task. The end of the performance was succeeded by an extraordinary demonstration of applause on the part of the audience, shared by all the performers, but directed in the final stage toward the imaginative leader of the orchestra.

Amusements

Apr 29

E BOSTON GLOBE—SA3

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Brahms Festival

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Brahms Festival, yesterday afternoon, was also the last in the regular Friday subscription series. Dr Koussevitzky was therefore greeted by a rising orchestra and audience. The handclapping—sustained a little longer than usual at the beginning of a Symphony concert—signified plainly the listeners' mingled pleasure at yet another program, and the reluctance with which they were soon to take seasonal leave of conductor and orchestra.

The program contained three numbers: the "Tragic" Overture, unheard at a Symphony concert since 1927; the D major Symphony, and the second of Brahms' piano concertos, that in B-flat major. Ossip Gabrilowitch, distinguished both as pianist and as conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, was soloist.

Not in a long while has the Friday audience stamped and cheered as it did after Mr Gabrilowitsch's masterly performance in the concerto, and again after the Symphony. A modest, somewhat self-effacing artist, Mr Gabrilowitsch balances in his playing two elements: he is at once a sound interpreter of classic music, and a poetizing, recreating player. Under his hands this great masterpiece of symphonic composition retains its solidity of structure and its essentially Teutonic style and spirit. Yet Mr Gabrilowitsch imparts to it a certain delicate fervor all his own.

Since this B-flat concerto was last heard in Boston, when Arthur Schnabel played it at the 1930 Brahms Festival, comparisons between his interpretation and that of Mr Gabrilowitsch inevitably spring to mind. Yesterday's performance was emotionally fervid, though organically unified. If memory is correct, Mr Schnabel seemed committed to what is regarded by some as a typically German intensity, more powerful than delicate. Where the German artist sang the slow movement a little reservedly, Mr Gabrilowitsch suggested restrained passion. Not infrequently, in the breath-taking, frenzied first two Allegros, Mr Schnabel's tone was hard; yesterday this was at a minimum.

Until some master of Brahms' stature comes to walk among us this B-flat concerto must remain the greatest, in many respects, of modern times. Brahms here not only summoned all his skill at musical form, all his ingenuity and dignity as a symphonist—for the work amounts to a symphony for piano and orchestra—but he let himself go emotionally. Here the classicist does not obscure the romantic Brahms, who, when he chose, could write melody and express his feelings as well as any.

Surely the slow movement, with its reminiscences of "Immer Leiser Wird Mein Schlummer," is by its very nature without a peer in modern music, save, perhaps, the two slow sections in Brahms' C minor and F major symphonies. Schumann's well-worn remark about the "heavenly length" of Schubert's C major Symphony can be applied to this concerto more sincerely than some nowadays use it in connection with Schubert's work.

From first to last, the "Tragic" overture" is somberly dramatic in mood. There is no mistaking its tragic implications. Possibly it lacks the symmetry of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and likewise the impression that a complete dramatic episode is being told. Nonetheless, it is great music.

Dr Koussevitsky's reading of the D major Symphony is an old story. Save for a few badly produced notes from the brasses—who may be tired after a season's work—and an interlude where the 'ecllos were driven so hard they sounded like Tchaikovsky, the performance was thoroughly enjoyable.

Tonight, by exception, a different program will be heard. Mr Gabrilowitsch will be soloist in the early D minor concerto; Dr Koussevitsky will also conduct the "Academic Festival" overture and Brahms' First Symphony, in C minor.

C. W. D.

JORDAN HALL

Herald Apr 29

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The last Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The concert was listed in those of the Brahms Festival, April 26—April 30. The program was as follows: Brahms, Trajic Overture; pianoforte concerto B flat major No. 2 (Ossip Gabrilowitsch); symphony, D major No. 2.

When Mr. Gabrilowitsch played in Boston with this orchestra on Jan. 18 1918, he chose this concerto. Dr. Muck was the conductor. The program also comprised the overture to "Les Francs-Juges" by Berlioz and Tchaikovsky's Serenade for strings. Mr. Gabrilowitsch had already played the concerto at his first appearance, with this orchestra on Feb. 16, 1907. It was a great pleasure to hear him again, and it is to be regretted that he has not stood before a Boston audience as the conductor of the Detroit orchestra. He is always welcome whether he gives a recital or plays with our own orchestra. Yesterday was his seventh appearance as a pianist at the regular concerts.

This concerto in B flat he has made his own. We do not forget the admirable performances by Rafael Joseffy, Adele aus der Ohe and others; but there is a peculiar charm to the interpretation by Mr. Gabrilowitsch; no one within our recollection has so caught the Hungarian spirit of the last movement in which North German Brahms turned Magyar, with gypsy blood in his veins. As rendered by Mr. Gabrilowitsch and the orchestra inspired by its leader this concerto was no longer a display piece for the glory of a virtuoso, it was pure music, played by the pianist in a most poetic manner, brilliantly when there was occasion for brilliance; and conducted by a musician in full sympathy with the pianist and the composer; it was a performance abounding in delicate nuances, nor were eloquent outbursts lacking; an ideal performance that the sensitive musician or layman might imagine, but one that is very seldom heard. It was a performance that would lead one, hearing of it by enthusiastic reports from the fortunate, to exclaim: "I would I had been there." Seldom has any performance in Symphony Hall excited such hearty, one might justly say tempestuous and prolonged applause for pianist, conductor and orchestra.

If the andante movement ravished the ear, the intoxicating dash of the finale stirred the blood. Dr. Koussevitzky when he first came on the platform was paid the now customary tribute of respect and affection; the audience rose and applauded loud and long.

The "Tragic" overture is not heard as often as it deserves. It is a waste of ingenuity, this discussion as to what particular tragedy Brahms had in mind, "Hamlet" or "Faust." The word "tragic" is enough to denote the contents; and the overture is nobly tragic; not hysterically so after the manner of the younger generation. There is a reserve that intensifies the tragic emotion. There is the purifying of passion commended by the Greeks.

One had supposed for many years that the second symphony of Brahms was a sunshiny, balmy, easy-going, pleasant work in contrast with the first, which to early hearers was austere, yes cryptic. Of late years biographers have arisen who insist that these poor foolish people were mistaken; that the second symphony is full of storm and stress. There are conductors who take that view. Dr. Koussevitzky is not among them, nor does he attempt to strengthen the Mendelssohnian flavor when it is perhaps too apparent by drowning it in the strong waters of a more nervous, one might add, and blatant school.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

APR 30 1933

Two Series Of Concerts

Symphony Orchestras Of Boston And Washington Plan 3 Programs Each Here Next Year

INTERESTING from a musical point of view is the announcement that plans are being successfully carried forward that will bring to Baltimore next season two of the outstanding symphony organizations of the East, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, for a season of three concerts each.

Not since the war time has the former organization played more than one concert a season in Baltimore. The Washington Symphony, a comparatively recently formed body, has recently been heard at the Lyric, and it is due to the interest displayed on that occasion that it has been decided to present it in a season of concerts.

Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr has acted as counselor in Baltimore for both of these organizations and it is largely due to her energy and enterprise that these concerts have been added to the city's cultural events.

According to present plans, the Boston Symphony will be heard at the Lyric on November 14, January 31 and April 3. The tentative dates for the National Symphony are November 8, January 17 and March 14.

SYMPHONY IN SEASON'S FINAL

Big Ovation for Conductor and Players

Post Apr 30

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of last evening, the final one of the season and the fourth of the Brahms centenary festival, which ends tomorrow with a performance of the "German Requiem," was even more of an occasion than its predecessor of Friday afternoon.

If there was enthusiasm Friday, there was more last night. And the programme, which included the finer of the two overtures, the "Academic Festival," the greater of the two pianoforte concertos, that in C minor, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch again as soloist, and the noblest and most imposing of the four symphonies, the First, was distinctly the better of the two.

Long after the concert ended, a standing audience remained to express by cheers and applause its appreciation of an evening of great music, greatly played. As on Friday, Mr. Gabrilowitsch received an ovation. It was well deserved. His performance of the concerto was marked by loftiness and vitality, qualities conspicuous also in the playing of the orchestra, in the conducting of Dr. Koussevitzky, while the performance of the symphony surpassed any that has been heard here under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

The close of this, the orchestra's 52d season, finds conductor and orchestra at the summit of their powers. Never was Dr. Koussevitzky's place in the affection and esteem of the public so secure.

BOSTON EVENING

Concert-Crier

Next Week

The Pops—For a forty-eighth year the Pop Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be resumed on Wednesday evening in Symphony Hall. They will continue on every week-day through May and June, with an additional concert on every alternate Sunday from May 14. On the stage Arthur Fiedler will again be conductor, high in favor with the public for his programs, for his unflagging zest and ambition, for the spirit he has infused into the orchestra. That body will number eighty players. It will be heard in music that ranges widely—fragments of symphonies; classic and popular overtures; selections from operas, operettas and musical plays; items from ballets; waltzes and other dance-tunes; numbers from theater-music of all sorts; miscellaneous trifles light and pleasing; orchestral arrangements of all sorts. No conductor in the long past of The Pops has assembled such diversified programs as Mr. Fiedler's. In the course of the spring, evenings of a particular composer or of a particular sort of music will be in order.

Otherwise the arrangements of previous years will hold. The hall will be clothed in the summer setting that Robert Edmond Jones designed. The floor will be set with tables—five chairs to each. For the tables there will be the usual "refreshments," now enlarged by that mildest of intoxicating beverages—three-point-two beer. It will be dispensed in various brands, Bostonian or New Yorkish. Smoking will be in order, except in the first balcony. Chatter may go to and fro. Everywhere an air of spring release and of seasonal pleasure. But there is no need to particularize. What Bostonian, permanent or transient, does not know his Pops? The freshman at the schools and colleges are but the exceptions that prove the rule.

The first program, finally, assembles Wagner's "Emperor March"; the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride"; the Gypsy Dance from Bizet's "Carmen"; a new Fantasia on Themes from Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel"; Gershwin's new "Cuban Overture"; an arrangement for strings of the old English ballad, "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes"; Grainger's "Molly on the Shore"; Ravel's "Bolero"; a selection from Kern's newest operetta, "Music in the Air"; Strauss's waltzes, "Wine, Women and Song"; the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." Subsequent programs will be printed daily on these pages.

Orchestral—Friday evening in Jordan Hall: Concert

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, APRIL 28, 1933

MUSIC

BRAHMS FESTIVAL

The second concert of the Brahms festival took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program and participating artists were as follows:

Quintet for clarinet and strings in B minor (Messrs. Polatschek, Burgin, Gundersen, Lefranc, Bedetti).
Songs: Liebestreu
Das Madchen spricht
So Willst du des Armen
Wir wandelten
Der Schmied
(Jeannette Vreeland—Helen Ernsberger, accompanist).
Liebslieder Waltzes for piano duet and four vocal parts (small chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society—pianists: Dr. Archibald T. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth).
Quartet for piano strings in G minor (Messrs. Sanroma, Burgin, Lefranc, Bedetti).

Once more an enthusiastic audience filled Symphony hall to capacity at the name of Brahms. Perhaps it is not entirely due to Brahms that the festival is such an unqualified success. In part it is the public's implicit faith in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, in their capacity to choose and execute with unfailing perfection. But in part it is due to Brahms. Not that a Bach or a Beethoven festival would fail where Brahms succeeds. But the very fact that Brahms is so overwhelmingly popular indicates that the "post-war period" is not to be easily classified. Certainly the spirit of Brahms's music is remote from any of the numerous guesses as to the "temper of the present age."

A possible fault with yesterday's concert was the size of the hall for chamber music. From a distance parts of both quintet and quartet were almost unbearably remote. It would be interesting to hear if the beauty of Mozart's chamber music would also tend to fade if played under the same conditions. As it was the quartet was heard the better of the two. The perfection of both performances reflects great credit on Mr. Polatschek, Mr. Sanroma and the Burgin string quartet.

Miss Vreeland added much to the pleasure of the afternoon by her performance of Brahms Lieder. She sang with ease and in excellent taste. Miss Ernsberger, her accompanist, also deserved great credit.

The wisdom of the program-maker was proved by placing the piano quartet last. Two or three of the Liebeslieder Waltzes, sung by small chorus with piano accompaniment, were delightful to hear, but they soon became cloying. Indeed this part of the program took on, unwittingly, an amateur, "parlor" flavor.

On the whole, the concert was an interesting one and should stimulate a love of chamber music in Boston.

A. W. W.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Brahms Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's festival in observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Johannes Brahms was ended yesterday afternoon with a performance of "A German Requiem." This concert, which likewise marked the conclusion of the Boston Symphony's 52d season, was in the nature of a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund. Dr Koussevitzky conducted. The choral portions were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, were soloists.

The hall was filled. When the performance was over and conductor, orchestra, soloists, choristers, and Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth stood together upon the stage, a veritable pandemonium broke loose. This was the sort of demonstration that occurs rarely in Symphony Hall, and only when a vast audience has been indescribably stirred. In all the clapping, cries of "bravo," and pounding of feet, no one was forgotten. Those in the auditorium seemed to understand thoroughly just what it meant to sing and play Brahms' exacting music, to train the choruses and rehearse singers and orchestra, to conceive and bring to being a smooth and sensitive performance. As on Saturday, a laurel wreath was proffered to the conductor, who, accepting it for all concerned, placed it against his stand. Let no one take lightly the implications in this gift of a laurel wreath. Here was an occasion where no other sign of appreciation would have served.

Although Brahms composed his Requiem over a period of years, those moments he spent conceiving his score and writing down the notes must have been not only inspired but exalted. For in at least two movements—the second and third—he achieved sublimity. Here he matched, perhaps surpassed, the sonorous beauty of his text, which he fashioned himself out of various passages from the Bible. Acknowledging the ease with which one can make extreme statements, one can also find it just to say that the second movement of this Requiem, with its marvelous employment of the kettle-drums, comes as near as any music to suggesting, not to fear, but the cosmic mystery of death.

This Requiem, like the B minor Mass of Bach, was not composed for use as a church ritual. There is no plan of religious service. Both composers were Protestants. For many years a popular but erroneous belief held that Brahms' Requiem was composed in memory of his mother, who died in 1865. This found its way into more than one reputable book on music. But Brahms had worked upon parts of the Requiem before that time, and it is now accepted that his original intent was to rear a memorial to Robert Schumann, who befriended Brahms as a youth.

The performance was one that could have been achieved only by such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, such a conductor as Dr Koussevitzky and by choristers so well trained as the Harvard and Radcliffe men and women under Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth. Save for momentary obscuring of vocal lines in the celebrated fuge of the third movement, and some forced tone from the sopranos when Brahms ventured too far above the treble clef, the singing was excellent. Miss Vreeland's work showed plainly her improvement as an "oratorio" singer since she first appeared here. She has banished that strained manner of delivery so common among present-day soloists of less than first rank. Mr McClosky had difficulty with tempo and rhythm at the outset of his first solo, but subsequently he improved.

There could have been no more fitting end to such a Festival than this marvelous Requiem, so well performed.

C. W. D.

RSONAL and SOCIAL

EVERYBODY COME TO THE POP CONCERT
NEW ENGLAND MED CENTRE
SYMPHONY HALL
MONDAY EVE MAY 7
SINGLE TICKETS
TABLES FOR FIVE
SINGLE TICKETS
TABLES FOR FOUR

(Transcript Photo by Warren Colby)

Boston Dispensary Volunteers Urge Attendance at the Pops on Monday, May 7, When the Medical Center Will Benefit. Left to Right—Miss Pauline Ehrlich, Miss Elizabeth Harding, Chairman of Volunteers, and Miss Ellen Pierce, a Debutante

Her. Apr 30

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the last concert of its 52d season last night in Symphony hall. It was a concert in the series of the Brahms Festival. (A German "Requiem" by Brahms will be performed this afternoon as the third pension fund concert of the season, bringing the ending of the Brahms festival.)

The program of last night comprised these works: Academic Festival Overture; Piano Concerto, D minor No. 1 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch); Symphony, C minor, No. 1. The first symphony was chosen probably on account of its sonorous close with the now famous introduction suggested as some think by the tones of the Alpine horn awakening echoes from mountain after mountain in the Bernese Oberland. Yet in the first years of this symphony in Europe as in this country it met with a cool reception; even Clara Schumann was at first disappointed in the work. She missed the "melodic flight" she found in some of Brahms's chamber music; in Vienna and in Munich the audiences were cold; when it was first heard in Boston in 1878 John S. Dwight found the symphony "coldly elaborate, artificial and not to be mentioned in the same day with any symphony by Schumann, Mendelssohn or the great one by Schubert; certainly it cannot be popular. It will not be loved like the dear masterpieces of genius." In Europe the symphony was a long time in coming into its own. Hanslick was moved to write an article inquiring into the causes of the popular dislike. And so it was with the piano concerto in D minor; leading critics of Germany found it dry"; a barren waste. Nor is it surprising that the Academic Festival Overture, that joyous pot-pourri of students' songs, a piece d'occasion, was preferred to the Tragic Overture. There has been a readjustment of values. The pendulum has swung far the other way. The music of Brahms has its fanatical worshippers. It is the fashion to rave over it without discrimination; to charge those taking a calm view of his works as a whole with blasphemy against the Lord's anointed.

The concerto played by Mr. Gabrilowitsch last night has never been ranked by a concert audience as the equal of the one in B flat. The first two movements were intended originally for a symphony that was begun in 1854 but was never completed. No wonder the concerto was at first coldly received by the public and by the critics. Brahms himself admitted that it was a "brilliant and decided failure"; but he was sure it would please some day. The firm of Breitkof and Haertel refused to publish the concerto. Does it not even today arouse respect perhaps, rather than affection even when it is played by Mr. Gabrilowitsch and the Boston Symphony orchestra?

The pianist gave the full force, the demoniacal fury of the first movement and a poetic reading of the slow movement whenever Brahms allowed him to be poetic; but the strength of this concerto is in the orchestra, and Dr. Koussevitzky gave a magnificent reading of the score. Here it may be said as was said yesterday, seldom are a conductor and a pianist so fully one in musical understanding and artistic sympathy. One doubts whether any other pianist could so eloquently express the spirit in turn of two concertos so different in mood as the one of yesterday and the one of last night. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, himself the skilled conductor of an excellent orchestra, was surely the first to recognize and appreciate the support given him by the orchestra as by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The audience again was enthusiastic in its enjoyment and approval. It was loath to leave the hall after the symphony; loath to bid farewell to conductor and orchestra if only for a few months. The concert was a memorable close to a brilliant season.

Pop Concert May 8 for Medical Center

Tran. Apr 29

Elizabeth Harding Heads Group of Volunteer Workers Who Are Planning Benefit

With the Pops opening next week a pleasant way to raise money for the many charities so much in need of it suggests itself, and first to take advantage of it is that group of energetic debutantes and post-debs who are doing such amazing work at The Boston Dispensary and the Boston Floating Hospital, the two hospital units of the New England Medical Center.

Miss Elizabeth Harding, daughter of the Francis A. Hardings of Chestnut Hill, has been working at The Dispensary since she made her debut two seasons ago. Every morning finds her at her job. She likes it so well she sticks to it even in summer. She is chairman of a large group of volunteer workers, who have been making plans in their own quiet, efficient way for a benefit night at the Pops, at Symphony Hall, and they have chosen Monday, May 8. With more than a week to go, they already have more than seventy table reservations, and they are going to sell many more for that date to aid the Medical Center.

Tickets can be obtained from Miss Harding and Miss Ehrlich, at 25 Bennet street, or by calling Hancock 5650.

Committee members for the concert are: Miss Constance Babcock, Miss Gertrude Ball, Miss Brenda Blunt, Miss Charlotte Burack, Miss Etta Cannon, Miss Constance Collins, Miss Mary Curtis, Miss Pauline Ehrlich, Mrs. Sloan Gibson, Miss Eleanora Grannis, Miss Charlotte Hanson, Miss Elizabeth Harding, Miss Mabel Hatheway, Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, Jr., Miss Sylvia Hurwitz, Miss Eleanor Jones, Miss Charlotte Mann, Miss Florence Martineau, Miss Elizabeth Meade and Miss Barbara Morton.

Miss Ellen Pierce, Miss Marian Reggio, Miss Catherine Rotch, Miss Edna Stedman, Miss Eleanor Stephenson, Miss Peggy Tarbell, Miss Rosemary Terhune, Miss Anne Torbert, Miss Peggy Turner, Miss Martha Wing and Miss Alice Wood.

Those who have taken tables include: Miss Martha Alford, Mrs. John W. Bartol, Mrs. Charles Belknap, Mrs. George F. Bremer, Mrs. Frederick H. Briggs, Mrs. Charles C. Cabot, Mrs. Chilton R. Cabot, Mrs. Parker Converse, Mrs. John A. Cousens, Mrs. Frank A. Day, Dr. and Mrs. Hilbert F. Day, Mrs. Adolph Ehrlich, Mrs. Ronald A. Ferry, Mrs. Waldo E. Forbes, Miss Sophie Friedman, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham, Mrs. William A. Gaston, Miss Ruth Gibson, Henry O. Gilbert, Mrs. Arthur Grannis, Miss Eleanora Grannis, Mrs. William C. Gray, Mrs. Henry V. Greenough, Miss Josephine Griffith and Mrs. Richard W. Hale.

Mrs. Francis A. Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Hatheway, Miss Florence Hatheway Miss Mabel Hatheway, Mrs. Richard S. Humphrey, Mrs. James Hunnewell, Miss Helen Jackson, Mrs. William F. King, Mrs. John Lawrence, Mrs. George Lewis, Jr., Mrs. Alexander Lincoln, Miss M. B. Lothrop, Mrs. George A. Lyon, Robert W. Maynard, Mrs. Charles Mixter, Miss Harriet Moseley, Mrs. Gordon McTavish, Mrs. Hamilton Osgood, 2d., Mrs. Grafton Perkins, Miss Margery Peabody, Mrs. William G. Perry, Mrs. Abraham E. Pinanski, Dr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Pratt, and Miss Julia C. Prendergast.

Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Barbara Reynolds, Mrs. Charles Rheault, Mrs. Otis Weld Richardson, Mrs. Carleton Richmond, Mrs. James M. Rothwell, Miss Caroline Saltonstall, Mrs. Richard M. Saltonstall, Mrs. Robert W. Sayles, R. N. Sedgwick, Mrs. Percy E. Sheldon, Mrs. Henry M. Shreve, Mrs. Sumner Smith, Mrs. M. C. Stanwood, Dr. A. Warren Stearns, Mrs. J. Sidney Stone, Mrs. George Tarbell, Dr. Francis Thurmon, Mrs. Charles F. Tappan, Mrs. Charles Walcott, Mrs. Grant Walker, Mrs. Alexander Whiteside, Mrs. John C. Whicher and Mrs. Orrin G. Wood.

Beer Renews an Ancient Alliance With the Pops

By Moses Smith
Music Editor

Adv. Apr 30

THE HOMILY for today is suggested by a sentence from the announcement of the opening of the Pops concerts on Wednesday evening: "The menu, extended so far as the law allows, will have some resemblance to the bill-of-fare of the old time Pops."

In less dignified language, beer is back. Quibble not about the exact alcoholic content. The important thing is that after a dozen dry years, during which the grumblers insisted that Pops would never be the same without beer, these concerts are about to resume their "normal" aspect.

Now the Pops are 47 years old, only a few years younger, indeed, than the winter subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself. Shortly after this orchestra was founded by Major Higginson the spring season of popular concerts was begun, primarily to lengthen the season of the players in the orchestra. Thus more attractive contracts could be offered to desirable new members.

This economic function of the Pops remains even today its principal raison d'etre. Naturally if, after the season, there remains an actual profit to be applied to the inevitable orchestral deficit from the winter concerts no one is less happy.

So far as the public was concerned, these concerts were meant to fill a place resembling that of the German bier-garten, which Higginson knew well in his student days. Instead of rigid chairs lined up in regular columns and aisles, the public was seated at tables, at which refreshments were served. The food was good, the beers and wines excellent; for those who smoked—"smokes." In such atmosphere a Beethoven symphony was scarcely so appropriate or desirable as a Strauss waltz. The whole thing was well synchronized with the calendar, on which was writ SPRING.

There are stories without end of beer-guzzling at the old Pops, too familiar to bear repetition, but all pointing to the conclusion that the music was an excuse for sociable drinking and chatter. Quite naturally, therefore, there were viewers-with-alarm when Prohibition arrived, threatening to destroy this institution unique in America.

Well, brethren, the Pops have had their ups and downs during these 12 years, but they have managed to survive. During the past three seasons Arthur Fiedler has been conductor, at the same time when business conditions in the world have been—shall we say?—unsettled. In this period the Pops have even forged ahead. Beer or no beer, the Pops had last season one of the best attendance records in their entire history.

And this has been going on, mind, while the movies were supposed to be running such institutions as the Pops into the ground. Some of the successful comeback of the Pops is due, no doubt, to an improved popular taste, an increased interest in so-called classical music. Some of it is due, certainly, to Arthur Fiedler's shrewd building of programs. Some must be traced to the enterprise of the Symphony Hall management. Whatever the reasons, it is clear that the dread of beer-less Pops was unfounded.

Despite this fine reasoning, however, you may be assured that the management at Symphony Hall is very happy about the return of beer.

182

COMMENT CONCERNING MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The "Pops" Begin This Week Another season of "Pop" concerts will begin in Symphony Hall Wednesday evening. Arthur Fiedler will conduct. As in the past, the orchestra will number about 85 players, and the programs will run to "light classics" and new and familiar popular pieces.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Refreshments will be served at the tables. Beer will resume its place on the "Pops" menu. These concerts will be played every weekday evening and on alternate Sundays. The first of the Sunday concerts comes on May 14. The program for Wednesday evening and those for the remainder of the week follow:

Wednesday, May 3. "Emperor" March, Wagner; Overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; Gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; Fantasy on Themes from "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; Cuban Overture (Rumba) (first time in Boston), Gershwin; "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," arranged for strings by Alfred Pochon; "Molly on the Shore," Grainger; Bolero, Ravel; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltz, Strauss; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," prelude, Wagner.

Thursday, May 4. "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; Three Dances from "The Bartered Bride," Smetana; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; from the suite "Mother Goose," Ravel; Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major, Liszt; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Girls of Baden," waltzes, Komzak; Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Friday, May 5—Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Suite, Mendelsshon; Minuet, Bolzoni; "William Tell," Overture, Rossini; Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; "Lohengrin," Finale of Act 1, Wagner; "The Band Wagon," Selection, Schwartz; "Estudiantina," Waltz, Waldteufel; Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanoff.

Saturday, May 6—Polonaise, Chopin; "Sakuntala," Overture, Goldmark; "Perpetuum Mobile," Strauss; "Rigoletto," Fantasia, Verdi; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Gypsy Dance, Nachez; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "Grubenlichter," Waltz, Zeller; "New Moon," Selection, Romberg; "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa.

Brahms' Requiem Today

The "German Requiem" of Johannes Brahms will be performed in Symphony Hall at 3:30 this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. Dr Koussevitzky will conduct. Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, are soloists. This concert, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the Symphony's pension fund, brings to conclusion both the Brahms Festival and the Boston Symphony se-

---

MUSIC

BRAHMS'S GERMAN REQUIEM

Closing the festival in honor of the centenary of Brahms's birth, a German Requiem was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. It was a Pension Fund concert. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the performance, which was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, with Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, as soloists.

The Requiem is a work of peculiar beauty, steeped in the shadowy and, to some, forbidding mysticism characteristic of so much German art and philosophy. There is an insecure, a mournful and uncertain comfort in the words, "Who goeth forth and weepeth, and beareth precious seed, shall doubtless return with rejoicing, and bring his sheaves with him." The work is full of foreboding, and heavy with the constant consciousness of death, and of man's dissolution. There is no joyousness in the final chorus, which is as resigned as the words, "Blessed are the dead . . . that they rest from their labours, and that their works follow after them." In those words which express only a sorrowful and human acceptance of extinction, may be found the explanation for the lack of religious ecstasy in the work, for the almost terrified, and not at all exultant hysteria of the chorus on the words, "Grave, where is thy triumph? Death, where is thy sting?"

But that the Requiem is gloomy, trenchant with fears and suffering, does not mean that it is not beautiful. As it was performed yesterday—particularly the second half of it—it seemed again to be a rarely well integrated and honest piece of funeral music, comforting with sympathetic gestures, but stricken too with the terrors and tears of the bereft.

Except for the orchestra, which seemed tired, and was slow on some cues, and for a few uncertain moments in one of the choruses, it was a splendid performance. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses had been well trained and sang with devotional intensity and care. Miss Vreeland and Mr. McClosky sang with understanding and sincerity, their voices sounding out pleasingly into the packed hall.

There was a spontaneous tribute to the performers, and most especially to Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, at the close of the concert, into which the whole audience joined heartily.

E. B.

Post May 1

SYMPHONY ENDS WITH REQUIEM

Season and Brahms' Festival Closes With Chorus

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a performance of the German Requiem the Symphony Orchestra's 52d season and its Brahms festival, in honor of the centenary of that composer's birth, came concurrently to an end yesterday afternoon.

TWO GOOD SOLOISTS

This performance of the Requiem was given in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, making, exceptionally, a third Pension Fund Concert within one season. The chorus yesterday, as in recent performances of this work in Symphony Hall under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, came from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, who had been heard in songs of Brahms at the concert of last Thursday afternoon, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, who had already been soloist with the orchestra this season in the three performances of Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast." Mr. McClosky was particularly successful yesterday in the first of his two solos; to his music he brought a seriousness that was happily without a suggestion of the sanctimonious and a richness of tone that set his measures in a good light.

Closes the Festival

The Requiem brought an obvious and at the same time an appropriate end to the Festival. It would have been still more impressive had Brahms been able to sustain through the seven numbers of the Requiem the inspiration or, if you prefer, the inventiveness that marks the first four. There is nothing in choral music more solemnly beautiful than the opening section, and the fourth division, the chorus, "How lovely is thy dwelling place," is possessed of an unfading charm.

It has been urged that these collegiate singers lack the body of tone essential for choral music of this type and such criticism is, of course, well founded.

With Beauty of Tone

Yet there were compensations yesterday, as there have been in the past. Dr. Koussevitzky's youthful singers answered him with a raptness and an elation, a devotion to and enthusiasm for their task that their elders might scarcely summon. And there was besides this, particularly in the women's chorus, a frequent beauty of tone that owed not a little to the freshness of the voices.

The scenes of enthusiasm that marked the last two Symphony Concerts were repeated yesterday, and among those who shared deservedly in the plaudits were Dr. Davidson and Mr. Woodworth, who had trained respectively the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses. The audience completely filled the hall.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Globe May 1

Brahms Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's festival in observance of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Johannes Brahms was ended yesterday afternoon with a performance of "A German Requiem." This concert, which likewise marked the conclusion of the Boston Symphony's 52d season, was in the nature of a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund. Dr Koussevitzky conducted. The choral portions were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and David Blair McClosky, baritone, were soloists.

The hall was filled. When the performance was over and conductor, orchestra, soloists, choristers, and Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth stood together upon the stage, a veritable pandemonium broke loose. This was the sort of demonstration that occurs rarely in Symphony Hall, and only when a vast audience has been indescribably stirred. In all the clapping, cries of "bravo," and pounding of feet, no one was forgotten. Those in the auditorium seemed to understand thoroughly just what it meant to sing and play Brahms' exacting music, to train the choruses and rehearse singers and orchestra, to conceive and bring to being a smooth and sensitive performance. As on Saturday, a laurel wreath was proffered to the conductor, who, accepting it for all concerned, placed it against his stand. Let no one take lightly the implications in this gift of a laurel wreath. Here was an occasion where no other sign of appreciation would have served.

Although Brahms composed his Requiem over a period of years, those moments he spent conceiving his score and writing down the notes must have been not only inspired but exalted. For in at least two movements—the second and third—he achieved sublimity. Here he matched, perhaps surpassed, the sonorous beauty of his text, which he fashioned himself out of various passages from the Bible. Acknowledging the ease with which one can make extreme statements, one can also find it just to say that the second movement of this Requiem, with its marvelous employment of the kettle-drums, comes as near as any music to suggesting, not to fear, but the cosmic mystery of death.

This Requiem, like the B minor Mass of Bach, was not composed for use as a church ritual. There is no plan of religious service. Both composers were Protestants. For many years a popular but erroneous belief held that Brahms' Requiem was composed in memory of his mother, who died in 1865. This found its way into more than one reputable book on music. But Brahms had worked upon parts of the Requiem before that time, and it is now accepted that his original intent was to rear a memorial to Robert Schumann, who befriended Brahms as a youth.

The performance was one that could have been achieved only by such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, such a conductor as Dr Koussevitzky and by choristers so well trained as the Harvard and Radcliffe men and women under Dr Davison and Mr Woodworth. Save for momentary obscuring of vocal lines in the celebrated fuge of the third movement, and some forced tone from the sopranos when Brahms ventured too far above the treble clef, the singing was excellent. Miss Vreeland's work showed plainly her improvement as an "oratorio" singer since she first appeared here. She has banished that strained manner of delivery so common among present-day soloists of less than first rank. Mr McClosky had difficulty with tempo and rhythm at the outset of his first solo, but subsequently he improved.

There could have been no more fitting end to such a Festival than this marvelous Requiem, so well performed.

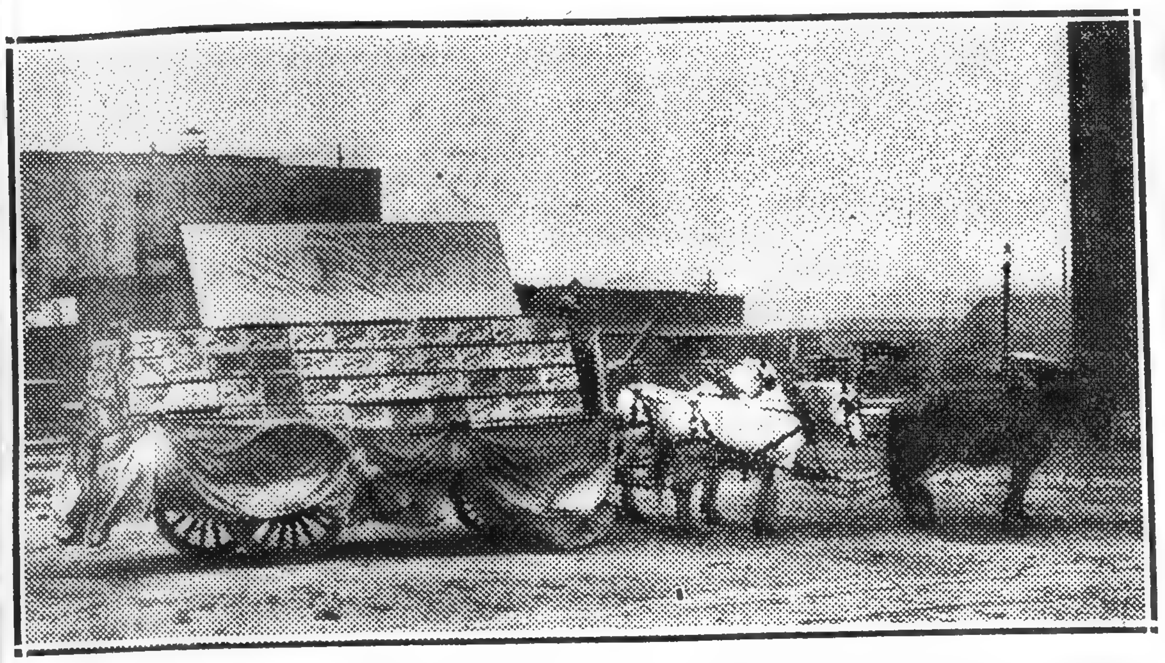
C. W. D.

may 1 Trans

BOSTON EVENIN

ington News --- May

Beer for the Pops



(Transcript Photo by Frank E. Colby)

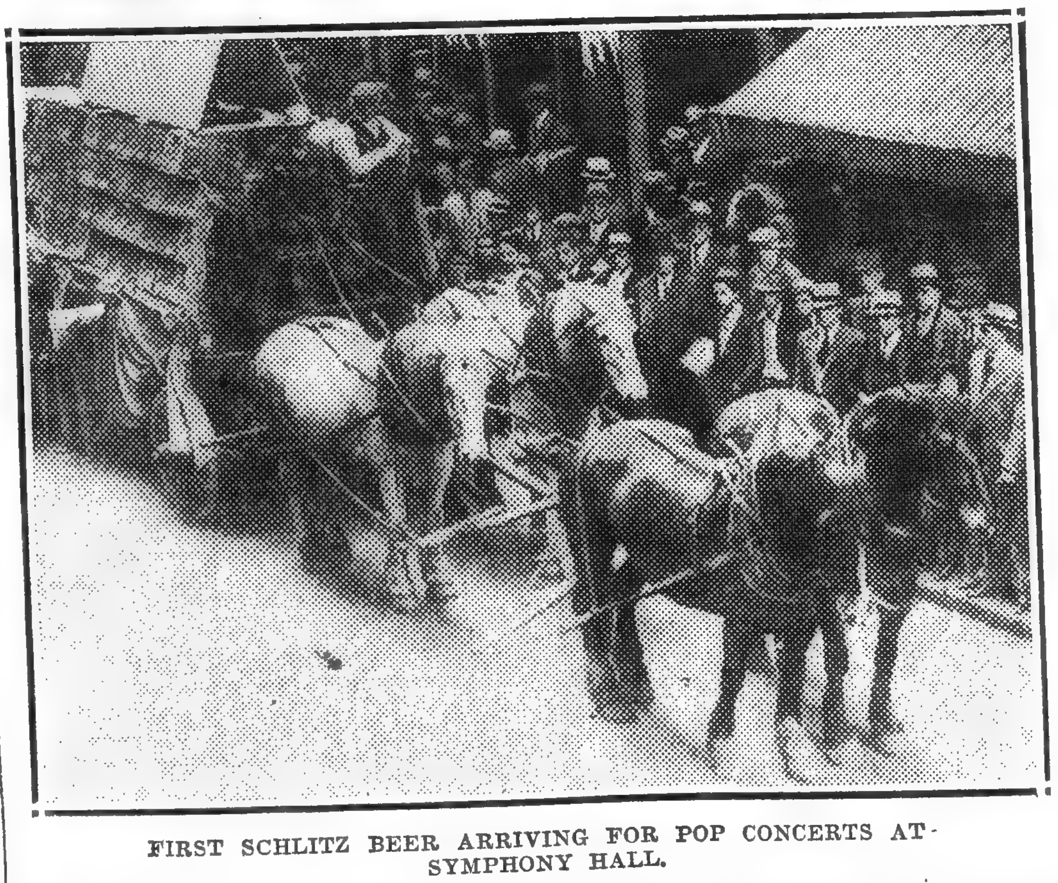
200 Cases of 3.2 Beer from Milwaukee for Symphony Hall

AT the opening of the Pops in Symphony Hall Wednesday night, New England will have its first taste since 1918 of Schlitz—"The beer that made Milwaukee famous." The first shipment of Schlitz to enter New England was hauled to Symphony Hall by a four-horse dray this morning. It was conveyed at the order of J. F. Foley of the Milwaukee Beverage Company from his warehouses at 34 Midway street. Two hundred sealed cases rest safely in Symphony Hall awaiting the Pops opening.

Veteran patrons of the Pops may remember that Schlitz was the first beer served at the Pops, then called the Promenade Concerts, when they were started in the old Music Hall in 1885. Joseph Gahm, the New England agent for many years, then had the concession for refreshments at the Pops. This brand stood upon the Pops menu with others for the thirty-five years that beer was an integral part of the Pops. The Pops, indeed, were founded by C. A. Ellis in a successful attempt to introduce in America the beer garden custom of Europe where music lovers enjoy fine music in the summer season while seated sociably at tables.

This will be one of a considerable list of malt beverages, national, local and imported, which will be served at the Pops.

POPS OPENING TOMORROW TO GIVE FIRST SCHLITZ BEER SINCE 1918



FIRST SCHLITZ BEER ARRIVING FOR POP CONCERTS AT SYMPHONY HALL.

At the opening of the Pops in Symphony Hall tomorrow night, New England will have its first taste since 1918 of Schlitz—"the beer that made Milwaukee famous." The first shipment of Schlitz to enter New England was hauled safely to Symphony Hall by a four-horse drawn dray yesterday. It was conveyed at the order of J. F. Foley of the Milwaukee Beverage Company from his warehouse at 34 Midway st. Two hundred sealed cases rest safely in Symphony Hall awaiting the Pops opening.

Veteran patrons of the Pops may remember that Schlitz was the first beer served at the Pops, then called the Promenade Concerts, when they were started in the old Music Hall in 1885. Joseph Gahm, the New England agent for many years, then had the concession for refreshments at the Pops. This brand stood upon the Pops menu with others for the 35 years that beer was an integral part of the Pops. The Pops, indeed, were founded by C. A. Ellis in a successful attempt to introduce in America the beer garden custom of Europe where music lovers enjoy fine music in the Summer season while seated sociably at tables.

Globe May 2

---

of the most colorful and m its long history.

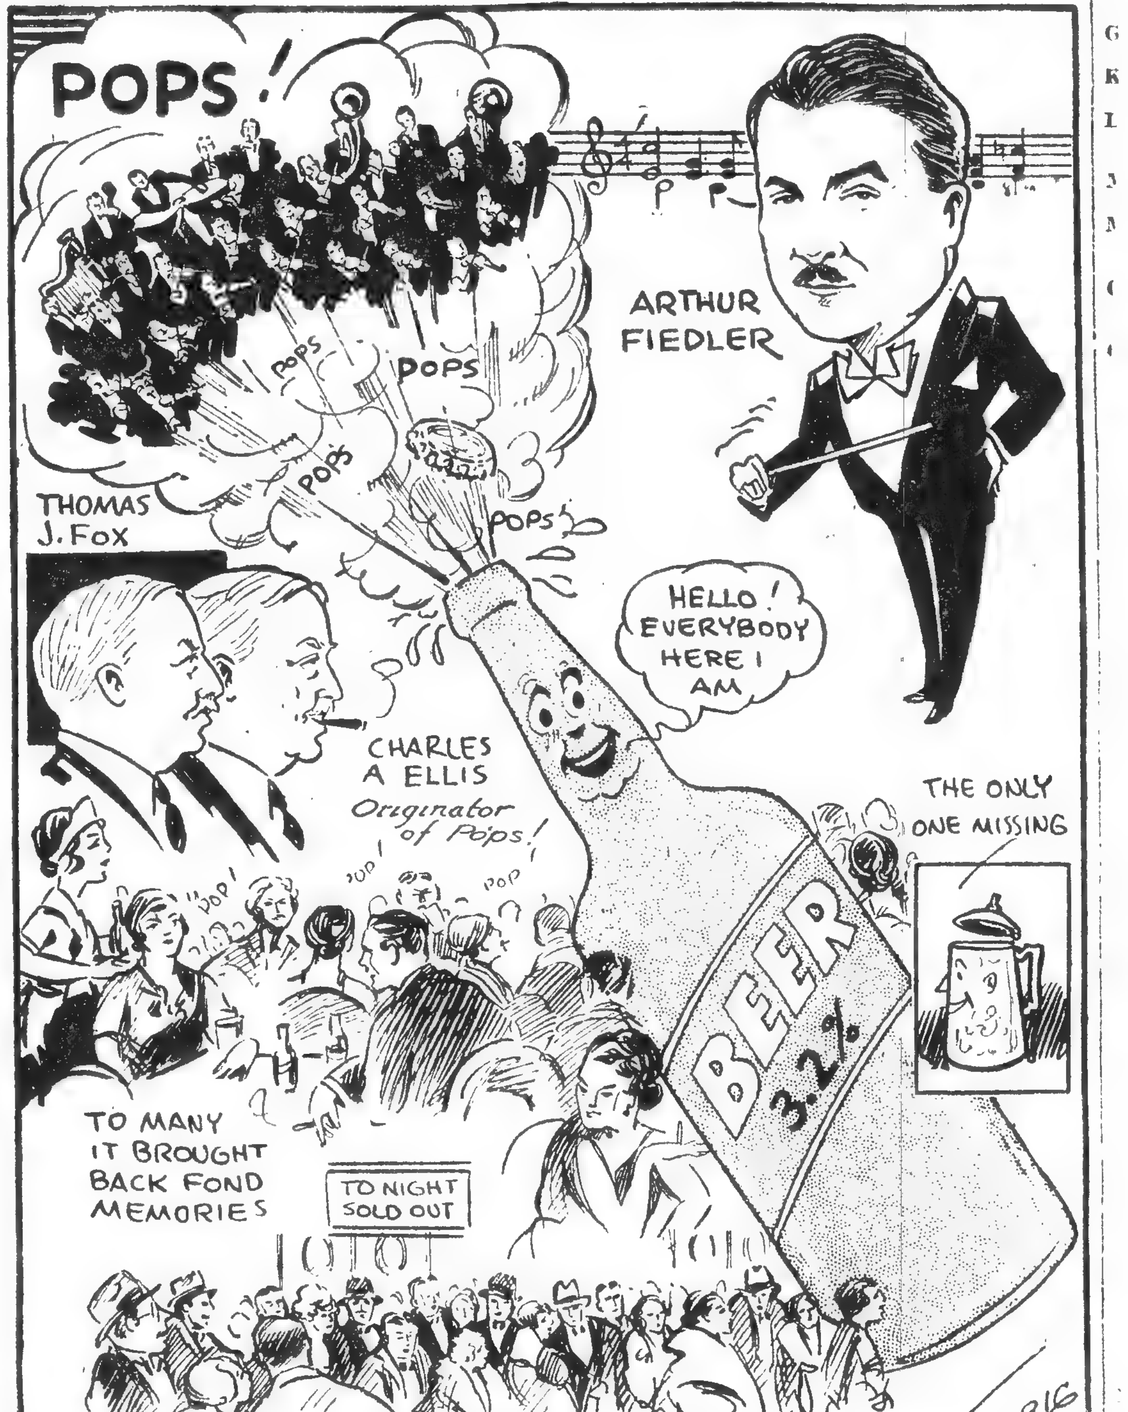
Continued on Page 7—Fourth

NAVY YARD T

THE BOSTON GLOBE—T

LIKE POPS OF THE OLD DAYS IS 1933 OPENING--S. R. O. OUT EARLY

Beer, of Course, and Wine List Too—Crowd Gayer Than Usual—New March by Secretary Woodin Makes Hit—Attire Less Formal



THE LOVERS OF MUSIC WITH BEER-JAMMED THE DOORS

The first thing any arrival at the "Pops" did last night—provided he was sensitive to the times—was to look for the beer list. Yes, there it was, with some almost incomprehensible names. There was, moreover, a wine list, with such fabulous designations as "burgundy" and "claret." For once, in what remains of the jazz age, youth had to look to age for enlightenment regarding certain of these names.

Everything about this opening of a new season of "Pops" appeared to be a little gayer than customary. It must have been the beer and the wine, though perish the thought that these contributed more than a respectable degree of conviviality! There were bottles all the way from Milwaukee, St Louis, Canada, England, France, Germany. And of course Boston was represented.

The S. R. O. sign was hung out early. The audience preserved the expected balance between the young and a little younger, but seemed to be more informal in attire than has been customary. There were more business suits, with a few tweeds thrown in; more dresses which to the ordinary male would appear suitable for any occasion but a swanky party. Tuxedos and evening gowns distinctly had the worst of it.

There were two figures in the hall who must have enjoyed a particular pleasure at being present. These were Charles A. Ellis, who started the "Pops" away back in the '80s, and Thomas J. Fox, one of the architects who designed Symphony Hall.

Cool green and shining gold were the order of the decorations, as they have been for the last few seasons. This innovation of Robert Edmond Jones has proved a distinct visual pleasure at the "Pops."

Mr Fiedler, beginning a fourth season as conductor, received the hearty welcome which invariably falls to him whenever he appears to lead an orchestra. He elected to begin a thoughtfully balanced program with Wagner's "Emperor" march, a piece that even the highbrows seldom have opportunity to hear nowadays. This resounding music was perfectly suited to set the mood of the evening. There is, after all, something reassuring in music with plenty of volume.

The conductor sprang a surprise in offering, as an encore, a march, "Franklin D. Roosevelt," by Secretary of the Treasury Woodin. No mistaking how the audience felt about it. It had to be repeated.

There was even a distinction of a "first time in Boston." This was George Gershwin's "Cuban Overture," otherwise a rumba. Mr Gershwin's ever-vigorous "Wintergreen for President" likewise had to be played twice.

The remainder of the program ranged through operatic and miscellaneous favorites of years past to excerpts from the score of "Face the Music." To have omitted a waltz, particularly one by Strauss, would be unthinkable at the "Pops." So Mr Fiedler selected "Wine, Women and Song." Wagner's overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" brought the festivities to an end.

So-o-o (with proper reference to Ed Wynn), in spite of all the matters that disturb us, the Spring has brought, in the "Pops," a certain degree of normalcy.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM

Flowers" and "Dedication," while Arthur Shepherd's "Four Western Pieces" was played three times, and Douglas Moore's "Circus Parade" and "A Symphony of Autumn" were played once.

Other single performances were Carl McKinley's "Masquerade," Daniel Gregory Mason's "Chanticleer," John Powell's "In Old Virginia," Charles Sanford Skilton's "Cheyenne War Dance," Leo Sowerby's "Irish Washerwoman," Victor Herbert's "Irish Rhapsody," Werner Janssen's "New Year's Eve in New York," and

184

A TOAST TO THE STEIN SONG OF MAINE

KENDALL EMERSON A. F. JONAS, JR.

MISS NANCY MORISON MISS ELIZABETH MIXTER

Miss Nancy Morison and Miss Elizabeth Mixter, Boston debutantes, are shown with their escorts, Kendall Emerson and A. F. Jonas, Jr., as they raised their glasses filled with the new beer in a toast to the University of Maine when the "Stein Song" was played at the Pops Concert, Symphony Hall, last night. It was the first time beer was served at the favorite concert in 13 years. Cheerio! (Boston American photo.)

---

goun Square section. Association.

Clink of Beer Glasses Merry Music at Opening of Pops

With the clinking of the beer glasses providing an undertone to the sound of the violins for the first time in 13 years, the pops opened their 48th season in Symphony Hall last night.

Long before Conductor Arthur Fiedler stepped out on the stage, Symphony Hall was crowded and the waitresses were busy rushing brew. The S. R. O. sign had been out for several days and from all indications, whatever the effect of 3.2 on employment and business, it means a new lease of life for Boston's most famous concerts.

People came from all ranks and walks of life. The debutante and the college man were there with the matron and the executive. Many turned out who had not been to a pop concert since the noble experiment got under way.

Dinner jackets and low backed evening dresses were side by side with less festive attire. The one thing the audience had in common was the beer and the smiles on their faces. There was beer of every kind including a special shipment from Milwaukee sent on for the opening night. Some of the first brew from abroad was on sale.

The crowd cheered and demanded an encore when the orchestra played a song composed by Secretary of the Treasury Woodin in honor of Franklin D. Roosevelt. And when they broke into the famous old stein song, they rose on their chairs, grasped glasses and sang.

"For its always fair weather when good fellows get together."

"I never heard them sing like that in all the years I've been coming," said one society matron as she left the hall.

Music

The Pops

The Symphony Hall Pop concerts began their forty-eighth season last night, with Mr. Arthur Fiedler again directing the orchestra of Boston Symphony players. The audience, which filled the hall, received with enthusiasm the first program of the season. The green-and-gilt decorations of Mr. Robert Edmond Jones lent their now familiar festive aid to the walls.

The "popular" character which these concerts have so successfully resumed under Mr. Fiedler's direction was evident in the opening list of works. From the classics he had selected items to appeal not only to the musician but as well to the lover of tunes and of orchestral colors Wagner's "Emperor" March and "Meistersinger" Overture, Smetana's "Bartered Bride" Overture, the Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" and a Fantasy on themes from "Hansel and Gretel." Otherwise his choice ran from such way-station pieces as Grainger's "Molly on the Shore" and Ravel's inescapable "Bolero" to a Strauss waltz and examples of the masterworks of Messrs. Kern and Gershwin. Mr. Gershwin's Cuban Overture (Rumba) was played for the first time in Boston.

The Pops audience of today reflects the popular quality of the music. It does not take its pleasure-making too seriously. It can listen to the music and talk at the same time. There is an air of informality about the concerts which undoubtedly belongs to such occasions. By all signs, the Pops are off to one of their most prosperous seasons.

L. A. S.

Pop Concerts Get Favorite Old Beer

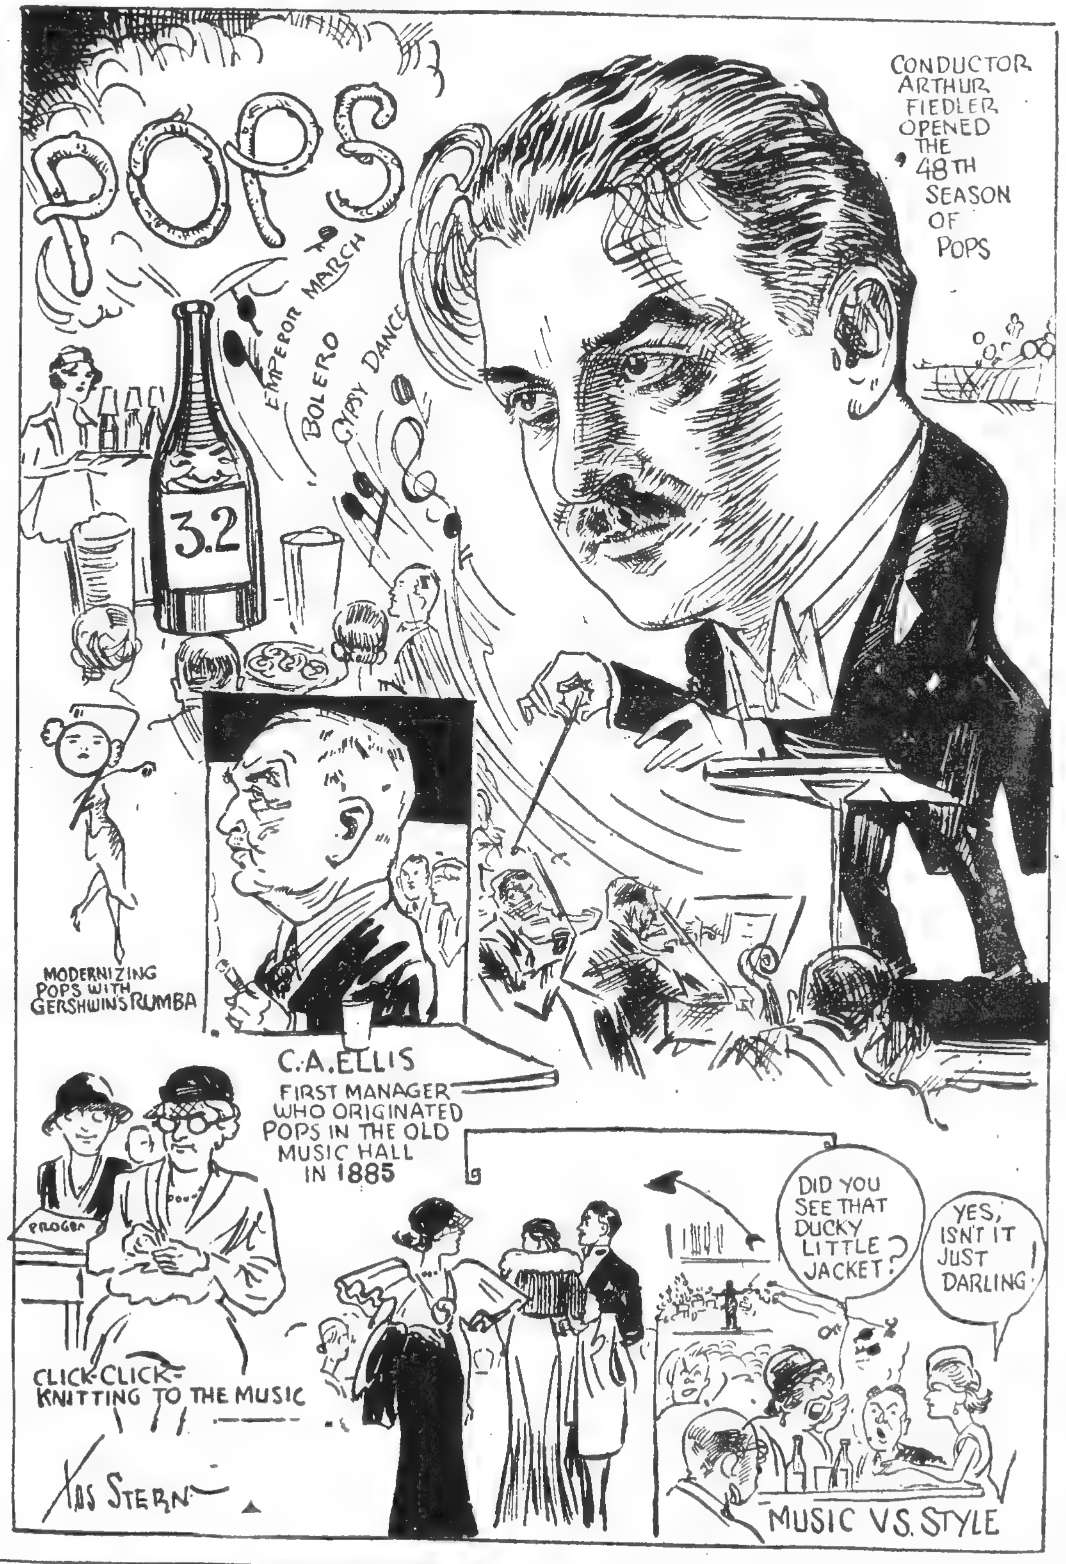
May 1

Regd

Boston's Pop concerts, which start their 48th season tomorrow night at Symphony Hall, were copied from the old European beer garden custom, with light brews to go with the light music; and the first beer to be served at the old Music Hall pops was Schlitz's. It will be served again, after a lapse of 15 years, for 200 cases of the brew that made Milwaukee famous have arrived at Symphony Hall through special order of the Schlitz president, Erwin C. Uihlein.

THURSDAY, THE BOSTON HERALD MA

AT OPENING OF POPS SEASON



POPS
EMPEROR MARCH
BOLERO
GYPSY DANCE
3.2
CONDUCTOR ARTHUR FIEDLER OPENED THE 48TH SEASON OF POPS
MODERNIZING POPS WITH GERSHWIN'S RUMBA
C.A. ELLIS
FIRST MANAGER WHO ORIGINATED POPS IN THE OLD MUSIC HALL IN 1885
PROGRA
CLICK-CLICK-KNITTING TO THE MUSIC
DID YOU SEE THAT DUCKY LITTLE JACKET?
YES, ISN'T IT JUST DARLING!
MUSIC VS. STYLE
YOS STERN

POP PROGRAM

Arthur Fiedler announces the following program for the second night of the Pops in Symphony hall tonight:

Pomp and Circumstance	Elgar
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Valse Triste	Sibelius
Three Dances from "The Bartered Bride."	Smetana
Finale of "Scheherazade"	Rimsky-Korsakov
From the Suite "Mother Goose"	Ravel
Fourteenth Hungarian Rhapsody, in F major	Liszt
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection	Gershwin
"Girls of Baden," Waltzes	Komzak
Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser"	Wagner

TRIBUTE TO BEER AT POPS OPENING

Legalized Brew Shares 'First Night' Honors

Last night's opening of the 48th seasn of the Pops in Symphony hall was something more than a resumption of spring and summer programs by a symphonic orchestra of 85. It was a popular tribute to the return of that legalized beer which, though a trifle nearer than the old near-beer, is still non-intoxicating, if we may believe our neighbors. Early in the evening it was evident that here was a beer-minded audience, at the floor tables at least. Attention to the lighter musical numbers, if not wholly disrespectful, was unmistakably indifferent. Only once did a selection command absolute silence. Then, strangely enough, it was Ravel's crescendant "Bolero" which worked the miracle. Often a bottle dropped to the floor, with no sawdust to mitigate its fall. Not that it was a noisy audience; just a cross-section possibly new to the Pops, or one intent on celebrating the new era, with less than customary regard for an attractive muscial menu.

Mr. Fiedler, vociferously greeted, called repeatedly to the conductor's stand for applause which frequently netted extra numbers, was in glowing mood. Unlike Mr. Adamowski or other predecessors, he disdained the monitory tap of the baton to exact attention, but plunged forthwith into his work. His program was typical of the man: wide in range, loyal to old standbys; welcoming a novelty like Gershwin's Cuban overture, "Rumba," with its queer instruments and its Gershwin dissonances; and recognizing the worth of contemporaneous composers like Jerome Kern through excerpts from "Music in the Air." For stringed sentiment he gave "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," Alfred Pochon's arrangement; and Percy Granger's "Molly on the Shore." The rest of the program ranged from Wagner's Emperor march to his prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," with Smetana, Bizet, Humperdinck, Ravel and Strauss between them. Of the several extras, Secretary Woodin's Franklin D. Roosevelt march and Gershwin's Wintergreen for President, out of "Of Thee I Sing," aroused the greatest enthusiasm.

The exceptional excellence of this mighty orchestra needs no further comment at this time. Nor does Mr. Fiedler need new phrases of praise for his program-making or for his command of his scores or his musicians. What seems of more pronounced interest at this time, the beginning of a new and undoubtedly a very successful season, is the fact that Boston, Milwaukee, St. Louis, even Canada and England, are again providing amber refreshments, that the pretzels are bigger and more appetizing, and that thirst for beer and hunger for music seem destined to abide content- [illegible] during the next 10

Pops, Hops, and Communal Song

Mr. Fiedler's Audience Becomes Vocal at Last — Sawdust and Decorum

THE forty-eighth season of Pop Concerts lost no time in getting under way at Symphony Hall last evening. Punct at eight-thirty-five—after the conventional five minutes' grace for late comers—Mr. Fiedler mounted his podium. The orchestra was as numerous as the platform would hold: large enough to have compassed the most pretentious score of Strauss—Richard, not Johann. Mr. Theodorowicz had assumed his summer post as concert master. Other first-desk players were still on hand. The hall—transformed from its winter dress of dull red and gray into a dazzling green-and-gold biergarten—was filled, or rapidly filling. The applause was sharp and brief. A couple of bows, and Mr. Fiedler's baton cut in on the Emperor March. The field was off!

But it was obvious from the start that other attractions as well as music had brought the company together. Even before Mr. Fiedler's appearance folks were casting eager glances over the pages headed: "To Nibble," "To Smoke," "To Eat,"—ah! here we are!—"To Drink!" The list was short and hoppy. For the convenience of future historians, who may inquire into the sumptuary habits of Bostonians, A. D. 1933, it may be reprinted here. It began with Schlitz and Pabst, added Budweiser, made room for Walsheimer from Germany, returned to Roxbury and Pickwick, crossed the border for Black Horse, and wound up with Bass's Dog's Head from Burton-on-the-Trent. A sufficiently varied selection, surely, for those conservative New Englanders who are content with a good, safe, four per cent. And the card added, for those who are willing to rob the grape of much that Nature has put in it, two "Burgundies" and a "Claret." For the rest there were listed three varieties of lemonade, three ginger ales, mineral waters, fresh grape juice, coffee, tea, and the traditional, blameless Pop punch.

It was not the Pop punch, however, which led the audience last evening to cheer, stamp its feet in the sawdust, and join in communal song. To be sure, the stamping was no more than a polite rumble. A Ninth Symphony has been similarly rewarded on a Saturday evening in winter. And the cheering was restrained—patriotic rather than bibulous, a fitting response to Secretary Woodin's "F. D. Roosevelt" March, tucked in by way of encore by the canny Mr. Fiedler, who knows when to spring a surprise. But about the song one cannot be so sure. Barring "special" nights, under the guidance of "song leaders," it is hard to recall a Pop Concert audience that really burst into music. They did last evening, and they admired their own vocal efforts so much that Mr. Fiedler—after a hasty conference of glances and shrugs with Mr. Theodorowicz—was forced to prolong an already long program by a further repetition. The occasion of this unprecedented ebullience was that half-forgotten ballad about a stein on the table. Despite the fact that the Pops management dispenses only bottled goods, and serves that in glasses, the stein-song got the best hand of the evening. So far has a benevolent Congress persuaded us in Boston to cast aside our legendary reticence!

Beer aside, it was an evening for good music and decorous behavior. Glasses and bottles rattled no more noisily than in the days when they contained mere carbonates and benzoates of soda, acetic acid, sulphur dioxide, artificial fruit coloring, glucose and similar alternatives for alcohol. Conversation was not so loud nor so general as to be obtrusive. The house was reasonably quiet for the slumber song from "Haensel und Gretel." It gave Mr. Gershwin's "Cuban Overture" a polite hearing and rather better than polite applause. It heard the first bars of the ineluctable "Bolero" in almost absolute silence. And as for the gypsy dance from Bizet's "Carmen" and the sensuous transitions of Strauss's "Wine. Woman and Song"—well. it is doubtful if either composer expected that his work would be mistaken for "Parsifal." And it is true that last evening's audience was in no mood for unwarranted solemnity.

Mr. Fiedler's happiest selections last evening were not those listed on the program. They were the supernumerary fragments which he inserted as encores. A "Slavonic Dance" from Dvorak was conventional enough addendum. Mr. Woodin's thumping marchpast was of another stripe. So was "Wintergreen for President"—rapturously applauded and repeated. So was the waltz from Heymann's score for "Kongress Tanzt"—a certain addition to the season's list of approved encores. And so, above all, were those brown October measures from Hovey and another hey-day. They turned the clock back fourteen years, and he would be a curmudgeon who denied that we all felt at least that much younger last evening.

D. W. B.

The Boston Symphony Season

May 1 Monitor

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

WITH a performance of "A German Requiem," the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought to a close, on the afternoon of April 30, a five-day Brahms Festival, and its fifty-second season.

The other works performed during these five days included the First, Second and Fourth Symphonies, the two Pianoforte Concertos, the Concerto for violin and violoncello, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the "Tragic" and "Academic Festival" Overtures. There was also a chamber program (April 27) at which were heard the Clarinet Quintet, the Piano Quartet in G minor, some songs (Miss Jeannette Vreeland) and some of the "Liebeslieder Waltzes," Op. 52 and 65, sung by a small group of Harvard and Radcliffe choristers. The vocal works were pleasingly presented, but the chief impression left by the performance of the instrumental items by members of the orchestra was that chamber music is better not played in Symphony Hall.

The Double Concerto (April 26) was almost a novelty. That is, it is seldom heard; and the rarity of its presentation is not surprising. At best, the work is ungrateful. The material of the middle and third movements is banal. The first movement is made of more pregnant stuff, and its facture is better, but so far as the solo parts are concerned it is unrewarding. Niemann suggests that only members of the same family can play the work. Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti have been members of the same orchestral family for a decade or more, and they achieved at least an admirable unanimity.

* * *

